ites, see Judg. 3:26-30. And for the spoils, see, e.g., Gen. 34:27-29; 1 Sam. 17:52-54; and 2 Kings 7:14-16.

The encounter between Achior and Judith (14:5-10) closes the secondary story of the Ammonite leader. The one who had been a benevolent preacher of the history of Israel and a proselyte is now a witness. A paradoxical witness, he gives his testimony by falling on his face and losing his spirit. The deed is so great that he cannot bear it and loses his senses. When he recovers, all he can do is pronounce another benediction. He is converted and is fully incorporated into the community of Israel, even against the rules of Deut. 23:3-4. With Judith's report, which the narrator does not repeat, time is taken up until daybreak.

14:11-19, In the Assyrian Camp. The narrator knows how to exploit contrasts. To the discovery and information in Bethulia correspond the discovery and spreading of the news in the camp. To the ritual joy of the besieged corresponds the funeral rite of the besiegers. The narrator enjoys telling us how the alarm rises along the military hierarchy toward the center and the head. There it is suddenly interrupted, for the general lies headless. The author also knows how to develop the discovery and the reaction by Bagoas in a crescendo of verbs. These verbs first move forward: "went . . . knocked . . . opened . . . found." Then they stop: "cried out . . . wept . . . groaned . . . shouted . . . rent his garments." Bagoas' report is intensively emotional. But his pain and indignation are the joy of the narrator and of the readers. The Jews, Bagoas says, are slaves and traitors, and a woman from among them "has brought disgrace." The woman has conquered the man, the servant the master.

Since the author was not willing to end the story at 13:10, this would be another good ending place, with the shouts of despair of the besiegers, in contrast to their arrogant confidence in the initial chapters. But the author would rather end with a joyous tone and wishes to savor and prolong the joy of victory. Narratively, we are now descending.

15:1-13, Denouement. This chapter does not add much to the narrative. It describes the rout of the enemy, pursuit, and plunder. The author could have saved time but is caught in the very web of the narrative, like a sportscaster after a victory for the home team.

One should note for their political implications the congratulations of the high priest and of the senate. The highest authorities confirm that belligerent resistance is the correct attitude and that collaborationism is wrong. The Israelites can plunder the material goods of the enemy, but they must not accept their customs.

Not only do the authorities approve, but they also affirm that "God is well pleased." This is the ultimate referendum, which the people approve with a unanimous "amen."

Then Judith, who has acted as a prophet, an intercessor, and a strategist, takes on the role of choreographer, like Miriam (see Exod. 14-15). Finally, she takes the crown of a poet. The storyteller will not begrudge praise and makes the protagonist the author of the final hymn.

16:1-17, Canticle of Judith. Her poem is wide in scope, like the prayer in chap. 9. Its movement is majestic, with synonymous repetition and evocative, bold strokes (vv. 3, 9). The generative theme is succinctly stated in v. 6: "But the Lord Almighty has foiled them by the hand of a woman" (RSV). "The Lord" is a name that resounds seven times in the hymn. He is "omnipotent" in creation and in repeated historical events. The "them" who are foiled are now the Assyrians, the very powerful and invincible Assyrians. "By the hand of a woman" refers to an individual and recent event. God chooses the weak to overcome the strong.

The structure of the hymn is as follows: (A) vv. 1-2, introduction; vv. 3-12, historical depiction; (B) v. 13, introduction; vv. 14-15, cosmic depiction; (C) vv. 16-17, conclusion. The parallelism between historical action and cosmic action is traditional (cf. Ps. 136). The eschatological ending harkens back to the prophets.

The relationship between the historical and the cosmic goes beyond a mere parallelism or coincidence. There is a unifying dynamism. The recent history has been dramatic—aggression, extreme danger, and miraculous deliverance. Such was also the drama of creation, with its resistance and rebellion, which the Lord's power repeatedly overcomes (cf. Isa. 52:9-11). Then comes a basic contrast. While God rules over the cosmos directly, in history God prefers to act and to triumph by means of the weak, as long as they fear the Lord. Judith's mighty deed has been above all a new revelation of the Lord.

Although the psalm is full of quotations and echoes from the OT, it is still original. What follows are a few parallels to guide readers:

- v. 4—Ps. 3:6; Isa. 37:24; Jer. 1:15
- v. 5—2 Kings 8:12; Ps. 137:9; Nah. 3:10
- v. 6—Judg. 4:9; Ps. 33:10
- v. 7—Deut. 1:28; 3:11
- v. 13—Exod. 15:1; Ps. 144:9
- v. 14—Pss. 33:6-9; 104:30
- v. 15—Pss. 46:3; 97:4-5; Mic. 1:4
- v. 17—Isa. 66:24

The section of highest poetical quality is vv. 3-9. Here one finds a well-developed antithesis between the massive and overwhelming advance of Assyria and Judith's meticulous actions: a woman against an army; seduction against aggression; beauty against strength. Between the two, as a wedge, intervenes the transcendent Lord, whose extended arm Judith is (v. 6). She is exalted by contrasts of mythical or legendary flavor ("the sons of Titans, . . . tall giants," v. 7, RSV).

Verse 9 is masterful in its use of the ambivalent verbs "ravished" and "captivated," which belong to the language both of war and love, as well as by the symmetry of its poetic lines and by the surprising leap from subject to subject ("her sandal . . . her beauty . . . her sword").

The final verse is also an admonition. Empires and nations decide their own final lot, "in the day of judgment" by their attitudes toward the weak people of Israel. The psalm is followed by a processional dance (cf. Ps. 68) that leads to the Temple in Jerusalem.

16:8-25, Epilogue. It would appear that the readers of that time, or at least many of them, would wish to know what happened next. So, Judith was very rich, very famous; she had many suitors; and she did not marry. Would this disillusion readers? No. With her unbreakable fidelity to the memory of her first husband Judith symbolizes the fidelity of the people to its only Lord. From this fidelity follows a stable peace. Judith lives to be one hundred and five, fifteen years longer than Moses, five years less than Joshua. The peace she has secured lasts longer than any achieved in the times of the judges.

THE ADDITIONS TO ESTHER

DAVID J. A. CLINES

INTRODUCTION

The Additions to Esther are those portions found in the Greek Bible (the Septuagint version [LXX]) that are not found in the Hebrew Bible. When Jerome (ca. A.D. 342–420) prepared the Latin (Vulgate [Vg.]) version of the Bible, being an enthusiast for the Hebrew original, he moved the passages found only in the Greek version to the end of the book, even though they belong logically at various points in the course of the narrative. When the chapter and verse numbering of the Bible was introduced (in the thirteenth century A.D.), the Additions to Esther were numbered from 10:4 onwards, the last verse of the Hebrew Esther having been 10:3. Some modern versions and editions use the letters A to F to designate these Additions. Some English versions of the Bible (e.g., RSV) print only the Additions in the Apocrypha; some (e.g., NEB), in addition to printing the Hebrew Esther in the Old Testament, also print the whole of the book of Esther, including the Additions, in the Apocrypha; and some (e.g., JB, NAB) print only one book of Esther, translating both the Hebrew text and the Greek Additions in the sequence in which they appear in the Greek Bible.

These are the six Additions:

1. A 1–17 = 11:2–12:6 Mordecai's dream and the discovery of a conspiracy
2. B 1–7 = 13:1–7 The first royal letter
3. C 1–30 = 13:8–14:19 The Prayer of Mordecai and the prayer of Esther
4. D 1–16 = 15:1–16 (= Vulgate 15:4–19) Esther's appearance before the king
5. E 1–24 = 16:1–24 The second royal letter
6. F 1–10 = 10:4–11:1 The interpretation of Mordecai's dream; colophon

Addition F bears the verse numbers immediately following the last verse of the Hebrew Esther (10:3) because its subject matter follows on from it, though its last verse (11:1) belongs logically at the very end of the book; then the other Additions are numbered in sequence. Thus, Addition F, even though it contains what is logically the last material of the book, has the earliest chapter and verse numbers of the Additions.

The Origin of the Additions

The Additions are found only in the Greek Bible, and not in the Hebrew, but some of them seem to have existed earlier in a Hebrew or Aramaic form. This is the case with Additions A, C, D, and F, where traces of a Semitic original are still visible. Additions B and E (the royal letters), on the other hand, are obvious examples of flowery Greek rhetorical style and must have been composed originally in Greek. All the Additions are most probably Jewish in origin, especially Additions A and F, which breathe an anti-Gentile spirit. The Semitic Additions are quite likely Palestinian in origin, while the Greek Additions more probably come from a Jewish community outside Palestine, such as that in Alexandria, Egypt where the LXX version of the Bible was made.

The date of the Additions is witnessed to by the unusual colophon or concluding bibliographic notice attached to the book at 11:1 (omitted by NAB). This librarian's note records that the Greek Esther, including the Additions, was brought from Jerusalem, where it had been translated, to Egypt in the fourth year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra. The date is therefore ca. 114 B.C. (but ca. 77 or ca. 48 B.C. are also possibilities, since there was more than one Ptolemy with a wife named Cleopatra).

COMMENTARY

11:2–12:6 = A 1–17, Addition A: Mordecai's Dream and the Discovery of a Conspiracy. The Greek Esther frames the Esther story with a narrative of a dream of Mordecai at the beginning (11:5–11) and an account of its interpretation at the end (10:6–11). Though the details of the dream are somewhat cryptic, it is plain that the dream is a divine revelation. That in its turn means that the events of the Esther story, and in particular the deliverance of the Jews from danger, are seen by the Greek book as divinely foreseen and divinely engineered. The dream is made known to Mordecai a whole year before the events that begin the Hebrew story (cf. "the second year" in 11:2 = A 1 with 1:3). The Greek Esther is thus immediately different from the Hebrew version, where God is never mentioned by name, and only the coincidences of the plot and the eventual deliverance of the Jews point to the activity of God behind the scenes. Here, from the very beginning, Mordecai knows "what God had determined to do" (11:12 RSV = A 11), at least in general.

The dream also has the function of changing the Esther story from a court tale of the struggle of rival courtiers or a success story of the wit and wisdom of Jewish heroes at the Persian court into a narrative with cosmic and apocalyptic dimensions, for the conflict between the two courtiers Mordecai and Haman becomes a struggle between two mythological "dragons" (cf. Rev. 12:3). Their contest is accompanied by earthquake and universal war, all the nations rising up against the righteous.

A further function of the Addition is to enhance the importance of Mordecai as compared with Esther. Such a tendency is perhaps already observable in the Hebrew book itself, where the final note focusing on the greatness of Mordecai seems to have been added to an earlier form of the book. By comparison with the Hebrew book, where Mordecai enters the story only in his relation to Esther, in the Greek Esther he is initially the channel of divine revelation, and it is he who finally utters the authoritative interpretation of the meaning of the dream and thus of the history narrated in the book. It is true that Esther is the tiny spring that becomes a great river (11:10 = A 9; cf. 10:6 = F 3), but that hardly makes her the hero. The tendency toward making Mordecai the greater hero is even more marked in 2 Macc. 15:36 where the festival of Purim is known as "Mordecai's Day."

The second element in this first Addition (12:1-6 = A 12-17) is a slight elaboration of the brief narrative in the Hebrew book recounting Mordecai's discovery of a plot by two palace officials to assassinate the king (2:21-23). The expansion is busily functional, answering all the questions curious readers might raise about the story. Thus, how did Mordecai manage to overhear their plot? He was dozing, lit., "at rest" at the time. What made him suspect them? Their "nervousness" (see Moore, pp. 177-78). What were their names? Gabatha and Tharra. Did they confess to their crime, or were they put to death on the word of Mordecai? They confessed. What happened to Mordecai? He was promoted and rewarded.

Although the Additions seem to have been specially composed for their places in the book of Esther, they diverge at some points quite significantly from the Hebrew narrative. In this Addition, for example, Mordecai is represented at the beginning as "a great man, serving in the court of the king" (11:3 RSV = A 2), whereas in the Hebrew book it is not even certain that he is a courtier of any rank to begin with. Here, also, when Mordecai discovers the plot of the two eunuchs, it is he himself and not Esther (as in 2:22) who informs the king. Here he is rewarded immediately (12:5 = A 16), whereas in the Hebrew story it will be crucial for the plot that Mordecai has not been rewarded at the appropriate time.

13:1-7 = B 1-7, Addition B: The First Royal Letter. This elaborate and florid Addition is designed to lie between 3:13 and 3:14 of the Hebrew text. Its striking stylistic differences from the authentic Persian royal documents of the book of Ezra (4:17-22; 6:3-12; 7:12-26), for example, rule out the likelihood of its being genuine.

Addition B professes to explain from the king's point of view why the massacre of the Jews was ordered. Since it was written by a Jew, however, we may expect to observe some ironies in it. The king, for example, boasts that he is "not elated with presumption," though 1:1-8 gives the lie to that. Nor can it be unsatirical that in a decree commanding genocide he claims that he is "always acting reasonably and with kindness" (13:2 RSV = B 2). His false concern for the "tranquility" of the lives of his subjects and the stability of the kingdom (13:2, 7 = B 2, 7) is matched only by the inaccuracy of his praise of Haman as excellent in good judgment and "distinguished for his unchanging goodwill and steadfast fidelity" (13:3 RSV = B 3). We are not meant to forget that in the context (3:12) it is Haman himself who composes this royal decree, including its extravagant testimonial to Haman! The overarching irony is the bombastic and insincere style that is attributed to the Persian monarch; the author of the Addition has read the original Esther story in the right spirit (see Esther, "Commentary," 8:1-22). We observe that in this high-sounding epistle no mention is made of anything so vulgar as money. Readers will not have forgotten, however, that a very substantial bribe has been spoken of a moment ago (3:9).

There are some notable similarities between this letter and that of the letter attributed to Ptolemy Philopator in 3 Macc. 3:12-29, a Greek work of the first century B.C. The composition of speeches was of course part of the stock-in-trade of every writer trained in the Greek rhetorical schools. Our author has also drawn upon the wording of the older (Hebrew) Esther story, as, for example, in the description of the Jews as "a certain hostile people, who have laws contrary to those of every nation and continually disregard the ordinances of the kings" (13:4 RSV = B 4; cf. 3:8).

13:8-14:19 = C 1-30, Addition C: The Prayer of Mordecai and the Prayer of Esther. The prayers put in the mouths of Mordecai and Esther for divine assistance at their time of crisis follow the interchange of messages between Mordecai and Esther in chap. 4. It is usually thought that the author of these Semitic Additions (A, C, D, and E) was chiefly concerned with introducing religious language and activity into a book in which religion and the very name of God were strikingly absent. That may well be so, but there were certainly other narrative concerns as well.

In this Addition the principal interest from a narrative point of view is to explain Mordecai's unmotivated and apparently reckless behavior in refusing obeisance to Haman as prime minister of the Persian government (3:2). The Hebrew text suggested that being a Jew had something to do with Mordecai's refusal, but the connection of thought and motive in 3:4 ("for he had told them that he was a Jew," RSV) is left very indistinct. The author of this Addition wants to exculpate Mordecai of the blame candid readers of the Hebrew story might cast upon him. It was not out of insolence or pride or desire for fame that he refused to honor Haman, says this Addition; he "would have been willing to kiss the soles of his feet, to save Israel!" (13:13 RSV = C 6). Readers may well wonder why Mordecai did not take that farsighted view when invited to do obeisance to Haman in the first place, or whether Mordecai is deceiving himself somewhat. His claim that he refused to bow down to Haman to avoid "setting the glory of a human above the glory of God" (13:14 = C 7) does not ring true either, since we know that in Israelite, Persian, and Hellenistic times courtly obeisance by Jews was not frowned upon even by the most strictly religious. Mordecai here says nothing of the ethnic reason that is suggested in the reference to Haman as an Agagite in 3:1. In his prayer to God it is the strictly religious explanation that prevails.

Mordecai's self-justification aside, his prayer is a rather conventional and unremarkable piece, with overtones of many preexisting biblical models for prayer. It contains praise (13:9-11 = C 2-4), leading into self-exoneration (13:12-14 = C 5-7), followed by petition (13:15-17 = C 8-10). The prayer is indeed psychologically apt, for it represents Mordecai as deeply engaged with the struggle for power. It is no accident that he keeps on addressing God as "Lord" (Gk. kyrios), for he views God essentially as a cosmic version of the Persian emperor: "there is no one who can oppose your will" (13:9 = C 2). A consequence of this view is that any disaster that may befall the Jewish people will be God's fault, not Mordecai's, so God is asked not to neglect his people whose enemies are now plotting against them.

Esther's prayer (14:13b-19 = C 14b-30) contains its share of conventionalities, such as the confession of sin (14:6 = C 17), which is of doubtful relevance and is no less self-regarding than Mordecai's. But its markedly stronger passion redeems it from the self-righteousness of Mordecai's prayer. She first prays for her people (14:3-11 = C 16-22) and then at equal length for herself (14:12-19 = C 23-30). She vigorously defends her authentic Jewishness by affirming that she abhors the splendor of the Persian court and her own personal royal regalia, hates sleeping with an uncircumcised Gentile, and has never eaten the royal food. Her standards of Jewish separateness and food-law observance are as rigorous as Daniel's, except that this depiction seems to conflict with that of 2:9 where she is given her food allowance from the regular provision of the harem. She has not had a day's happiness from the day of her arrival at the court, she avers (14:18 = C 29). This interest in Esther's psychology, which will be more marked still in Addition D, fills an evident gap in the Hebrew story, which is singularly reticent on the characters' emotions (Haman in 5:13 is the exception that proves the rule).

15:4-19 or 15:1-16 = D 1-16, Addition D: Esther's Appearance Before the King. In the Latin (Vg.) version the next three verses (15:1-3) give the words of Mordecai's message to Esther via Hathach the eunuch (so also the Douay-Rheims version). These verses do not belong here logically, but after 4:8, where they are placed in more modern Catholic versions like JB, NAB (NAB numbers them B 8-9). In the LXX and therefore in NEB, for example, their material is incorporated in 4:8; RSV, translating only the Greek Additions, omits them entirely, and numbers the remainder of the Addition 15:1-16.

This Addition is a dramatic expansion of 5:1-2, where the story of Esther's entrance to the king's presence is told somewhat laconically, considering the danger it involves and the consequences that hang upon it. The principal interest here is a psychological one; Esther's feelings are explored with all the finesse of a popular romantic novel. Although she gives every appearance of assuredness, she is inwardly "frozen with fear" (15:5 RSV = D 5) because of the mortal danger and because of the fearsome countenance of the king. (In the spirit of the Greek Addition, the Old Latin version makes an extra addition: "He saw her as a bull at the peak of his anger, and he considered killing her; but he was uncertain, and calling out, he said, 'Who dares to enter unsummoned into the court?'") Esther faints from terror, but the king leaps down from his throne, clasps her in his arms, and reassures her with the news that the prohibition of entry into the king's presence unbidden applies only to their subjects, not to the queen herself. The mortal danger has all been a mere matter of miscommunication!

It is characteristic of the piety of the author of the Additions that the king's crucial change of attitude is explicitly ascribed to God: "God changed the spirit of the king to gentleness" (15:8 RSV = D 8). This then becomes a turning point for the narrative as a whole, to some extent usurping the significance of the happy coincidence of the reading of the royal records in 6:1-3.

The impact of this scene on the character of Esther is no doubt to make her more of a "traditional" woman. Her beauty is particularly emphasized, and her delicacy, fearfulness, and fainting fits are contrasted with the king's masculine dignity and authority. In the Hebrew story, on the other hand, Esther conducts this scene and its sequel entirely on the basis of her wits.

16:1-24 = E 1-24, Addition E: The Second Royal Letter. This Addition is inserted after 8:12 of the Hebrew text, that is, immediately after the account of the sending out of the second decree. Its style is, if anything, even more bombastic and convoluted than that of Addition B. It is probably not out of place to detect some malice on the author's part towards Gentiles who need to cover up the truth by periphrasis. Readers may also be amused at the author's skill in composing a text explaining why the previous (unalterable) royal decree is now inoperative.

In this Addition, purporting to be a further letter from Artaxerxes, the elaborate opening (16:1b-9 = E 1b-9) sententiously observes that even those who have been most highly honored by their superiors can prove unworthy of the trust reposed in them. The king lets slip an admission that he himself has been deceived and that his methods of administering the empire stand in need of some revision (16:9 = E 9)—improbabilities in any authentic Persian document, but pardonable gibes by our Jewish author.

The crux of the matter is reached in 16:10-14, where Haman, who was always desperate to be thought an insider (5:12; 6:6-8), suffers a fate worse than death in being excoriated for un-Persian activities (he is "an alien to the Persian blood, and quite devoid of our kindness," 16:10 RSV = E 10). Treated with exceptional generosity, considering that he is a foreigner, Haman has taken advantage of his status to plot against the Jews and thereby undermined the stability of the Persian state and left it an easy prey to the Macedonians (i.e., the Greeks, who are the Persians' traditional enemies). A more wildly improbable hypothesis is hard to imagine, but it is reasonably in keeping with the king's lack of candor in referring to Mordecai as "our savior and perpetual benefactor" (16:13 RSV = E 13), when he had evidently forgotten all about him and had never even given him the customary reward. The author of the Addition is enjoying the irony.

From the point of view of the Jews the most important element of the letter is the advice of the king to provincial officials everywhere that "you will do well not to act upon the instructions given by Haman" (16:17 = E 17). The king distances himself from the first decree and no doubt runs counter to the convention of the unalterability of Persian law. In the Hebrew story the king evades any responsibility for devising a means of diverting the purpose of the first decree (see Esther, "Commentary," 8:7-8). The author of this Addition also has the king contradicting some details of the narrative proper, in that Haman was not impaled at the city gate but in his own courtyard, and his sons were not executed before this letter was sent (7:9-10; 9:7-10). Is this a lapse on the author's part or a hint that Artaxerxes is still not entirely in touch with events? Most surprising of all in this letter is the royal command that the festival of commemoration should be observed not just by Jews but by all the inhabitants of the empire upon pain of spear and fire. Any city or country not celebrating Purim is to be made "not only impassable for men, but also most hateful for all time to beasts and birds" (16:24 RSV = E 24). The excessiveness both of the command and of its sanctions (even in Persia it would be strange to execute anyone for not celebrating a festival!) suggests that the author is still writing in a satirical mode, as if to say: "In Persia nothing is done by halves." Even if the festival of Purim was originally a non-Jewish festival, as was probably the case, the king is not referring to anything but the Jewish festival here, for it is the commemoration of the deliverance from Haman's plan that is being demanded.

10:4-11:1 = F 1-11, Addition F: The Interpretation of Mordecai's Dream; Colophon. This sixth Addition follows from the short paragraph about Mordecai that concludes the Hebrew story (10:1-3). The Addition draws together the very beginning and very end of the Greek version of Esther.

It must be confessed that Mordecai's dream was not a remarkably coherent one. That is no doubt a permissible fault in a real dream, but this is a literary product. Should Mordecai be a dragon? How is Mordecai as dragon related to the "nation of the righteous" (11:7 = A 6)? How did the great river from a little spring deal with the dragons or with the nations prepared for war? It may be that the dream was originally a quite independent narrative having nothing to do with the story of Esther and Mordecai. It is perhaps significant that the variant Greek text of Esther (the A text) interprets the river not as Esther but as the enemies of the Jews, and actually offers an interpretation of the sun and the light as a revelation to the Jews, rather than simply failing to interpret them, as does the Greek version (the LXX). In either case the function of the dream and its interpretation in the Greek Esther is obviously both to attribute the salvation of the Jewish people to God, rather than to either of the human heroes, and to affirm that history is foreseen and directed by God.

The other interesting facet of the Addition is the explanation given of the name Purim. In the Hebrew story, there is only one "lot" (Heb. pur), which is that cast by Haman to determine the day for the extermination of the Jews (3:7). The plural word Purim, however, demands a different explanation, which the Addition duly provides. The two lots are destinies made by God, not Haman, and they are the different destinies of the gentile nations and of the Jews. By rights, this explanation of the term should have superseded that given in 3:7, and it is interesting that in the A text (though not in the LXX, i.e., the B text) that verse is omitted.

The last verse of Addition F (11:1 = F 11) is technically known as a colophon, a concluding note written either by a scribe or a librarian. Such colophons were appended to works in ancient Greek libraries, like the famous one at Alexandria, especially when the librarian had some doubts about the authenticity of the text or needed to note some details about its provenance. Here we have both the name and place of origin of the translator and the date of acquisition of one particular copy of the text that evidently became the ancestor of all other copies. The reference to the authenticity of the text suggests that there was some awareness that the text of the book of Esther had been tampered with (perhaps precisely by the inclusion of these Additions!). And the librarian's notation that the present text had been supplied by Dositheus who "said" that he was a priest and Levite and that he and his son "said" the text was genuine perhaps implies that the librarian doubted it. It was this Greek version that became the book of Esther for Christians through most of the Christian centuries; for Jews the Hebrew text of course remained the authentic Esther scroll.

WISDOM OF SOLOMON

JAMES M. REESE

INTRODUCTION

The Wisdom of Solomon produces a variety of impressions on readers. It is learned but contains simplistic arguments, traditional in content but original in form of presentation. It is hostile to pagan practices but sympathetic to certain aspects of Hellenism, that fusion of Greek and Near Eastern culture that developed in the centuries after Alexander the Great's conquests. In style it alternates between the parallelism characteristic of OT poetry and the elaborate periodic sentences found in Greek oratory. Its subject matter ranges widely over philosophical problems, ethical questions, theological doctrines, historical descriptions, psychological reflections, and scientific teaching. Because of the broad scope of the Wisdom of Solomon commentators are divided as to its date, origin, structure, unity, and even its original language.

The book receives its traditional name from the unknown author's identification of himself with King Solomon, famous for his pursuit of wisdom. The literary form and special vocabulary indicate that it is a Hellenistic school tract. Its author was a pious Jewish intellectual, an enthusiastic supporter of traditional belief, but someone also open to cultural adaptation and doctrinal progress.

Subject matter, method of developing arguments, and familiarity with the OT point to its author as a teacher of Jewish students in Alexandria. The complicated style, difficult to follow in the last section, suggests that the composition of the book extended over a period of years. Yet the large number of cross-references in the form of flashbacks favor the overall unity of this complex production. The undertaking has many marks of a work-in-progress, and the intricate syntax of the last half betrays the lack of a final revision. A single couplet (19:22) brings the book to a dramatic close.

As a unified whole the Wisdom of Solomon belongs to the literary genre of protreptic, a genre of rhetorical exhortation in Greek philosophy. The sprawling genre of protreptic met the author's needs, namely, to justify God's actions toward the Israelites, to encourage Jewish readers to love their revealed tradition, to display encyclopedic knowledge capable of impressing sophisticated readers, and to portray biblical morals as superior to Hellenistic. The case is argued with great skill by a creative use of figurative language and literary allusions. The author's skill at coining new compound words compares favorably with that of the ancient Greek playwright Aeschylus.

The opening address to "you judges of the earth" is a literary device to focus attention, but the book is directed to readers thoroughly familiar with Jewish tradition and OT writings. In fact, after the author assumes the person of King Solomon to pray to the "God of our fathers and Lord of mercy" (9:1) for the gift of Lady Wisdom, the bulk of the remaining text speaks directly to God in prayerful dialogue. This too is a literary artifice in keeping with the flexibility of a protreptic.

Structure

The flowing style and frequent asides make clear-cut divisions between major parts difficult to isolate, but the following outline preserves both the unity and the complexity of its composition.

The first part, 1:1–6:11 and 6:17–21, is an exhortation to blessed immortality. This section is a diatribe, a form of argumentative discourse developed in the Greek philosophical schools. In this diatribe the author argues that the promises of the Mosaic covenant are the heritage of those virtuous believers who trust in the Lord who led their ancestors out of Egypt. Because "righteousness is immortal" (1:15; →Righteousness), the rewards promised will be enjoyed not for a short time on earth but "in God's hand forever" (3:1).

In the second part, 6:12–16 and 6:22–10:21, we find praises of Lady Wisdom, personified as God's throne partner. These chapters form an aporia, a statement of a philosophical problem. They begin by promising to resolve the aporia, "What is Wisdom and how does she come into being?" (6:22). The lengthy answer makes these chapters an exposition of several theological and ethical questions involved in the human quest for eternal life with God.

Warnings not to abandon divine wisdom for human folly form the third part, 11:15–16:1a. This section is another diatribe, serving to justify God's conduct toward all human sinfulness, especially that of Israel's enemies during the Exodus, an issue that will form the subject of the fourth part. (The close connection between the two parts accounts for the insertion of Part Three as an excursus after Part Four has already begun in 11:1-14.) The length, subject matter, and special purpose of Part Three all suggest that it is a major division of the Wisdom of Solomon. It performs the role of providing necessary background information.

Part Four is 11:1-14 and 16:1b-19:22, praise of God as Israel's liberator. The last part is a syncretism, or comparison, an adaptation of a Hellenistic form in which two persons or qualities or events are compared. The author contrasts two modes of the Lord's activity. Israel's all-powerful Creator used the same natural events for the benefit of Israel and the destruction of Israel's Egyptian oppressors. This syncretism is a skillful adaptation of the Greek genre that conveys the lesson stated in the final couplet, "In every way, Lord, you magnify and glorify your people; present at every moment in every place, you never ignore their needs" (19:22).

Setting and Purpose

The focus on the Exodus in the last half of the Wisdom of Solomon and the book's frequent allusions to the religious practices of ancient Egyptians point to Alexandria as the book's place of origin. The self-conscious literary style of the Wisdom of Solomon and the many demands that its complicated rhetorical structure place upon readers caution against seeing this work as a historical appeal to Egyptian authorities to treat the Jewish community more humanely. Its frequent references to the cruelty of ancient Egyptians and its harshness toward all forms of pagan religious practice make the Wisdom of Solomon ill suited to be a political tract in a concrete historical crisis. Its approach is not calculated to gain outside support for a cause. On the contrary, it is the kind of exhortation that appeals to the loyalty of a group questioning its own identity and direction. It is not a document that arose out of an actual persecution of Jews; its style and content point to literary activity within a rabbinical school as the setting for its composition.

The author was familiar with metropolitan culture and capable of appreciating scientific research. But what believing Jews have received from God is the value at stake. God is with them in their present situation, and so "their hope is full of immortality" (3:4). Danger comes not so much from outside political forces as from loss of faith in God and the providence guiding history (→ Providence). The large number of terms borrowed from Hellenistic anthropology, philosophy, psychology, medicine, and the popular cult of the goddess Isis point to a date near the beginning of the reign of the Roman Emperor Augustus in 28 B.C.

The unknown author argues for fresh stands on religious questions under discussion by Jewish intellectuals of that period. With vivid language the Wisdom of Solomon proclaims personal immortality for the just. In spite of difficulties and disappointments like sterility and early death, the lot of those remaining loyal to Israel's God is preferable to the path of sinners. On judgment day, by means of God's gift of "incorruptibility" (2:23; 6:19), "the just will stand with great confidence in front of those tormenting him" (5:1; → Judgment, Day of).

Religious Significance

To the large Jewish community in and around Alexandria, a city whose population the Jewish philosopher Philo put at over a million persons (Flaccus 43), the Wisdom of Solomon offered a formal apologia for a vigorous stance against the appeal of Hellenism. In a sense, each of its four parts could stand alone as a defense of some value of Israel's revelation.

Joined together in this sustained protreptic, these four major parts provide a powerful appeal for continued fidelity to the Mosaic covenant. How effective this exhortation proved for its original readers is not known. Nor does the NT offer any clear literary allusion to the text of the Wisdom of Solomon. Though some images and technical terms, like the "radiance" of wisdom, appear in both, the similarities are a result of themes drawn from a common religious climate.

PART ONE: 1:1-6:11; 6:17-21

Exhortation to Blessed Immortality

An extended, self-contained diatribe, 1:1-6:11 and 6:17-21, sets the tone for the entire book. Forces are at work seeking to shape human destiny, which finds its center not in this age but in eternal life. A series of vivid tableaux describes the fate of the righteous as reigning forever, safe "in the hand of God" (3:1).

From this extended appeal, the nature of the Wisdom of Solomon as an apologia (an argued defense of beliefs) is clear. Only God can draw human beings to their eternal destiny. This long diatribe prepares readers for the polemic against idolatry in Part Three. The author shows sophisticated literary skill in setting up this exhortation in the schema a b a b a. The first, third, and fifth developments take the form of exhortations (1:1-15; 3:1-5:1; 6:1-11). Between these appeals are inserted two descriptions: the first, of evil conduct (1:16-2:24), and the second, of God's judgment upon evil conduct (5:2-23). The appendix, 6:17-21, serves to summarize the exhortations.

Exhortation to Walk in Righteousness

Serving as an introduction to the entire book is an ardent appeal to "you judges of the earth," a phrase taken from the Septuagint (LXX) translation of Ps. 2:10. They are to seek righteousness (in the sense of holiness), for "righteousness is eternal" (1:15). This exhortation sets the mood in three ways: by its poetic style, by its appeal to biblical themes, and by its ethical demands. An examination of these three features will illustrate characteristics common to the entire Wisdom of Solomon.

The poetic style imitates the parallelism of Hebrew poetry, in which each line contains a complete clause (→ Poetry). The language employs figurative speech, e.g., calling God "Power" (1:3) and "Ear of Jealousy" (1:10). Biblical themes are pervasive. One searches for God "in simplicity of heart" (1:1), an expression alluding to the words of the aged David as he prayed before the assembly of Israel in 1 Chron. 29:17. And worshipers must avoid "murmuring" (1:10, 11), almost a technical term in Exodus 15-17 for scorning the God of the covenant. Failure to trust in God's care is a way to call divine punishment upon one's life (1:12-14).

By far the greatest preoccupation of this introduction is attention to ethics; it insists that God refuses worship from those who are malicious (1:3). The text does not resolve the dilemma whether ignorance opens the way to malice or whether malice is the underlying cause of ignorance (1:4-5). The introduction begins with ethical goals but then shifts attention to the pursuit of wisdom, enemy of all kinds of sin. What wisdom achieves, God accomplishes. Both search human hearts and bring secret motives to light (1:6-11).

The final verses of this opening exhortation make clear the orientation of all its parts (1:12-15). Moral integrity and righteousness are not ethical matters limited only to this life; rather, they primarily concern future life. Never does the Wisdom of Solomon isolate human destiny from God's care for creation. "For God did not make death nor does he delight in the destruction of living beings" (1:13). God's care to maintain the varieties of living species offers an insight into his loving nature.

When this divine care is directed to humans, it is not limited to protecting the species as such but offers immortality to each person. Obviously God did not "make death" (1:13), an allusion to the result of human sin described in Gen. 3:19. Thus immortality is not simply a natural quality of human souls but a dimension of "righteousness" (1:15). How God overcomes death and communicates the gift of immortality will be explained as the book unfolds (→ Immortality; Soul).

Description of Evil Conduct

Abruptly the scene changes from the royal figures addressed in 1:1-15 to a group of evildoers. Rather than describing their conduct, the author allows these opponents of God to describe their own deeds and motives. This first-person narrative conveys their arrogant cynicism, in which ill will colors their knowledge of God. In certain ways the description presents a stereotype of the Greek philosophical tradition of Epicureanism (→ Epicureans). The Epicureans viewed the soul as made of subtle matter. The picture is simplistic, but it captures the feeling of despair in much Hellenistic philosophy contemporary with the author. Human life appears "short and painful" (2:1); "our end is irreversible" (2:5).

Those who hold this foolish view of life pour out a violent tirade that extends for exactly twice as many lines as were devoted to describing their miserable state (2:6-20; thirty-six lines). For them life has only two goals: to seek pleasure and to prove by their conduct that might makes right. This diatribe is a lively portrayal of the contrast between the high moral standards of Jewish society and the perceived corruption of Hellenistic permissiveness. The contrast is an implicit exaltation of the moral superiority of God's chosen people.

Some influence from OT pictures of suffering just believers, especially the suffering servant figure of Isaiah 53, colors this vivid description (→ Servant). Certain church fathers saw in Wisd. of Sol. 2:12-20 a prediction of the Passion of Jesus. Other commentators viewed these verses as a Christian interpolation based on the Gospel passion narratives. But no image of a suffering "messiah" should be read into the designation of the persecuted just man as "son of God" (2:18). The salvation envisioned here is simply rescue from verbal and physical abuse. Sinners mock self-control and passive resistance as no protection against their philosophy that might makes right.

In a brief reply of nine verses the author passes judgment on Hellenistic morality, which attracted some Jewish students. Bluntly put, "They were deceived for their evil blinded them" (2:21). The battle is between the closed world of expediency that offers no hope and the "mysteries of God," which assure the "last honors of blameless souls" (2:22).

In a concluding remark (2:23-24) the author states the eschatological basis for evaluating human life: "God created human beings for incorruption, and made them as an image of his own eternity" (2:23; some ancient manuscripts and modern commentators read "nature" in place of "eternity"). This profound statement introduces a new insight into Jewish teaching by borrowing the concept of "incorruption" from Epicurean philosophy. Incorruption was a divine quality that prevented the subtle atoms of the gods from escaping their bodies; it thus assured their immortality.

By appropriating this technical term, the author is engaging in a polemic on two fronts. First, he places human immortality in the divine sphere, as an "image" of God rather than a quality inherent in human nature. Second, he affirms that eternal life is a pure divine gift designated by God to draw certain human beings into a form of communion surpassing natural powers. This carefully articulated eschatological outlook permeates the entire diatribe (→ Eschatology).

What then is death? Not part of God's plan but the result of demonic envy. These verses provide an original, creative interpretation of the fall of the man and woman of Gen. 3:1-19. The serpent is implicitly identified with the devil who induced these first mortals to challenge God and thereby lose their precious gift of "incorruption." As a result, human beings are now subject to a double death, in both the realm of nature and the sphere of eschatological destiny. This bold appropriation of Hellenistic philosophical vocabulary to articulate faith identifies the original audience of the Wisdom of Solomon as a specific group of knowledgeable Jewish intellectuals.

Exhortation to Upright Conduct

The central section of the opening diatribe is the longest and most carefully developed of its three exhortations (1:1-15; 3:1-5:1; 6:1-11). Its structure indicates that the author felt a need to justify this new eschatological perspective at length with specific examples.

3:1-12, The Contrasting Fates of the Upright and the Sinful. The section opens with a joyful announcement of the eternal reward for "upright souls" (3:1). First, they must undergo a period of testing that baffles unbelievers. Trials are God's way of revealing who is "worthy of himself" (3:5). To be worthy of God means exactly that: victorious over death, the just enjoy life with God. The just are empowered to participate in God's lordship. In using the term "souls" to identify the just, the text neither affirms nor denies resurrection of the body; it affirms only continuity in personal existence. "Soul" is one of the author's favorite words. Appearing over twenty-five times, it reflects the influence of Hellenistic psychology, which identified conscious activity with the spiritual principle of life.

Those who remain faithful to the Mosaic tradition will be assigned to preside over the judgment of their wicked oppressors. Once more the promise serves as an incentive to fidelity. Only those who persevere in doing what God wants "will abide with him in love," that is, enjoy divine "favor and mercy" (3:9).

A graphic contrast shows why the gloom of sinners is justified. First, they have no hope in the future because they cut themselves off from the Lord. Second, their life upon this earth is marred by disappointments in three areas: marriage, family, and posterity. These three provide the subject matter for extended reflections presented in a series of overlapping contrasts, a technique also used extensively in Part Four.

3:13-4:6, True and False Faithfulness.

The first arena for the testing of conduct by the promise of eternal life with God is fidelity in marriage. Rather than exalting physical fruitfulness as a criterion for divine approval (→ Child, Children), the author proclaims that the Lord will look for "fruit in the visitation of souls," that is, for moral integrity (3:13). The expression "visitation" to describe final judgment on life is the common OT image for God's intervention either to punish or to reward. The Wisdom of Solomon alludes here to Isa. 56:4-5 but gives it an eschatological significance. Promises of fidelity are extended so that even eunuchs, who have no hope of offspring, can hope for an honorable role in the new age. Their struggles to remain chaste are "good birth-pangs" (3:15).

The bleak picture of unfaithful marriage unions continues by identifying their offspring as bad seed, destined not only for personal doom but also to disappear without progeny. Neither will they enjoy consolation "on the day of decision" (3:18). Here final judgment is called by a Greek legal term. This is one of the many instances of the authors balancing images from Hellenistic and from Jewish traditions.

The real fruitfulness in human life is to produce virtue. "For in its recollection is immortality, because it is known in the sight of God and in the sight of human beings" (4:1). This juxtaposing is emphatic in that it provides an opportunity for the author to clarify the different effects of human and divine remembering. God's remembering triumphantly carries those who have virtue into eternal life, "crowning with victory the struggle of those who are not soiled" (4:2). This image, modeled on Greek athletic contests, is a strong plea to Jewish readers to opt for divine friendship.

Having made this urgent appeal, the author moves on to the third area where improper unions produce painful results: when children end up as accusers of their parents' sinful lives (4:4-6).

4:7-5:1, Eschatological Triumph of the Just. A final comparison illustrates the same lesson of the superiority of upright conduct. Only those familiar with the Bible could understand the double allusion here. To the story of Enoch's being snatched from earth by God in Gen. 5:24 are joined reflections about the moral crassness of sinners based on Isa. 57:1-11.

This detailed exhortation ends with a vivid contrast between the wicked, who will wither away under the burden of their sins, and the just, who stand triumphantly at God's judgment before "those who tormented him and despised his suffering" (5:1). This picture of the just person is a good example of the author's use of inclusion or ring style, i.e., a return to the topic with which he began this exhortation (see 3:1).

Description of God's Judgment on Evil

The author's love of balance accounts for a second description that carefully parallels the monologue of evildoers in 2:6-20. The device of making sinners speak once more, after they have seen their error, gives this passage a special persuasive power. Having seen God vindicate the upright in the eschatological judgment, sinners repeat many of the images and examples they used in their previous mockery. This speech thus forms an ironic reprise of their earlier attack on the righteous. They voice regret that they came to understand too late. The images of a ship passing through water (5:10) and of a bird in flight leaving no trace (5:11) skillfully utilize the riddle of Prov. 30:19 to wonder at the emptiness of sin.

The author drives home what is at stake in human choices by balancing this lament of sinners over their foolish choices with another praise of the righteous. They enjoy reward "in the Lord's hand," from which they receive a royal crown (5:16). This picture recalls the book's opening address to earthly kings. But now the description of God is expanded by drawing upon the warrior imagery of Isa. 59:17. The apocalyptic elements introduced briefly here (5:16-23) anticipate the long descriptions of God using nature against sinners in Part Four.

These poetic images do not provide sufficient information to pronounce on what happens to sinners after death. The author's primary concern is to convince readers to pursue God's will so that they may join the "sons of God" or "saints" in the heavenly beatitude of God's court. At this point the text does not have to add another condemnation of sinners; they have already condemned themselves.

The length to which the author goes to picture the glorification of the upright proclaims its central role in his teaching. Obviously he deemed the lesson to be of supreme importance for Jews living in the environment of Alexandria. Unless they were committed to an eschatological view of their destiny, they would not have the depth of motivation needed to remain faithful to the God of Israel. Victory in the contest of life against forces of evil comes from the "spirit of the Powerful One," who easily sweeps away all human arrogance (5:23).

The imagery of this description comes from the popular apocalyptic movement that flourished among Jews between 200 B.C. and A.D. 200 (→ Apocalyptic Literature). Its goal was to encourage Jews, who were a subject people, and to keep alive their hope for enjoying God's covenant promises, which this author has translated into eternal rewards. Unless God acts, the sin that entered the world through "the devil's envy" (2:24) "will make the whole earth a waste" (5:23). A profound awareness of sin's destructive power penetrates the long diatribe that opens the Wisdom of Solomon. The author will now draw it to a close with an exhortation that prepares readers for Part Two.

Exhortation to Seek Wisdom

Once more the text addresses rulers. The terminology differs from that used in the opening admonition, in keeping with the author's attraction to synonyms. This literary fiction of an exalted audience both ties the whole section of the book together and presses home the sense of urgency marking the diatribe. The real audience is the Jewish intellectual community, which needs to be confirmed in its faith. What it needs is neither political influence nor territorial domination but "power from the Most High" (6:3).

The mood of this exhortation is somber, because the readers are being blamed for failure to "walk according to the will of God" (6:4). They are not to depend on any supposed privileges, presuming that their God, "the Lord of all does not shrink from any face" (6:7, alluding to Deut. 1:17). Rather, they must "learn wisdom," for that is the only protection against "falling away," in the sense of committing apostasy, the supreme spiritual folly (6:9).

This mention of wisdom serves as a hinge enabling the author to prepare for Part Two of this protreptic, which will celebrate the mysterious Lady Wisdom. She is the one who empowers believers to receive the gift of blessed immortality, the goal of their existence.

In its opening exhortation, Wisd. of Sol. 1:6 uses the term "wisdom" to designate God as a "beneficent spirit." That experience of God must have worn thin for Jews exposed so long to the many attractions of Hellenism. This complicated diatribe urges them to open their lives once more to their mission in the world. As usual, the author blends traditional biblical teaching with technical terminology from contemporary Hellenistic culture. Greek philosophers could not even agree whether or not any kind of providence existed. Israel's God "is provident toward all" (6:7). So the author can end the first part of his work with an emphatic couplet, "Set your desire then on my discourse; long for it and you will become learned" (6:11).

Concluding Summary of Part One

Thoughtful touches like this summary identify the author of the Wisdom of Solomon as a teacher, unable to leave a topic without making one final connection for pupils. Even after beginning the praises of Lady Wisdom in 6:12-16, he stops to insert an extended syllogism in the style cultivated by the Stoics, namely, a sorites (→ Stoics). It celebrates practical wisdom as the crowning achievement of an upright life. The seven qualities listed as generated by loyalty in pursuing God's will restate in a succinct way those virtues that "you judges of the earth" were urged to cultivate in the opening exhortation (1:1-15). The logic is not perfect, but the thrust is meant to be more emotive than didactic.

The insertion of this summary as a kind of afterthought is one final reminder that goodwill on the part of believers is essential for participating in the moral transformation and blessed immortality that ultimately come through God's gift of Lady Wisdom.

PART TWO: 6:12-16; 6:22-10:21

Praises of Lady Wisdom, Personified as God's Throne Partner

The outstanding characteristic of Part Two is the personification of God's saving presence as the woman who shares his throne. Lady Wisdom is mentioned explicitly over twenty-five times in Part Two. The personification of wisdom appears in the OT and in other Jewish writings (e.g., Prov. 8; Sir. 24). The Wisdom of Solomon, however, makes two significant modifications to bring Lady Wisdom into closer contact with Hellenistic civilization.

First, her activities are modeled on the portrait of Isis, worshiped widely in the Aegean area and Egypt as goddess of culture and benefactor of humanity. The praises of Isis were formulated in litanies, called aretologies, which recorded her outstanding accomplishments in promoting human culture. Original Jewish readers of this protreptic would have recognized that it was drawing upon the picture of Isis to present the Lord of Israel as ultimate benefactor of humanity by his sending of Lady Wisdom to work on behalf of members of the chosen people.

Second, the author spells out his own development as the fruit of the presence of Lady Wisdom within his body, mind, and spirit. She gave him the qualities that Hellenistic philosophers urged political leaders to cultivate in the self-help ethical manuals of that era, known as the kingship tracts. These manuals came into existence after the death of Alexander the Great when his generals set up kingdoms in the ancient Near East. They needed public support for their new style of leadership. Accordingly, they employed famous philosophers as tutors for their children to train them to be benefactors of humanity. These kingship tracts helped future kings prepare for their tasks.

Part Two of the Wisdom of Solomon deliberately mirrors contemporary Hellenistic ethical and religious documents to celebrate the God of Israel as source of those skills and talents responsible for all human growth. It is the heart of the author's apologia for biblical faith as Israel's contribution to humanity. Only by fidelity to their revelation of a superior religious tradition can Jewish intellectuals bring knowledge of the true God and of salvation to the world. The author offers new theological insights to these readers as "kings" in the sense that they have the destiny to uphold the Lord's law in the world. The sublimity of its message accounts for its ornate and scholarly style, with many plays on words and figures of speech that add to the luster of Lady Wisdom.

Prologue Introducing Lady Wisdom

Suddenly, without transition, the style and imagery of the Wisdom of Solomon change. No longer is the author engaged in a diatribe to provide incentives for the cultivation of a life of holiness. Now this ideal is portrayed concretely in the activity of a "shining and spotless" woman (6:12). As God's "throne partner" she offers the gift of blessed immortality that readers have been urged to seek. Thanks to her presence, holiness is not an agonizing struggle but a joyful experience that floods the human spirit with well-being and loving communion with the Lord. The text pictures God as originating this desirable communion by dispatching Lady Wisdom to those who choose to “love” and “seek” her. These two activities were urged upon the “kings” in the opening address (cf. 1:1). The transformation that she effects is spelled out in the sortes that divides this prologue (6:17–21).

In the second half (6:22–25) of this short prologue, in which the author assumes the identity of King Solomon, he appropriates a technical expression from the Isis litanies—“I will proclaim”—to outline the program for Part Two. He will undertake a quest for answers to questions: who or what is Lady Wisdom? How did she originate? What are her secrets? The author promises a comprehensive search “from the beginning of creation” and an openness that holds back nothing of her “secrets,” in contrast to the practices of contemporary mystery cults (6:22). Their mysteries could not be revealed.

The very nature of Lady Wisdom precludes such pettiness, for she has nothing to do with “pining envy.” The questions raised give this second part of the book the nature of an aporia or problem composition. Questions will be answered first in the portrait of Lady Wisdom and of her gifts (7:22b–8:16) and then in the concluding ode that traces her saving influence in the world from Adam to Moses (10:1–21). In carrying out this promise the author reveals himself as a committed religious teacher who has internalized the covenant values of Israel’s faith. Consequently, he prefaces his praises of Lady Wisdom with an enthusiastic description of his personal encounter with her. This description provides the setting for his theological teaching on God’s providence and salvation.

7:1–22a

Autobiographical Account of an Encounter with Lady Wisdom

To enhance the credibility of his revelation about Lady Wisdom, “Solomon” explains how he began his personal relationship with her. He had no advantage because he was born a king. Hellenistic philosophers often made the point that a king is no different from any other human being. He came into this world during a “ten-month” period of time (7:2). It is no accident that the rare compound used here also occurs in a litany of Isis. One of her good works was to guard the “ten-month” pregnancies of her devotees. In fact, this autobiographical sketch is marked by over fifteen words never found in the OT, including new compounds found only in this book. By this choice of unusual words the artful Solomon displays his familiarity with contemporary science and culture.

The point this approach makes is that under Wisdom’s direction he reacted to his common condition of being subject to human weakness in an uncommon way—he prayed. He correctly reasoned that every human being needs divine help. God answered his plea in two ways: in the form of “prudence” and through the action of “Wisdom’s spirit” (7:7). Young Solomon found himself with a new attitude as well as enjoying great material advantages given by Lady Wisdom.

He confesses that, ironically, he did not know that she was their “female begetter” (7:12; RSV: “mother”). This new feminine coinage is an example of a practice popular among Hellenistic writers. The author uses this same technique again, calling Lady Wisdom “female initiate” and “female selector” (8:4).

The last part of this autobiographical recollection provides insight into who Lady Wisdom is (7:14–22a). Solomon now asks God directly for accurate knowledge and a worthy attitude, because God is “guide of Wisdom and director of the wise” (7:15), phrases that recall Hellenistic titles of Isis and Hermes as guides of souls. He goes on to say in a series of seven phrases that God has already given him the whole range of human knowledge from astronomy to botany (7:17–21). Abruptly he changes direction and states boldly that all this came to him from the “craftswoman” Wisdom, a feminine form applied to her three times (7:22; 8:6; 14:2).

The surprise is that what was attributed to God is immediately assigned to Lady Wisdom without restriction. By refusing to make any clear distinction between the two, the author indicates that the identity of Lady Wisdom is an aporia, a theological problem to be probed. In one sense she cannot be separated from God as some kind of distinct entity, like the “emanations” of Hellenistic philosophical speculation. At the same time the technique of personifying this dimension of God provides a shift of perspective to generate a desire to enter into communion with the Lord. The author wishes to communicate his own “friendship with God” (7:14).

7:22b–8:16

A Portrait of Lady Wisdom and List of Her Gifts

Having provided his credentials, the self-styled King Solomon now fulfills his promise to reveal “who Wisdom is.” The answer is a complex and challenging philosophical meditation.

7:22b–8:1, The Qualities and Activities of Wisdom. It begins with a list of twenty-one diverse qualities that are deeply rooted in Hellenistic learning (7:22-23); ten of these terms never appear in the LXX. Lady Wisdom resembles the Stoic world spirit, which is immanent in the universe, permeating, unifying, and vivifying all. In addition, she has a transcendent spirit that communicates goodness, mercy, and loving-kindness to intelligent creatures.

Since many of these qualities were also applied to Isis in her litanies, they obviously communicated to the original audience a variety of connotations whose significance is lost on modern readers. Lady Wisdom operates universally and effectively because she acts like rays of the sun emanating from the divine glory. Her identity is further defined by five activities that make her a kind of cosmic soul (7:24-25). These actions derived primarily from contemporary speculation on the relation of divine power to human existence. Wisdom serves as mirror (7:26) to reflect qualities attributed to the divine sphere in the eclectic philosophical climate popular among the Stoics.

Lady Wisdom has transcendent features. She possesses powers belonging to Israel's Lord, the one Creator and Savior. She makes all things new. In each successive generation she enters into holy souls and prepares friends of God and prophets. She has made creatures lovable to God and never fails in her mission to transform persons (7:27-30). A striking couplet sums up her work in the world: "With force she stretches from one end of the earth to the other and rules the whole universe gently" (8:1).

In abstract terms Lady Wisdom is God's providence. But the author delivers the message of God's wisdom as empowered saving presence in a poetic language that spoke to cultured Jewish readers. This portrait instructs them that they do not have to espouse Greek ideals to find meaning in life. On the contrary, to abandon the unique Lord of the universe, who promises eternal friendship, is supreme folly.

8:2-16, Gifts Available from Wisdom.

Having fulfilled his promise to reveal who Lady Wisdom is, the author now explains her secrets in the form of gifts she has given him and offers to anyone else willing to woo her and be united with her in marriage. Here the text draws first on the language of Hellenistic mystery cults to interpret what love for Wisdom is. It explains that communion with her culminates in the so-called four cardinal virtues: prudence, justice, courage, and self-control (8:7). In a departure from the biblical practice, the text employs the technical terminology of Hellenistic ethics. Thus, justice designates what is due others, rather than the state of holiness, as in Wisd. of Sol. 1:1.

As a whole, these four virtues constitute the holiness that is "more useful in life" than anything, because they bring eternal life. For all this use of technical vocabulary, the imagery of Lady Wisdom giving birth to these virtues is a significant departure from philosophical ethics, which saw virtue as the achievement of purely human effort. Not so, insists the author. Lady Wisdom gives birth to true virtue only in hearts loyal to God.

Other gifts that Lady Wisdom brings transform her followers into seasoned and articulate "life companions," a metaphor never employed in the OT. With a certain amount of repetition, the text closes this portrait of Lady Wisdom by returning to the autobiographical style. In a carefully balanced and artistically constructed conclusion with daring sexual imagery, Solomon once more reminisces about the advantage he recognized for his kingship of a life led in intimate companionship with Lady Wisdom (8:9-16). She gave him satisfaction and superiority even over powerful kings. The lesson for readers is that they do not have to fear but can have "joy and merriment" at every moment. In terms of the literary unfolding of the book, this personal story sets the stage for the following prayer.

Prayer Begging God for Lady Wisdom

8:17-21, Introduction to the Prayer. The solemn language introducing an intense prayer to God to be allowed to receive Lady Wisdom reflects the author's deep religious experience and his desire to convey it to young Jewish intellectuals. Its thrust is eschatological: "immortality is having Wisdom as a relative" (8:17). That emphasis does not lessen a whole range of present benefits flowing from Lady Wisdom's presence: good delights, unlimited wealth, glory.

Here appears a controversial verse that has been understood as teaching the preexistence of the soul. "I was a child of good natural condition and had received a good soul, or rather, being good I came into a spotless body" (8:19-20). In context, however, this sentence describes the author's status at the moment of his ardent prayer. As he had stated earlier, Lady Wisdom gave him "all good things" before he recognized her presence (7:11). So now he shows that, thanks to her influence, he "came into" a spotless body, in the sense of the Greek ideal of a sound mind in a sound body. Recognizing his maturity as gift, he responds by praying with his whole heart to God for Lady Wisdom.

9:1-12, Structure of the Prayer for Wisdom. This plea is a free translation and elaboration of the famous prayer of Solomon in 1 Kings 3:6-9. It can be divided into an address to God (9:1–3) and two parallel petitions, each joined with a motive for offering this prayer (9:4–9, 10–12). The address to “God of our fathers and Lord of mercy” directs this prayer to the author of the covenants with the patriarch Abraham and the lawgiver Moses. This is the same God who is creator and whose providence governs all.

What is new in the address is the theological insight, namely, that God created by his “word,” and in particular that God established the human family by Lady Wisdom (9:1b–2a). This amounts to another way of saying what was affirmed earlier, that she is God’s providence. She has a role in enabling humans to participate in her task of managing the whole universe “in holiness and uprightness” (9:3). They do so when they conduct themselves like kings by ruling over their share of creation in integrity of heart. All in all, this opening is pregnant with the author’s vision of the purpose of creation.

By the loftiness and variety of the address to God, young Solomon stimulates in pious readers a sense of their importance and encourages them to resist Alexandria’s metropolitan appeal. By describing Lady Wisdom in Hellenistic religious and philosophical terminology, he exalts biblical revelation above human learning.

The first petition asks God for Lady Wisdom in her capacity as “throne partner” (9:4), the bold image repeated from 6:14. This title is linked to both the goddess Isis and to Fate in Hellenistic piety. By what right does Solomon expect to receive her as gift? Not because he is a king but “because I am your servant and son of your maidservant” (9:5, an uncharacteristic direct quotation of Ps. 115:7, LXX). He supports his petition by spelling out his weaknesses in body, mind, and deed. This motive introduces the reality behind all prayer, namely, that even the most accomplished human being will be accounted as nothing without Lady Wisdom. In other words, salvation is God’s free gift.

The example of his divinely imposed mission to build the Temple with its altar (9:8) may not seem relevant to a sophisticated audience. The Jerusalem Temple, however, is cited in its cosmic significance, as symbol and model of the heavenly sanctuary, where God receives adoration from the saints. Only Lady Wisdom can communicate an appreciation of that divine worship. Thus, the first petition ends by emphatically repeating her divine prerogatives (9:9).

The second petition is an elaborate plea that God send Lady Wisdom (9:10–12). It is artistically constructed in ten balanced poetic clauses expressing Solomon’s absolute need for her help. She goes into labor to bring forth for him the discernment and good works practiced by his wise father, David.

9:13–18, Concluding Reflection. The prayer itself consists of only these two dynamic petitions. The remaining verses (9:13–18) form a reflection and transition. First, they recall the opening of Part Two and the promise to explain who Lady Wisdom is and what her secrets are (see 6:22–23). Then they elaborate the truths stated in the prayer itself: human beings are weak and need special protection. An allusion to Plato’s teaching in Phaedo 81c, that the tent of the earthly body weighs down the “constantly reflecting mind,” occurs in 9:15.

Once more the author cannot refrain from adding an additional comment. This takes the form of an oratorical question to emphasize the need for Lady Wisdom and God’s “holy spirit” (9:17). The question is answered by a practical example of her impact. The exchange forms an appropriate summary to the aporia section of the book and acts as a hinge to Part Four: she enables mortals to exercise upright conduct on earth and to “be saved” (9:18). This is the first appearance of the verb “save” that will dominate the remainder of the work.

The Saving Power of Lady Wisdom

Chap. 10 has its own style and unity, characterized by two striking features. The first is the repetition of the emphatic “she” to designate Lady Wisdom six times as aiding Israel’s heroes. The second literary feature is the absence of the proper name of any of these heroes. Not only does that style imply an audience familiar with the OT narratives; it also makes the patriarchs types or models to illustrate ways by which Lady Wisdom manifests her saving power.

The first beneficiary of Lady Wisdom’s protection was Adam, when he abided on earth “alone,” i.e., bereft of any companion. His position exemplifies the point made in the prayer that even the most illustrious mortal, the head or “father of the cosmos,” is nothing without Wisdom, a lesson repeated below (10:8–9). When Adam was deceived by “the devil’s envy” (2:24), she rescued him from the consequences. By way of contrast, Cain is mentioned as one who refused to heed Lady Wisdom. A poetic image identifies her as the “pilot” of Noah’s ark, a title also attributed to Isis. More attention is devoted to Abraham and his brother Lot, with an allusion to the popular story about the unbelieving wife who was turned into a pillar of salt.

Only Jewish readers would recognize the allusion to Jacob’s ladder of Gen. 28:12 in the reference to the “kingdom of heaven” (10:10). His piety amid a variety of hardships shows that Wisdom’s help does not eliminate struggle, but she does empower the devout to overcome

(10:12). From Joseph the text skips directly to Moses, thus limiting the number of examples to seven. At this point Lady Wisdom begins to protect “a holy people and blameless posterity” (10:15), a change that prepares for the examples of Part Four. This verse also introduces two changes of style. The author goes from third-person narrative to direct address to God (10:20) and also begins to describe events in the form of a series of contrasts. The same situation that serves as a blessing on the chosen people brings destruction upon their enemies (11:5–14).

Part Two comes to a resolution appropriate for the literary problem or aporia in the author’s favorite technique, a summarizing couplet: “Wisdom opened the mouths of the speechless and made the tongues of babies distinct” (10:21). These achievements point to universal harmony and integration of Jewish and Hellenistic cultures, because they were both attributed to the goddess Isis in her litanies and assigned to the messianic age in Isa. 35:6.

PART THREE: 11:15–16:1a

Warnings Not to Abandon Divine Wisdom for Human Folly

Ancient writings did not employ footnotes. One of the techniques used to supply background material was the excursus. The Wisdom of Solomon brings this technique to a high point of development by forming a diatribe out of a series of excursuses. This part of the book, therefore, is more reflective and abounds in hostile judgments against the culture that threatened to corrupt its pious readers. Part Three serves a double function. First, it is a powerful condemnation of idolatry, the chief expression of human folly. Second, it provides a reasoned defense of Judaism’s monotheism. Its nature as an excursus is emphasized by its insertion within Part Four (11:1–14; 16:16–19:22), which describes God’s saving activity during the Exodus. This breaking off after the first comparison drives home the truth that Israel’s God dominates history. What is at stake in this diatribe is the vindication of God’s way of governing the universe.

The exaltation of God’s authority, addressed to human rulers in 6:1–11, prepared readers for this dissertation on divine providence. The whole development is held together by a traditional biblical theme, that God punishes idolaters by the instruments of their sin: “through those things which one uses to commit sin, through them comes punishment” (11:16). In some way God lets sinners take on the qualities of the creatures that they worship.

11:15–12:27

A Defense of God’s Provident Ruling of the World

11:15–12:2, God’s Restraint in Punishing Sin. The mention of thirst as punishment for the ancient Egyptians serves as occasion for inserting a long defense of God’s intervention against the Egyptians who practiced animal worship, a vice mentioned three times in Part Three (11:15–26; 12:23–27; 15:14–16:1a). Perhaps to respond to criticisms of God’s harsh treatment of the Egyptians as recorded in the biblical account of the Exodus, the text hastens to exempt God from any charge of vindictiveness in punishing. On the contrary, God’s “all-powerful hand” (11:17), capable of meting out any mode of punishment, even to the point of creating fearful instruments of torture, always acts with love and restraint.

This highly imaginative presentation ironically offers God a whole list of possible instruments of torture that he could create on the spot. Their psychological impact would be to instill fear in the worshipers of idols. God could cause fear by calling upon Fate, the supreme power conceived in Greek religion as ruling over gods and mortals. Having mentioned the possibilities, the text shows God acting in a way completely different from Fate. As the author says to the Lord, “You have arranged all in measure and number and weight” (11:20). The text continues speaking to God about the manner in which he fulfills all his activity, showing that it achieves the Greek ideal of perfect balance and harmony.

The prayerful dialogue style gives this diatribe greater apologetic power, in that it exhibits an even deeper religious intimacy than the cult of Isis could. The Lord’s covenant promises and powerful protection are always available to loyal worshipers. The reminder, “For to prevail mightily is always in your power” (11:21), is spoken to the Lord but directed to Jewish students tempted to sample Hellenistic cults. Rather than being harsh or arbitrary, the God who punished Israel’s enemies in Egypt always acts as a concerned and merciful benefactor who does not have any self-interest to protect.

What Egyptians criticized as punishment had a different role. All divine conduct is a display of the truth stated above in 1:13 that God does not delight in the destruction of any living creature. “You overlook sins of mortals with a view to repentance; for you love all creatures. For you would not have fashioned anything you hated” (11:23–24). By using vocabulary similar to that in the polemic against sinners in chap. 2, the text continues the plea for fidelity to Israel's tradition. The same God who "created humans for incorruption" (2:23) did so by placing his "incorruptible spirit in all" (12:1). Because there is continuity between earthly existence and eternal life, God disciplines mortals now to engender the fidelity and righteousness that reign forever.

12:3-27, Speaking to God About Providence. The emotional pitch of the text reaches new heights as the author enters into a series of four brief personal exchanges with God about the workings of providence. First, in a dense outpouring that has prompted modern editors to see some textual corruption, the text paradoxically reminds God that he hated the Canaanites for their magical rites of idolatry and cannibalism (12:3-11a). Knowing that they were an "accursed seed," God nevertheless eliminated them only gradually, to provide an opportunity for repentance.

Second, employing legal terminology and the technique of rhetorical questions, the text affirms strongly God's providence (12:11b-18). Infinite strength is the basis of this justice. Rather than acting in the "might makes right" manner of those who oppressed the innocent worshiper in 2:18, God always manifests honesty and fairness. In the third brief colloquy God's providence is presented as a lesson to the chosen people "that the upright person should show loving-kindness" (12:19). The lesson itself is straightforward, but its application is so obscure that it created difficulty for copyists. Such variety exists in the manuscripts that many commentators think that the original reading has been lost. They question how punishing enemies "ten thousandfold" either exhibits fairness or provides a lesson that invites Jews to expect mercy (12:22). Assuming the text is sound, we find in it the realism of the author, who here assumes a prophetic stance. The very severity of God's conduct toward the chosen people's foes is their own best hope for survival, for it is an unmistakable sign of his providence calling them to conversion.

This paradox gives rise to the fourth conversation with God, which focuses on the conduct of the Egyptians during the Exodus as illustrating the painful lesson of perceiving God's punishment too late (12:23-27). The Egyptians were the most striking example of the principle underlying Part Three: sinners are punished by the instruments of their sins. By going to the limits of idolatry in worshiping brute animals, they became so completely hardened that they could not perceive God's efforts to correct them by punishments. "And so the fullness of condemnation overwhelmed them" (12:27).

Why Aeon Worship Fails

Again the author's ability as teacher manifests itself in a carefully developed condemnation of idolatry. The remainder of Part Three is not limited to the ancient Egyptian foes of Israel but focuses on the idolatry of contemporary Hellenism. Chaps. 13-15 form the most methodological development of the whole exhortation as they lash out against the chief forms of idolatry in order of increasing malice.

They are written from the point of view of faith with a twofold objective: apologetic and polemic. As an apologia they confirm believers in the wisdom of worshipping the God of revelation, whose power was celebrated in Part Two. As a polemic this series of diatribes mocks what Hellenism has to offer as a source of comfort and hope. The series builds to a climax, beginning with the least offensive form of idolatry, nature worship, whose devotees were merely "foolish" (13:1). Next, those who worship carved statues are "doomed" (13:10). Worse is a person who fashions idols out of clay, "for such a one knows that he sins more than all" (15:13). Finally, "most stupid of all and more wretched than a foolish child" are those who worship brute animals, the kind of idolatry practiced by Israel's masters in Egypt (15:14).

The first of these polemics begins with a short but skillfully constructed passage against nature worship (13:1-9). Argument from analogy is used, namely, that anyone perceiving the beauty of the universe should recognize that its source must be superior and stronger and more beautiful. An objection is raised that this kind of idolatry springs from goodwill and so is excusable. But this defense is rejected on the principle that anyone capable of exploring the richness of the cosmos is easily within reach of quickly finding the Lord of all (→ Creation).

In this concluding judgment the cosmos is designated as "Aeon" (13:9; RSV: "world"), the widespread Hellenistic personification of the universe as eternal and living, without beginning, middle, or end. This argument rests upon belief that the Lord has manifested himself through creation, inviting humans to enjoy transcendent religious experience greater than the popular desire to "become Aeon," i.e., to enter into the cosmic harmony of the universe.

13:10-14:8

Condemnation of Those Who Worship Idols

The second form of idolatry condemned was more common, namely, idol worship. It is now treated at greater length and in a variety of ways (→ Idol). First, with biting irony the text ridicules trust in idols by offering detailed descriptions of the stages involved in selecting and carving material for an idol and preventing it from falling, and then begging this helpless object for all kinds of favors (13:10-19).

Next, the description turns to the role that idols played in sea voyages (14:1-8). This is the only passage outside of Part Two that speaks of Lady Wisdom, the "craftswoman" who governs this dangerous activity. Only God's providence can lead sailors across the waves safely. The case of Noah's ark is cited as proof, although no proper name is mentioned. God acted as pilot for Noah, selected to be "the hope of the world" (14:3-6). God's protection elicits a blessing, but idols and their makers are cursed for their cruel deceptions.

14:9-15:6

A Short History of the Origin and Spread of Idolatry

14:9-21, The Euhemeristic Explanation.

Probing deeper into the folly of idolatry, the author interrupts the series of illustrations by inserting an excursus within an excursus. This brief sketch of the origin and spread of idolatry heaps further scorn upon the practice. It draws upon contemporary inscriptions erected by Hellenistic kings to glorify their contributions to society. Its basis is the so-called Euhemeristic theory that gods are deified mortals. Little is known about Euhemerus, who lived about 300 B.C. The theory attributed to him developed over a period of time and existed in a variety of forms. The Wisdom of Solomon finds it useful to bolster the case against idolatry.

This historical note begins with a statement of the theme, which also serves as title for the excursus: "Equally abhorrent to God are the sacrilegious and their sacrilege; without doubt both performance and performer will be punished!" (14:9-10). This title is composed with the help of unusual terms, repeated at the end (15:6), thus setting the development apart clearly as a unit. The title also gives this survey a moralizing tone that is developed from the opening condemnation of idolaters for their misuse of God's creation. They exemplify human malice and scandal at its worst (14:11-14).

The moral depravity of idolaters is illustrated by two examples. In the first case, a father translates his untimely grief into idolatrous "mysteries and rites." In the course of time "the sacrilegious custom is observed as law" (14:15-16a). The second example began in the vanity of rulers who courted their subjects' favor by having their statues erected at advantageous locations throughout their kingdoms. The sculpture proved so attractive that after the ruler's death his statue continued to encourage honor. This eventually led to worship in times of misfortune and oppression (14:16b-21).

14:22-31, A Vice List. The historical survey goes on to spell out the ever increasing evil consequences of idolatry in the form of a Hellenistic vice list, which describes the desolation that sin causes. Vice lists were a commonplace in contemporary Cynic-Stoic diatribes. The specific vices mentioned fit better, however, into the standard of morality urged by biblical writers. The list serves the author's purpose of illustrating that the moral life of Jewish believers was superior to that of pagans, among whom "everything is pell mell" (14:25). After describing typical sins, the list repeats in different words the underlying principle of Part Three: "For worship of unmentionable idols is source and cause and goal of all evil" (14:27).

Concluding the list is a sin that links it to the revelation of the God of Israel, perjury (14:28-31). Why accent this vice? Because perjury is a practical form of idolatry that denies God's concern for human integrity and mocks his power to bring humans to their destiny. Perjurers are the living antithesis of "the judges of the earth," addressed in the opening of the book, whose concern was to honor the Lord.

15:1-6, The Reward of Those Who Worship Israel's God. The final paragraph of this historical summary contrasts the sad story of idolatry's harm with a happy outburst praising the covenant of Israel's God, "gracious and true, slow to anger and ruling in all mercy" (15:1), for watching over the chosen people. Implied in it is praise for faithful Jews who have not let themselves be enticed by the allure of painted idols. Jewish readers could not miss the allusion to the Sinai covenant. Into the traditional covenant formula of Exod. 34:6 is inserted the Stoic term for providence, "ruling," used earlier for the work of Lady Wisdom (cf. 8:1).

This passage serves to reinforce the diatribe against idolatry by reminding readers about the gift of revelation they enjoyed. Their links to the living God differ from links to an idol. Revelation nourishes and is nourished by a hope "full of immortality" (cf. 3:4), in contrast to the empty hopes of all whose lives are involved with idols. Believers' hope rests on "knowing" the Lord who promises eternal happiness, which is the reward of virtue (cf. 4:1).

15:7-13

Condemnation of Those Making Clay Idols

The author's scorn for potters who make idols pours out in the emotional description summed up in the word he coined, translated as “perverted drudgery” (15:8), to show contempt for those who know they are “sinning beyond all others” (15:13). Such arrogance stirred the author’s ire. By refusing to admit that his life is a “loan” from God and by willfully making “counterfeits” for personal gain, the maker of clay idols reveals that his own heart is made of “ashes” (15:10, a term from Isa. 44:20, LXX). His hope is as fragile as his product. The text illustrates the principle inspiring this long diatribe, that sinners are punished by the very matter of their sins.

In turning breakable clay into an “inane god,” such potters chart a foolish destiny and exchange hope for eternal life into wearying toil. This example incorporates a commonplace in Greek protreptic literature, that life is a play-thing of the gods, a “carnival” where fools seek profit and pleasure. Those who buy into that shallow form of life shut their hearts to the opening plea of the entire book, “Love justice” (1:1).

Animal Worship as the Most Evil Form of Idolatry

A transitional paragraph both concludes the diatribe against idolatry and prepares to continue the comparisons based on the Exodus from Egypt. The ancient Egyptians who enslaved the Israelites deserve to be scorned as “most foolish” and “more miserable than an infant’s soul” (15:14, recalling 12:24) for two reasons: they esteemed even their enemies’ idols and they worshiped hostile and ugly beasts.

The first identifies the Egyptians as stupid children lacking any personal judgment. They embraced the sins and ignorance of their enemies by attributing to them superhuman powers. The second reason for calling ancient Egyptians incomparably foolish is that the brute animals they worshiped were inferior to other animals. In fact, since these beasts are the very ones cursed by God for their part in humanity’s fall, they lack “both the praise of God and his blessing” (15:18–19, referring to Gen. 1:22; 3:14). This multiple folly prompted God to visit upon the ancient Egyptians punishment by means of the same type of creeping animals they worshiped (16:1a). This climactic statement completes the justification of God’s conduct toward the enemies of his people. The author is now free to celebrate God’s care for the chosen people during the Exodus as the final phase of his exhortation to Jewish students to remain faithful to their tradition.

PART FOUR: 11:1–14; 16:1b–19:22

Praise of God as Israel’s Liberator

The subject matter of the final part of the book relates to the role of Lady Wisdom, yet forms an independent section, a literary syncretism, i.e., a set of contrasts between the different ways God treated Israel and its enemies. The Lord, addressed throughout, is pictured as carrying out a series of dramatic interventions related to the departure of Israel from Egypt. The author freely uses data from biblical and traditional sources to construct seven contrasts.

Not only does the Lord determine the outcome, but both Egyptians and Israelites are aware of what is happening to each other. The Israelites experienced a certain degree of suffering, but it was always brief and served to teach that the Lord never abandons them. In contrast, the Egyptians are held fully responsible for their sins against God and Israel.

After the first set of contrasts Part Four is suspended to insert Part Three (11:15–16:1a), which provides a systematic theological justification for the Lord’s way of acting on behalf of the chosen people during the Exodus. The syncretism itself is too complicated to allow for an adequate apologia for God’s providence, which is an integral part of the aim of the Wisdom of Solomon. Since Part Four could not achieve its goal without the systematic diatribe against idolatry, these two sections complement each other.

11:1–14, First Contrast: The Lord Offers Drink to Israel but Subjects Egyptians to Thirst. A brief introduction provides the setting for the contrasts (11:1–3). The narrator speaks directly to the Lord, with whom he recalls key moments in Israel’s history. Since no proper names occur, only Jewish readers familiar with the traditions of the Exodus would be capable of following these imaginative musings that glorify the interventions of Israel’s God. Often the biblical order and details are modified.

The first divine intervention comes when the Israelites wandering in the desert call upon the Lord and he supplies water “from a sharp rock” as a “remedy” for their thirst (11:4, recalling Deut. 8:15). Then follows the characteristic feature of Part Four, a description of the Lord’s contrasting treatment of the hostile Egyptians with respect to water. The underlying principle governing these examples is that God is teaching and saving Israel. “For through the events that punished their enemies, through these very things they were aided in their need” (11:5).

An elaborate description, both adapting and going beyond details of the plague of the “ever-flowing river,” describes the punishment of the Egyptians. They suffered not only from seeing their drinking water turned to blood but also from seeing the divine favor upon the Israelites (11:6–14; see Exod. 7:17–24). The midrashic modifications introduced are designed to appeal to Hellenistic readers. They give these contrasts an apologetic tone (→ Midrash).

Some added details come from Jewish oral tradition, but many others were no doubt simply invented by the author to embellish the description of God’s favor toward the chosen people. Their great variety made the accounts difficult reading for later scribes copying new manuscripts, so that many textual variants appear in manuscripts. Variation in translations is often linked to the manuscript reading chosen by a translator.

16:1b–4, Second Contrast: The Lord Sends Strange Animals to Feed Israelites and Starve Egyptians.

The book returns to the contrasts after the long diatribe against idolatry, which ends with the animal worship of the ancient Egyptians. During the Exodus both Israelites and Egyptians suffered the torment of hunger. The Lord’s people, however, experienced his care in the form of an unexpected gift. He sent quail as a delicacy to nourish them. At the same time he sent upon the starving Egyptians animals so ugly that they took away all appetite. This contrast rests on an imaginative interpretation of the impact of the plague of frogs, presented as punishment for the persecution of the Israelites (see Exod. 8:2–7).

16:5–15, Third Contrast: God Exposes Both Israelites and Egyptians to Poisonous Animals but Rescues the Israelites.

The two groups go through an even more severe crisis: being bitten by poisonous animals. The original Jewish readers would recognize the allusion to the bites of the fiery serpents (see Num. 21:5–9). The text stresses that the healing must be attributed not to the image of the serpent erected by Moses but to God’s mercy and word. The Lord snatched believers from death—identified as both the River of Forgetfulness, Lethe, and Hades, two Hellenistic terms for the underworld—and brought them healing (16:10–13).

The contrast changes the details in the case of the Egyptians, who were plagued not by poisonous animals but by locusts (see Exod. 10:12–20). The Exodus text does not mention flies. The contrast rests almost entirely on the healing of the Israelites and draws from it praise for God as the only one who has power over “life and death” (16:13). These terms are used in the religious sense of eternal life with God or complete separation from him.

The message to be learned is succinctly summarized in the closing reminder to the Lord, “It is impossible to escape your hand” (16:15). There is a deliberate recall of the dramatic rescue of the righteous just one in Part One, snatched away from enemies to live forever confidently with the Lord (see 5:1, 15).

16:16–17:1, Fourth Contrast: The Lord Uses Creation to Destroy Egyptians and Heavenly Food to Feed Israelites.

This carefully constructed central contrast, replete with literary allusions and poetic phrases, contains numerous didactic references. After describing the hardening of the Egyptians, the narration tells how they and their animals were lost in the mysterious storm in which fire and rain cooperated against them (see Exod. 9:22–25). Their punishment contrasts with the miraculous feeding of the Israelites on the “bread from heaven,” the “food of angels” (16:20, recalling Ps. 77:25, LXX). This bread not only resisted changes of nature in the desert but “afforded every delight and adapted to every taste,” as an expression of the Lord’s surpassing “tenderness” (16:20–21). The manna’s power to withstand the elements gave believers perspective on how little they suffered compared with Egyptians, whose crops were destroyed.

Rather than end the synchronism at this point, the author generalizes with a prayerful consideration. The Lord’s heavenly gift provides the model for the people’s spiritual insight. Addressing the Lord directly in this synchronism, the author is struck with religious awe that “creation opens up for the benefit of those who trust in you” and responds “to the desire of those who beg” (16:24–25). Such a display of divine love teaches believers that their real life is sustained ultimately not by creatures but by the divine “word.” These favors invite them to “anticipate the rising of the sun in praising” the Lord so that dawn finds them “praying” for what they need (16:28). This responsive and confident faith community forms a strong contrast to the “hope of the ungrateful” that melts and flows off like “useless water” (16:29).

This personal outpouring reveals the motives behind the book’s opening admonition, “Be concerned about the Lord in goodness and seek him in simplicity of heart” (1:1). What is at stake is fidelity to divine revelation as key to personal integrity and eternal destiny. In this religious framework the final couplet of this central contrast serves to remind readers that the ancient Egyptians were closed to God’s grace: their “undisciplined souls went astray” (17:1). Rather than being like idolaters, slaves to nature or any other creature, believers reap the divine bounty lavished by God’s tenderness on all creation through faith, prayer, and self-control.

17:2–18:4, Fifth Contrast: God Sends Darkness to Terrify Egyptians and Light to Fortify His People. The longest of the contrasts contains a lively poetic description of the terrors experienced by the Egyptians. This passage depicting their fear is difficult to understand in places because it contains unusual comparisons, plays on words, and penetrating psychological insights. More than thirty terms never found elsewhere in the LXX appear in it. The impact of the plague of darkness that engulfed not only the land but also the minds and the hearts of the Egyptians is described in striking metaphors at great length. In fact, the text devotes five times as much space to this display of divine punishment as it does to the experience of light enjoyed by the Israelites before their departure.

In theological terms, what the author contrasts are two ways in which God's "eternal providence" works (17:2; see 14:3). This providence turned the arrogant captors of the chosen people into "prisoners of darkness and captives of lingering night" behind the veil of "Forgetfulness," the river of Hades from which God protected his people (17:3; see 16:11). This vivid description portrays how the power of darkness worked on the imagination of the Egyptians to accent sights and sounds so that "they thought what they had seen was worse" than it really was (17:6). Through divine intervention those who promised to drive out all fear from Egypt themselves suffered "a timidity so sick it was laughable" (17:8).

This vivid picture leads up to a descriptive definition of fear, placed at the very center of this long development: "fear is nothing other than betrayal by the resources of the reasoning faculty, ignorance converting anticipation into the worst form of torture" (17:12–13). This psychologizing definition reflects a kind of speculation popular among contemporary Hellenistic writers, who interpreted Homeric myths and the "descents into hell" in psychological terms.

Once the definition is formulated, the author balances the description with further images of "unexpected fear" at work through dreams, which formed an "unbarred prisoner," made either by "monstrous phantoms" or by the "betrayal of the soul" (17:15). Hellenistic philosophers looked on dreams as psychological self-punishment. The author of the Wisdom of Solomon was aware of such speculation, but he viewed dreams as instruments of divine providence directing human destiny and trapping sinners in their evil choices. This approach continues his apologia for fidelity to revelation. Sin traps all classes of human beings, like farmers, shepherds, and solitary workers, in "one chain of darkness" (17:17). Their fear foreshadowed even worse punishment at the hands of divine justice.

The short second part of this fifth contrast celebrates the blessing of freedom upon the chosen people. It came first on them in the gratitude of the Egyptians for not being wiped out when they were helpless in their prison of darkness. More importantly, God's blessing took the form of a "flaming column," the pillar of fire God prepared, along with a protecting sun, to lead them on their journey to freedom (18:1–3).

This contrast affirms once more the justice of God in punishing the Egyptians severely. They fully deserved their loss of freedom for imprisoning the Israelites, who had the mission to give "the light of the incorruptible law to the world" (18:4). This revelation recalls the longer justification of God that opened Part Three, the only other time the adjective "incorruptible" occurs in this work. There the author reminded God, "Your incorruptible spirit is upon all" (12:1).

God's all-powerful justice obliges him to demand responsible conduct from everyone. For their part, being true to themselves is the condition for recognizing both God's presence in human affairs and the law revealed to Israel as light of the world. The Egyptians fall into the same category as the wicked of Part One, who strayed from the way of truth and did not let the light of justice shine for them (see 5:6–7).

18:5–25, Sixth Contrast: The Word of the Lord Brings Death to the Egyptian First-born but Freedom to Israel. Mention of the law suggests Moses, the lawgiver. This contrast, which deals with the death of the firstborn of the Egyptians in the Red Sea, takes its origin from an allusion to the attempted slaughter of Moses and the actual killing of an unknown number of Israelite babies. In punishment, God destroyed not only Egyptian children but also their soldiers in the water.

That incident prompts a further elaboration, a poetic description of the first Passover feast, celebrated in Egypt as the Israelites anticipated their freedom (18:6–9). This description tends to clutter the comparison, but it also supplies elements usually included in them. First, the Israelites knew about "the destruction of the enemy," i.e., the final fate of the Egyptians. Second, it repeats the principle governing the contrasts, why God brought them about: "for by the way you punished our adversaries, you also invited us to glory" (18:8).

The destroying angel of the Exodus is portrayed as God's "all-powerful word," reaching from earth to heaven. But the Egyptians learned too late that Israel is truly "God's son" (18:10–16). The contrasting scene pictures Israel as being rescued from an "experience of death."

Without offering details the text refers to the time when Aaron, dressed in priestly robes, intervened through "prayer and the propitiation of incense" to appease God's anger (18:21; see Num. 16:46-47).

19:1-21, Seventh Contrast: The Lord Leads Israel to Safety and Destroys Its Captors. The last contrast begins by portraying one final act of malice on the part of Egyptians. In a desperate "plan of folly" they try to stop the Israelites, whom they had already agreed to let go. The point of the contrast is the way God organized Israel's escape without violating either Egypt's freedom or the laws of nature. Creation obeyed the divine "commands" to expedite Israel's marvelous journey through the sea "on a plane of green grass," skipping like lambs and praising "you, Lord, the one who rescued them" (19:5-9). God's people kept in mind the previous suffering, for them a short prelude to comfort, but for Egyptians, who "justly suffered their own evil deeds," a disaster (19:10-13).

Similarities to the central contrast appear at this point. The tone is highly emotive, with the author addressing God explicitly as "Lord," and using the second-person pronoun five times. He adds two reflections. First, the malice of the Egyptians is presented as even greater than that of the Canaanites who resisted the arriving Israelites (19:13d-17). The second, concluding description pictures the transformation of nature, repeating the miracle of the manna, now called "ambrosial food" (19:18-21; see 16:20-22).

19:22, Concluding Comment. The final couplet, addressed to the Lord, is an optimistic expression of the attitude permeating the entire protreptic: the Lord has always brought the chosen people through danger. Readers are left to draw the conclusion: to abandon the faith community is self-destruction.

SIRACH

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

INTRODUCTION

In most Greek manuscripts the title of this book identifies its genre and author: the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach. The Syriac text has a shorter version, the Wisdom of Bar Sirach. Latin tradition drops the name and introduces descriptive categories such as "the Church Book" (Ecclesiasticus, so the Vulgate) and Parabola ("Proverbs," according to Jerome, who states that a Hebrew copy had this title). On two occasions later Jewish writers introduce a citation from Sirach with the words hammoshel 'amar (Heb., "the Parabolist said"). At least one Jewish scholar, Saadia (d. A.D. 942), refers to Sirach as seper musar ("the Book of Discipline/Instruction").

The manuscript tradition yields some confusion about the author's name and precise relationship to Sirach. In all probability his name was Jeshua ben Eleazar ben Sirach, the name Simon in some manuscripts having entered the text by mistake from 50:1. The "ch" ending on Sirach in the Greek manuscripts represents either a Greek chi, indicating an indeclinable word, or a final Hebrew alep. For convenience, in this commentary Ben Sirach designates the author and Sirach the book.

In a way the twofold title in which literary type and authorship appear seems entirely appropriate for a book that bridges two cultures, the Hebraic and the Hellenistic. Sirach represents the culmination of Jewish wisdom literature of the sort found in the book of Proverbs (→ Wisdom). Although Sirach introduces distinctive features, specifically the integration of Israel's sacred history into the wisdom tradition, the book resembles Proverbs in all essentials. At the same time, pride of authorship deriving from the Greek culture prompted Ben Sirach to identify himself rather than attribute the written product to King Solomon or to some other figure of the past.

The Historical Setting

Sirach opens with a prologue written by Ben Sirach's grandson, who arrived in Egypt during the thirty-eighth year of Ptolemy Euergetes and resided there for some time before translating the book into Greek. The reference is to Ptolemy Physcon VII Euergetes II, who ruled Egypt from 170 to 164 and again from 145 to 117 B.C. Ben Sirach was probably active as late as 180 and perhaps even later. The death in 195 of the Simon whose ministry as high priest made such a lasting impression on Ben Sirach reinforces this dating of Ben Sirach's activity between 200 and 180 B.C.

The first twenty years of the second century B.C. inaugurated a lull before the storm brought on by the Maccabean revolt. To express gratitude for Jewish assistance in routing the Egyptian garrison in the citadel at Jerusalem in 198 B.C., the Seleucid king Antiochus III made several concessions: the royal coffers would help defray the cost of sacrifices; materials for the construction of the Temple were exempt from taxes; the people were obligated to live according to the law of their ancestors; the Senate, priests, scribes, and sacred singers were exempt from various taxes; citizens in Jerusalem were exempt from taxes for three years; and other citizens enjoyed a reduction in taxes of one-third, while slaves were emancipated. The situation changed as a result of Syria's defeat at the hands of the Romans in Magnesia in 190. Pressed for increased revenues, the Seleucid rulers rescinded the exemptions from taxes and restricted the privileges they had earlier granted to Jews.

The internal situation reflected the political climate on the larger scene. Opportunists joined forces with rulers and their challengers, hoping to be on the side of the victor. Competing families, Tobiards and Oniads, divided the people's loyalty, and the rivalry between Jews and Samaritans extended the dissension even further. The struggle between Jason and Menelaus for the office of high priest demonstrates the degree to which avarice and greed affected religious office (see 2 Macc. 4–5). Their willingness to compromise Hebrew ways in favor of Greek customs illustrates the degradation of the priesthood and explains why Ben Sirach praises Simon, the father of Onias III, so lavishly. At the same time Antiochus IV Epiphanes' deposition of Onias constituted an infringement by a foreign government on the religious freedom of the Jews that precipitated open revolt. Only a few allusions in Sirach betray this volatile political atmosphere (50:25–26, a reference to Edomites, Philistines, and Samaritans; 40:25–26 and 50:1, 23–24, which possibly criticize the contenders for the high priesthood for fomenting strife and for offering money for the religious office). Perhaps the unique prayer in 36:1–17 for renewed deeds of salvation arises from Ben Sira's sense that the sacred legacy was in jeopardy at the moment.

Relation to Tradition

The translator identifies his grandfather as a student of Jewish Scriptures, which already exist in his time as three distinct entities: the Law, the Prophets, and the other books. The last division was still open, and Ben Sira fully expects his book to find a place beside the other wisdom books. In his view Israel's wisdom cast a wide net, embracing the sacred tradition as well as, presumably, the usual fare of literature such as Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes. His grandson acknowledges a practical dimension of knowledge in that all instruction enables an individual to live in compliance with Jewish law. He also assumes that a translation into the adopted language of Jews in Egypt, probably at Alexandria, will facilitate obedience to the Torah.

Ben Sira's grandson also recognizes the inadequacy of his translation, conceding that things originally expressed in Hebrew have different nuances from their nearest equivalent in the Greek tongue. If this protest amounts to something more than a modest disclaimer, it suggests that the disappearance of the Hebrew text of Sirach is particularly unfortunate. Recent discoveries of considerable portions of Sirach in Hebrew have thus ushered in a new stage of research on the book, although the Greek text remains fundamental to every analysis.

According to the grandson, Ben Sira specialized in instruction and wisdom. This description accords with Ben Sira's own understanding of his vocation as a wise man and a scribe. Admittedly, the latter term occurs in a conventional text about various vocations (36:24); the oldest such text seems to be the Egyptian Instruction of Duuf. More reliable therefore is the self-description in 50:27, where Ben Sira characterizes his book as "instruction in understanding and knowledge," and in 51:23–30, where he implies that he administers a school (Heb. bet hamidrash, "house of study"). This is the first clear mention of an Israelite school, although some scholars have assumed the existence of the institution at a much earlier date on the basis of parallels with Egypt and Mesopotamia, and to some extent Ugarit; the needs of the royal court, especially with respect to diplomacy; scattered archaeological evidence in Palestinian inscriptions; and the quality of Israel's literature.

Ben Sira uses the first person freely, as does also the unknown author of Ecclesiastes, but the actual extent of autobiography remains uncertain. Much of this material belongs to literary convention, and it therefore reveals little about specific details in Ben Sira's life. Even the much discussed allusion to travel in 34:9–12 may fall into the category of literary convention, and the ambiguous allusion to deliverance from some peril associated with a journey may consequently indicate nothing about Ben Sira's travels. On the other hand, he may very well have represented his compatriots before a foreign government in the same way John and his son Eupolemus negotiated on behalf of Judea (2 Macc. 4:11) and Philo defended the Jewish cause before Caligula.

Efforts to glean information about Ben Sira's domestic situation on the basis of his harsh observations about daughters and his reference to a shrewish wife stray wide of the mark, for such descriptions belong to the traditional teachings of ancient sages. Nevertheless, Ben Sira does introduce a virulence in his observations about women that exceeds anything in Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, or Job.

It appears that Ben Sira cherished irreconcilable traditions, the prophetic and the wisdom. Believing in inspiration during his own day, he endeavored to write a book that was in the tradition of the Mosaic legislation and the prophetic corpus. For Ben Sira instruction embraced far more than the general insights, however astute, achieved by the wise. It included the specific law of Moses. The majestic hymn about wisdom in 24:1–29 thus occupies a central position in the book, for it claims the Mosaic teaching as the essence of wisdom. This may not constitute a declaration of war against the Greek understanding of knowledge as the fruit of reasoned inquiry, but the insistence that revelation lies at the heart of learning gives Judaism a distinct advantage over Hellenism in this regard.

The insistence on inspiration may actually have emerged as a response to Israel's wisdom literature, which elevates human inquiry as the fundamental mode of existence. Although the compilers of Proverbs 1–9 challenged this understanding of knowledge by inserting religious devotion into the equation, thereby insisting that the fear of the Lord was both the essence and the principal element of knowledge, Ben Sira takes an even greater step. For him wisdom is identical with the Mosaic legislation at Sinai and hence a divine gift rather than a human achievement.

This integration of themes from Yahwism (Israel's specific religious traditions) and wisdom occurs throughout the book, not simply in the praise of famous men (44:1–50:21). Allusions to Israel's sacred tradition function as examples and warnings, whereas earlier teachers had restricted their material to universal experience. Ben Sira goes so far as to quote David's bold response to the divine anger: "We shall fall into the hands of the Lord, not into the hands of men; for his majesty is equal to his mercy" (2:18; cf. 2 Sam. 24:14). Elsewhere Ben Sira alludes to pentateuchal traditions from the primeval history (Gen. 1–11) and the patriarchal narratives (Gen. 12–50). He mentions Adam (Sir. 33:10; 40:1), Eve (25:24), Lot (16:8), Sodom and Gomorrah (39:23, NEB), the fallen angels (16:7), the Flood (40:10), the Noachian covenant (17:12), the image of God (17:3), the creation account (39:16, 21), and Jacob's descendants (23:12).

Allusions to matters outside the book of Genesis also occur, such as the six hundred thousand Israelites who perished in the wilderness (16:9–10), the divine epithet "Holy One" (4:14), the Mosaic Law (24:23), Zion (36:13–15), and the tree that sweetened water (38:5). Twice Ben Sira brings together a large number of sacred themes. In 24:1–12 he refers to creation by means of a heavenly mist, the pillar of cloud symbolizing God's dwelling place, Jacob and Israel, the holy tabernacle, Jerusalem, and the special people of God; in 36:1–17 to divine signs and miracles, the reciting of God's wonders, tribes of Jacob and their inheritance, people called by God's name, Israel as God's firstborn, the city of God's sanctuary, prophecies spoken in God's name, and Aaron's blessing.

The Forms of Expression

Ben Sira's literary expression borrows heavily from Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes. He offers instruction to students, using the technical language of a teacher who addresses his students as sons. Interesting variations of "my son" do occur, for example, "holy sons" (39:13), "children" (3:1), "my children" (23:7; 41:14), and "you who need instruction" (51:23). Ancient instructions typically employ imperatives, freely offering prescriptive advice reinforced with warnings and admonitions. These instructions resemble brief paragraphs on specific subjects, often set off from what follows or precedes by refrains and repeated phrases. In this regard Ben Sira develops a practice that the author of Proverbs 1–9 preferred, presumably because it gave ample opportunity to support his teachings with religious arguments.

These paragraph-length instructions cover a wide range of topics, for they aim to prepare young men for coping in society. Hence the teacher discusses everything from table manners to religious duties, always concentrating on the best way to succeed in an endeavor. Almost all Ben Sira's advice has a strong practical bent, even when the subject extends to matters like dreams (34:1–8), shame (41:17–42:8), and death (41:1–4). At times he endeavors to solve vexing theological dilemmas, such as justifying the vocation of the physician in a society that believes sickness indicates divine punishment for sin (38:1–15), and comparing the scribe's life of leisure to the drudgery of other types of work, while at the same time recognizing the contribution that laborers make to the well-being of the community (38:24–39:11). Much of Ben Sira's energy addresses the difficult area of sexual conduct and, more generally, relations between the sexes, but he also speaks often about parental responsibilities to discipline children. These instructions strive at inculcating attitudes that issue in specific actions; they answer questions like "How should I respond to people from widely different social strata, the wealthy and paupers? What is my duty in the matter of charitable contributions? When should I speak in a public meeting?"

Sirach also has numerous truth statements, often called sentences, the other major form of expression in proverbial literature. These brief aphorisms capture what were regarded as timeless and universal truths, expressing them in a way that seizes the imagination and lingers in memory. "A rich man does wrong, and he even adds insults; a poor man suffers an injustice, and he must apologize" (13:3). "A story told at the wrong time is like music in a time of mourning, but rebuke and punishment are always wise actions" (22:6). "A new friend resembles new wine; after it has aged, one can drink it with pleasure" (9:10b). "All living beings become old like a garment, for the ancient decree reads, 'You must surely die'" (14:17).

Like teachers before him Ben Sira varies the truth statements enormously. He uses the "better than" proverb ("Better is a man's wickedness than a woman who does good; and a woman brings shame and disgrace," 42:14), the numerical proverb ("I take pleasure in three things which are beautiful in the sight of the Lord and of men: agreement between brothers, friendship among neighbors, and a wife and husband living in harmony," 25:1), and the particle of existence ("There is one who by keeping silent is deemed wise, while another is detested for talking too much; there is one who keeps silent because he has no answer, while another remains silent because he knows when to speak," 20:5–6). Ben Sira also pronounces benedictions and maledictions ("Blessed is the man who does not err with his lips and does not suffer remorse for sin," 14:1; "Woe to timid hearts and to slack hands, and to the sinner who leads a double life," 2:12), and he uses rhetorical questions freely ("What race is worthy of honor? The human race. What race is worthy of honor? Those who fear the Lord. What race is not worthy of honor? The human race. What race is not worthy of honor? Those who break the commandments," 10:19).

In these cases, Proverbs serves as Ben Sira's guide to literary expression. To some degree that is true of prayer, which achieves prominence in Sirach despite its meager role in Prov. 30:7–9. With Ben Sira the wise man becomes a worshiper, unashamedly offering prayers to the Deity (22:27–23:6; 36:1–17). The titles with which Ben Sira addresses God emphasize majesty and intimacy: “Lord, Father and Ruler of my life” (23:1); “Lord, Father and God of my life” (23:4); “Lord, the God of all” (36:1); “the Lord, the God of the ages” (36:17). This sage lifts up his voice in hymnic praise (42:15–43:33; 51:1–12), particularly when the wonders of nature steal his imagination. For this hymnic praise the author of Job is Ben Sira’s mentor, even if some of the poems in the book of Job amount to dubious praise. At least two things stand out as one surveys the wonders that Ben Sira extols: a sense of awe and a recognition that the human eye has only penetrated the surface. Moreover, Ben Sira’s language waxes eloquent, especially in his use of exquisite images for freezing rain, frost, and racing clouds (in 43:14–20, pools put on ice “like a breastplate,” hoarfrost becomes “pointed thorns,” clouds “fly forth like birds”).

Two didactic compositions resemble the hymns, although these learned meditations leave the impression of rational reflection and studious instruction (16:24–17:14; 39:12–35). These compositions explore the place of humankind in the universe and affirm a legitimate role for everything, even things that appear to be out of place in an orderly universe. Closely related to these meditations, especially in function, is the debate form, for which Ecclesiastes paved the way within Israelite wisdom literature. (This device to stave off dissent, specifically denial of divine justice, appears in Egyptian wisdom traditions as well.) Ben Sira warns against an attitude that presumes too much about God’s patience, mercy, and sovereignty (5:3–6) and challenges the assumption that one can sin with impunity (“Do not say: ‘I am hidden from the Lord, and who from on high will remember me? Among so many people I shall not be noticed, for what is my life in the boundless creation?’” 16:17). Here the normal form (“Do not say . . . for . . .”) has given way to an elaborate rationale introduced by an expression demanding close scrutiny: “Behold!” (16:18–23).

Like Proverbs and Job, Sirach uses the hymnic form to praise wisdom (24:1–29), but he introduces altogether new concepts. Whereas wisdom in Job 28 remains inaccessible to everyone but the Lord, in Sirach she takes up residence at Jerusalem and expresses herself through the law of Moses. Proverbs 8 stresses wisdom’s participation in creating and ordering the world, a theme that Ben Sira picks up and elaborates in peculiar fashion. A universal motif, creation by a mist that covers the earth, bows before particularist notions such as a dwelling in Jacob and an inheritance in Israel, a resting place in Zion among an honored people, the portion of the Lord. The erotic relationship between student and wisdom, present in Proverbs 8 and 9, achieves new expression in an acrostic poem that concludes Sirach (51:13–20, 30), an earlier form of which was discovered in Cave 11 at Qumran.

An astonishing shift takes place when Ben Sira actually sings praises of mortals (44:1–50:24). Like the formal expressions of praise called encomia in Greek culture, these walks through the gallery of biblical characters prepare the way for an effusive display of respect for the high priest in office during Ben Sira’s time. The choice of heroes, highly selective, betrays a prejudice for priestly lineage and for individuals who contributed to Israel’s religious establishment. Not a woman graces the pages of this account, despite the contribution of women to the religious life as recorded in sacred literature. Pride of position goes to Moses, Aaron, and Phinehas; David, Solomon, Hezekiah, Josiah, Zerubbabel, and Joshua receive praise for their part in reforming and strengthening the Temple and its service. Others who make this select list impressed Ben Sira by miraculous feats rather than by the content of their prophetic teaching. By design the personalities make an appearance according to the threefold division of the Hebrew canon: Pentateuch first, Prophets next, and the Writings last, except for an afterthought that returns to the starting point, Enoch, and works backwards to Adam.

The essential themes of the book, fear of the Lord and wisdom, interact so effectively that some question remains about which of these occupies prominence. The author of Proverbs 1–9 subjugated fear of the Lord to wisdom, relegating this religious aspect to the essence and first principle of knowledge. For Ben Sira fear of the Lord has no rival, not even from the person who acquires wisdom: “How great is he who has gained wisdom! But there is no one superior to him who fears the Lord. The fear of the Lord surpasses everything” (25:10–11). This exalted appreciation for religion leads Ben Sira to conclude that wisdom’s garland and root exist in the fear of the Lord. Therefore, such religious devotion alone justifies a sense of accomplishment in Ben Sira’s eyes (10:22).

Beneath these themes of true piety and the quest for knowledge lies an explosive issue that threatens to divide Ben Sira’s constituency. Can one believe in divine justice? The tension between wrath and mercy lends immense pathos to the book, which virtually begins and ends with an affirmation of both concepts. Besides the traditional arguments for divine justice—God’s knowledge of events before they occur, the testimony of past experience, the anticipation of an eschatological (final) redressing of all wrongs, the necessity of acknowledging the limits of human knowledge—Ben Sira introduces two new arguments, one psychological and the other metaphysical. Sinners suffer inner stress, and the universe itself fights on behalf of the virtuous. Both efforts to secure a rational theodicy, that is, a defense of the justice of God, have parallels in the Greek culture of the second century B.C. For Ben Sira, the harmony of creation manifests divine glory, a term that occupies an exalted position in the final chapters of the book.

The Larger Environment

Although Sirach resembles other Jewish literary works of the third to first century B.C., the book also has points of contact with Greek literature. Affinities with Jewish wisdom link Sirach more closely with those texts in Hebrew than with the Greek Wisdom of Solomon. Ben Sira shares a few phrases with Ecclesiastes, but he does not endorse this book's skepticism, particularly with regard to the divine-human relationship. The book of Tobit places more emphasis on specific acts of piety as an expression of loyalty to the Mosaic law, but both Tobit and Sirach freely lift their voices in prayer. Whereas Ben Sira prays for wondrous acts on God's part, Tobit both prays for and experiences divine feats. Baruch's poem on wisdom (3:9–4:4) does not integrate mythic themes about wisdom's role in creation with the idea that the concrete expression of wisdom occurs in the law. The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs transcends the ritual aspects of religion to a degree that Ben Sira never achieves. The author of Wisdom of Solomon embraces Hellenistic concepts enthusiastically, whereas Ben Sira's indebtedness to the Greeks appears to be no more than unconscious breathing of the air.

Occasional parallels occur between Sirach and Greek authors (Theognis, Sophocles, Xenophon, Euripides, Hesiod, and Homer), but none of them requires actual literary dependence. The comparison of death to falling leaves in Sir. 14:18 and in Homer, a natural association of ideas, belongs to folk wisdom. The Stoic declaration, "He is the all!" occurs in Sirach, along with a host of Greek ideas and customs: a eulogy of ancestors, the notion of a rational universe, the balancing of human freedom and divine providence, dining customs, and pride of authorship. Perhaps Ben Sira's attitude toward physicians owes much to the Greek ethos. Links with Egyptian wisdom may exist, especially in the attitude to shame, the use of the bee to illustrate the importance of small things, and the comparison of the scribal profession to other types of work.

The air that Ben Sira breathed may have been Hellenized, but he does not permit it to overcome him. The Stoic ideal of world citizenship can find no toehold, for Ben Sira believes that Israel is the Lord's portion. Links with Aramean wisdom through Ahiqar, although plausible, may belong to folk tradition, e.g., references to the futility of opposing a flowing river and the revelation of character through one's clothes. Ben Sira does not openly endorse Jewish eschatological hopes, but he approaches them in fervent prayer (36:6–12). One strange allusion to the Lord's fighting on behalf of those who strive to the death for truth must have taken on new meaning during the Maccabean revolt. Earlier wisdom had no place for God as combatant.

Ben Sira's opponents are Jews who have surrendered their Jewish heritage, becoming indifferent to the Mosaic law and adopting a libertine life-style. They do not believe in the traditional concept of reward and retribution, hence they associate with dangerous companions. Unlike Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach directs its message to Jews and lacks any explicit attack against the dominant culture in the Mediterranean region. Ben Sira does not hate Hellenism, but he believes in the superiority of Jewish wisdom and ethics.

The Text

The Greek text survives in two forms: codices such as Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, and others; and a longer form of certain cursives (the most important of which is identified by its catalogue number, 248). The Old Latin and Vulgate used the Greek text of Sirach, which has also influenced the Syriac Peshitta to some degree (→ Texts, Versions, Manuscripts, Editions). In 1896–1900 parts of the Hebrew text dating from the ninth to twelfth centuries A.D. came to light after having disappeared for centuries. The Cairo Genizah, a medieval synagogue storage room for discarded manuscripts that was rediscovered in the nineteenth century, yielded about two-thirds of the Hebrew text (labeled A, B, C, D); another leaf (E) was discovered in 1931. Additional fragments of B and C came to light in 1958 and 1960; three years later a fragmentary scroll was discovered at Masada containing 39:27–44:17 in mutilated form. The B manuscript from Cairo closely resembles this scroll from Masada. This original Hebrew version antedates the Greek, but it has numerous errors and glosses (explanatory comments by the scribe). The freedom with which scribes rewrote this text indicates that it was not considered sacred like the books of the Hebrew canon. An interesting feature of Cairo B and E, an arrangement of the text in poetic lines, occurs also in a fragment of 6:20–31 (the ends of the lines) that was found in Cave 2 at Qumran. In all, the Cairo Genizah has yielded Sir. 3:6–16:26; 30:11–38:27; and 39:15–51:30, plus fragments of other chapters.

Although they are not usually reproduced in English translations, titles for individual sections are found in both the Greek and Hebrew texts (20:27; 23:7; 24:1; 30:1, 16; 44:1; 51:1; Heb., 31:12 = Gk. 34:12, 41:14, and 44:1). Transitions between sections also occur several times (42:25 to 43:1; 43:33 to 44:1; 49:16 to 50:1). In the Hebrew an extra psalm similar to Psalm 136 follows 51:12. The sequence from chap. 31 to 36 differs in the Hebrew, Vulgate, and Syriac from the Greek, which offers a less likely order at this point.

Sirach was not included in the Hebrew Bible, but the book was often cited until the tenth century A.D. in rabbinic circles, occasionally as sacred Scripture. Some features of the book are closer to Sadducean teaching than to Pharisaic, which may have precluded its inclusion in the canon, although its relatively late date probably explains its omission. Within the Christian church the status of Sirach has varied. The author of the Letter of James was especially fond of Sirach; and the writers of the pseudepigraphal works the Didache, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Letter of Barnabas as well as Clement of Alexandria used it as a source of inspiration. The early Latin fathers included Sirach as one of the five Solomonic books; Cyprian, bishop of Carthage in the middle of the third century, affirmed the canonical status of Sirach, later proclaimed at the Council of Trent. Protestant churches do not accept Sirach as canonical, though it is valued as instructive and edifying.

COMMENTARY

The Prologue. The Greek text opens with a prologue in which the translator commends his grandfather's insights and asks for readers' indulgence in instances where the translation lacks exactness. The audience, Jews in the Diaspora, and possibly some Egyptians (unless the praise of Israel's wisdom, like Deut. 4:6, targets Jewish readers) learns that the author of the book was a teacher who read (i.e., explained) the Scriptures. These sacred texts already existed in two distinct divisions, the Law and the Prophets, plus another group, still undefined. Sirach draws inspiration from all three divisions, although it most resembles those books in the third group. Ben Sira's teachings have a practical raison d'être, to enable one to observe the Mosaic law.

1:1-21, Wisdom and the Fear of the Lord. Because wisdom derives from God and is fully known only by the creator, Ben Sira endeavors to identify it by demonstrating the intimate relationship between wisdom and fear of God. Two impossible tasks emphasize wisdom's hiddenness; these resemble numerical proverbs, at least in rhetorical function. Just as none can count the sand of the sea or explore the abyss, so nobody but God possesses wisdom. Consequently, humankind ought to fear the Lord, precisely because a small measure of wisdom comes to favored creatures. Here God pours out wisdom in the same way the Holy Spirit is poured out, making the customary identification of wisdom and spirit (Wisd. of Sol. 1:4-7) doubly interesting. Ben Sira praises fear of the Lord highly: it brings joy and long life, for awe and religious devotion, the essential meaning of the concept of the fear of God, constitute both the first principle and essence of wisdom. (Although v. 21 is not present in the older Greek manuscripts, Skehan and Di Lella argue for its authenticity.)

1:22-2:6, The Necessity for Patience. The impatient individual will not acquire wisdom, whereas the humble one endures testing, fortified by hope and faithfulness, the two ingredients in the Hebrew word 'amunah. Israelite and Egyptian wisdom literature warns against hot-headed behavior, the opposite of wise conduct, and advocates patience until the correct moment when speech achieves maximum potential. In certain circumstances good people encounter extraordinary testing, partly through the evil machinations of powerful officials but also as a means of shaping character. Ben Sira encourages fidelity in trying circumstances in the same way the Letter of James urges steadfastness (James 1:2-15), but the two authors respond differently to the question "How can I become wise?" Ben Sira advises observance of the law whereas the Letter of James suggests that one ask God for wisdom. Both authors warn against having a divided mind, for God knows the authentic character of every person. Ben Sira admirably brings together free will and divine largesse (Sir. 1:26; 2:6).

2:7-18, The Vastness of Divine Compassion. The prevalence of temptation does not necessarily imply an uncaring Deity. Ben Sira affirms the ancient credo from Exod. 34:6-7, particularly those attributes that bring comfort to the believer. As an object lesson, Ben Sira quotes David's bold response to divine displeasure (2 Sam. 24:14), thus emphasizing divine mercy equivalent to majesty. This entire section in Sirach shows rhetorical flourish and balancing of refrains grouped together in threes ("you who fear the Lord"; "who ever . . .?"; "woe to"; "those who fear the Lord"). Similarly, the assertion in Sir. 2:11 that the Lord is compassionate corresponds to 2:18, which brings together power and tenderness. The appeal to lessons from experience to reinforce God's justice ignores the force of Job's personal attack against overconfidence on the part of the wise. Nevertheless, Ben Sira could have justified his position by noting that Job ultimately experienced honor after only temporary distress.

3:1-16, Filial Duty. This reflection on the implications of the commandment to honor one's parents preserves an early example of the belief in the efficacy of good deeds, their power to offset transgression in the final reckoning. Ben Sira's observations about old age and its unwelcome features may reflect changing economic factors in Judea and the accompanying breakdown of the larger family. The earlier identification of wisdom with length of years has yielded before harsh examples of persons like Auranus whom the author of 2 Maccabees describes as advanced in years and no less advanced in folly (2 Macc. 4:40). An aged father's vanishing strength and reduced intellectual acumen offer occasions for insensitive youth to seize unprecedented authority in daily affairs, but such seemingly innocent usurpation of power has devastating consequences, particularly in destroying the offender's relationship with a higher authority, God. The same goes for those who lack respect for their mothers, whose curse the Lord reinforces.

3:17-31, Intellectual Modesty. The inquirer after knowledge needs to recognize that some things can never be discovered, for wisdom conceals itself. Nevertheless, a discerning person will ponder proverbs, seeking to learn as much as can be known. Where revealed knowledge vies with insights achieved through human effort, considerable tension results. The author of Deut. 29:29 and 30:11-14 wrestles with this problem generated by suspicion that worthwhile things require extraordinary expenditure of energy and insists that mystery remains, although God has bestowed considerable information on humankind. The manner of posing the questions reveals the presence of disconcerting claims that such revealed truth is too accessible to be truly valuable. Ben Sira confronts a similar attitude and adopts the earlier stance that God has granted adequate insights. Here is a call for intellectual humility, one that may address Greek influence among young Jews or even the philosophical quest in the Greek world.

4:1-10, Kindness to the Poor. Intellectual rigor that manifests itself in studying proverbs does not require one to withdraw from society and its deprived citizens. Ben Sira advises his students to relieve the burdens borne by the poor, for which kindness God will respond favorably. Such unfortunate individuals already have enough vexation without having to wait for a handout or having their hopes dashed by a potential benefactor who pretends not to see them. Ben Sira reproduces ancient belief that the Holy One attends to the prayer of the afflicted, which in this instance takes the form of a curse against the person who increased the poor one's burden (4:6). Potential officials are thus encouraged to use their power to improve the lot of widows and orphans, daring all the while to render verdicts in favor of the powerless rather than currying favor from the rich.

4:11-19, Wisdom's Practical Benefits. Ben Sira describes some rewards that accompany wisdom, making it worthwhile to endure initial hardship in the quest for her. Here wisdom is personified, at least as a literary figure. She leads new students along difficult paths and tests their resolve, eventually rewarding those who endure faithfully (4:17-18). This idea corresponds to the sages' teaching that the Lord disciplines those who occupy a place of favor. Wisdom bestows joy, life, honor, and divine approval. Her benefits know no limit, even outside Judea, for she enables some individuals to judge nations.

4:20-6:4, Speaking Wisely. This section deals with timidity in speech and its opposite, reckless talk. In the first instance Ben Sira considers the person who refrains from speaking when the occasion demands some comment (4:20-28). The result is concealed wisdom, hence worthless. The truly intelligent individual recognizes the right moment and seizes the opportunity to throw light on the situation. This does not mean that one must speak in every circumstance, for sometimes silence is wiser, particularly when passions run freely. Nevertheless, one should have courage to state the truth and to fight for its supremacy. Ben Sira makes an astonishing claim: that God will fight alongside you in this struggle on behalf of truth.

Rash speech comes in many forms (4:29-6:4). Ben Sira warns against freethinkers who let their lusts govern their lives, thinking wealth lasts forever. He uses an old formula of debate to withstand those practical atheists who deny God's sovereignty on the basis of delayed punishment or who presume on divine mercy in the same way a later philosopher said, "God will forgive. That's his business." Instead of these types of speech, one ought to be thoughtful and consistent, scrupulously avoiding slander and boasting. The power of speech brings honor and shame, so silence is preferable to speech unless understanding governs the tongue. Ben Sira thus carries on an ancient discussion, a favorite topic among the wise, but also one that later captured the imagination of the author of the Letter of James.

6:5-17, Friendship. Not everyone who claims to be a friend can be trusted, for some people use friendship for their own advantage, turning away from the slightest sign of adversity arises. Ben Sirā recommends caution in choosing intimates, even to the point of testing potential friends. A pleasant demeanor and kind words draw others to a person, but rare indeed should be the individual who shares his or her inner secrets. The expression "one in a thousand" (6:6) occurs in Job and Ecclesiastes for a rare find; the same usage appears in Egyptian wisdom literature. Ben Sirā acknowledges the fact that some so-called friends take excessive liberty, becoming overly familiar. As protection from abuse of friendship, Ben Sirā advises extreme measures: remaining distant from enemies and maintaining a guard toward one's friends. The Egyptian Instruction of Amenemope, written for Amenemope's son Sesostri, goes even farther, discouraging trust in anyone. Sirach does not manifest such a jaundiced view; instead, it endorses friendship enthusiastically, calling a true friend an elixir of life, a shelter, and a treasure.

6:18-37, Wisdom's Unwelcome Discipline. Ancient teachers made no secret of the difficulties confronting those who wished to become learned. Here Ben Sirā compares wisdom to a field in need of plowing and to a yoke that eager students place on their shoulders (6:19, 24). Behind the first metaphor lies the erotic dimension of learning, elsewhere expressed as a lover in pursuit of a beloved, especially wisdom personified as a woman who invites students to her banquet. But the image of plowing, frequently used as a euphemism for sexual relations, also seems to be associated in this instance with another metaphor, wisdom viewed as a rough path students must travel, unless the reference is to a rocky field. In any event, Ben Sirā observes that the time of harvesting makes all the effort worthwhile. Then he makes an enigmatic assertion that wisdom, like her name, is carefully guarded (6:22). The meaning of this claim has escaped contemporary interpreters, unless it makes a pun on the Hebrew noun musar ("instruction"), which resembles a participle musar ("removed, withdrawn") or less likely, the noun moser ("bond, halter").

The second metaphor, wisdom as a yoke, suggests that it both assists in the effort to plow a field and imposes discomfort at the same time. Ben Sirā urges students to accept the burden gladly, knowing that at last the yoke will transform itself into emblems of royalty. This type of language also occurs with regard to the demands of the law, which some rabbis understood as a yoke (cf. Jesus' invitation to take on his yoke, Matt. 11:29-30). Ben Sirā concludes this advice with some immensely practical suggestions about being alert to hear intelligent persons dispense wisdom (6:34-37). Students are told to seek out gifted individuals and to visit them regularly. Lest this counsel be misconstrued, he adds that these enterprising students ought to remember the ultimate source of knowledge, God, and consequently to reflect often on the commandments.

7:1-17, The Fate of the Wicked. This section warns against ungodly conduct and admonishes readers to adopt habits that will not bring a punishment of fire and worms. Two features of this discussion catch the attention of modern interpreters. The first is the personification of evil, which is similar to the personification of wisdom in Proverbs 1-9. Sin has a will of its own, choosing its own companions. Hence an erotic component possibly colors the remark about sowing the furrows of injustice (7:3). The second feature involves a difference between the Greek and Hebrew versions. The addition of fire as punishment in the Greek text of 7:17 may reflect developments in thought among Jews in Alexandria about the afterlife as a time of punishment, although the same expression occurs in Isa. 66:24.

In Sir. 7:4-5 the natural movement from the Lord to an earthly ruler betrays their functional kinship in Ben Sirā's mind. Nevertheless, the attitude toward official responsibility differs from earlier wisdom, which encourages persons to seek high office and to act justly in positions of leadership. The pressure on judges from foreign sources may explain Ben Sirā's attitude. The subject of prayer crops up often in Sirach. Verse 14 urges perseverance and warns against verbosity in public gatherings and at prayer.

7:18-28, Domestic Advice. Except for the reference to cattle, this section focuses on intimate relationships between husbands and wives, parents and children, and owners and slaves. Ben Sirā recognizes the immense worth of an intelligent and good wife, but he also knows that not every man is so fortunate. He therefore discourages anyone from remaining in a marriage that lacks affection. Ben Sirā's comments about slaves reflect the biblical law allowing a Hebrew slave to go free after six years' service (Exod. 21:2; Deut. 15:12). The linguistic shift from cattle to children, although offensive to modern readers, indicates the indispensable role of domestic animals in an agricultural community. The remarks about a father's responsibility to see that his daughter finds a suitable husband shows that this important task was not taken lightly, despite Ben Sirā's suspicion about the character of daughters, which manifests itself later with considerably more virulence than here. In one Hebrew manuscript (A) the father is urged to find wives for his sons while they are young, hence preventing temptation.

7:29-36, Obligations to Priests and the Poor. Ben Sira's high regard for priests finds expression here. He implores his readers to provide the necessary means of their subsistence, particularly since Mosaic law commands it. Ben Sira also encourages charitable deeds, among which he appears to include religious ritual in connection with the dead. The Greek text tones down this reference to a cult of the dead, suggesting instead that Ben Sira mentions burial rites, so important to the author of Tobit. The motive for such kindness is self-interest, both the anticipation of divine favor and the avoidance of punishment.

8:1-19, Some Things to Avoid. A sense of humor underlies the observations about old age and death, but the gravity of subject matter can scarcely be missed. Ben Sira's allusion to lack of respect for the aged reflects the conflict between the generations that became particularly harsh during this time of competing worldviews, Hebraism and Hellenism. The association of old age and death flows naturally, but Ben Sira's comments do not have the power of Ecclesiastes' poem on the same topic (Eccles. 12:1-7). The appeal to the insights acquired by those persons who have lived a long time ignores Job's attack on this traditional attitude. Ben Sira advises students to listen to sages as they talk about their lessons from experience. He thinks such attention to learned people will enable one to serve powerful officials, the goal of students in older wisdom traditions, at least in Egypt. The warning against legal disputes with individuals whose financial resources will determine the outcome demonstrates Ben Sira's practical approach to things. This cautious realism also rests behind his warning against letting down one's guard, particularly in the presence of someone who might talk too freely to others.

9:1-9, Relationships with Women. This section treats a husband's behavior toward his own wife and toward other women. Ben Sira implies that jealousy has a way of injuring the one who lacks trust; the specific background for this intriguing comment about a wife who turned the tables on her jealous husband is missing. The warning against surrendering to a woman's power occurs elsewhere in Prov. 31:3, advice from King Lemuel's mother to her son. Ben Sira's primary concern in this section is to alert students to the dangers associated with sexual laxity. His worry is essentially an economic one (cf. Deut. 22:28-29), but not entirely, for he thinks adulterous conduct brings destruction in the end. Much of this material recalls the warnings against the strange woman in the book of Proverbs. Ben Sira's observation about dining with another man's wife uses the image of leaning on the elbow, i.e., acting too familiarly (a reading preserved in codex 248).

9:10-16, Friends and Neighbors. This section returns to some of the ideas expressed in 8:1-19, almost as if to contrast faithful friends with harmful acquaintances. The statement that an old friend resembles old wine seems proverbial, but Ben Sira may have composed it himself. He reiterates the danger of ruthless and powerful companions, who make one walk as if in the presence of hidden snares. Similarly, he repeats the recommendation that students acquire wisdom from sages, adding that the subject of study should be the Mosaic law. As in 8:17-19, this unit closes with a reference to the damaging effect of the tongue, specifically from a person who reveals confidential information and/or talks too much.

9:17-10:5, On Rulers. The optimism underlying Ben Sira's statement about God's active participation in assuring that the right ruler achieves power (10:4) demonstrates the pervasive quality of traditional views, even when political circumstances seem to render them obsolete. Ben Sira affirms a benevolent providence, one that operates universally rather than merely on Israel's behalf. Still, the Greek text insists that the ruler of the whole earth shows special favor to scribes. Thus Ben Sira combines universalist and particularist thinking in a way that was typical of ancient wisdom literature. The initial comment about rulers (9:17) states that a person's skill at a particular craft manifests power over the medium, and that a ruler's persuasive speech manipulates subjects in a desired manner. Ben Sira observes that the product reveals the skill of an artisan in the same way a magistrate's language demonstrates his competence as a ruler of the people.

10:6-11:1, Pride and Honor. This section asserts that even the most powerful ruler succumbs to a horrible death, hence has no reason to be proud (10:9-10), and that human beings are both honorable and dishonorable, necessitating a decision about who deserves respect and who does not (10:19-25). Ben Sira had witnessed a transfer of power of great magnitude, the victory by Antiochus III over the Ptolemaic empire. Nevertheless, this astute observer of the political scene realizes that today's king is tomorrow's corpse. The anecdote about an illness that mystifies the physician (or that the physician makes light of, 10:9-10) may have a specific king in mind, but the point applies generally. A mighty ruler became mortally ill, inheriting unwanted vermin at death (10:11). In light of the inevitable end awaiting all mortals, every arrogant boast becomes hollow. This example of pride offers an occasion for Ben Sira to deliver a brief homily on its awful results (10:12–18). In particular, human arrogance has prompted God to intervene in the political arena, replacing proud rulers with humble ones. This motif of a topsy-turvy world occurs in Egyptian wisdom literature, but without Ben Sira's optimism that the change promises good things for society at large.

This section has a striking example of a rhetorical device whereby the same answer is solicited for opposite questions (10:19). In this way Ben Sira emphasizes differences among human beings, who are worthy of honor and contempt. This necessity for distinguishing among citizens leads to a discussion of sociological differentiations, which Ben Sira challenges. He insists that the customary honor bestowed on the rich and famous should take into account another ingredient, whether or not they fear God. This quality alone determines who deserves honor, and this means that poor people who fear God ought to be held in high esteem. This principle prompts Ben Sira to make an astonishing claim that free persons will serve intelligent slaves (10:25). Nothing suggests the actual manumission of slaves, however, for the implication is that perceptive slaves use their learning to their own advantage.

Because all human beings suffer decay, distinctions that take into account religious and intellectual qualities count most. But some persons overdo humility by depriving themselves of life's bounty, while others pretend to have plenty although lacking essential commodities. Ben Sira advocates a little common sense, while acknowledging that people usually honor the poor for their intelligence and the rich for their possessions.

11:2–28, Appearances Are Deceiving. This section takes up the subject of deceptive appearances, insisting that intelligent persons probe beneath the surface of things to get to the heart of the matter. Good looks and expensive clothes do not make a person, and those whose appearance is less pleasing may actually be far more impressive. Ben Sira uses an illustration of the bee, which despite its smallness is responsible for the sweetest of things (11:3). An Egyptian Instruction, Papyrus Insinger, uses the same example. Anyone who takes present honors seriously forgets their fleeting nature, for God works in mysterious ways, sometimes reversing one's fortunes. For this reason one ought to refrain from judging persons in adverse circumstances. Their status could change in a moment. The same principle applies to the prosperous, who could easily lose everything. It follows that no one's true character is manifest until the moment of death. Ben Sira therefore offers some simple advice: wait until a person's death to make a final assessment of that life (11:28). Because he does not believe in life beyond the grave, Ben Sira assumes that God will weigh one's deeds, balancing the good against the bad, and hand out reward or punishment during one's lifetime. However, this idea of a rigid accounting later came to play an important role in the Pharisaic belief in an afterlife.

In this connection Ben Sira cautions against hasty judgments deriving from an unwillingness to listen to others and to reflect on matters prior to speaking. The decisive factor in human relations is impenetrable, for it derives from the Lord who does wonders. No one can understand why one person, whom modern critics would label a workaholic, fails to amass a fortune while another, who is less capable and less industrious, achieves extraordinary success (11:11–12). Ben Sira attributes the success and failure to God's hidden action. From this source come good luck and bad, life and death, wealth and poverty. Nevertheless, Ben Sira boldly asserts that God's favor falls to the godly (11:17). Still, this practical teacher acknowledges that human beings have no assurance that a life of hard work will result in years of luxurious living, since death steals into the presence of confident individuals, mocking their unused wealth. Ben Sira's efforts to defend God's reputation for just dealings imply that a brief moment of bliss can compensate for a life of misery. His argument mixes realism and idealism; people undergoing hardship forget their better times, and those who enjoy life's bounty easily blot out all memory of earlier unhappiness. That is why the final moment looms large in Ben Sira's thinking.

11:29–14:19, On Wealth. Although many topics surface in this long section, the unifying theme is riches. Ben Sira discusses some unfortunate character traits of many wealthy people and cautions poor people against courting the favors of the affluent. His reason is that people associate with their own kind (13:2, 15–20). Another compelling argument concerns the destructive behavior that unscrupulous persons of power display toward those whom they consider inferior. Moreover, Ben Sira insists, foolish people deny themselves many pleasures, hoping to amass a fortune and forgetting how quickly death can strike. Given the unpredictability of life, human assessments seem somewhat skewed, particularly when rich individuals can offend others and add insult to injury, whereas the poor are victimized and submit to the further indignity of offering apologies (13:3). In connection with his comments about death Ben Sira uses a simile that must have occurred to numerous thinkers, specifically that the passing of humans resembles falling leaves. Nature's cycle takes place, with new leaves replacing old ones; in the same way, some people die and others come into being (14:18).

Ben Sira introduces an interesting criterion for deciding when to give alms. Good deeds should be targeted for devout people, inasmuch as they occupy a special place in God's eyes (12:1–7). Such thinking naturally produced the clever proverb of a later time that God loves the poor but helps the rich. This attitude does not represent a rigid rule in Ben Sira's mind. Rich persons can be scoundrels; hence ordinary citizens should not invite the wealthy into their homes. Some scheming individuals will usher in strife and dissent while pretending friendship. The real test of friendship requires adversity, for only genuine friends remain when circumstances become tough. Ben Sira mentions a metal mirror as a device for determining bogus friendship (12:10–11). This illustration may allude to the ancient idea of a magic mirror that revealed friends and enemies. Alternatively, it offers a dubious analogy that false friendships corrode just as a metal mirror does. By frequent polishing, one can prevent tarnish.

The futility of trying to be something one is not produces some fine observations. For example, whoever flirts with danger deserves no pity, and any earthen pot that foolishly strikes against a kettle can hardly expect sympathy when it shatters. Similarly, whoever grasps pitch will discover its adhesive power, and whoever lifts too heavy a weight will regret the action (13:1–2). Living creatures associate by species, so rich and poor do not belong together. The analogy is inadequate, since the two represent a single species. Nevertheless, Ben Sira presses the point. Wolves do not associate with lambs, dogs with hyenas, or wild asses with lions. All these examples serve to highlight the vulnerable status of poor people in the presence of the rich (13:15–20). If anyone accepts an invitation to dine with the wealthy, caution should prevail, and deference, but not too much—that would result in the poor person's disappearing into the woodwork. Ben Sira states a fact: the rich can do nothing wrong whereas the poor can do nothing right, at least in the estimation of the crowd, which lifts up a falling rich person but pushes down a poor one, or it listens attentively to the rich but ignores the words of the lowly (13:21–23).

Having said all this, Ben Sira refuses to condemn wealth outright, for not all riches have sin's taint. As a matter of fact, he encourages people to enjoy life's good things rather than passing the days as a miser (13:24; 14:3–16).

Here Ben Sira repeats Ecclesiastes' advice, which a later scribe turned into a commandment that all people must give an account for every good thing not enjoyed. The emphasis of this unusual ruling lies on the goodness of creation and God's desire that human beings appreciate nature's largesse. Ben Sira's motive differs significantly: death approaches, so make the most of things without incurring divine wrath. Given the complexity of these issues, Ben Sira's remark that devising proverbs requires much effort seems appropriate (13:26).

14:20–15:10, Wooing Wisdom. The happy person acquires wisdom by every available means: stalking her like game, spying on her, camping alongside the wall of her house, building a nest (according to the Hebrew text) in her branches, and enjoying her shade (14:22–27). Such an individual achieves all this by mastering the law. Wisdom's response to such ardor includes conduct appropriate to a bride and mother (15:2). She comes eagerly to meet her lover, offering bread and water. The understanding that she bestows on her husband assures prosperity, honor, and eloquence. But she withholds herself from fools and arrogant people, restricting her favors to those who practice piety, the outward expression of wisdom.

15:11–20, Freedom of Choice. The previous section concludes with an allusion to impious sinners, perhaps freethinkers. Ben Sira attempts to refute their argument that conduct is determined by external forces. He insists that everyone has free will, indeed that God created humans good but they exercised freedom and chose their evil inclination (15:14). Later rabbis developed the notion of two inclinations, an evil one and a good one. As far as Ben Sira is concerned, evil did not originate with God. Other Israelites thought differently, blaming either God or Satan. Although Ben Sira accuses humans, he assures them that God sees everything (15:18), the implication being that justice ultimately prevails.

16:1–23, Misguided Thinking. Discarding traditional Israelite attitudes toward numerous progeny, Ben Sira sees children as a blessing only if they fear God. But such bold thinking has its limits, and he rejects the opinion that one can sin with impunity because God dwells in the remote heavens. Appealing to personal experience and to biblical record (16:5–10), Ben Sira refutes the claim that an indifferent God overlooks human sin. The giants who rebelled against heaven, the inhabitants of Sodom, the Canaanites, the rebellious Israelites—they all experienced divine retribution. The same exacting punishment applies to individuals, and God's mercy matches the divine wrath. Therefore it is foolish to deny God's active distribution of justice. Ben Sira quotes two examples of such misguided thinking (16:17, 20-22), between which he reflects on the majesty of God (16:18-19).

16:24-17:14, Divine Wisdom in Creation.

Traditions about creation and the Sinaitic legislation come together in this unit, which gives the impression of mathematical precision. God created the universe in perfect order; hence nothing inappropriate can occur (16:26-28). The same care went into the fashioning of human beings, to whom God gave special gifts such as divine likeness and authority over all other creatures (17:1-4). One manuscript (248) adds that God gave the five senses to humans, and to those God added a sixth (understanding) and a seventh (speech). The divine solicitude eventuated in a covenant between God and the people, who beheld the glorious majesty at Sinai and received the law (17:12-14). Curiously, only relationships between human beings are mentioned here.

17:15-18:14, The Compassionate Judge.

Ben Sira endeavors to explain God's special relationship with Israel. To be sure, God watches over all people, but the care of non-Jews falls to other designated divine beings (17:17). God's attention focuses on Israel, whose deeds of charity bring immense joy but whose sins are fully known and despised. Nevertheless, God leaves open the door of repentance for fragile human beings (17:24). Unlike humans, God lives forever. The greatness and majesty of God escape detection and defy description. Ben Sira asks the same question that Psalm 8 does, "What is man?" and answers somewhere between the Psalmist's and Job's responses (18:8). Whereas the Psalmist spoke of human glory and Job of misery, Ben Sira emphasizes the brevity of life and bleak prospects in the grave, but he also highlights God's compassionate shepherding (18:9-14).

18:15-18, Kind Words. Kind words ought to accompany a gift, for they are superior to it. The implicit contradiction in a gift from one who begrudges it (18:18) recalls Ben Sira's discussion of true generosity in 14:3-10.

18:19-29, Using Caution. Wise persons use caution in all things, particularly vows, for they know how quickly fortunes change. Ben Sira reverses the usual order of the expression "from evening to morning." Ecclesiastes also admonishes its students to pay their vows promptly and urges caution in taking vows (Eccles. 5:2, 4-5).

18:30-19:12, Self-Control. This section warns against two kinds of behavior related to drinking and speech. Ben Sira opposes a lavish life-style if one cannot afford it, and he makes fun of people who cannot refrain from telling what they know. The humorous illustrations convey his point beautifully: a word about to burst one's insides, birth pangs, and an arrow in one's thigh cause great discomfort for fools (19:10-12). The association of wine and women as temptation (19:2) occurs also in Egyptian wisdom literature.

19:13-17, Rebuking Others. Because everyone offends with the tongue, intelligent people give others every opportunity to clarify what actually occurred. Four of the five verses employ anaphoristic style, repeating the phrase "Question a friend/neighbor" for rhetorical effect.

19:18-30, Wisdom and Cleverness. Israel's sages recognized that information could be put to dubious use, indeed that intelligence itself sometimes functioned in the cause of evil. Such cleverness is attributed to the serpent in Gen. 3:1 and to Jonadab who schooled Amnon in the art of seduction (2 Sam. 13:3). Because of this negative potential of wisdom, the sages were reluctant at first to attribute wisdom to God. In this unit Ben Sira brings together the basic themes of the book, wisdom and the fear of God. (Verses 18, 19, 20c, and 21 are later additions to the text.) The description of unscrupulous persons whose outward demeanor conceals inner hostility demonstrates profound psychological understanding, and the juxtaposition of a statement indicating awareness that things are not always what they seem over against a straightforward assertion that one is known by the impression made on others indicates cautious realism.

20:1-31, Guarding One's Speech. Egyptian and Israelite sages developed a highly sophisticated concept of rhetoric that consisted of timeliness, restraint, integrity, and eloquence. Knowing when to speak and when to remain silent was a mark of intelligence; in Egypt a sage was known as "a silent one." Truthfulness and persuasiveness were essential if one expected to make optimal use of the right moment for speech. The wise trained themselves to speak well in behalf of truth, but they also acknowledged that some people possessed an innate gift of eloquence. This understanding of speech and silence was more complex than it might appear, as the two sayings in Prov. 26:4-5 illustrate. They isolate instances when neither silence nor speech achieves the desired goal. Ben Sira therefore works with a revered tradition when considering the merit of speech and silence. In his view, silence in itself may derive from ineptness.

Violence in a good cause necessarily aborts, like a eunuch's desire to seduce a woman (20:4). What seems to be a bargain may cost one dearly (20:12). The meaning of this obscure saying may be that some people obtain a bargain while others pay exorbitant prices.

21:1–10, Sin's Smooth Path. This counsel to sinners has two graphic images: sin resembles a viper (21:2), and an assembly of sinners is like a bundle of tow (21:9; the Greek contains a wordplay here). Roads were not normally paved in ancient Israel, but sin's path is so smooth that its occupants slip into the grave (21:10). Ben Sira likens building a house with borrowed money to preparing one's tomb (21:8; unless the reading "for the winter" is original, which suggests stupidity in failing to gather wood).

21:11–22:18, The Wise and Foolish. The contrast between the wise and fools occurs frequently in ancient wisdom literature. Here Ben Sira gives some examples of conduct typical of each group. Their attitudes toward learning also set them apart, for the wise value education. In a sense wisdom connotes good manners, but it implies more: weighing what one hears, thinking first, then speaking, improving on maxims (21:15). In a word, the wise expand knowledge like an overflowing river (21:13). Fools are like leaking containers, retaining nothing (21:14). Hence mourning for them lasts forever as opposed to the usual seven days (Heb. shiba'; 22:12). It appears that Ben Sira thought one's quest for wisdom permitted the setting aside of normal etiquette (21:23; cf. 14:23). Ben Sira's remark about the birth of a daughter may derive from the fact that she cannot continue the family name, but the context implies that he has in mind the onerous task of locating a husband for the daughter (22:3–5). Instead of a fence on a hill, the image in 22:18 may be that of small pebbles on a wall, having been placed there to alert farmers when jackals threatened a crop (cf. RSV and JB).

22:19–26, Holding on to Friendship. This section returns to the subject of friendship (see 6:5–17) and presents a complementary dimension of human relationships in which the remarkable resiliency of affections comes to expression. Ben Sira recognizes that the bond uniting friends can snap when one person exceeds the limits of propriety, but he also celebrates the amazing readiness to forgive that characterizes genuine friendship. The sudden shift from third person to first in v. 25 has precedent in Ecclesiastes, where first person style dominates one particular section (Eccles. 1:12–2:26). For Ben Sira the shift may be a subtle move to emphasize the personal dimension of friendship.

22:27–23:6, A Prayer for Self-Control. This remarkable prayer asks for wisdom's harsh discipline to prevent licentious thoughts. It uses the image of a sentry on one's lips and a seal to keep harmful words at bay (22:27). The prayer also recognizes the danger of pride that encourages passionate indulgence (23:4).

23:7–15, Proper Use of Language. Two types of language bring ruin: The first, empty religious oaths and frequent reference to God, incurs divine wrath (23:9–11); the second, coarse talk, issues in public disgrace (23:13–15). Ben Sira's allusion to the inheritance of Jacob (23:12) refers to the Israelites rather than to the land promised them.

23:16–27, Fornication and Adultery. Hunger for "bread" makes fornicators incapable of refusing the offer, and they rationalize their conduct by pretending the utmost in discretion (23:18). God's eyes, brighter by far than the sun, observe the action. (Did not God see everything before creation? After creation, God still sees everything that happens.) Women who commit adultery offend God, their husbands, and children (23:23). All who behave in this manner destroy themselves.

24:1–22, Wisdom Praises Itself. Reminiscent of Prov. 8:22–9:12, this hymn draws on creation imagery (a lifegiving mist and a divine word), but it endeavors to bring together the universal and particular: wisdom exalts herself in the heavenly realm, and she receives God's command to dwell with the Jews. This exclusivism contrasts with 1 Enoch 42:1–2, which states that she found no dwelling place on earth but that iniquity was more successful, settling like rain or dew in the desert. Ben Sira likens wisdom to a luxuriant tree or vine, from which human beings obtain delectable fruit (24:13–22).

24:23–34, Reflection on Wisdom. Ben Sira identifies wisdom with the Mosaic law, which bestows life like the rivers of Eden. Nevertheless, the first occupant of Eden did not fully grasp her, nor has anyone done so since that early attempt (24:28). This abstracting of wisdom reflects a poignant sense of despair, which locates wisdom in creation. That experience is tempered somewhat by the claim that the Mosaic law is a concrete expression of wisdom (24:23). Ben Sira's own effort has overflowed its banks, prompting him to write a further treatise for posterity (24:30–34).

25:1–26:27, Good and Bad Wives. Two surprising comments occur in this unit. Ben Sira exalts the fear of the Lord over wisdom and attributes the instigation of evil to woman. Normally, piety served as the initial stage to wisdom; often religious expression is called the crowning achievement of knowledge. But here Ben Sira subjects wisdom to religion (25:10–11). A similar break with traditional interpretation takes place when he blames Eve for the origin of sin (25:24), for Jewish literature of this general period usually accuses Adam of introducing death. In some circles his crime consists of a refusal to repent. Ben Sira's description of two types of wives plumbs the depths of sadness and soars to lofty heights of joy. Two important manuscripts, 70 and 248, together with the Syriac add a section about an appropriate choice of a wife and about harlots. Ben Sira's characterization of loose women who drink from any spring and open their quiver for any arrow demonstrates powerful imagery as a pedagogic tool (26:12).

The best manuscripts of Sirach lack 26:19–27, which seem to reflect later sentiment, although the ideas generally agree with Ben Sira's attitude toward women. The metaphor of one's wife as a fertile field occurs widely in Israelite and non-Israelite wisdom. The book of Proverbs may have inspired these comments, but they use harsher language than their earlier counterpart.

26:28–27:15, Honesty. The merchant's profession offers an easy means of cheating the buyer, so much so that Ben Sira thinks the temptation virtually irresistible (26:29–27:1). He also believes that eloquence and clear reasoning reveal character (27:4–7).

27:16–28:26, Offenses Against Companions. Ben Sira observes that betrayal of a friend's secrets destroys the friendship forever and that the "third tongue," a technical expression for slander in rabbinic literature, ruins three people: the slanderer, the person being slandered, and whoever believes the cruel report. A tension exists here between realistic observation and religious ideology. Ben Sira's emphasis on forgiving one's neighbor for offenses has precedent in earlier wisdom literature, although the motive is not exactly altruistic. Prov. 25:21–22 recommends kind actions toward enemies and promises divine reward for this conduct. The image of "coals on the head" may derive from an Egyptian ritual of repentance. The section on actions that double back to harm the actor also has biblical and extrabiblical precedent.

29:1–20, Lending Money. Whereas Prov. 22:26 advises against surety, Ben Sira offers a cautious defense of the practice. His rationale, purely religious, implies the winning of divine favor by lending to the needy (29:9). No usury is mentioned (cf. Lev. 25:36).

29:21–28, Hospitality. In the Greco-Roman world some men dwelt in other people's houses and rendered various services in return. Ben Sira's observations imply a similar arrangement, which he compares unfavorably with humble circumstances in one's own abode.

30:1–13, On Rearing Children. Ancient sages believed in the effectiveness of the whip.

A Sumerian sage reminisces about school days and indicates that he was caned for numerous offenses. Similar texts from Egypt refer to the constant threat of physical punishment in school but promise ample rewards for the pain. The book of Proverbs also encourages vigorous discipline for disobedient children, so that the nonbiblical saying "Spare the rod and spoil the child" adequately sums up the teaching about this subject.

Ben Sira urges parents to wield a heavy hand, whipping children soundly and keeping some distance to avoid familiarity. The primary concern is the father's welfare. The Hebrew text adds a graphic image: as a python pounces on a wild beast, so crush a son's loins while he is young.

30:14–25, On Good Health. In the ancient Near East sickness posed a special intellectual problem in addition to its physical burden. Was illness a sign of divine displeasure? The simple answer, based on a concept of reward and retribution that pervaded popular belief, brought immense grief to innocent people. The book of Job wrestles with this vexing problem, although it fails to resolve the issue. Job's friends and Elihu give voice to the conventional understanding that grievous deeds alone explain the extremity of his suffering, but Job adamantly maintains innocence. In general, the book of Proverbs fueled the thinking of Job's detractors. Ben Sira has mixed feelings about the problem (cf. 38:1–15). On the one hand, with Job he realizes that not all misery comes as divine punishment. On the other hand, Ben Sira believes that wicked persons fall into God's punishing hands. Healthy persons are the richest of all individuals, but the sick bear a double burden: the illness and knowledge that God is angry toward them. After v. 24 the order of the Greek text becomes confused (30:25–33:13a and 33:13b–36:16 are transposed).

31:1–11, On Riches. To be sure, wealth has some bad side effects, but so does poverty. Pursuit of riches for their own sake brings ruin, but wealth affords noble opportunities. The Hebrew word mamon occurs here for "gold" (31:8), possibly for the first time.

31:12–32:13, Conduct at Meals. Like ancient Egyptian wisdom, which offers advice on etiquette at meals, Ben Sira teaches what is proper in his day. His remark about the eye in 31:13 is puzzling, but probably reflects the notion that the expression "desires of the eyes" sums up all evil. His attitude to wine (31:25–31) is more positive than that in Proverbs (cf. Prov. 23:29–35), while his comments on vomiting echo Seneca's remark that his contemporaries "vomit in order to eat and eat so as to vomit." The Greek background of Ben Sira's remarks about banquets is seen in the choice of a host to select the guest list and to say grace, as well as in the wreath of honor.

32:14–33:6, God-Fearers and Sinners. A Hebrew idiom lies behind the double imperatives in vv. 19–20, indicating a condition and its consequence. The absolute statement about the well-being of a God-fearer needs to be qualified by the realities of experience. Ben Sira's zeal for the law leads to extreme statements, like the one about the utter reliability of the sacred dice (33:3). He had complete confidence in priests who manipulated the Urim and Thummim. These rocks probably had a Hebrew waw or a taw on them. Priests asked questions with "yes" or "no" answers, continuing until two rocks with the same letter appeared.

33:7–15, Differences in Things and People. The universe consists of pairs; human beings likewise comprise camps of opposites, divinely constituted. Therefore some days are sacred, others not, and some men are chosen for the priesthood, others not. No women were among the priestly ranks; this exclusion of women reflects the attitude of the Jewish authorities toward purity and impurity.

33:16–18, Ben Sira's Personal Appeal. Acknowledging his temporal sequence at the end of inspired writers, Ben Sira claims to have excelled at wisdom and asks for a hearing from leaders. The latter is a rhetorical device in Wisdom of Solomon especially (Wisd. of Sol. 1:1; 6:1–2).

33:19–23, Financial Independence. Ben Sira offers sound advice to overly pious persons who gave all their possessions away to receive credit from God. Better wait until the hour of death, he suggests.

33:24–31, Treatment of Slaves. In the Decalogue asses, oxen, servants, and a neighbor's wife occur in the prohibition against coveting. Ben Sira also links asses and servants in this way. His remarks on slaves are in keeping with the tendency of wisdom literature to reflect the values of the reasonably well-to-do. Essentially conservative, it recommends the status quo, abhorring revolutionary periods in society. The king, although a potential threat, should be obeyed for safety's sake, if for no other reason. In Israel Solomon and Hezekiah were honored as patrons of the intelligentsia. Kings, in turn, were expected to shepherd the people (this metaphor is particularly common in Egypt). This same attitude of paternalism is reflected in the exquisite depiction of Job's happier days in Job 29–31. Ben Sira advises harsh treatment of slaves but balances his words with the reminder that they represent considerable investment (in blood, i.e., purchased with one's life substance).

34:1–8, Empty Dreams. Three means of predicting the future are rejected because they lack substance, resembling a reflection in a mirror. Ben Sira says that dreams generate excitement in senseless people. Biblical precedent for divine communication through dreams forced Ben Sira to qualify his remarks (34:6). But how could one determine the source of dreams?

The attitude toward dreams in the ancient world varied considerably. In Mesopotamia dream revelations were so common that a "science" of predicting the future arose. Specialists in interpreting dreams existed throughout the ancient Near East. The Hebrew Bible also witnesses to their presence (cf. the Joseph story and Daniel), but confusion over the source of dreams eventually led to a disparaging of this media of revelation (cf. Jeremiah's objection to dreams). The supernatural source of dreams persists in the NT (e.g., the stories about Pilate's wife and Joseph's escape from Herod's wrath).

34:9–17, The Protection of Wisdom. Travel's broadening influence compensates for risk involved in journeys away from home, and experience derived from them helps some people escape danger. Wisdom shelters the God-fearer.

34:18–35:20, Authentic Sacrifices and Prayers. Ben Sira continues the prophetic criticism of sacrifices that are not accompanied by moral rectitude. He employs a strong image: sacrifices gained from abuse of the poor are as offensive as murdering a son before his father. For Ben Sira deeds of kindness do not take the place of ritual (35:1–5). Although the law commands the offering of sacrifices, one's attitude and moral character determine God's response. Genuine repentance is essential, regardless of how frequently one fasts (34:26).

36:1–17, A Prayer for Deliverance of Jews. This fervent prayer for decisive action on God's part looks back on the Exodus and forward to the messianic era. Ben Sira notices disparity between the assurances just articulated and the dire circumstances of the Jews. He therefore pleads for God to restore them and crush the enemy. His guarded language in v. 10 may allude to Antiochus the Great. The comment about prophetic predictions (36:15) witnesses to the popular conviction that the unfulfilled oracles promising weal cannot abort. For a brief moment Ben Sira abandons the universalism of the sages altogether. It should be noted, however, that the earlier sages' generosity did not extend to the fools among them. The universalism was therefore a qualified one, moral qualities determining the assessment.

36:18-26, Using Discriminating Judgment. Some food tastes better than other food, and some wives are better than others. Ben Sira's observations assume the "purchase" of wives and the arrangement of marriages by fathers. The Hebrew text calls the wife her husband's best vineyard, a common image in the Bible. Despite the risk (cf. 25:16-20), Ben Sira favors marriage over the single life.

37:1-6, True and False Friends. In the context of discussing friendship Ben Sira laments the creation of the evil inclination (but cf. 15:14). The text of v. 3 is not well preserved in the Greek or Hebrew, apparently reflecting the reluctance of later readers to attribute evil to God. In later rabbinic tradition, however, God's responsibility for creating the evil inclination is freely admitted, although a corresponding good inclination is postulated. In every individual the evil inclination was said to antedate the good by a dozen years, which seemed to explain the early occurrence of folly.

37:7-15, On Advisers. Shrewd practical advice does not suffice for Ben Sira, who adds some religious observations as well. He presupposes polygamy and astrology in the comments about a rival wife (37:11) and seven watchmen (37:14). Presumably, the seven people observe the heavenly bodies in an effort to discern the future. The allusion may, however, suggest an exaggerated attempt to spot danger from human foes. The combination of self-reliance and prayer for divine leadership shows how Ben Sira lives fully in two worlds, that of secular sages and the one inhabited by deeply religious individuals. For him the insights acquired through reason, although significant, need the greater knowledge that God makes accessible to devout souls.

37:16-31, Using Intelligence for One's Well-Being. Intelligence that does not issue in beneficial actions is wasted. Ben Sira uses two illustrations, a teacher whose words offend others (37:20-21) and a person whose eating habits harm the body (37:29-31). A curious contrast occurs in this section: lone individuals vanish soon but Israel survives indefinitely (37:25). This idea represents a break with earlier wisdom tradition, which was individualistic in its teachings.

38:1-15, On Physicians. Ben Sira counters objections to doctors who, in the view of some people, interfered with divine punishment for sin. He still thinks of sickness as punishment, for he advises prayer, repentance, and sacrifice when illness strikes, and he implies that sinners will need physicians (38:15). Nevertheless, he defends the medical profession, arguing that God created medicines and that doctors solicit divine aid in the practice of their trade. The Hebrew text states that sinners act proudly before physicians, presumably disparaging their services.

38:16-23, Grief for the Dead. According to 22:12, mourning for the dead lasted seven days, but here Ben Sira advises a shorter period of grief because of its adverse physical effect. The dead person's "epitaph" is sobering: mine today, yours tomorrow (38:22). Notably, Ben Sira does not mention prayers for the dead, which later became a custom among the Jews (but cf. 7:33-34). The unusual early termination of mourning recalls David's unconventional behavior after the death of the child conceived by Bathsheba and the comment about no coming back echoes David's solemn observation that the child "will not return to me" (2 Sam. 12:23). Ben Sira's astonishing counsel to let the remembrance of the dead cease contrasts sharply with the usual attitude about the importance of a lasting remembrance. Even Ecclesiastes complains bitterly because one cannot count on a permanent reputation.

38:24-39:11, Advantages of Being a Scribe. Like the Egyptian Instruction of Duaf, Sirach contrasts the occupations of various craftsmen with that of scribes. Ben Sira does not disparage the contribution of artisans in society (38:32, 34); on the other hand, he holds scribes in much higher esteem because of their status as royally appointed officials and leaders in high councils. This description of a scribe's subject matter focuses on the Scriptures, but not exclusively so (39:1). Egyptian sages emphasized the lasting memorial of scribes, writings that are recited for generations; Ben Sira simply mentions the reputation that endures (39:9-11).

39:12-35, In Praise of the Creator. In his effort to respond to the vexing problem of the apparent injustice of God, Ben Sira borrows heavily from earlier wisdom literature, but he also draws on the Greek philosophical tradition. He looks to the future for final rectification, explains suffering as disciplinary, recognizes that appearances deceive, and affirms justice in the face of apparent injustice, surrendering to mystery and raising a voice of hymnic praise. But he introduces new emphases, the one psychological and the other metaphysical. Sinners experience excessive anxiety, and the universe fights on behalf of virtuous people. The latter idea of a rational order that consists of complementary pairs derives from Greek arguments for an inherent justice in the world. In vv. 26-27 Ben Sira asserts that one's inner state determines how certain things appear to that person. Wisdom of Solomon develops this psychological idea fully, showing the devastating power of fear to turn ordinary things into objects of terror.

40:1–11, The Heavy Yoke. Ben Sira draws on a lively tradition about the miserable lot entrusted to humans. His language recalls Gen. 3:17–20, the divine curse on rebellious Adam, as well as Job's ruminations about the terrible plight of human beings (Job 7 and 14). One also hears an echo of the unflattering characterization of the human disposition that brought on the Flood (Gen. 6:5). Moreover, Ben Sira's allusion to returning to the mother of all recalls Job's reference to returning there (possibly the aforementioned maternal womb but more likely he uses a euphemism for the underworld). Whereas the earlier texts from Genesis and Job describe a universal human bondage, one in Job's case exacerbated by divine surveillance, Ben Sira thinks God's watchful care assures a measure of justice, multiplying sinners' grief sevenfold. The miserable experience of human beings, outlined in detail here, throws in relief the preceding praise of the creator.

40:12–27, Life's Positive Features. Ben Sira continues the argument that God sees and punishes evil and rewards good deeds. He also uses a rhetorical device to emphasize nine things that surpass others that are good in themselves (e.g., a friend or companion is welcome, but to be husband and wife is preferable).

40:28–41:13, On Death. The attitude toward death in various wisdom texts reflects both realism and faint hope. The latter manifests itself in feelings of consolation over a life well lived (the harvesting of golden shocks of grain) and expresses confidence in the timing of death's summons after a long, prosperous life (cf. Job 4–5). But the sages also know a darker side of death, the premature visitation by the angel of death who seizes persons unawares. An Egyptian sage states that protests at this time accomplish nothing worthwhile, for the messenger of death does not consider youth to rest outside its grip. Some individuals, like Job, actually welcomed death because of their personal suffering, while others, like Ecclesiastes, viewed the shadow of death as a grievous burden affecting every waking moment. Ben Sira's cool detachment contrasts noticeably with Job and Ecclesiastes, but he still refuses to endorse belief in life after death, which the author of Dan. 12:2 does a couple of decades later. Wisdom of Solomon welcomes the Greek notion of immortality as an answer to this problem.

41:14–42:8, Two Kinds of Shame. The Hebrew text has a title before v. 16 ("Instruction about Shame"). Ben Sira first explores some actions where shame has a proper place (41:17–23) then proceeds to name further acts that ought not to cause a sense of shame (42:1–5). The reference to an old man in 42:8a probably relates to fornication but was mistakenly read "contends with a youth." The motivation in this unit is thoroughly secular—winning popular approval (42:8b).

42:9–14, On Daughters. A father's worries over a daughter are chronicled, beginning with temptations during her tender youth and continuing after her marriage. The Hebrew text characterizes her, nonetheless, as a secret treasure. Still, the popular proverbs that conclude this section reveal a low opinion of women that often finds expression in rabbinic, Greco-Roman, and early Christian literature.

Ben Sira's Attitude Toward Women

The view of women in ancient wisdom literature is not easily assessed. The notorious "foreign woman" represents a threat to youth in Egypt and Israel, and warnings against harlots and adulteresses are ubiquitous. On the other hand, sages frequently praise wives as gifts from God, although conceding that some wives occasion much sorrow. Furthermore, wisdom assumes the form of woman, at least in Israelite metaphorical speech. But she has a counterpart—Madam Folly. The author of Ecclesiastes laments his inability to locate a single woman of worth, although he can only find one man in a thousand. In the story of the contest of Darius' pages (1 Esd. 3:1–4:41) woman is praised as the strongest thing in the world, excepting truth and its Author.

Ben Sira inherits this mixed tradition about women and contributes one new dimension, the category of evil daughters as a subject of discussion. His characterization of wicked daughters is thoroughly obscene. In addition, he introduces the adjective ra'ah (Heb., evil) in the expression "wicked woman." Although the text is disputed, he may also have made the ridiculous statement that a man's wickedness is better than a woman's goodness. Still, he recognized the value of a good wife, even while viewing her from a man's perspective. In all this, Ben Sira was a child of his time.

42:15–43:33, A Hymn in Praise of the Creator. This hymn introduces the long section in praise of the fathers, as the transition in 43:33 makes specific. Ben Sira asserts that even angels lack the ability to praise God fully, hence his own effort only scratches the surface. Yet that surface is a wondrous one, as Ben Sira illustrates with rare poetic images. The summary statement that God is "the all" does not indicate pantheism, for Ben Sira adds that the Creator is greater than the sum of the parts (43:27-28). A sense of awe permeates the language about natural phenomena (sun, moon, stars, rainbow, lightning, and dew, etc.).

44:1-50:24, Praise of the Fathers. A general introduction (44:1-15) and a specific conclusion from Ben Sira's own day (50:1-24) conclude this journey through Israel's sacred history. Although the material of the hymn is thoroughly Hebraic, the similarities with Greek encomia (rhetorical compositions in praise of heroes) are noteworthy, suggesting to some interpreters that Ben Sira models his hymn on these orations. His own special interests surface in the choice of heroes to stand out in the list and in what he recalls about some of the others. The priestly institution and its founders occupy central position, and the contribution of others to the religious establishment at Jerusalem comes into play. These include David, Solomon, Hezekiah, Josiah, Zerubbabel, Jeshua, and Simon II. The list of Israel's worthy men includes a sampling of heroes, but its exclusive nature is highlighted by the absence of women and non-Israelites. The emphasis on the miraculous carries over to what Ben Sira says about prophets, whose wondrous deeds outshone their words in his estimation.

With this hymn Ben Sira thoroughly integrates Israel's sacred history into the thought of the wise, whose literature before him does not betray the slightest hint of familiarity with Israel's special religious story. Presumably, the hymn attributes the miraculous deeds to God's gift of wisdom, which guided these men and enabled them to make a name for themselves.

The description of Simon II may function polemically, for Ben Sira seems to have witnessed the corruption of the priesthood under Jason and Menelaus. Ben Sira's choice of a starting point for the poem in 44:16 witnesses to the popularity of reflection on Enoch during the second century B.C.; the later reference to him, followed by mention of Joseph, Shem, Seth, and Adam (Israelite heroes!) has suggested to some scholars that the book is not in the form that Ben Sira planned for it. The most surprising feature of the hymn is the absence of any specific Torah or wisdom piety.

The Hymn in Praise of Israel's Heroes

Ben Sira's hymn in praise of the fathers has been described by Burton Mack as a complete reading of epic history that served as a mythic etiology for Judaism in the period of the Second Temple. The hymn's architectonic structure is tripartite, with two transitional units:

Establishment of Covenants	I
Conquest of the Land	Transition
History of Prophets and Kings	II
Restoration	Transition
Climax (Simon II)	III

Common themes unite the figures belonging to the major units, for example, "the promise of a blessing" links together the personalities from Abraham to Jacob. The poem's encomiastic traits are emphasized. Four parts emerge from this analysis: first, prooemium or introduction (44:1-15); second, genealogy (44:16-49:16); third, narration of the subject's achievements (50:1-21); and fourth, epilogue (50:22-24). In this reading 49:14-16 serves as a bridge from the past to the present, juxtaposing Adam and Simon II in a manner that makes praise of the latter both appropriate and effective. The praise is commemorative rather than entertaining, but Ben Sira makes efficient use of various rhetorical devices that occur in Greek encomia. These include, among others, amplification by syncrisis (the juxtaposition of opposites for rhetorical effect), hyperbole, rhetorical questions, appeal to experience gained through travel, reference to the person's character and reputation for good deeds, claim that words cannot adequately describe the individual, and assertion that the person's contribution to society is unprecedented. Nevertheless, it must be acknowledged that 1 and 2 Chronicles provide many parallels to Ben Sira's use of biblical material. For example, 1 Chronicles remained silent about some undesirable conduct on David's part.

It is striking that Ben Sira completely drops Ezra from the biblical record. Explanations for the omission of Ezra vary, but three attempts to explain this anomaly merit consideration. One answer appeals to changed socioeconomic circumstances that made mixed marriage a matter of indifference in the late third and early second century B.C. In this view, Ezra's legislation about marriage with foreigners was too strict, inasmuch as it failed to take into account long-standing practice among the Jews. Therefore, embarrassment led Ben Sira to omit Ezra from the heroes deemed worthy of praise.

A second explanation concentrates on the scribal profession. The scribe in Ezra's day was narrowly and exclusively oriented toward the Mosaic law. Ben Sira understands the vocation of scribe much more broadly. The interest in the law was complemented by research in the wisdom tradition. In a sense Ben Sira transforms the office of priest-scribe into that of teacher-sage, whose authority rests ultimately on his scholarship, insights, and communicative skills.

A third response to the silence about Ezra focuses on the state of the priestly office in the period after Simon II's death. Onias III was a pious leader but lacked the qualities of bold leadership. Like Ezra, he was a political quietist. For this reason Ben Sira does not want to extol Ezra as someone whom Onias III could emulate. Instead, Ben Sira skips over Ezra and highly praises Onias' father, hoping to stimulate a desire on Onias' part to pattern his actions after his father and predecessor in the office of high priest.

Two other omissions in the hymn have occasioned some comment. Joseph does not appear in the body of the hymn, although the brief "afterthought" in 49:14-16 mentions him along with the prediluvians Shem, Seth, and Adam (Enoch appears for a second time here, but the Siriac and the Masada texts do not include him at 44:16). One possible reason for this curious situation is that Joseph's link with the northern tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh and his blessing on these sons implied a positive attitude toward the hated Samaritans. The active campaign waged by the Samaritans and the Tobians in Transjordan against the policies of Simon II may have generated enough animosity to prompt Ben Sira's silence about Joseph. Another explanation is that Ben Sira pulled Joseph's name out of sequence to blot out any record of Joseph's role as adviser to the Pharaoh. A third answer takes its cue from the fact that Onias III switched allegiance from the Seleucids to the Ptolemies. Ben Sira does not want to give the appearance of approving this shift of loyalty. None of these answers deals with the problem adequately if the allusion to Joseph in 49:14-16 derives from Ben Sira; for this reason, as well as for its strange location, some interpreters consider these verses secondary.

Ben Sira also omits Saul, although the biblical record contains enough negative material on this tragic figure to explain his absence in the hymn. Furthermore, Ben Sira makes no secret of his hatred for the Samaritans, whom Saul would undoubtedly have recalled, and David, Saul's enemy, is Ben Sira's hero. Finally, Saul was not an example of piety for later Judeans, at least in sacred memory.

50:25-26, A Numerical Proverb. This expression of animosity toward Philistines, Edomites, and Samaritans seems out of place in the book, and it hardly expresses the universalism typical of earlier sages. Nevertheless, Ben Sira's attitude toward these neighboring peoples reflects the animosity resulting from hostile actions directed toward Judeans who returned from captivity in Babylonia and attempted to resettle in Jerusalem and its immediate vicinity. The inhabitants of Samaria are linked together with archrivals, Philistines and Edomites. The bitterness toward all three groups resulted in military action by the Hasmonean rulers shortly after Ben Sira's day.

50:27-29, Ben Sira's Epilogue. The author identifies himself by name and commends his teachings to readers.

51:1-30, An Appendix. This appendix consists of a prayer (51:1-12), a psalm (sixteen verses in the Hebrew but missing in Greek), and an acrostic poem (51:13-30). The prayer resembles a thanksgiving psalm in which the author praises God for deliverance from some danger. The psalm in the Hebrew text is made up of numerous biblical quotations; its kinship with Psalm 136 has attracted some attention. Finally, Ben Sira describes his successful acquisition of wisdom, a motif that recurs in Wisdom of Solomon with erotic overtones (like the manuscript of Sir. 51 discovered at Qumran). The invitation to attend Ben Sira's house of instruction (Heb. bet hammidrash) is the first of its kind. The Hebrew text of v. 29 also mentions Ben Sira's academy (yeshivah). The emphasis on human learning and divine mercy in the last verses conclude the book in a way that brings together the tension throughout.

BARUCH

DANIEL J. HARRINGTON

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Baruch (sometimes also called 1 Baruch to distinguish it from the noncanonical books designated as 2 Baruch and 3 Baruch) is a composite work consisting of a narrative introduction (1:1–14), a prose prayer attributed to the Jewish exiles in Babylon (1:15–3:8), a poem about the elusiveness of wisdom and the identification of wisdom and the Law (3:9–4:4), and another poem in which the theological significance of Israel's exile is explained and the hope of restoration is explored (4:5–5:9).

The three major sections (1:15–3:8; 3:9–4:4; 4:5–5:9) appear to have been originally independent works. Because all three pieces were connected with Israel's experience of exile in Babylon and its hope for return to the homeland (though the connection of 3:9–4:4 with this theme is quite weak), they were joined together and given a narrative framework (1:1–14). All three pieces combine words and phrases from the Hebrew Bible (especially Dan. 9, Job 28, and Isa. 40–66) into a kind of pastiche that ends up being a new and somewhat creative composition.

Most likely, the narrative framework and the three major parts were composed in Hebrew. The evidence for this hypothesis was laid out by J. J. Kneucker in Das Buch Baruch (1879), in which a reconstruction of the original Hebrew text was attempted and explained in great detail. Although Kneucker convinced most scholars that 1:1–3:8 reflected a Hebrew original, there was resistance to the idea that the last two parts (3:9–4:4; 4:5–5:9) were written in Hebrew. But D. G. Burke's Poetry of Baruch (1982) seems to have established that those two sections also were composed in Hebrew. The criteria used in establishing Hebrew as the original language include the poetic style, the reliance on parallelism, the clarity gained by retroversion (i.e., retranslation) into Hebrew, and the occasional instances where the Greek translator may have misunderstood the Hebrew original.

Of the extant texts of the book of Baruch, the Greek translation of the lost Hebrew original is the most important. The Greek text of Baruch appears in four uncial manuscripts of the Septuagint and in thirty-four minuscule manuscripts (→ Texts, Versions, Manuscripts, Editions). There are also versions in Syriac, Latin, Coptic, Ethiopic, Arabic, and Armenian.

The alleged author of the book is Baruch the son of Neriah, the secretary and companion of Jeremiah. If Baruch was the author, he would have written in the early sixth century B.C. from Babylon. This setting, however, is universally acknowledged today to be a literary fiction, and the book of Baruch is considered an example of pseudepigraphy. The chief arguments for this position are historical and literary. Not only is there no other evidence that Baruch was in Babylon, but also there are so many mistakes and inaccuracies in the narrative framework (1:1–14) that Baruch the son of Neriah could not have been responsible for them. Furthermore, the three major parts (1:15–3:8; 3:9–4:4; 4:5–5:9) are mosaics of biblical passages (Dan. 9, Job 28, and Isa. 40–66) that were most likely not even in existence in the early sixth century B.C.

There is a wide range of opinion about when the book as a whole and its parts were composed. The spectrum of scholarly views extends from the period of the Exile to the second century A.D. Most scholars place the work in the Maccabean period (200–60 B.C.). Further precision in dating is hard to achieve, mainly because of the method of composition (a pastiche of biblical phrases) and because of the lack of clear allusions to contemporary historical events.

Although the work is set in Babylon, the fact that it appears to have been composed in Hebrew suggests that it originated in Palestine. This setting is confirmed to some extent by the narrative framework's insistence that the three major sections were intended as advice for the Jerusalem community. Nothing can be said about the identity of the author. In fact, we must reckon with the possibility of four different authors—one for each major section plus the final redactor who supplied the framework and put the parts together. Of course, we cannot rule out the possibility that one author was responsible for more than one part.

The individual parts of the book of Baruch have distinctive theologies. The exiles' prayer (1:15–3:8) admits that the Exile was the Lord's just punishment of the people on account of their sin but appeals nonetheless to the Lord's goodness and mercy as well as to his own glorification in restoring Israel. The wisdom poem (3:9–4:4) alludes to Israel's situation in exile but offers no sustained reflection on it. The wisdom poem's focus is the elusive quest for wisdom and the real opportunity for Israel to discover wisdom in God's gift of the Law. The poem of consolation (4:5-5:9) returns to the subject of exile but is primarily concerned with offering encouragement about the return from exile under the guidance of the "everlasting one." It presents the Exile as God's just punishment of Israel for its sins.

The joining of these three pieces into a whole provided a reflection on aspects of Israel's exile in Babylon and its restoration to the land. The central position given to the wisdom poem (3:9-4:4) makes the Law into the pivot for moving from the sadness and despair of exile (1:15-3:8) to the confident hope in restoration (4:5-5:9). If the redaction took place during the Maccabean period, the book of Baruch may have been part of the movement of religious restoration that accompanied the Maccabean triumph over Antiochus IV Epiphanes. Since the first part (1:15-3:8) drew extensively on Daniel 9, the final redaction probably occurred at some chronological distance from the events of the Maccabean crisis.

The Hebrew book of Baruch was not included among the canonical books in the Hebrew Bible. Its Greek version appears in many manuscripts of the Septuagint. The Council of Trent in a decree issued on 8 April 1546 listed Baruch among the canonical books of the OT as part of or closely associated with the book of Jeremiah.

COMMENTARY

1:1-14

Narrative Framework

After a prescript (1:1-2), the book sets a "historical scene" (1:3-9) and gives an instruction from the Jewish Babylonian exiles to those Jews who remain in Jerusalem (1:10-14). The prescript provides a more extended genealogy for Baruch than appears in Jer. 32:12. There is no other evidence that Baruch was in Babylon. According to Jer. 43:5-7, he accompanied Jeremiah into Egypt. The date formula "in the fifth year, on the seventh of the month" is peculiar for its omission of the name of the month. Since both Jerusalem and its Temple seem to be intact (see 1:7-14), the date formula may refer to Nebuchadnezzar's first capture of Jerusalem and deportation in 597 B.C. (see 2 Kings 24:10-17).

The historical framework (1:3-9) paints a picture of Baruch reading what follows (1:15-5:9) to the Jewish exiles under the leadership of King Jeconiah (Jehoiachin). The biblical inspiration for the scene may have been Hananiah's prophecy in Jer. 28:1-4 and Jeremiah's letter to the exiles in Babylon in Jer. 29:1-32. The Jewish community assembled in Babylon by the otherwise unknown river Sud, as they did under Ezekiel's leadership by the river Chebar (see Ezek. 1:1). Their observance of the anniversary of the capture of Jerusalem by mourning, fasting, and praying (1:5) fits in with Jewish custom of the Second Temple period (see Zech. 7:1-7; Neh. 9:1; Ezra 8:21; Dan. 9:3). Their collection for the Jerusalem community (1:6-7) expresses a solidarity between the Babylonian exiles and Jerusalem. The high priest in Jerusalem is the otherwise unknown Jehoiakim (see 1 Chron. 6:13-15). In his first attack on Jerusalem (597 B.C.), Nebuchadnezzar had carried off vessels from the Temple (see 2 Kings 24:13). Likewise, in the second Babylonian attack (587), sacred vessels were taken and brought to Babylon (see 2 Kings 25:13-17). The reference in 1:8-9 is to a substitute set of vessels allegedly made under Zedekiah after the exile of Jehoiachin. Although there is no mention of a substitute set in 2 Kings 24:18-25:7, its existence is a logical necessity if the Temple service were to continue. According to Ezra 1:7-11, the Temple vessels were returned to Jerusalem only under the Persian king Cyrus in 538 B.C.

In the instruction that accompanies the collection (1:10-14), the people first urge that the money be spent on material for sacrifices at the Jerusalem Temple (1:10). The assumption is that the Temple worship at Jerusalem continued through the Exile (see Jer. 41:5). The Jerusalem community is asked to pray for the Babylonian king and for the exiles (1:11-13). As in Dan. 5:1, Belshazzar, the son of Nabonidus, is wrongly identified as the son of Nebuchadnezzar. This positive attitude toward the Babylonian kings reflects Jeremiah's own stance (see Jer. 29:7). For the idea of the postexilic community praying for the Persian king and his sons, see Ezra 6:10. The Jerusalem community is also to pray on behalf of the Babylonian exiles (1:13). Their present suffering is interpreted as just punishment for their sins. What follows is to be read as a confession (see Lev. 5:5; 16:21; Num. 5:7) on "the day of the feast and in the days of the solemn assembly." Perhaps there is reference to the Day of Atonement or to the anniversary of Jerusalem's fall.

1:15-3:8

The Exiles' Prayer

Only at 2:11 is God addressed directly in prayer. Before 2:11 the text is a confession of Israel's sinfulness and an admission that the Exile is a just punishment (1:15-2:10). The prayer proper (2:11-35) is followed by a concluding summary

(3:1–8). The prayer starts out as a close rewriting of Daniel's confession in Dan. 9:4–19 with the help of other biblical phrases (esp. from Jeremiah). But by 2:19 the Danielic confession is left behind, because the material has been used up.

1:15–2:10, Preliminary Confession. The obvious biblical model is Dan. 9:7–8, 10–14. Nearly every word from that passage is reproduced here. Phrases from other biblical books fill out and expand the Danielic confession. The one "original" move is the identification of Israel's great sin in Bar. 2:3 as cannibalism. The beginning of the confession of sins (1:15–18) uses the vocabulary of Dan. 9:7–8, 10 (see Neh. 9:26, 32–33). The people are to proclaim that in their experience God has been shown just because their punishments resulted from their own sins. All the people of Judah and Jerusalem, especially their leaders, are accused of failing to obey God's commands.

The admission of communal guilt in Dan. 9:11 is expanded in Bar. 1:19–22 by phrases from Deuteronomy (9:7; 29:19) and Jeremiah (7:24–25; 11:4–5; 26:5; 32:30). A pattern of disobedience set in the Exodus has continued until the Exile. The curse (see Dan. 9:11) is the just outcome of this disobedience. Instead of heeding Moses and the prophets, the people served other gods and did evil. Bar. 2:1–2 is almost a verbatim quotation of Dan. 9:12–13. The mention of the incomparable evil done in Jerusalem (see Dan. 9:12) and the allusion to something written in the law of Moses (see Dan. 9:13) leads the author to identify this evil as cannibalism (Bar. 2:3; Lev. 26:29; Deut. 28:53; Jer. 19:9; Lam. 2:20; 4:10). This terrible crime is presented as the reason why Israel has been subjected to other nations and scattered in exile (2:4). Israel's low state (see Deut. 28:13) is attributed to its sin in refusing to hear the Lord's voice (2:5), once more in terms taken from Dan. 9:8, 11, 16.

The third part of the preliminary confession of guilt (2:6–10) begins as the first part did, by using the contrast between God's righteousness and Israel's shame from Dan. 9:7. Almost every other phrase is taken over directly from Dan. 9:12–14, with additional material from Jer. 7:24 in Bar. 2:8 and Dan. 9:10 in Bar. 2:10. The text confirms the righteousness of God in all the calamities that have befallen Israel and blames them all on Israel's failure to repent and its refusal to hear God's voice and to walk according to the divine commands.

2:11–35, The Prayer Proper. The first part of the prayer proper (2:11–18) appeals to God's activity in the Exodus and admits the people's sin. It urges God to look with favor on Israel for two reasons: that all the earth might know that Israel is called by the Lord's name (2:15) and that Israel may give glory to God and ascribe justice to him (2:18). These themes reappear in the concluding summary (3:6–7). Whereas up to this point God had been talked about in the third person, now with 2:11 God is addressed in the second person. The same shift occurs in Dan. 9:15. Bar. 2:11–12a follows Dan 9:15 closely, with some influence from Jer. 32:21. While Bar. 2:12b–13a corresponds to Dan. 9:16, the reason why God should turn away his wrath ("because we are left as few among the nations") has been imported from Jer. 42:2. The idea of Jerusalem and its people having become a byword among its neighbors (Dan. 9:16b) was used in Bar. 2:4. Bar. 2:14–15 begins and ends with phrases adapted from Dan. 9:17 and Dan. 9:19. The idea of God giving favor before captors appears in Gen. 39:21, and the challenge that God should save Israel so that all the earth might recognize God as Lord occurs in 2 Kings 19:19. After Bar. 2:16 combines Deut. 26:15 and Dan. 9:18, Bar. 2:17–18 contrasts the dead in Sheol who cannot honor God and testify to his justice (see Pss. 6:5; 88:11–12; Isa. 38:18) with even the weakest and frailest living person who can do so. There is probably a personification of Israel in defeat and in exile in 2:18.

The second part of the prayer proper (2:19–26) gives God's mercy as the only reason for approaching God (2:19). In failing to heed Jeremiah's call to serve the king of Babylon, Israel has brought upon itself the severe punishments that it has endured. After alluding to Dan. 9:18b in specifying God's mercy as the basis of the prayer, Bar. 2:19–20 refers back to Dan. 9:6 ("your servants the prophets") as the vehicles by which God makes known his will. God's will for Israel is expressed in Bar. 2:21–23 by a pastiche of quotations from Jer. 27:12–13; 27:9; 7:34; and 48:9. The result of Israel's refusal to serve the king of Babylon has been the desecration of the graves of Israel's ancestors (see Jer. 8:1), the exposure of their bones to heat by day and to cold by night (see Jer. 36:30), the death of the people from various causes (see Jer. 16:4; 32:36), and the desolation of the Jerusalem Temple. These punishments were the consequence of Israel's evil deeds (see Jer. 11:17). According to Bar. 2:27–35, even these punishments were part of God's goodness and mercy toward Israel. Israel should have known this from the Torah (see Deut. 31:24–25; Josh. 8:32). The alleged quotation from the Torah in Bar. 2:29–35 uses phrases from Deuteronomy (esp. 30:1–10) and Jeremiah. It attributes Israel's exile to its stubborn failure to hear God's voice (2:29–30a) and foresees Israel's repentance in the land of exile and its return to God (2:30b–33). It looks forward to resettlement in the ancestral land and great growth for the people (2:34). It concludes with God's promise of an eternal covenant with Israel according to the terms of Jer. 31:31-34 and an eternal homeland as a reversal of 1 Kings 14:15 (2:35).

3:1-8, Conclusion. The prayer ends by appealing to almighty God to hear Israel's prayer and to have mercy by remembering that hearing Israel's prayer is in God's interest. Some ideas of the prayer up to this point reappear, giving the impression that 3:1-8 was intended as a summary and conclusion. The initial approach to God in 3:1-3 contrasts God and Israel: God is almighty and lives forever, whereas Israel is mortal and lives in anguish. Again Israel admits its sin and appeals to God's mercy. The description of the exiles as "dead" in 3:4 may reflect a Greek mistranslation of the Hebrew or the idea of the exiles as spiritually dead (see Ezek. 37:1-14). "Remember," the key word of the prayer, occurs in Bar. 3:5. As in 2:11-18, God is urged to remember Israel for the sake of his own name and so that he may be glorified (3:7). The prayer ends with the plea that God take notice of Israel's plight in exile in language that alludes back to 2:4, 13, 26.

3:9-4:4

The Wisdom Poem

The setting in exile is established both in the beginning (3:10-11) and at the end (4:2-3). Almost every phrase in the poem is found elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible, though this poem does not follow one text as closely as the preceding prayer followed Daniel 9. Its major themes—the elusive character of wisdom and the identification of wisdom and the Law—appear most clearly in Job 28 and Sirach 24, respectively. The wisdom poem exhibits a chiasmic structure in five parts: the first (3:9-14) and fifth (4:1-4) stanzas identify wisdom and the Law; the second (3:15-23) and fourth (3:29-38) stanzas reflect on the quest for wisdom; and the middle stanza (3:24-28) joins the two themes in an indirect way.

The poem begins in 3:9 by paralleling (and thus equating) the commandments of life (see Deut. 30:15-20) and wisdom. It proceeds in 3:10-11 to describe Israel's exile in Babylon not only as life in a foreign land but even as existence among the dead in Sheol. Israel's exile is explained in 3:12 as due to its abandoning the fountain of wisdom (see Prov. 18:4), which here must refer to God's Law, as the parallel phrase "the way of God" in 3:13 makes clear. If Israel had kept the Law, it would have dwelt in everlasting peace. The stanza ends in 3:14 with the imperative "learn" plus five "where" clauses. Wisdom, strength, knowledge, long life, and enlightenment and peace are to be found in the Law. The consequence of ignoring the fountain of wisdom has been exile and life among the dead.

Wisdom's elusive character is brought out in the second stanza (3:15-23). The treatment of this theme is reminiscent of Job 28, which contrasts the human search for and discovery of precious metals and stones and the unsuccessful human quest for wisdom. A second piece of background is supplied by the motif of personified wisdom's search for her rightful place (see Sir. 24; 1 Enoch 42:1-3; Wisd. of Sol. 7; Col. 1:15-20). From what follows in Bar. 3:16-23, it is clear that the double question in 3:15 about finding wisdom's place and entering its treasures or storehouses is rhetorical. Those who "play with the birds of the heaven" (3:17) are probably described in terms taken from Job 41:5. The description of those who work in silver in 3:18 may be metaphorical; that is, it may be a reference to those who scheme and are greedy for money. The judgment passed on the persons mentioned in 3:16-18 is that they have disappeared into Sheol and others have taken their places (3:19). The cycle repeats itself from generation to generation, according to 3:20-21. Failing to perceive wisdom is described there in terms of not finding the "way" of wisdom. The stanza concludes in 3:22-23 by listing peoples who have not understood wisdom's "way." It mentions two places with a reputation for wisdom: Canaan (Phoenicia; see Ezek. 28:4; Zech. 9:2), and Teman (Edom; see Jer. 49:7; Obad. 1:8-9). Then it denies that Hagar's sons (Ishmaelites; see Gen. 16, 21) found wisdom. The "merchants of Merran" may have been from Midian (see Gen. 37:28). "Storytellers" and the seekers of understanding likewise did not find wisdom.

The central stanza (3:24-28) describes the greatness of the universe created by God and denies that God gave wisdom to the "giants" of old. Since both the first and the fifth stanza identify wisdom as the Law, the third stanza is an oblique testimony to Israel's status as the elect people of God. At first glance, the reference to "the house of God" in 3:24a would seem to be the Jerusalem Temple (see Sir. 24:10-12). But because of 3:24b-25, most commentators conclude that the house of God is the entire created universe. The "giants" were born from the rebellious angels who knew the heavenly secrets and shared them with humans (see 1 Enoch 7). According to 3:27-28, they were not given genuine knowledge by God and so they perished.

The fourth stanza (3:29-38) takes up the theme of the elusiveness of wisdom, which was the theme of the second stanza (3:15-23). After establishing that humans cannot find and possess wisdom (3:29-31), it describes God as the wise governor of the universe (3:32-35) and as the one who gave wisdom to Israel in the form of the Law (3:36-38). The section about the failure of humans to find wisdom (3:29-31) is reminiscent not only of Job 28 but also of Deut. 30:12-13, an indirect preparation for the later identification of wisdom and the Law. The second section (3:32-35) establishes that God alone knows wisdom (see Job 28:23-27) and describes God's governance of the universe. The reference to "light" in 3:33 may mean lightning. Throughout this section the emphasis is on the obedience of creation in carrying out God's plans. The third section (3:36-38) identifies the God who creates and governs with the God of Israel, who gave wisdom to Israel as his beloved people. In the literature of the early church, the description of wisdom in 3:38 ("Afterward she appeared upon the earth and lived among human beings") was applied to Jesus. Modern scholars have argued that the sentence was a Christian addition. It is best taken, however, as a Jewish reference to Wisdom dwelling among human beings on earth (see Prov. 8; Sir. 24, and Wisd. of Sol.).

The final stanza (4:1-4) takes up two themes from the first stanza: Israel's situation in exile and the Law as wisdom. Identifying wisdom with "the book of the commandments of God" (4:1) recalls Sir. 24:23 ("the book of the covenant of the Most High God"). The idea that one's response to God's commands leads either to life or death (4:2) echoes the phrase "the commandments of life" (3:19; see Deut. 30:15-20). The command to Jacob to turn and walk toward wisdom brings back the setting in exile and continues the "way" imagery. Bar. 4:3 may indicate that God might offer wisdom (the Law) to another nation, or it may simply refer to other nations boasting over Israel's defeat. The poem concludes by declaring Israel happy or blessed (see Matt. 5:3-12; Luke 6:20-23) because through the Law it knows what pleases God.

4:5-5:9

The Poem of Consolation

The third major piece concerns the Exile directly. It is a pastiche of biblical phrases taken chiefly from Isaiah 40-55. After an introductory exhortation to the remnant of Israel (4:5-8), the personified Jerusalem addresses the "neighbors of Zion" and the exiles (4:9-29). Then the narrator encourages Jerusalem to look toward the restoration of her children (4:30-5:9). The responsibility for the Exile is placed on God, who used that experience to punish Israel for its sins. Nevertheless, the emphasis in this poem is God's promise to restore the exiles to Jerusalem.

The poem of consolation (4:5-8) begins by calling Israel to "take courage" (see 4:21, 27). In addressing the "memorial of Israel" the author refers to the exiled remnant that keeps alive the memory of Israel. The responsibility for the Exile is placed on Israel's sins, especially in sacrificing to demons rather than to God (4:7).

Nevertheless, exile does not mean the total destruction of God's people (4:6). Israel is accused of forgetting God and of grieving Jerusalem (4:8). The second part of this charge sets the stage for Jerusalem's portrayal as a person addressing first the "neighbors of Zion" in 4:9-16 and then the exiles in 4:17-29.

Those nearby peoples who had seen Zion's capture are personified as "neighbors of Zion." In her address to them (4:9-16), Mother Jerusalem first explains the responsibility and reason for Israel's plight. Despite appearances, God is really the one who brought about the Exile. The favorite epithet for God in this part of the book is the "everlasting one" (see 4:8, 10, 14, 20, 22, 24, 35; 5:2). Jerusalem's role as a mother deprived of her sons is portrayed poignantly in 4:10-13. She is both widowed and made childless. The fault is with Israel for turning aside from God's Law. Next (4:14-16) Mother Jerusalem urges the "neighbors of Zion" to remember Israel's captivity when God brought their enemies against them. After a repetition of 4:9b, the Babylonians are described in highly negative terms taken from Deut. 28:49-50. This first address has put in proper theological perspective the major actors in the Exile: God, Israel, and the Babylonians.

The second address (4:17-29) is directed to the Jewish exiles, though the transition is made obliquely by a rhetorical question. It begins and ends with the promise that God, who brought these disasters upon Israel, will rescue it (4:18, 29). In between, the text emphasizes that God brought these calamities on Israel (see 4:25, 27) and that God will deliver Israel (see 4:21-24, 27). God is the "everlasting one" and the "holy one" (4:20, 22), who hears the people's prayers (4:27, 28). In a reversal of the language of Isa. 52:1 and 61:3, Mother Jerusalem puts on the "sackcloth of supplication" (see 4:20) to pray on behalf of her children. In Bar. 5:1, she will put on forever the beauty of the glory of God. Twice (4:21, 27) she urges her children to "take courage" and pray to God, in full confidence that her captive children will be restored to her (4:23). The "neighbors of Zion," who had seen Israel's captivity, will see its glorious restoration (4:24). The enemies of Israel will be punished (4:25). Israel itself is urged to be patient (4:25) in its exile, though the reason for the Exile is traced to its own resolve to go astray from God (4:28).

Having addressed the people in 4:5-8 and narrated Mother Jerusalem's address in 4:9-29, the poet now speaks directly to Jerusalem in 4:30-5:9. Three imperatives ("take courage" in 4:30, "look" in 4:36, and "arise" in 5:5) divide the text into stanzas. The first stanza (4:30-35) describes the fall of Babylon, the captor of Israel, as part of the consolation of Israel (see Isa. 40:11; 51:3, 12; 61:2-3). A threefold reversal of the beatitude form ("wretched will those be . . .") in 4:31–32 introduces the theme of reversal in 4:33–34. God is described as the one who "named" Jerusalem; in 5:4 the city is called "peace of righteousness and glory of godliness." According to 4:35, the "everlasting one" will bring fire on Babylon (see Isa. 34:10; Jer. 50:32; 51:30, 58), and it will become an abode for demons (see Isa. 13:21; 34:14).

The second and third stanzas presuppose the picture of Jerusalem watching the return of the exiles (see Isa. 40:9–11). Personified Jerusalem first is told (4:36–5:4) to look at her sons returning to her at God's command. For the idea of the exiles coming from "east and west" in 4:37, see Isa. 62:6–9. At 5:1–2, the "sackcloth of supplication" described in 4:20 is put off by Jerusalem and replaced by the cloak of God's righteousness and the headdress of glory (see Isa. 61:10). In doing so, she conforms to Isa. 52:1; 61:3. In 5:3–4, the motifs of God's splendor (4:24) and God's naming Jerusalem (4:30) are brought to fulfillment.

Then the personified Jerusalem (5:5–9) is told once more to look for her returning children, as in Isa. 40:9–11. Here, however, the focus is the exiles who come back. The return takes place at the command of God and under God's leadership. The exiles rejoice that God has remembered them (5:5) and are carried in glory (5:6). In fulfillment of Isa. 40:4, their way will be made straight and easy (5:7). According to 5:8, God will even make the woods and trees provide shade. A close parallel (probably dependent on Bar. 5:8) appears in Pss. Sol. 11:6–7. The light of God's glory (see Isa. 60:1–3) will lead Israel back, with personified Mercy and Righteousness beside him (5:9).

LETTER OF JEREMIAH

DANIEL J. HARRINGTON

INTRODUCTION

The Letter of Jeremiah purports to contain advice from Jeremiah to Jews exiled in Babylon on why they should avoid participating in non-Jewish worship. The structure of the book is set by nine refrains (vv. 16, 23, 29, 40, 44, 52, 56, 65, 69) in which the writer concludes that the pagan idols are not gods at all. After providing a historical setting in the exiled community at Babylon (vv. 1–6), the work gives ten reflections on the foolishness and uselessness of idol worship, concluding all but the last with the refrain. The reflections are repetitive and without any clear logical progression.

The work has been transmitted in Greek and in versions dependent on the Greek text, but there is a scholarly consensus, based on the style of the Greek and some probable mistranslations, that Hebrew was its original language. In the two most important Greek manuscripts of the Septuagint (Vaticanus and Alexandrinus) it appears as a separate book between Lamentations and Ezekiel. The Latin tradition attaches it to the book of Baruch, and so it is often taken as the sixth chapter of Baruch.

The scene for Jeremiah's letter is the exile of Jews in 597 B.C. under Nebuchadnezzar (see v. 2). The idea of a letter from Jeremiah to the exiled community in Babylon derived from Jeremiah 29, while the content and many of the phrases have been taken over from Jeremiah 10 and other biblical polemics against idol worship (see Pss. 115:4–8; 135:15–18; Isa. 40:18–20; 41:6–7; 46:1–7). Indeed, the work as a whole is a rewritten and expanded version of Jeremiah 10, taking its thrust from the Aramaic slogan in Jer. 10:11: "May the gods who did not make the heavens and the earth perish from the earth and from under the heavens."

The statement in v. 3 that the Babylonian exile would last "up to seven generations" (cf. Jer. 29:10, where it is supposed to last only seventy years) is sometimes taken as indicating composition late in the fourth century B.C. Since one generation lasts about forty years (see Judg. 3:11, 30), subtracting 280 years from 597 B.C. would give a date of 317 B.C. The allusion to the work in 2 Macc. 2:1–3 and the discovery of a fragment of the Greek version in a Qumran Cave 7 manuscript dated about 100 B.C. suggest the second century B.C. as the latest possible date of composition. If it was composed in Hebrew, a setting in the land of Israel and a time in which attitudes toward foreign cults were hostile (perhaps during the crisis under Antiochus IV Epiphanes) seem likely. The writer, however, is quite familiar with Babylonian customs and may have written in Babylon at an earlier time.

The Letter of Jeremiah provides a handbook of arguments why Jews should not worship foreign gods. The idols are powerless, helpless, and lifeless, without sense perception or consciousness. They are human fabrications and cannot do what the God of Israel does. They serve no purpose. Their manufacturers, priests, and devotees are shameful, deceitful, and foolish.

The Letter of Jeremiah is not considered canonical by Jews or Protestants. Catholics take it as chap. 6 of Baruch but do not use it in the current lectionary.

COMMENTARY

1–7, Historical Setting. The warnings against idolatry in Babylon are placed in the context of Jeremiah's letter to the exiles there (see Jer. 29). Since Nebuchadnezzar was not really responsible for the exile of 587 (see 2 Kings 25:11), this exile must have occurred in 597 (see 2 Kings 24:14–16). The warnings are addressed to Jews in Babylon who might be attracted to participation in foreign worship. The promise of return to Israel after "seven generations" (v. 3) can be taken as an indication of the date of the book's composition (shortly after Alexander's conquest). Or perhaps it was only a way of dealing with Jer. 29:10 ("When seventy years are completed for Babylon, I will visit you and fulfill for you my promise and bring you back to this place"), when in fact the return from exile had not been complete. When tempted to join in Babylonian worship, the exiles are urged to confess in their hearts the God of Israel, who will protect them with his angel (see Exod. 23:23; 32:34).

8–16, First Warning. Even though the idols are dressed and decorated in great splendor, they remain powerless. Made with great skill, they nevertheless cannot speak (v. 8). The gold and silver used in their crowns is taken by the priests for their own purposes and shared with the temple prostitutes (vv. 9-11a). Their beautiful garments corrode, and their faces gather dust (vv. 11b-13). Even their weapons and symbols of power are useless (vv. 14-15). The conclusion is that, since the idols are not gods, the exiles should not worship them (v. 16).

17-23, Second Warning. The idols lack sense perception and consciousness. After comparing the idols to a broken dish in their uselessness (v. 17a), the Letter presents a series of pictures intended to show that they are not conscious of anyone or anything outside themselves. The feet of the worshipers raise dust up into their eyes (v. 17b). The idols are locked in like prisoners (v. 18) and cannot even see the lamps lit for them (v. 19). They are blocks of wood, and their garments are eaten by worms (v. 20). Smoke blackens their faces (v. 21), and birds and animals alight on them (v. 22). Their total lack of sensitivity proves that they are not gods and therefore deserve no fear (v. 23).

24-29, Third Warning. The idols are lifeless, helpless, and senseless. Not only would the idols' gold tarnish unless polished by a human being, but also in the process of manufacture and purchase (vv. 24-25) the idols are totally unconscious. They have to be carried, need to be set upright, and cannot right themselves (vv. 26-27). The sacrifices offered to the idols are used selfishly by the priests and their wives and are even touched by menstruating women (vv. 28-29; see Lev. 12:1-8). The lifelessness, helplessness, and senselessness of the idols proves that they are not gods and do not deserve worship (v. 29b).

30-40a, Fourth Warning. The idols do not act like God. The first part of this warning (vv. 30-33) pictures women serving meals to the idols and priests either behaving in grotesque ways or stealing clothes from the idols. The second part (vv. 34-38) focuses on their inability to achieve anything. The idols cannot pay back good or evil, set up or depose kings, give money or wealth, demand the fulfillment of vows, rescue people, and so forth. These things, of course, are done by Israel's God. The idols are no better than rocks, and there is no reason to worship them (vv. 39-40a).

40b-44, Fifth Warning. The practices connected with idol worship are foolish. The first example (v. 41) is bringing a man who cannot speak before the idol in hope of a cure when the idol itself cannot speak. How can this powerless object give power to a human being? The second example (v. 43) involves the Babylonian practice of cultic prostitution described by Herodotus in Histories 1.199 as the most disgraceful of the Babylonian customs. A god that would allow such a custom cannot be a real god deserving worship.

45-52, Sixth Warning. The idols are human fabrications, manufactured by mortal craftsmen who engage in a deceit (vv. 45-47). Thus when the priests futilely consult the idols in time of war, all will know that the idols were only products of human ingenuity (vv. 48-51).

53-56, Seventh Warning. The idols are powerless. They cannot do what God does—set up kings, give rain, judge, or deliver (vv. 53-54). When fire breaks out in their temple, the priests escape but the idols perish in the flames (v. 55). When a king or an enemy comes, they offer no resistance (v. 56). Since they cannot do what one would expect from God, why should anyone imagine that they are gods?

57-65, Eighth Warning. Since the idols are powerless and a god is supposed to be powerful, they are the most useless things imaginable. Their powerlessness is demonstrated by their inability to protect themselves from robbers (vv. 57-58). Persons, even inanimate objects and the forces of nature perform their assigned functions (vv. 59-63a), but idols do not perform the function of real gods (vv. 63b-65).

66-69, Ninth Warning. The theme of the uselessness of the idols is continued by showing that they do not act like gods, the sun and moon, or even wild beasts (who at least can flee danger). Since there is no evidence that the idols act like gods, therefore there is no reason to treat them like gods.

70-73, Tenth Warning. The argument is concluded by comparing the useless idols to scarecrows (see Jer. 10:5), a thorn bush, and a dead body. Just as their clothing rots, so will the idols rot. Therefore the just person who has no idols will be far from reproach.

THE ADDITIONS TO DANIEL

ROBERT DORAN

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

The Additions to Daniel consist of three extended passages not found in the Masoretic Text (MT) of Daniel, but found in the two different Greek versions of the OT, the Septuagint (LXX) and Theodotion (→ Texts, Versions, Manuscripts, Editions): the Song of the Three Youths, Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon.

The LXX places both of the narrative additions after the MT Daniel, with Bel and the Dragon standing before Susanna. Theodotion, on the other hand, attempted to integrate the additions with MT Daniel, so that the progress of Daniel from youth to old age is described. The Susanna narrative, placed before MT Daniel, shows the rise to prominence of the young Daniel; Bel and the Dragon extends the chronological sequence of MT Daniel 1–6 (which includes the reigns of Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and Darius) by adding two episodes set at the court of Cyrus.

Song of the Three Youths

INTRODUCTION

Contents

In both versions this passage lies between MT Dan. 3:23 and 3:24 and consists of three unequal parts: first, the Prayer of Azariah, the Hebrew name of Abednego (vv. 1–22); second, a short prose account of the fate of the three Jews in the furnace (vv. 23–27); third, a hymn sung by the three youths while in the furnace (vv. 28–68). The relationship between MT Dan. 3:23 and 3:24 is highly dramatic. The three Jewish youths are thrown into an incredibly hot furnace and presumably destroyed, when suddenly Nebuchadnezzar is perturbed and in astonishment claims to see four men in the fire, the fourth looking like a divine being. Nebuchadnezzar reacts to the miracle by praising the God of the Jews. The author of the Addition must have found the transition too sudden and provided the details of the miracle. As in Exodus 15, 1 Samuel 2, and elsewhere, the narrative is supplemented by poetic material. Deliverance comes in response to prayer, and deliverance demands a hymn of praise. The Addition thus emphasizes the reciprocal covenantal faithfulness of God and the three young men.

Original Language and Date

The text of the LXX and Theodotion are very similar, the major differences occurring in the narrative sections of the Addition. There are no compelling linguistic arguments for assuming the Greek to be a translation of an originally Hebrew or Aramaic text.

The Addition must have been composed before the LXX translation, which is usually dated ca. 100 B.C.

Religious Significance

That much psalmody was written in the post-exilic period has been confirmed by the extensive poetic materials found among the Dead Sea Scrolls, not only the major collection of Thanksgiving Hymns (IQH), but also other fragmentary nonbiblical psalmic material, and the Prayer of Nabonidus (4QPrNab). The prayer and hymn in this Addition must be set within this context—the contents of both are commonplace for the period. The Addition emphasizes that heroes must be men of piety and that the basis of their wisdom is fear of the Lord.

COMMENTARY

1–2, Introduction. In Theodotion only Azariah says the prayer, while in the LXX all three pray. The Addition is variously prepared for in the translation of MT Dan. 3:23–24. In Theodotion no mention is made here of the death of those who threw the three youths into the furnace, but their death is mentioned in vv. 23–25 of the Addition. The LXX is closer to MT in maintaining the deaths in LXX Dan. 3:23; in vv. 23–25 of the Addition, the LXX distinguishes between those who threw the youths in the furnace and those who were stoking the fire. It is these latter who die in vv. 23-25.

3-22, The Prayer. After a brief introductory invocation (v. 3), the prayer divides into two parts: a proclamation of God's justice in punishing the sin of Israel (vv. 4-10); and a petition for mercy, a pledge of worship, and a call for God to help (vv. 11-22). Whether spoken by Azariah alone or by the three youths, the "we" of the prayer is collective: the prayer is a communal lament, recognizing the national guilt and pleading for national deliverance. The themes are traditional: confession of sin (cf. Hos. 14:2-8; Jer. 3:22b-4:2; 14:7-9); the just judgment of God (cf. Tob. 3:2-6; Add. to Esther 14:3-19); retribution against enemies (cf. Pss. 60:12; 79:12; 80:16; 83:13-18). Overall, the closest parallels are the prayers in Dan. 9:4-20 and Bar. 1:15-3:8.

Although the description of the enemies of the nation in v. 9 refers primarily to the persecution of Nebuchadnezzar that constitutes the plot of Daniel 3, ancient readers undoubtedly applied the description to the persecution of the Jews by Antiochus IV Epiphanes in 168-164 B.C.

The call for God's help is based on the covenant made to Abraham in Gen. 22:17. In contrast to the prayers in Dan. 9:4-20 and Bar. 1:15-3:8, no explicit reference is made to Moses, perhaps because the poetic contrast between the covenant promise of numerous descendants and the present smallness of the nation (vv. 13-14) most closely resembles the situation of Abraham. The substitution of a contrite soul and a humbled spirit for sacrifice in the now destroyed Temple continues the prophetic demand for proper conduct alongside the sacrificial ritual (Isa. 1:10-17; Amos 5:21-27; Ps. 51:16-17) and echoes the statements of Ben Sira that keeping the law brings atonement (Sir. 34:18-35:20).

23-27, Short Prose Interlude. Moore rightly notes that logically the angel should have cooled down the fire before Azariah began his prayer. He concludes with other scholars that this prose interlude originally introduced the following hymn of the three youths and that later the prayer of Azariah was inserted before this interlude.

28-68, The Hymn of the Three Youths. Following a brief introduction (v. 28), the hymn divides into five sections: first, a doxology to God enthroned in his heavenly temple (vv. 29-34); second, a call to praise addressed to the heavenly creatures (vv. 35-41); third, a call to praise addressed to creatures between heaven and earth (vv. 42-51); fourth, a call to praise addressed to creatures on earth (vv. 52-59); and fifth, a call to praise addressed to all humanity particularly Israel (vv. 60-68).

The first section of the hymn is clearly distinct from the rest. It addresses God directly and, while the rest of the hymn has a repeated refrain in the second half of each verse, this section varies the refrain. There is no reason to conclude, however, that this first section was an originally independent composition. The traditional quality of the hymnic material is shown by the striking agreement between vv. 29-30 and LXX Tob. 8:5. Verse 31 refers to God's heavenly temple, as one also finds in Ps. 11:4; Hab. 2:20; and most fully in the "Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice" from the Dead Sea Scrolls (4QShir-Shab).

The following sections of the hymn (vv. 35-68) provide close correspondences to Psalm 148. The repeated use of the same refrain in each verse is the same poetic device found in Psalm 136, and the wording of vv. 67-68 echoes Ps. 136:1-3. There is some variation in order between the LXX and Theodotion, particularly in vv. 44-51, but such is to be expected in lists of this kind. The overall progression from the heavens to earth and finally to humans remains the same, however, and follows the general order of creation in Genesis 1. The hymn then specifies the praise to be offered by Israel, and in this is similar to Sirach 24.

Susanna

INTRODUCTION

Contents

This Addition describes how the young, wise Daniel intervenes to save the beautiful Susanna who had been condemned to death for adultery on the testimony of false witnesses, elders of the Jews who had been rebuffed in their advances to her.

There are striking differences between the LXX and Theodotion in the telling of the story. Since the major English translations give only the Theodotonic version, emphasis will be placed here on providing an adequate presentation of the LXX. (For an English translation of the LXX, see Moore, pp. 99, 104, 114–15.)

First, the LXX begins at v. 5b–6 and has the quality of a superscription: “Concerning those about whom the Master said, ‘Lawlessness came forth from Babylon’ from elders, judges, those who seemed to guide the people; and lawsuits used come to them from other cities.” Second, the conclusion to the story also differs: “Wherefore the youths are the beloved of Jacob because of their integrity. Let us take care that the youths become courageous sons. For if the youths live reverently, a spirit of understanding and insight will be in them for ever.” Third, several additional sentences in Theodotion are not found in the LXX, and there is very little verbatim agreement between the two tellings.

Some of the Theodotonic additions (e.g., vv. 11, 31b, 36b, 39) simply add dramatic color. Others are more significant. While Theodotion situates the trial scene in the house of Susanna's husband, Joakim, the LXX places the trial at the synagogue of the city (v. 28), emphasizing the involvement of all the Jewish community. Such an emphasis coincides with the preference of the LXX for titles rather than proper names: Susanna in Theodotion v. 22 is the Jewess in LXX v. 22; in the body of the narrative Daniel is known as “the youth” four times in the LXX (vv. 44, 52, 55, 60), while Theodotion uses this appellation only once (v. 45); on two occasions the LXX emphasizes that the elders were judges (vv. 29, 34), where Theodotion simply designates them as elders (see Engel). This contrast between the two protagonists in the LXX is sharply sketched in a clause in v. 52, a clause not found in Theodotion, “and they led the elder to the youth,” and is continued in the LXX's conclusion, where stress is placed on the importance of youths in the Jewish community. At the very spot where the Jewish community met, the synagogue, the LXX contrasts the officials of that community, the elder-judges, with the youth, and the faithful Jewess with the perverted leaders. Theodotion has softened this contrast so that it is more a story of a particular attempt by two wicked elders against an individual woman who was saved by a young man, Daniel.

Religious Significance

The narrative can be compared to stories in other cultures concerning an innocent woman falsely accused (see Thompson, motif K2112) and a clever young man (see Thompson, motif J1140–50). The Jewish author has employed such a formula to convey his own particular message.

In the LXX version of the story the leaders of the people are contrasted with the youth to whom a spirit of insight has been given (v. 45). While Theodotion speaks of God rousing the Holy Spirit already in the youth, the LXX has an angel injecting the Spirit into the youth. The leaders of the people are viewed with suspicion. As the statement in v. 51b (found only in the LXX) indicates, one should not believe the elders simply because they are elders. Insight belongs not by right to those in authority; it is given. The conclusion, formulated to draw the moral of the story, states that the education of youths is to be carefully guarded—they will live reverently and a spirit of insight will be in them. Such a conclusion seems an attempt to assert control over the youths, for the thrust of the story itself leads in the opposite direction, to a critique of institutional authority and a distinction between institutional office and the spirit of insight.

In the Theodotonic version the description of the two evil men as members of a larger group of elders who held their position as judges for that year does away with the sharp contrast developed by the LXX. The elders are simply two wicked men who happen to be elders, not the only leaders of the community. The fuller description of Susanna and her family heightens the sense that this is a narrative about one event that occurred, not a caution against institutional office as such. Susanna becomes a model of piety in the face of coercion to act wickedly, and the story serves to explain how Daniel rose to prominence among the exiled Jewish community (v. 64).

Original Language

The Susanna narrative has not been found among the Qumran fragments of Daniel, and there are no external criteria for claiming that the Greek Susanna is a translation of a Semitic original, whether Hebrew or Aramaic. One argument for the originality of the Greek version is the existence of the puns based on Greek in vv. 54–55. But a Greek translator could have made such puns in Greek because there were puns in the Semitic original, just as English translators of the Greek text try to do. The Greek contains many Semitisms, however, and most scholars have concluded that there was an original Semitic version of the Susanna story.

A secondary question, given the differences between the LXX and Theodotion, is whether Theodotion is a revision of the LXX, or whether there were two Semitic texts, one behind the LXX and another behind Theodotion. To such questions no certain answer is possible, but the neater solution is, I believe, not to multiply nonextant Semitic originals unless absolutely necessary.

Date and Setting

If there was an original Semitic narrative, it must predate the LXX translation of Daniel, that is, predate 100 B.C. It has been suggested that the suspicious attitude toward authority figures within the Jewish community in the LXX might provide a clue to the date. But one should remember that stories poking fun at authority figures are always popular, as are stories of beautiful virtuous maidens saved from lecherous leaders. Dating of such stories must always remain surmise.

COMMENTARY

1-6, Introduction. In the Theodotionic version, these verses introduce readers to the actors and the scene of the narrative, the house of Joakim. Joakim's wealth and prominence in the community are stressed. While Susanna receives social standing only as the wife of the rich Joakim, Theodotion emphasizes her piety and her instruction in the law of Moses.

That the LXX begins with v. 5b has been persuasively argued recently by Engel from the evidence of certain Greek manuscripts and the Syriac version. In the LXX, vv. 5b-6 act as a titular description of the narrative and underscore what was said above about the narrative as a critique of authority.

The quotation of God's word in v. 5b is problematic. It is not even certain how far the quotation extends, though the citation is probably "Lawlessness came forth from Babylon." This saying is not found in the MT or LXX, although the form of the saying is common: from x will come y, as, for example, in Isa. 2:3; 45:23; 51:4; Jer. 1:14; 23:15.

The Attempted Seduction and Trial of Susanna

The two main parts of this section in Theodotion are vv. 7-27 and vv. 28-41. In v. 7 the people leave Joakim's house; in v. 28 they return. The first part divides into three acts: vv. 7-14, the growing passion of the elders; vv. 15-18, the opportunity while Susanna wishes to bathe; vv. 19-27, the confrontation and propositioning of Susanna.

The LXX also divides into two parts, although here the division is marked not by the crowd's return to the house but by a change of scene to the synagogue of the city (v. 28b). The first part has two acts: vv. 7-10 describe the sudden infatuation of the two elders; vv. 12-28, the sexual harassment of Susanna.

7-27, The Attempted Seduction. The narrative in Theodotion develops skillfully. Readers sense how the elders' day-after-day glimpse of the beautiful Susanna strolling carefree in the lush garden gradually changes to a desire to view her and finally to passion; how that passion at first shames but then bonds them in a conspiracy for both to have their way with her. The author heightens the sensuality with the evocation of the beautiful maiden bathing in the heat of the day, a motif found in the Bathsheba incident at 2 Sam. 11:2, and the elaboration, found in Jub. 33:2 and T. Reub. 3:10-4:1, of Reuben's sleeping with Jacob's concubine Bilhah. The innocence of Susanna is underlined, as it is said twice that the elders were hidden and unseen.

The climax is the confrontation of the two elders with Susanna. Moore emphasizes that the demand of v. 20 ("Let us have you") is an "indelicate Greek expression for sexual intercourse," and the elders' coarse speech contrasts with their more dignified language before the people at vv. 37-38. The heightened psychological description in Theodotion continues as Susanna groans (v. 22). Her screams show her to be true to the Mosaic law of Deut. 22:24. The scene of the screaming maiden, the shouting elders, and the running servants occurs only in Theodotion.

The LXX narrative is more restrained and less developed as a story. Susanna is described as an elegant woman, and the names of her husband and father are given, both to increase the sense of her social propriety and to stress the impropriety of the elders as they act against "the wife of their brother of the sons of Israel" (v. 7). Their desire appears in the LXX as a result of a chance meeting, not as a gradual development. The innocence of Susanna in all this is stated—she does not know what has happened.

The scene shifts to the very next day, as the two elders try to beat each other out like two lovesick adolescents. One elder interrogates the other, and then both confess (vv. 13-14). The use of legal terminology is nicely ironic. Instead of confession leading to repentance, they bond together against the innocent woman and try to rape her. The Greek term ekbiazesthai in v. 19 reflects the case law of Deut. 22:25-28 and indicates how the elders are breaking the law. Susanna's speech echoes the response of Joseph to Potiphar's wife in Gen. 39:9, as well as the words of David in 2 Sam. 24:14 and the martyred brothers in 2 Maccabees 7. The emotional scene in Theodotion vv. 24-27 is missing: in the LXX the elders slink away threatening revenge for their rebuff.

28-41 (Theodotion; 28b-41, LXX), The Trial. In Theodotion the trial takes place at the house of Joakim. The inner psychology of the two elders is given, both in their vicious desire to have Susanna killed (v. 28) as well as in their desire to see her beauty (v. 32). The inner emotions of Susanna are depicted (v. 35) and also the outward show of emotion by her household (v. 33). Theodotion emphasizes the beauty of Susanna but tones down the LXX account and has only Susanna's veil lifted, as in the ordeal of the suspected adulteress in Num. 5:11-31. The ritual of the laying on of hands (v. 34) follows that of Lev. 24:14 against the man who blasphemes. The exact meaning of the ritual is debated, but the community, through the witnesses, is physically pressing the communal uncleanness that has resulted from the breakdown of social order onto the sinner and then expelling/exterminating that ritual impurity from its midst. The outward ritual act contrasts strikingly with the inner purity of Susanna. But the combined word of the elders (vv. 36-40) carries weight, and Susanna is condemned to death.

The LXX shifts the scene to the city synagogue, and the authoritative position of the two sinners is stressed. To the synagogue comes the whole household of Susanna. The refinement of Susanna contrasts with the lust of the elders who order her to be uncovered. The LXX does not specify, as does Theodotion, that this refers only to her head, and Zimmermann draws attention to the discussion of the ordeal of the suspected adulteress in m. Sofā 1:5, where the priest was not only to loosen her hair, as in Num. 5:11-31, but to tear her garments so that he lay bare her bosom. Both ritual ordeals, however, were to apply only if there were no witnesses. In its narrative context this action of the elders serves only to shame Susanna and treat her as a harlot (Hos. 2:10; Ezek. 16:37-39) before the actual trial is over.

The LXX places the prayer of Susanna and the positive response of God before the false testimony of the elders. To a certain extent this diminishes the drama of the narrative. The false witness of the two elders in the LXX is almost self-incriminatory as they reveal themselves to be voyeurs of the alleged criminal act.

The Clever Young Man

With the condemnation pronounced against her, all seems over for Susanna. But a new actor, God, enters the scene and he uses as his agent the young man Daniel. The name Daniel, "My Judge is God" (Heb.; → Daniel), is most apt, as Daniel both defends the innocent and corrects a perversion of justice.

The method Daniel uses to uncover the truth is the separate cross-examination of witnesses. Thus the narrative contrasts the evil elders who relied on their authority with the clever judge, Daniel. Such contrast is a motif found frequently in folk literature (see Thompson, motif J1141.3; 1153).

Daniel separates himself from the previous procedure. His intervention is similar to that demanded by m. Sanh. 6:1-2 whereby, when a person is being led out to be stoned, a herald must call out his crime and request that anyone who could show the criminal's innocence step forward. Daniel himself demands a careful examination as required by Deut. 19:16-21 (cf. Deut. 13-14; 17:4). Since the community has not followed such procedure, Daniel can call them foolish, lacking Torah wisdom. The wisdom of Daniel is further demonstrated by his ability with words, as he puns the responses of the two elders (vv. 54 and 58).

The death of the elders follows the principle of retribution of Deut. 19:18-21 and is in line with what the rabbis later claim was the Pharisaic interpretation of the law, that false witnesses should be killed even if the falsely accused had not been executed. The Sadducees held a more lenient position (m. Mak. 1:6).

This section in the LXX is clearly marked off from the previous narrative by the exclamatory "And behold" as well as by the appearance of the new actor, the angel. The major differences in this passage between the two versions have already been noted in the introduction.

When Daniel interrogates the second elder, the LXX reads, "Why was your seed corrupted like that of Sidon and not of Judah?" Sidon is the son of Canaan (Gen. 10:15) and, in the Table of Nations, Sidon's descendants would seem to include Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 10:19).

As the LXX in v. 7 had noted the family aspect of the sin—Susanna was the wife of their brother—so at the end the LXX notes how the elders were punished as they had intended to do to their sister (v. 62). The LXX details the punishment: "They judged them to be false witnesses, led them off, and threw them into a ravine. Then the angel of the Lord threw fire through their midst." The evildoers are taken outside the city to be stoned (see m. Sanh. 6:4). The combination of stoning and fire is found also in the punishment of Achan (Josh. 7:25). Here the angel takes part in the punishment as if it were one of the community as the people are purified of the evil in their midst.

The Epilogue

Theodotion provides a happy ending, as befits the way the author has fashioned the narrative as exemplar, while the LXX draws a lesson for readers.

Bel and the Dragon

INTRODUCTION

Comparison of the Septuagint and Theodotion

Bel and the Dragon deals with the clever success of Daniel at court and with the danger that success brought him. Daniel shows his superiority by exposing as nongods what the Babylonians and their king worship—a statue of Bel and a snake/dragon.

The two Greek versions tell substantially the same story, but details vary; for example, in v. 11 in Theodotion the priests suggest the procedures to follow, while in the LXX Daniel does so. The main difference is, as noted in the General Introduction above, the way Theodotion has integrated this story with MT Daniel. The LXX begins its account as if readers knew nothing about the Daniel of this narrative: "There was a certain man, a priest whose name was Daniel, son of Abal, a confidant of the king of Babylon." These details about this Daniel do not contradict anything readers of LXX Daniel previously knew. It is surprising, however, to be given such genealogical details at the beginning of this narrative. It is as though one were introducing Daniel for the first time, a Daniel different from the Daniel of chaps. 1–12. A priest named Daniel is known to have returned from the exile in Babylon (Ezra 8:2; Neh. 10:6). As noted above, the LXX Susanna is a story of how God gives insight to youths, not a narrative showing how the young Daniel came to be well known among the people. As Susanna comes after Bel and the Dragon in the LXX, the young Daniel in the LXX would again be differentiated from the priest and confidant of the king of Babylon. These two narratives in the LXX are clearly marked off from the Daniel of MT Daniel, while Theodotion has integrated them to provide a fitting beginning and end to the career of Daniel.

Another marked difference between the two versions is the identification of the Habakkuk of the story. The Theodotonic version clearly designates him as "the prophet Habakkuk in Judea" (v. 33). There is no such identification in the LXX: Habakkuk is simply someone taking a bowl of stew and a jug of wine out to the harvesters (v. 33). The narrator does not say whether he is in Judea or in the Babylonian countryside. Theodotion has neatly tied Bel and the Dragon to biblical literature, identifying an unknown character as a known prophet.

Narrative Structure

The narrative has been nicely welded together into a single plot. The LXX and Theodotion use different connectives, but in both versions the narrative coheres. The major actors remain the same throughout—Daniel, the king, and the Babylonians. Both Bel and the snake are characterized as objects that the Babylonians worship (vv. 3, 23). After the snake is destroyed, all those from the region (LXX v. 23; Theodotion: "the Babylonians") came against Daniel to complain that the king had become a Jew, had overthrown Bel, and had killed the snake. The story of the threat to Daniel's life is thus strongly connected with the preceding narrative. The king's first confession of Bel's greatness (v. 18) and his final confession of Daniel's God (v. 41) use almost exactly the same formulas, even though LXX and Theodotion offer minor differences. This repetition is highly significant and helps unite the narrative. The LXX further connects the two episodes by the phrase "in that place" in v. 23, but also by developing the motif of eating. This motif dominates the Bel episode (vv. 7, 8, 9, 11, 15, 17, 21). In the snake episode the king claims, "You cannot say he is bronze. Look, he lives and eats and drinks." Daniel then destroys the snake by offering it fatal food (v. 23). In the Theodotonic version the connection is made through the notion of life: Daniel worships the living God (v. 5), while Bel is not a living God (v. 6); the king asserts that Daniel cannot say that the snake is not a living God (v. 24), but Daniel insists that it is his God who lives (v. 25). The links between all the episodes in both versions are so pervasive that the narrative must be seen to be a whole. Such stories, of course, could theoretically have existed independently, but there is no evidence that they did.

Structurally, the narrative has the same basic organization as that found in Daniel 6:

	Daniel	LXX
High Status of Daniel	6:1–3	1–27
Threat to Status	6:4–18	28–33
Deliverance	6:19–22	34–41
Status Restored	6:23–28	42

Both are stories of conflict, but different emphases are important. Daniel 6 pays little attention to the details of how Daniel achieved his high status, while that is precisely the emphasis in Bel and the Dragon. In this story, by using the narrative form of the success of the clever courtier the author shows how Daniel rose in status. Daniel solves two problems: if Bel does not eat, who does? Is the snake's eating and drinking a proof of divinity? In the first incident Daniel cleverly traps the priests through the use of ashes; in the second, he makes a special mixture in the form of barley cakes that he feeds to the snake, which then dies. This narrative form recalls that of Daniel 2, where Daniel rises in status through his interpretation of the king's dream (see 2:46-49). In Bel and the Dragon Daniel's rise in status is most clearly seen in the LXX, where Daniel receives control over the priests of Bel and is given the provisions normally given to the temple, no small gift. After Daniel destroys the snake, however, the description of success is not given, and immediately the narrative moves to the threat against Daniel. This sequence shows the close coherence of the narrative as a whole, which combines two genres kept distinct in the narratives of Daniel 1-6: the success of the wise courtier and the court conflict.

But this narrative really does not concern the court at all, except peripherally as Daniel is a confidant of the king. It is the Babylonians who revere Bel and the snake (vv. 3, 23) and who initiate the action against Daniel. That the narrative has its origins in a court conflict narrative, however, is betrayed by its ending. The author follows what usually happens in court conflict stories and has those who plotted Daniel's destruction thrown to the lions (v. 42). Properly, this should mean all the inhabitants of the region (LXX), all the Babylonians (Theodotion). Bel and the Dragon is not really a court conflict. It is a conflict between Daniel and the Babylonians as such.

The choice of Bel and the snake was not capricious. Bel was the titular god of Babylon, Marduk, who is portrayed in the Enuma Elish as the one who brings order out of chaos. He battled against Tiamat, leader of the forces of chaos (→ Tiamat). Scholars have questioned whether living snakes were ever worshiped in Babylon, and some have suggested that Bel and the Dragon must have been written in Egypt against active Egyptian zoolatry. But such theories have too constrictive a view of the relationship between an author's characters and the author's historical environment. Tiamat was portrayed iconographically as a dragonlike or snakelike figure in the battle between herself and Marduk. The author of Bel and the Dragon is in fact poking fun at the two main characters of the Babylonian creation myth, the Enuma Elish. Opposed to this mythology is the God of Daniel, who created heaven and earth and who has authority over all humanity (v. 5).

Original Language and Setting

There are linguistic hints that both the LXX and Theodotion are translations of Hebrew. Moore, however, notes the difficulties of deciding between Hebrew and Aramaic and suggests that the stories were originally composed in Aramaic, but that Theodotion was based on a Hebrew translation of the Aramaic. Such a theory seems overly complex.

The story must have been written by the date of the Greek translation of Daniel (ca. 100 B.C.). Otherwise there are few clues as to the date. Conflict stories in which an oppressed people poke fun at their oppressors can arise at any time. The narrative clearly functions to bolster Jewish identity and self-esteem vis-à-vis their oppressors and symbolically destroys them. As Judea was part of the Babylonian and later Persian empires, and as officials of those empires were known in Judea, this parody could have been written anywhere in the empire.

COMMENTARY

---

1-2

Introduction

In the LXX stress is laid on the priesthood of Daniel, an indication that this story will be about religious competition. LXX also provides a genealogy: Daniel is the son of Abal. Scholars have tried to ascertain what the Hebrew name would be and have suggested Hebel, Abiel, or Habal.

Theodotion provides a historical introduction to the story. According to Herodotus, Cyrus was the maternal grandson of Astyages of Media, whose kingdom he took by force (Herodotus, History 1.107, 130). Cyrus issued the edict of 538 B.C. that allowed Jews to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the Temple (→ Cyrus). Theodotion emphasizes the important position of Daniel: he is distinguished above all the king's friends, as in MT Daniel 6:4.

The Idol Bel

3-7, The Problem. Herodotus (History 1.183) speaks of a golden statue of Bel in Babylon that was 18 feet high. In Bel and the Dragon, Bel's statue is of clay and bronze, two of the elements mentioned in the vision of Dan. 2:32-33. The amount of food supplied to Bel each day is immense: besides the twelve bushels of finest flour, Theodotion reads forty sheep and some fifty gallons of wine, whereas the LXX has four sheep and some fifty gallons of oil.

The contrast between the king and Daniel is set forth in v. 4. The reverence of Cyrus for Bel is known from an inscription in which Cyrus claims that Marduk (= Bel) brought him to power in Babylon; Cyrus wished to be known as "Cyrus, the king who worships you [Marduk]."

8-15, The Test. The king angrily takes the debate a perilous step further with the threat of death. Theodotion characterizes the charge against Daniel as one of blasphemy (v. 9), whereas the LXX simply states the charge that Daniel said Bel did not eat what was offered to him. The LXX has Daniel involve Bel's attendants in the threat.

At this point the stories are told differently in the LXX and Theodotion. Theodotion has the priests come forward confidently and suggest the conditions of the test, and then provides the reason for their confidence, the secret entrances. Daniel scatters the ashes in the king's presence, and so readers can already surmise what is going to happen. The suspense is taken away. In the LXX, on the other hand, Daniel tells the king to seal the doors and, without the king's knowledge, has ashes scattered on the floor. Readers wonder what will happen.

16-22, The Solution. In LXX the king's reaction to seeing the seals intact is quite understandable, as he was not privy to Daniel's stratagem. In Theodotion, to the contrary, the king behaves rather foolishly, as he should have first checked the ashes. In the LXX Daniel cleverly deduces by means of the footprints how the priests could enter and shows the secret entrances to the king, whereas Theodotion has the priests show them to the king.

In Theodotion the king kills the priests, but it is Daniel who destroys the statue of Bel and its temple. In the LXX the king hands over the priests to Daniel (as slaves?), gives Daniel the temple's provisions, and himself destroys the statue of Bel. Theodotion thus emphasizes the complete destruction of the temple and its functionaries as well as Daniel's role in it. The LXX, on the other hand, points out the financial reward of Daniel. The role of the king in the LXX is consonant with the complaint of the crowd in v. 28, whereas the one in Theodotion is at odds with it.

The Snake

23-27, The Killing of the Snake. Daniel seems to have set himself an impossible task as he proposes to kill the great snake/dragon without the help of sword (LXX: "implement of iron") or rod. Such conditions only enhance Daniel's cleverness. In the LXX the king stresses that the snake eats, so Daniel makes something for him to eat. The mixture Daniel concocts does not sound too appetizing, but as every good chef knows, presentation is everything, and Daniel displays it in the form of barley cakes. When Daniel throws them to the greedy snake, it eats and bursts apart. Daniel rubs in his success with a rhetorical question in the LXX, "It is not this that you worship, O king, is it?"

28-32, The Conflict. Daniel's success over the snake does not lead to a reward but to conflict. All the people of the country are convinced that the king has become a Jew. The king is shown in a very bad light as he caves in to the demands of the crowd. The conflict is not between Daniel and the king but has been raised to the level of Jew versus Babylonian. Daniel is put in a pit again, as in Daniel 6. The LXX specifies that the pit was for conspirators against the king. There must have been many to keep up the rations of two condemned persons per day. Theodotion stresses that food was kept from the lions so that they would devour Daniel. The LXX explicitly notes the improper behavior of the Babylonians as they are said not to want to give Daniel burial, the greatest dishonor one could show.

33-39, Salvation. The major differences in the Habakkuk episode were noted in the Introduction above. A strong argument can be made that in the LXX the Habakkuk incident is an insertion, as there is a strange repetition between v. 38 and the end of v. 39. In v. 38, after Habakkuk has brought him food, Daniel prays, "The Lord God remembered me, he who does not desert those who love him." At the end of v. 39, after Daniel has eaten and the angel has returned Habakkuk back to his place, the text reads, "The Lord God remembered Daniel." If one were to leave out the Habakkuk incident, the text would run smoothly "And Daniel was in the pit six days [v. 32b]. But the Lord God remembered Daniel [v. 39b]. Later the king went out to mourn Daniel and, peeking into the pit, he saw him sitting." One suspects that originally there was no miraculous description, simply the assertion that God remembered and saved Daniel.

Theodotion has smoothed out the story to accommodate the Habakkuk episode: there is no second mention of God's remembering Daniel. The incongruity still stands, but in both versions God's care for his followers is stressed. Theodotion simply heightens the miraculous by having the angel give Habakkuk a round-trip journey from Judea to Babylon in one day.

40-42, Conclusion. The story climaxes in the confession of the king and the restored high status of Daniel as his enemies are eaten by the still hungry lions. That Theodotion has the king confess the God of Daniel recalls the confession of Darius in Dan. 6:26. It goes further, however, in Bel and the Dragon, as the king also confesses that there is no other besides God, a clear reversal of the king's previous attachment to Bel in v. 18.

PRAYER OF MANASSEH

DANIEL J. HARRINGTON

INTRODUCTION

The Prayer of Manasseh contains an invocation of God (vv. 1–7), a confession of sins (vv. 8–10), and a petition for forgiveness (vv. 11–15). It uses many biblical phrases, apparently according to the Septuagint (LXX) version, and stands in line with the conventions of postexilic Jewish prayer. Its key descriptions of God as “the God of the righteous” (v. 8) and “the God of those who repent” (v. 13), while not explicitly biblical phrases, serve to capture the basic spirit of the prayer.

The Prayer of Manasseh was most likely composed in Greek. This position is supported by its author's apparent acquaintance with the LXX, the occurrence of some Greek words that are unusual in translations from the Hebrew, and a few strange Greek constructions. Several phrases, however, preserve the flavor of a Semitic composition.

Even though the work was not part of the LXX, it is customarily included in editions of the Greek Bible immediately after the Psalms and under the heading “Odes.” Thus it appears in two Greek uncial manuscripts of the LXX, (Alexandrinus and Turicensis; → Texts, Versions, Manuscripts, Editions). It is also preserved in the Apostolic Constitutions and Didascalia, early church manuals from the third and fourth centuries A.D. The most important versions are the Syriac and the Latin.

Manasseh was king of Judah from 698 to 642 B.C. According to 2 Kings 21:1–18, Manasseh was a wicked king, especially because he introduced foreign cults into Jerusalem and Judah, even to the extent of setting up the graven image of Asherah in the Jerusalem Temple (see 2 Kings 21:7). He is also said to have shed much innocent blood (see 21:16). Nevertheless, Manasseh had the long reign of fifty-five years (see 21:1).

A different portrait of Manasseh appears in 2 Chron. 33:1–20. After describing the wicked deeds done by Manasseh (vv. 2–9), the Chronicler states that he was captured by the Assyrians and taken off into exile in Babylon (vv. 10–11). In his distress, Manasseh sought God's favor, humbled himself, and prayed to God. The result of his prayer was that God heard his prayer and restored him to his kingdom in Jerusalem (vv. 12–13). Then Manasseh embarked on a program of restoring proper worship to Jerusalem (vv. 14–17). The concluding summary of his life (vv. 18–20) claims that “his prayer” is written in both the “Chronicles of the Kings of Israel” and the “Chronicles of Hozai (or, the Seers).”

The Prayer of Manasseh purports to be the prayer uttered by Manasseh according to 2 Chron. 33:12–13 and preserved in two chronicles. Since the earliest evidence for the present text comes from the third century A.D., and the prayer was probably composed in Greek, we are most likely dealing with a pseudepigraphical work produced under Manasseh's name many centuries after his death. Since there are no discernible Christian elements, it was probably composed by a Greek-speaking Jew. It is not impossible, however, that a Christian author putting himself in Manasseh's position could have written this Jewish prayer. The author's use of phrases from the LXX suggests a date for the original composition around the turn of the era, though there is no further precision on this matter.

The major theological themes of the Prayer of Manasseh are the mercy of God and the power of repentance. The God of Israel's ancestors, who is also the Creator and Sustainer, is addressed as “compassionate, long-suffering, and very merciful” (v. 7). Because he repents over the evils done by human beings (v. 7), he can be said to have established repentance for sinners (v. 8) and can be addressed as the “God of those who repent” (v. 13).

Manasseh presents himself as the worst of sinners. Thus the clear message is that, if God accepts Manasseh's prayer (see 2 Chron. 33:13), repentance is possible for any sinner. God's reception of Manasseh's repentance serves to display publicly the mercy and goodness of God (see vv. 11, 14).

Although considered authoritative by Eastern Orthodox churches, the Prayer of Manasseh is not considered canonical by Jews, Protestants, or Roman Catholics. Since the Council of Trent, the Latin translation of it is placed in an appendix to the Latin Bible. The original author apparently composed it to fill the gap created by the statement in 2 Chron. 33:18–20 that Manasseh's Prayer had been preserved in two chronicles. In carrying out this exercise, he produced a prayer treasured by many readers for its theology of repentance.

COMMENTARY

1-7, Invocation. Manasseh begins the prayer by addressing God directly and reflecting on the attributes of God. The customary references to the "Lord Almighty" as Israel's God and the Creator give way to reflection on God's mercy shown in forgiving sinners. The invocation provides the reason why Manasseh may approach God with his confession. The traditional invocation of the "God of our fathers" (see Exod. 3:6, 15; 4:5; 1 Chron. 29:18) is given a twist with the phrase "and of their righteous offspring," suggesting a division within the descendants of the patriarchs between the righteous and the unrighteous (see Tob. 13:9, 13; Rom. 9:6). With his prayer, Manasseh wishes to align himself with the righteous in Israel.

The naming of God in v. 1 is followed in vv. 2-3 by an account of what God has done in creation, described in three participial clauses: "who made . . . who shackled . . . who closed . . . and sealed." The description of God's making heaven and earth (see Gen. 1:1; 2:1) is modified by the phrase "with all their order" (see Gen. 2:1, LXX). Shackling the sea (v. 3) is an act attributed to God also in Job 38:8, 10, 11 and Ps. 104:7, 9. The "abyss" is the "deep" of the creation account (see Gen. 1:2; 7:11; 8:2), the subterranean watery region beneath the earth. The agents by which God works ("by your word of command . . . by your fearsome and glorious name") presuppose the ancient Near Eastern idea of the active force of words and names.

Fear and trembling is the response to the Creator on the part of all created things (v. 4). The Semitic idiom "from the face of your power" could be translated either "because of your power" or "before whose power." In vv. 5-6 the theme of awe in response to God is developed by linking divine attributes and somewhat unusual adjectives beginning with the so-called alpha-privative (i.e., the Greek letter alpha used as a negative particle): the majesty of God's glory (see Ps. 144:5, 12, LXX) is unendurable; the wrath of his threat toward sinners is irresistible; and the mercy of his promise is infinite and unsearchable. The "mercy of his promise" probably refers to God's promise to forgive sinners when they repent. Thus Manasseh goes beyond the fascinating and fear-some aspect of the divine mystery and arrives at the chief theme of his prayer—God's willingness to forgive repenting sinners.

The invocation concludes in v. 7 with an appeal to God's mercy. After a series of adjectives ("compassionate, long-suffering, and very merciful") based on Joel 2:13 (LXX), Manasseh echoes the final phrase of Joel 2:13 (LXX) when he describes God as "repenting over the evils of human beings." Although in Joel the "evils" refer to the calamities that came upon Israel because of its sins, here the evils are the apostasies committed by King Manasseh (see 2 Kings 21:1-9; 2 Chron. 33:1-9). The prayer assumes that God will pardon those evil deeds in merciful response to sincere repentance. The second half of v. 7 is absent from the two Greek manuscripts. It was very likely part of the original text and lost accidentally in the textual transmission. The line serves to draw the invocation to a close and to focus on that aspect of God to which the following confession of sin and request for forgiveness of sins are directed.

8-10, Confession. Next, Manasseh accuses himself of his many sins, especially as they related to fostering foreign cults and neglecting the Jerusalem Temple (see 2 Kings 21:1-18; 2 Chron. 33:1-9). The confession proper begins in v. 8 by invoking the Lord as "the God of the righteous," an epithet without biblical foundation but one that allows Manasseh to approach God in spite of his admitted sinfulness. The God of the righteous established repentance not for the righteous patriarchs who did not sin against him but precisely for a sinner like Manasseh. The sinfulness of Manasseh is emphasized by his description of himself as "the sinner." While the Hebrew Bible does not describe the patriarchs in the same terms as Manasseh does, the portrayal of them in Genesis certainly contrasts with what is said of Manasseh in 2 Kings 21:1-9 and 2 Chron. 33:1-9. The contrast between the righteous and the sinners with respect to repentance appears in several Gospel sayings (see Mark 2:17 and parallels; Luke 15:7; 18:13). The sins of Manasseh, which are described in 2 Kings 21:1-18 and 2 Chron. 33:1-9, mainly concerned what was perceived as encouraging foreign cults and idol worship ("according to the abominable practices of the nations," see 2 Chron. 33:2).

Describing his sins as "beyond the number of the sand of the sea" (v. 9), Manasseh hesitates to approach God in prayer. The "height of heaven" refers to God's throne (see Isa. 38:14). The Syriac version adds the following to the verse: "And now Lord, I have been justly put down and deservedly afflicted." This verse allows a smoother transition to v. 10 and is probably original.

The description of Manasseh as weighed down with "many an iron chain" in v. 10 derives from 2 Chron. 33:11 ("bound him with bronze fetters"). The translation of the following phrase is problematic: whereas the RSV reads "so that I am rejected," most other translations render the phrase as a description of Manasseh's not being able to lift up his head. There is manuscript evidence for an additional phrase ("not doing your will and keeping your commandments") between "in thy sight" and "setting up abominations," but most interpreters dismiss it as a gloss.

11-15, Petition. The petition for forgiveness, for which the invocation and confession have prepared, calls upon "the God of those who repent" to forgive sins. Manasseh promises to spend all his days in praising God. Manasseh's petition for forgiveness begins in v. 11 by appealing to God's goodness. The image of bending "the knee of the heart" indicates that his prayer comes from deep within him and is made with full consciousness (see Joel 2:13: "rend your hearts and not your garments"). The petition is based on Manasseh's dramatic admission of his sinfulness in v. 12: "I have sinned, Lord, I have sinned, and I myself recognize my iniquities." This emphatic statement summarizes what has been said previously about Manasseh's sins and prepares for the prayer that follows.

The repetitive "forgive me, Lord, forgive me" in v. 13 balances "I have sinned, Lord, I have sinned" in the preceding verse. Manasseh trusts that God will not destroy him along with his iniquities, store up memory of his evils forever, or condemn him to Sheol (see Ps. 63:9). The "lowest parts of the earth" are not so much a region of torment as they are a place of separation from God (see Ps. 88:5-6). His prayer appeals to the Lord as "the God of those who repent." Like the epithet "the God of the righteous" in v. 8, it is not a biblical expression, but it does capture the spirit of Manasseh's prayer as a whole.

According to v. 14, God's answering Manasseh's prayer will be a display of the divine goodness and mercy, because all recognize Manasseh's unworthiness. The salvation envisioned by Manasseh involved release from captivity and restoration in Jerusalem (see 2 Chron. 33:12-13). Manasseh's resolve to praise God always in v. 15 probably alludes to his zeal in driving out foreign cults and restoring the worship of Yahweh after his return to Jerusalem (see 2 Chron. 33:15-17). He envisions a oneness between the worship on earth and the worship offered to God by the entire host of the heavens. The prayer ends with a doxology (see 1 Chron. 29:11) and an "Amen" (see 1 Chron. 16:36; Tob. 8:8; 1 Cor. 14:16).

1 MACCABEES

LAWRENCE H. SCHIFFMAN

INTRODUCTION

Title and Original Language

It is generally agreed that the First Book of Maccabees was originally written in Hebrew. Even though no manuscripts or fragments still exist in Hebrew, the Greek text of 1 Maccabees has the unmistakable style of a rather literal translation from the Hebrew. Moreover, the church father Origen (third century A.D.) claimed that the Hebrew title of 1 Maccabees was Sarbethsabaniel. This puzzling title is difficult to interpret but may be a somewhat corrupt rendering of Hebrew sar bet 'el ("Prince of the House of God") or of sar bet sabanai 'el ("Book of the House of the Resisters of God"). Most Greek manuscripts simply term the books of 1 and 2 Maccabees Makkabaion A and Makkabaion B. By the second century A.D. Ta Makkabaika ("The things Maccabean" or "Maccabean Histories") was the designation for both 1 and 2 Maccabees. The early church father Clement of Alexandria (second century A.D.) termed 1 Maccabees to Biblion ton Makkabaikon ("The Book of Things Maccabean") and 2 Maccabees he ton Makkabaikon epitome ("The Epitome of Things Maccabean"). Although "Maccabee" (meaning "hammer") was originally the nickname of the hero Judah, the use of the title "Maccabean Histories" led to the custom of referring to all of the heroes of the book as "Maccabees."

Circulation

1 Maccabees was not only composed in Hebrew, but it was also written in a style imitating that of biblical historiography. Translated into Greek, 1 Maccabees was known to the first-century A.D. Jewish historian Josephus, who used it as the basis of his account in the Antiquities of the Jews. It is possible that the last two chapters of 1 Maccabees were not available to Josephus, since he seems to lack adequate sources for the reign of Simon. The Greek translation was included in the Hellenistic canon of the Greek-speaking Jews, and, therefore, eventually in the canon of the Christian church. In this manner it was preserved. Knowledge of this book was widespread among the church fathers. Yet the contents of 1 Maccabees began to circulate among Jews only in the Middle Ages, indirectly through the Latin translation. Our book, like 2 Maccabees, must be sharply distinguished from the medieval Jewish composition Megillat Antiochus ("Scroll of Antiochus") or Megillat Hashmonim ("Scroll of the Hasmoneans"), first mentioned by the Jewish scholar Saadia Gaon (A.D. 882–942).

Manuscript evidence for 1 Maccabees is also widespread, although the book is absent from the Codex Vaticanus. The most important manuscript witnesses are Codex Sinaiticus (fourth century A.D.), Alexandrinus (fifth century A.D.), and Venetus (eighth century A.D.).

Contents

1 Maccabees presents an account of the history of Judea from 175 to 134 B.C. It describes the background of the Maccabean revolt, the revolt itself, the exploits of Judah the Maccabee (in Gk. Judas Maccabeus), and the efforts of his brothers Jonathan and Simon to permanently reestablish Jewish nationalism and religious practice.

The author is clearly a believing Jew who emphasizes the piety of Judah's family, the Hasmoneans, and their trust in God. At the same time, he gives full credit for their success to their own sagacity and tenaciousness. The author seeks to highlight the excellence of the Hasmonean dynasty and in this respect may be seen as an official historian of the dynasty. He sees the Maccabees as emulating various biblical figures and presents a defense for the charismatic leadership the Hasmoneans provided. Judah's piety is especially emphasized in the prayers and speeches attributed to him. The author sees this family as specially selected by God to bring about the deliverance of Israel from the empire of the Seleucid kings.

Over and over the author emphasizes the antinomian character of the Jewish opponents of the Maccabees—they are "lawless men." All opponents of the Hasmoneans are seen as motivated only by the basest of motives and allied against the way of God's Torah.

Sources

Numerous documents are included in this work to prove the legitimacy of Hasmonean rule within the context of the Seleucid empire and contemporary international law. In addition, the author has included various poetic extracts that must come from poems that circulated in that period. Beyond this, the various theories regarding the sources of 1 Maccabees are speculative. (For additional discussion, see 2 Maccabees, "Introduction.")

The author of 1 Maccabees was certainly influenced by the style of the biblical historiographical books, especially the books of 1 and 2 Samuel. Judah's accomplishments are often described in ways evocative of the triumphs of Saul, Jonathan, and David. Like the historiographical books of the Bible, 1 Maccabees has a prominent chronological framework, though the dates are given in accord with the Seleucid era, which began with the capture of Babylon in 312 B.C. by the former general of Alexander the Great, Seleucus 1. As a source for reconstructing the events of the period, historians have generally held 1 Maccabees in high regard, considering it to be earlier and more trustworthy than 2 Maccabees. In certain respects, however, the evidence and approach of 2 Maccabees must be preferred. Specific instances will be discussed throughout the commentary. The author of 1 Maccabees appears to be quite familiar with the practices of the Seleucid empire. On the other hand, he seems to exaggerate numbers greatly and takes the opportunity, like all historians of his period, to place speeches of his own composition in the mouths of his heroes.

Date

Virtually all scholars take the view that the book had to have been written before the Roman conquest of Judea in 63 B.C., since the Romans are presented in 1 Maccabees as friends and allies of the Hasmoneans. The author's knowledge of the period of John Hyrcanus requires that he wrote not much before John's death in 104 B.C. The most probable date for the composition of 1 Maccabees, therefore, is the first decades of the first century B.C. Goldstein (pp. 62–64) dates the composition to the reign of Alexander Janneus (103–76 B.C.), but not later than 90 B.C.

Historical Background

Ptolemies and Seleucids. In the summer of 332 B.C., Palestine was conquered by Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.). The land and people of Israel were now part of the new Hellenistic world, the cultural fusion of Greek and Near Eastern traditions that developed in the lands conquered by Alexander and held by his successors. After Alexander's death in 323 B.C., his generals, known as the diadochi (Gk., "successors"), were unable to maintain the unity of the kingdom. Individual generals were appointed to rule as satraps over particular areas on the old Persian pattern but eventually came to rule in their own right. In 323 B.C., Ptolemy took control of Egypt and in 305 B.C. was officially crowned. Seleucus was made satrap of Babylon in 322 B.C. After some difficulties, he established himself and his empire on sound footing in 312 B.C. Seleucus extended his kingdom to the entire eastern part of the empire of Alexander. These two states, the Ptolemaic and the Seleucid, were destined to play a profound role in the history of Palestine in the Hellenistic era.

By 301, Ptolemy finally established his hold on Palestine, although Seleucus claimed legal title to the area. Consequently, during the third century B.C. Ptolemaic and Seleucid armies fought five times over Palestine. Despite heavy damage, the Ptolemies were able to maintain control over this territory. Ptolemaic military units were stationed throughout Palestine, and many Greek cities were established. An extensive officialdom sought to develop economic life and trade. Among the crops to be imported to Ptolemaic Egypt from Palestine and southern Syria were grain, olive oil, smoked fish, cheese, meat, dried figs, honey, and dates. Palestine also assumed importance as a crossroads for the spice trade.

At the same time, there is virtually no information from this century regarding Jewish political affairs. We do know that the high priest Onias II got into a disagreement regarding taxation with Ptolemy III Euergetes (246–221 B.C.), who was reputed to have visited the Jerusalem Temple. The result of the dispute was the imposition in 242 B.C. of the young Joseph son of Tobiah, a nephew of the high priest, as a tax collector for the entire nation. The rivalry between the Tobiad family and the Oniad high priests would eventually play a part in the attempts at radical hellenization of Judea later in the second century B.C.

In 221 B.C. the Seleucid king Antiochus III tried to invade Palestine. His initial attempts failed, but he persisted. The death of king Ptolemy IV Philopator in 204 B.C. opened the way for Antiochus III. In 201 B.C. he invaded the country again and quickly took it. By 198 the Seleucids had established firm control that would continue until the Maccabean revolt. By the time Ptolemaic rule came to an end in Palestine Hellenistic cities had been firmly established throughout the country. The process of Hellenism had sunk strong foundations that would ultimately tear the nation apart but also play a role in its renewed independence.

Hellenistic Reform and the Maccabean Revolt. Throughout the years of warfare between the Seleucids and Ptolemies, each empire had its supporters among the aristocracy of Jerusalem. When Seleucid rule finally became stabilized, the pro-Ptolemaic party was left disenfranchised. After his conquest, Antiochus III affirmed the right of the Jews to live according to their ancestral laws. The gerousia (Gk.), that is, the council of elders, and the high priest Simon II, emerged as supporters of the Seleucids. But Onias III, who followed his father Simon II as high priest, changed the direction of his foreign policy and became at least a covert supporter of the Ptolemies. This, in turn, led the pro-Seleucid party to denounce him to the current Seleucid ruler, Seleucus IV. In an effort to shore up his rule, Onias went to Antioch in 175 to meet with the king.

Seleucus IV died in 175 B.C. and was succeeded by the infamous Antiochus IV Epiphanes (reigned 175–164 B.C.). Onias did not convince him of his loyalty and was forced to remain in Antioch. Onias' brother Jason then bought the right to the high-priesthood from Antiochus, as well as the right to establish in Jerusalem a gymnasium and ephebeum, the central educational and cultural institutions of a Greek city. Jason thus refounded Jerusalem as a Hellenistic city, a polis. The right to live according to the Torah granted to the Judeans by Antiochus III was now rescinded. In its place, the Jews were to live under the law of the newly constituted Greek city. Among other changes, this meant that the majority of those who previously had had full rights under the laws of the Torah now found themselves as second-class citizens in an oligarchy. Athletic activities characteristic of Greek culture became prominent, and the gerousia was probably purged of those members who did not support this reform.

Jason's brand of hellenization was apparently not radical enough for some. As a member of a family that had been pro-Ptolemaic, he soon found himself opposed by the pro-Seleucid Tobiad family and by the three brothers Simon, Menelaus, and Lysimachus. The Tobiads plotted to replace Jason with Menelaus as high priest. In 172 B.C. Menelaus bought the office from Antiochus. After an armed battle, Jason was forced to flee Jerusalem. Menelaus, now in control, appropriated funds from the Temple treasury to present gifts to Antiochus.

This misappropriation and his not being of the Oniad family turned the people bitterly against Menelaus. Violence broke out in Jerusalem, and Lysimachus, who had been left in control while Menelaus was in Antioch, fell in battle. Despite an appeal from representatives of the gerousia to replace Menelaus, Antiochus allowed him to continue in office, and the representatives were executed. It was not long before popular discontent would become full-scale revolt under new leaders.

During 169 B.C., when Antiochus made an ultimately unsuccessful attempt to conquer Egypt, a false rumor of his death led Jason to leave his hiding place in Transjordan and assault the city. He succeeded in driving Menelaus and his supporters into the citadel. Yet Jason was not able to reassert his rule. Apparently, popular forces arose against him, remembering that he had started the Hellenistic reform, and forced him to flee the Holy City again. Despite a slaughter by Antiochus himself, insurrection continued in Jerusalem. Antiochus' general Appollonius tried to control matters by establishing a fortress, known as the Akra, at the center of the city, but this attempt led only to further popular opposition and to massive flight of Jews from the city, some having been dispossessed to make room for the garrison he stationed there.

It is possible that at this time foreign deities were introduced into the Temple, creating further friction. Earliest attempts at organized rebellion were probably led by the Hasidim, a group of pietists who abhorred the religious compromises in Hellenistic Jerusalem. To stem the rising rebellion, Antiochus initiated the famous persecutions, which, far from being the beginning of our story, came after years of struggle and insurrection, fueled by the attempt of Hellenistic Jews to foist their way of life on the entire nation of Israel. There is no evidence at all that Antiochus pursued a policy of hellenization anywhere else in his kingdom. Rather, he took up this banner in Judea for tactical reasons. For Antiochus, the way to defeat the rebels was by an onslaught against the forces that propelled them—the Torah, the commandments, and the culture of the Jewish people.

The persecutions were enacted in the winter of 167–166 B.C. Foreign idolatrous worship and cultic prostitution were introduced into the Temple in December of 167 B.C. The God of Israel was syncretistically identified with Olympian Zeus and the Syrian god Baal-shamem. Throughout Palestine, the Sabbath and festivals were to be violated. High places were built where unclean animals were to be offered. Circumcision and observance of dietary laws were outlawed. The penalty for violations of these ordinances was death. The stage was now set for the confrontation of two opposing forces, the Jewish people and the Seleucids. The appearance of the Hasmonean (Maccabean) family would ignite the flames of full-scale revolt.

We cannot be sure if the accounts describing the beginning of the revolt are historical. Nonetheless, the refusal of Mattathias the priest of Modein and of men and women like him to succumb to the persecutions soon led many to escape to the mountains. Several thousand soon coalesced around the Hasmonean family, Judah the Maccabee and his brothers. Together with elements of the Hasidim they began to take control of villages throughout the countryside.

According to 1 Maccabees, by the time of Mattathias' death in 166/165 B.C., they had already achieved considerable success.

Under Judah the Maccabee the Jewish armies defeated successive Seleucid generals who attempted to put down the uprising. Judah soon was master of the entire country. Menelaus and the Hellenizers sought a peaceful settlement, asking that the Jews be allowed to return to their homes and that the persecution be officially suspended. The Seleucids realized the need for a political compromise. On October 15, 164 B.C., they restored the rights of the Jews as granted by Antiochus III, providing amnesty as well. While some may have taken advantage of this amnesty, the soldiers of Judah did not. In December of that year Judah and his men took Jerusalem, although the Seleucids continued to hold the Akra. On the 25th of Chislev (= December, 164) Judah purified the Temple and reorganized the sacrificial cult to conform to the Jewish tradition. This event is commemorated in the Jewish holiday of Hanukkah ("rededication"). The main objectives of the revolt, eliminating the persecutions and restoring Judaism to the nation, had been achieved.

Judah undertook wars throughout the land to defend the Jews from their pagan neighbors and at the same time to extirpate paganism from the country. After the death of Antiochus IV in 164 B.C., his son Antiochus V Eupator advanced on Judea, came to terms with Judah, and restored the rights of the Jews. Menelaus was executed by the Seleucids. In 162 B.C. Alcimus, a moderate Hellenizer, was appointed high priest, although Judah and his supporters resisted his appointment.

Alcimus sought Seleucid help to maintain his power against Judah. Fleeing to Syria, he returned with the general Bacchides. This time Judah fell in battle in 160 B.C. Judah's followers now rallied around Jonathan the Hasmonean and continued their opposition to Alcimus, to the hellenized Jews who supported him, and to their Seleucid allies. After Alcimus' death from stroke in 159, the post of high priest remained vacant for seven years. Though there was further conflict in 157, the Seleucid general Bacchides entered negotiations with Jonathan. A treaty was established, and Jonathan controlled most of Judea from a stronghold at Michmash, north of Jerusalem.

When internal affairs in Syria in 152 B.C. led to civil war between two pretenders to the throne, both sides began wooing Jonathan. Jonathan accepted the proposal of Alexander Balas, which included Jonathan's appointment as high priest. Thus, on the feast of Tabernacles in 152 B.C., Jonathan appeared in the robes of the high priest. Judea was now united under the rule of the Hasmoneans. Disturbances and violence were not at an end, however. In 143 B.C. Jonathan was kidnapped and murdered by a former Seleucid ally who was made uneasy by Jonathan's growing power. Simon, Jonathan's brother, succeeded him. Simon fortified Jerusalem and secured freedom from tribute from the Seleucid ruler Demetrius II. By 142 B.C. he had driven the Seleucid garrison out of the Akra. In a public assembly in 140 B.C., Simon and his descendants were confirmed as high priest, ruler, and commander of the army. A dynasty had been established that would rule the Jewish people until the coming of the Romans in 63 B.C.

COMMENTARY

1:1-64

Background of the Revolt

1:1-10, Alexander and his Successors.

The first four verses of the book briefly set the scene by tracing the origins of Hellenistic rule over the Near East. In 334 B.C. Alexander the Great set out from Pella in Macedonia on his series of conquests. The author of 1 Maccabees refers to "the land of the Kittim" as Alexander's home. The term "Kittim" originally referred to Kition on Cyprus or to the entire island. By the time of 1 Maccabees, however, the word had come to be a general term for the Aegean islands and parts of the coastline of the Mediterranean. Alexander defeated Darius III, the reigning Persian king, twice, first at Issus in 333 and then two years later at Gaugamela. By 332 Alexander had taken Palestine, and when his conquests ended, his empire stretched from Egypt to the area that is modern-day Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Alexander died in Babylon on June 10, 323 B.C. Although 1 Macc. 1:6 says that he divided his kingdom among his officers before his death, in fact Alexander died without having left instructions for his succession. Struggles between rival generals resulted in the dismemberment of the empire. The emblem of kingship, the white diadem, was assumed in 306 B.C. by the generals Antigonus and Demetrius, who ruled in Greece and Asia Minor, respectively. The following year Ptolemy, who controlled Egypt, and Seleucus, who ruled Syria and the eastern part of the empire, also claimed royal status (cf. 1 Macc. 1:8-9).

Opposite: Judah the Maccabee depicted in a twelfth-century A.D. Latin Bible now in Italy.

1 Macc. 1:1-9 quickly skips over the century of competition between the Seleucid and Ptolemaic dynasties for control of Palestine, neglecting to mention that the Ptolemies ruled for most of that period (301-198 B.C.) until defeated at the battle of Paneas by Antiochus III ("the Great"). The interest of 1 Maccabees is in one of the sons of Antiochus III, the king Antiochus IV Epiphanes (Gk., "god manifest," or "god famous"). Verse 10 alludes to the fact that Antiochus IV had been taken as a hostage by Rome in the aftermath of the defeat of Antiochus III at the battle of Magnesia (189 B.C.). Antiochus III died in 187 and was succeeded by his son Seleucus IV. In 176 Antiochus IV was released by the Romans. After the death of Seleucus IV in 175 and the short reign of his infant son, Antiochus IV took power.

1:11-15, The Hellenistic Movement.

Verses 11-15 describe the beginnings of the movement we know from other sources as the Hellenistic reform. A much more thorough account of these events is found in 2 Macc. 4:7-11. That passage tells us that Jason, the brother of the Jewish high priest, went to the king to get permission to change the legal status of Jerusalem and to reincorporate it as a Hellenistic city (polis), to be called Antioch. Part of the motivation must have been the economic opportunities such a reincorporation would have provided (see 1 Macc. 1:11).

The gymnasium (vv. 14-15) was the central cultural institution of Greek civilization and a prominent feature of every polis. In addition to physical activity and recreation, it was the place of education as well. Circumcision was known throughout the ancient world as the sign of the Jew. Nonetheless, because Greek athletics were performed in the nude, some hellenized Jews underwent epispasm, a procedure to reverse the appearance of circumcision, "the holy covenant" (RSV).

1:16-40, Antiochus IV in Egypt and Judea.

Despite the account in 1 Macc. 1:16-19, which attributes the initiative to Antiochus IV, the war between Antiochus IV and Ptolemy VI Philometor (reigned 180-145 B.C.) resulted from a Ptolemaic attempt to reconquer Syria and Palestine. In 170 B.C. Antiochus routed the Egyptians. By 169 Egypt was nearly overrun and Ptolemy VI taken captive. He was, however, put back into power by Antiochus IV.

1 Macc. 1:20-64 describes Antiochus' assault on Jerusalem and the persecutions he put into effect. 1 Maccabees does not attribute a motive to Antiochus other than a passing reference to his "arrogance" and says nothing of the inner struggle between the hellenized Jews and the more traditional Jews that actually provoked the confrontation, according to 2 Maccabees 3-5. In September or October of 169 B.C. Antiochus IV sacked Jerusalem (cf. 2 Macc. 5:1, 11-26). He entered those areas of the Temple restricted to Israelites and plundered the Temple furnishings. The "curtain" (1 Macc. 1:22) is probably that separating the Holy of Holies from the sanctuary. Antiochus also took treasures that had been deposited in the Temple for safekeeping by individuals and carried out a great massacre (cf. 2 Macc. 5:12-14). 1 Macc. 1:25-28 comprises the first of a series of poetic dirges that occur in 1 Maccabees (see also 1:36-40; 2:7-13; 3:45, 50-53; 7:17; 9:21).

In about April of 167 a chief tax collector, known from 2 Macc. 5:24 to be Apollonius, "captain of the Mysians" (RSV), was sent to Judea by Antiochus. He took Jerusalem by force and then established a citadel, the Akra, which dominated Jerusalem. The exact location of the Akra is a subject of debate. This citadel was colonized by hellenized Jews, "men who were transgressors against the law" (trans. Tedeschi). In 1 Macc. 1:36-40 a second dirge mourns the defilement of the sanctuary in language that recalls the destruction of the First Temple by the Babylonians in 587 (cf. Lamentations; Pss. 74; 79).

1:41-64, Antiochus' Decrees. The motivation for Antiochus' decrees outlawing local customs is explained by the author of 1 Maccabees as part of an overall policy to impose uniformity on his kingdom. Most modern scholars do not believe that Antiochus pursued such a general policy of hellenization. (For the background to Antiochus' decrees against Judaism see the Introduction and see 2 Maccabees 3-5, "Commentary.") In any event certain Jewish practices that served to separate Jews from the surrounding pagan culture were proscribed by Antiochus as punishable by death. (Goldstein is correct that Gk. hagious, "holy ones [i.e., priests]," in v. 46 needs to be corrected to hagia in accord with the Latin translation sancta, "holy things," i.e., sacrifices.) While some Jews acquiesced, others sought refuge. This account in 1 Macc. 1:41-53 completely ignores the internal Jewish unrest over the issue of Hellenism, described in 2 Maccabees, which seems to have led to Antiochus' decrees.

Antiochus went so far as to have an idol installed in the Temple, according to this account, on the fifteenth of Chislew, December 5, 167 B.C. The date of the twenty-fifth, given in Josephus and in 2 Macc. 1:18 and 10:5 is probably an attempt to synchronize the defilement with the rededication three years later (1 Macc. 4:52-54). Illicit sacrifices were to be offered throughout the land. The Torah, itself considered the cause of the Jewish resistance, was not to be read, and its scrolls were to be destroyed. Despite horrible tortures, Jews continued circumcision and the eating of exclusively kosher food. The mention in v. 59 of monthly offerings on the twenty-fifth of the month probably refers to observance of the king's birthday.

2:1-70

Mattathias' Revolt

2:1-28, The Rage of Mattathias. The beginning of chap. 2 introduces the Hasmonean family and describes the reaction of Mattathias and his sons to Antiochus' decrees. Mattathias and his family were among the lower clergy, priests of the clan of Joarib. As the process of hellenization advanced, they left Jerusalem and relocated in Modein (cf. 1:53). This town, seventeen miles northwest of Jerusalem in the Judean mountains, was probably the ancestral home of the family. In 2:7-14 the author puts a dirge into the mouth of Mattathias and describes the family of Mattathias as observing the traditional mourning rites (cf. Esther 4:1).

The confrontation between Mattathias and the Seleucid officials is foreshadowed in 1 Macc. 1:51-53. When the "enforcers" arrived in Modein (2:15), even the Hasmonean family was gathered among the crowd. The author accents the importance of Mattathias, placing him at center stage. Antiochus' officials offered Mattathias and his sons the status of "Friends of the King" as well as riches in return for their participation in pagan sacrifice. The Friends of the King were granted special status at court and wore distinctive purple hats and robes. Mattathias refused, but despite his eloquence, a few came forward to sacrifice, only to be killed by Mattathias. The author describes Mattathias as a latter-day Phineas, referring to the account of Num. 25:1-15 in which Phineas killed Zimri and Cozbi in the midst of their idolatrous sexual rites. As a result of Mattathias' actions, he and his sons fled into the mountains bordering on Samaria (cf. 2 Macc. 15:1). With this act of zeal and rage, the rebellion began.

2:29-41, Permissibility of Fighting on the Sabbath. The narrative temporarily leaves its account of Mattathias to describe an unnamed group, separate from the Hasmoneans, who also left their homes and sought refuge in the wilderness. Pursued and overtaken, this group refused to leave its camp on the Sabbath, in accord with a literalist interpretation of Exod. 16:29, nor would they fight on the holy day, even to defend themselves. Consequently, they were slaughtered when Antiochus' troops attacked on the Sabbath. The Hasmoneans emphatically decided that defensive warfare should be permitted on the Sabbath. This ruling, despite the opposition of certain circles within Judaism, became the normative view of Jewish law.

2:42-48, The Hasidim and the Beginnings of the Revolt. Among those who joined the Hasmoneans in the early days of the revolt were a group of Hasidim, "pious ones" in Hebrew. Various attempts have been made to claim that these were an organized sect, perhaps connected with those who gave their lives in v. 38, precursors of either the Pharisees or the Essenes. None of these theories can be proven. It is best to take Hasidim as a loose term for individuals of great piety, who "volunteered in defense of the Torah" (trans. Goldstein). The initial operations of the Hasmoneans were directed against hellenizing Jews, who are called "sinners" and "lawless" (v. 44). The altars erected for their use were destroyed and they were forced to maintain the law of circumcision.

2:49-70, The Death of Mattathias. Verses 49-68 contain a "testament of Mattathias," put into his mouth by our author. Such deathbed testimonies and farewell speeches were a popular feature in ancient Jewish literature (cf. Gen. 49; Deut. 33; Josh. 23; and the pseudepigraphical composition, The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs). Mattathias recalls how the Lord stood by the great heroes of Israel, Abraham, Joseph, Phineas, Joshua, Caleb, David, Elijah, Daniel and his three companions, Hananiah, Azariah, and Mishael. He also calls on his sons, in dramatic foreshadowing, to be willing to sacrifice their lives for the covenant. Mattathias passes on the leadership of the family to Simeon, while acknowledging Judah as the military chief. Mattathias died in April of 165 B.C. (Goldstein).

Judah's Struggle for Liberation

3:1-12, Judah Defeats Apollonius. Judah succeeded his father, Mattathias (cf. 2:66). The poem in 3:3-9 tells us that Judah's earliest operations were mounted against hellenizing Jews, identified as "lawless," "evildoers," and "ungodly." Only when attacked by Apollonius (v. 10) did Judah begin to do battle with the Seleucid forces. The comment of v. 8, that "he turned away wrath from Israel," compares him with Phineas (Num. 25:11) as Mattathias was in 2:26.

Josephus suggests that Apollonius was governor of Samaria. But he may have been the collector of tribute referred to in 1:29 and identified as Apollonius in 2 Macc. 5:24. Although 1 Macc. 3:10 identifies Apollonius' troops as "Gentiles and a large force from Samaria" (RSV), it is likely that the reference is to pagan Greco-Macedonians who then inhabited the city of Samaria and not to actual Samaritans (so Goldstein). In any event Judah was victorious in his first battle against Seleucid forces.

3:13-26, The Battle of Beth-horon. Seron, commander of Syria, decided to try his luck against Judah. He was joined by hellenizing Jews who sought to avenge Judah's earlier campaigns against them.

There were two villages, upper Beth-horon (to the southeast) and lower Beth-horon (to the northwest) on the road from Jerusalem to Lydda, between Jerusalem and Modein. The pass between them was extremely narrow (b. Sanh. 32b). Despite the fact that Judah's men were holding the higher position, they still despaired at the sight of the larger enemy forces, especially since this was only their second engagement with the Seleucids, and since they lacked adequate provisions. Judah encouraged his men, reminding them that their lives, the lives of their wives and children, and their way of life were all at stake. His comment, that "in the sight of heaven there is no difference between saving by many or by few" (3:18, RSV), recalls the words of Jonathan in 1 Sam. 14:6. The same theme is present in the story of Gideon's victory in Judges 7.

Judah fell upon the enemy suddenly and routed them, his forces killing eight hundred and putting the rest to flight westward. Josephus even reports that Seron was killed. From this time Judah was considered a force to be reckoned with.

3:27-37, Seleucid Affairs. Our author explains Antiochus' eastern campaign as resulting from the need to finance his actions against Judah's revolt. No doubt the real motivation for this campaign was to bring the eastern satrapies under control. Before he left to campaign in the east (perhaps May or June of 165) Antiochus may have established a coregency with his young son Antiochus V Eupator, appointing Lysias as guardian. Lysias, whose title of "Kinsman of the King" indicates a rank above that of "Friend of the King" (so Goldstein; cf. 2:18; 3:38), was ordered to crush the rebels. For this purpose extensive forces were deployed, although the claim that half the king's armed forces were to be dedicated to crushing Judah's insurrection at this early stage seems exaggerated.

3:38-4:25, The Battles with Nicanor and Gorgias. According to 3:38, Ptolemy son of Dorymenes, Nicanor, and Gorgias were sent to Lysias. Yet 2 Macc. 8:8-9 makes Ptolemy the one who sent Gorgias and Nicanor. These three Friends of the King were provided with large armies. The number of soldiers here (40,000 infantry and 7,000 cavalry) is probably derived from the size of the Aramean (= Syrian) force defeated by David, according to 1 Chron. 19:18. Emmaus, where the Seleucid army camped, commanded several routes from Jerusalem to the coastal plain, yet it was exposed from the south. Expecting the immediate rout of Judah's forces, slave traders joined the camp of the Seleucid army. The additional troops who joined the Seleucid forces (1 Macc. 3:41) were, as Goldstein suggests, from Idumea and Philistia, not Syria and Philistia. The two names are written similarly in Hebrew and are easily confused.

Judah's forces assembled at Mizpah, an ancient place of prayer, where they mourned and fasted and read from the Torah. Our author inserts his fourth dirge in v. 45 (cf. 1:25-28, 36-40; 2:7-13). The exact location of Mizpah cannot be determined. It was the site of Samuel's prayer to God to enable Israel to be victorious over the Philistines (1 Sam. 7:2-14). Even without a Temple, Judah's forces put on priestly garments and offered first fruits, but they were unable to complete the rites of Nazirites since the offerings had to be made in the Jerusalem Temple. (In 1 Macc. 3:49 the translation "stirred up" in the RSV must be set aside. Tedesche translates "shaved," a part of the Nazirite rite [Num. 6:18].) After praying for deliverance, the assembly sounded the trumpets in accord with Num. 10:9.

Judah organized his army on the biblical model and then discharged the requirements of Deut. 20:1-9, the law of conscription (1 Macc. 3:55-60). Similar rites are required in the Qumran War Scroll as well. He dismissed those to be exempted and made the priest's address of encouragement. Again, he repeated his father's message (2:50) that his forces had to be ready to sacrifice their lives if necessary.

Gorgias intended to outnumber Judah's three thousand men and to take them by surprise. For this reason he had to employ hellenized Jews ("men from the Akra"), as they knew the terrain well enough to guide his troops by night. Informed of this plan, Judah slipped away and positioned his under-equipped army to attack the larger and better fortified main camp of the Seleucids (4:1-7). The speech the author attributes to Judah in vv. 8-11 recalls the deliverance of Israel at the Red Sea (Exod. 14:10-13).

Judah's forces apparently commanded the high ground, and the Seleucids fled toward the plain as their guard posts failed to withstand the descending army of Judah (1 Macc. 4:12-15). Gazara is Gezer, where there may already have been a Seleucid stronghold to which the soldiers fled. Azotus is Ashdod and Jamnia is Yavneh. A tongue of Idumean territory may have separated Judea from the Philistine towns of Azotus and Jamnia (Goldstein), or we may read Judea for Idumea with some manuscripts (so Tedesche). The territory of ancient Philistia was occupied by pagans in the Hellenistic period.

Gorgias' force, having failed to catch Judah's men in their camp, next appeared in the hills above their own camp, which was being burned by the Maccabean army (v. 20). They immediately fled to Philistia. Judah's men turned to the spoils and to celebrating their victory with praise of God. The refrain quoted in 4:24 ("for he is good and his mercy endures for ever," RSV) is familiar from Psalms 106; 107; 118; 136; and 1 Chron. 16:8-36 (cf. 2 Chron. 20:21).

4:26-35, The Battle with Lysias. When his men reported their failure, Lysias prepared to mount an even greater offensive. The defeat of Nicanor and Gorgias had probably taken place in summer or autumn of 165 B.C. Lysias' campaign ended in failure by late winter of 164. The dangers of an insurgency so close to the borders of the Ptolemaic empire made it worth the risk of a winter campaign. One of the reasons for advancing from the south (4:29) may have been the desire to avoid the rains. At the same time, the approach from Idumea afforded Lysias a friendly base, since the Idumeans had no sympathy for the Hasmonians. Beth-zur, where the battle took place, was in southern Judea. Lysias chose this location since it afforded him the high ground. Judah was outnumbered, even though his army had grown substantially since the defeat of Nicanor and Gorgias.

Facing overwhelming odds, Judah prayed to God that the Seleucids be delivered into the hands of his army, just as Goliath had been handed over to David (1 Sam. 17) and the Philistines to Jonathan (1 Sam. 14:1-15). The model of those early heroes of Israel is very important to the image the author of 1 Maccabees wished to create for Judah. Judah began his prayer (1 Macc. 4:30-33) with the benediction formula, "blessed are You," which was widespread in literature of the Second Temple period (515 B.C.-A.D. 70) and which forms the basis of the Jewish liturgical system.

The battle resulted in a resounding defeat for Lysias. His decision to return home may have resulted from the news of the death of Antiochus IV and the appointment of Philip as regent for his son Antiochus V. Nonetheless, Lysias was already preparing for another engagement.

4:36-61, The Rededication of the Temple. The defeat of Lysias left the Hellenizers and Seleucids in the Akra isolated. When Judah and his men went up to the Temple they found it abandoned; the hellenized priests had probably fled to the Akra or left the city.

While some of his men fended off the troops of the Akra, Judah set out to purify the sanctuary. Only priests unblemished according to the law of Lev. 21:17-23 participated in the cleansing of the sanctuary. Regarding the altar, Goldstein suggests that Judah faced a dilemma, since Deut. 12:2-4 commanded the destruction of idolatrous altars but at the same time prohibited the destruction of God's altar. What was to be done in a case in which God's altar had been defiled by idolatrous worship? Accordingly, the altar was replaced with a new one (built of unhewn stones in accord with Exod. 20:25 and Deut. 27:6), but the stones of the old altar were hidden away. The vessels, candelabrum (menorah), and incense altar had to be replaced, since Antiochus had carried them away when he first entered Jerusalem (1 Macc. 1:21-23). The burning of incense and the setting out of the loaves rendered the Temple fit for the renewal of sacrifice (4:50-51).

The first sacrificial offering was brought on the twenty-fifth of Chislev, 164 B.C. (vv. 52-53). The notion that the rededication took place on the anniversary of the day on which the Temple was defiled has given rise to the emendation of 1:54 (see commentary above on 1:54). The cornices and decorations were replaced (4:57) as they had been taken by Antiochus (1:22). The gates and doors that had been burned (4:38) were also restored. It was decreed that the festival of Hanukkah ("dedication") was to be celebrated annually as an eight-day festival.

The Mount Zion referred to in 4:60 means the Temple Mount, which needed to be fortified against the troops in the nearby Akra. It was now clear that a fortress facing Idumea was required, to prevent the Seleucids from attacking again from that direction. Hence, Beth-zur was fortified.

5:1-68, Judah Expands His Domain. The author describes Judah's early attempts to extend his territory and punish the enemies of Israel as defensive operations against gentile aggression. Akra-battene was a district in southern Samaria populated by Idumeans. The Baeenites may be the people of the city of Beon referred to in Num. 32:3, located in Transjordan. The Ammonite Timothy of 5:6, identified as a phylarch, Greek for a local leader, appears also in 2 Macc. 10:24-37. He is probably to be distinguished from the strategos named Timothy, a high official of the Seleucid empire, mentioned in 1 Macc. 5:11-44 and 2 Macc. 12:2, 10-31 (so Goldstein).

At the same time, non-Jews in surrounding locales rose up against their Jewish neighbors. Judah received pleas for help from the Jews of Gilead who had taken refuge in Dathema (1 Macc. 5:9-10) and from Galilee as well (v. 14). Gilead is the land east of the Jordan between the Yarmuk River to the north and the Arnon to the south. The location of Dathema is unknown. The Timothy who besieged the Gileadite Jews was the strategos by that name (see commentary above on 5:1-8). The words en tois Toubiou in 5:13 have been variously understood. The RSV translates, "who were in the land of Tob," for which see Judg. 11:3. Tedesche has "who were in the village of Toubias," which his note seems to indicate is to be identified with the land of Tob. Goldstein translates "who were members of Tubias' troop," referring to a military unit under the leadership of one of the Tobiad family, a clan of hellenized Jews. If this last translation is correct, it would show that even hellenized Jews were under attack. While Judah and Jonathan went to rescue the Jews of Gilead, Simon was sent to Galilee (1 Macc. 5:17). Judah commanded those left in Judea not to do battle with the enemy; he was concerned about the risk entailed in deploying substantial forces outside of Judea. Simon was victorious and drove the pagan attackers into the city of Ptolemais, also known as Acco on the Mediterranean, north of Haifa. Unable to hold Galilee, he evacuated those Jews he had rescued (vv. 21-23).

The longer account of Judah's exploits in 5:24-54 results from his being the central hero. Indeed, v. 43 emphasizes the personal bravery of Judah, as v. 53 speaks of his kindness and concern for stragglers. Judah's attempt to avoid armed confrontation with the people of Ephron (vv. 46-51), follows the laws of Deut. 20:10-15. The exact location of most of the cities mentioned in this account cannot be established. Carnaim, known as Ashteroth-karnaim in Gen. 14:5, is north of Edrei in Transjordan. The temple of Carnaim, which Judah burns, was probably dedicated to Astarte. Raphon is in the same vicinity. Ephron is eight miles east of the Jordan, opposite Beth-shean. Judah also had to evacuate the Jews from Transjordan, since it would have been impossible to hold on to such far-flung territory. The triumphant entry of these Jews into Jerusalem described in v. 54 echoes Isa. 35:10.

Joseph and Azariah, left to command the troops in Judea, violated their instructions (1 Macc. 5:19) and marched against Jamnia (Yavneh on the Mediterranean shore). Gorgias, probably the same one mentioned in 3:38-4:25, routed their army (5:59-60). Our author gives two reasons for the rout, disobedience to commands and not being of the Hasmonean house. Here the author is emphasizing his view that the Hasmoneans were divinely chosen legitimate rulers. The Hasmonean brothers themselves continued to attain victories and to command popular support (vv. 65-66). Judah's destruction of pagan cult sites (v. 68) was part of the general Hasmonean approach to extirpating paganism from the land of Israel.

6:1-17, The Death of Antiochus IV Epiphanes. Chronologically, 1 Macc. 6:1-17 follows 3:37. The "upper" or "inland" provinces of 6:1 are Mesopotamia and Iran. Elymais is the region known in the Bible as Elam. No city of that name is known, however, and the precise location of Antiochus' campaign remains uncertain. Antiochus is pictured here as a temple robber, as he appears in 1:21-24. The beginning of 6:4 may be translated with the RSV, "and they withstood him in battle," or, with Goldstein, "when they stood against him for battle." Goldstein's translation allows him to conclude that no actual battle took place, but that Antiochus gave up when he saw that the inhabitants would resist.

In vv. 5-7 the text describes an envoy who related to Antiochus the events of 3:38-4:61. This account attributes the king's death to the news of the defeat in Judea. Such a sequence of events is extremely unlikely, even though Antiochus' death did occur a short time after the rededication of the Temple. Indeed, in Chislev (November/December) of 164 B.C. the news of Antiochus' death became known in Babylonia, according to an ancient clay tablet from Babylon. It is therefore not probable that events of that same month in Judea could have been known to Antiochus before he died. It is likely, therefore, that our author has presented his own interpretation of events and that the messenger is fictitious, as suggested by Goldstein.

Sensing that he was dying, Antiochus summoned the "Friends of the King," a group of courtiers (see commentary above on 2:15-28). The author has Antiochus blame his death on his despoiling of the Jerusalem Temple (cf. 1:20-24) and his attacks on Judea. The second-century B.C. Greek historian Polybius attributed Antiochus' death to his desire to plunder the temple of Artemis in Persia (Histories 31:9). Josephus counters Polybius' claims with the view of 1 Maccabees (Antiquities of the Jews 12:358-9).

The king designated Philip as regent for his young son Antiochus, electing him to bring (so Goldstein) Antiochus the diadem, robe, and signet ring, which symbolized the royal power. In so doing he displaced Lysias, whom he had entrusted with the government in his absence (3:32-36). Antiochus IV then died in early winter of 164 B.C. Lysias proved no easy match. Before Philip could assert his power, Lysias, to cement his own power over the Seleucid realm, set up Antiochus V, then nine years old, as king, giving him the title Eupator, meaning "born of a noble father."

6:18-63, The Campaign of Antiochus V Against Judea. In 163/162 B.C., about a year after the death of Antiochus IV, spurred on perhaps by the instability attending the succession and regency of the Seleucid empire, Judah besieged the Akra. A group of pagans and hellenized Jews managed to elude the siege and approached the king, arguing that the attack on the symbol of Seleucid hegemony over Judea and the fortification of the Temple and Beth-zur constituted an act of rebellion.

In 6:28-33 the young king is pictured as controlling affairs, although in reality power was concentrated in the hands of the regent, Lysias. The size of the forces is no doubt exaggerated here. As in Lysias' previous campaign against Judah, the approach to Beth-zur was through Idumea (see 4:29). After defending the fortress, Judah suddenly withdrew his men to Beth-zachariah, where he was soon met by the enemy. The author's description of the valiant defense of Beth-zur by the Jews in 6:31 leads us to believe that actually the Jews withdrew because they were unable to withstand the Seleucid pressure.

The detailed account of the overwhelming forces of the enemy in 6:34-41 is intended to show that it was not Judah's fault that he lost this battle. Goldstein suggests that the author took the description of the elephants from a military manual. In his view, the unfermented grape and mulberry juice stimulated the animals because of its color and taste. Elephants were commonly used in battle during the Hellenistic age, a practice apparently adopted from the Persians. Although the RSV in v. 37 says that there were "four armed men" on each elephant, that reading is based on emendation. More probable is "two" as in Tedesche and Goldstein, based on a reconstructed Hebrew original shene shalishim, "two riding warriors," which was easily misread as shenayim u-sheloshim, "thirty two," the reading in most Greek manuscripts.

After an initial success, the battle quickly went against Judah's army. His brother Eleazar, surnamed Avaran, died in battle (vv. 43-46). This tragedy may have contributed to the demoralization that caused Judah to withdraw his army.

The king was greatly aided in conquering Beth-zur by the fact that Jews were prohibited from farming the land of Israel during the Sabbatical Year (see Exod. 23:11; Lev. 25:3-7). Most probably this means that it was the year after the Sabbatical Year, at which time the lack of the previous year's produce would be felt. The same problem afflicted those Jews who sought to defend the Temple against the army of Antiochus V (1 Macc. 6:51-54).

At this time, Lysias' control over the young Antiochus V was challenged by Philip. It was Philip who had actually been appointed regent by Antiochus IV on his deathbed (6:15). Lysias decided that he needed to commit his troops to the struggle against Philip for control over the empire. For this reason he sought peace in Judea (vv. 55-56).

Lysias' speech in 6:57-59 is no doubt a composition of the author. In it Lysias asserts that there is no sense in continuing the war and that the only reason the Judeans opposed the Seleucids was because the latter had prohibited the practice of Judaism. Lysias, according to our author, deliberately conceals the true reason for his desire to return to Antioch, the presence there of Philip. In a parallel in 2 Macc. 11:13 Lysias decides to make peace because he realized that God was on the side of the Hebrews.

Verses 60-61 describe the legal proceeding wherein the two sides exchanged oaths. We can imagine that this was a solemn occasion in which specific military protocol was followed. Compare the parallel description in 2 Macc. 11:13-21 and 27-33, in which the agreements take the form of a series of letters. The king's acceptance of Lysias' proposal (1 Macc. 6:61) is paralleled in a letter in 2 Macc. 11:22-26 in which Antiochus V proposes that the Jews be allowed to live according to their own laws. Only after all arrangements were concluded did the defenders of the Temple (perhaps termed Mount Zion here) withdraw from their positions.

Despite Lysias' oath of peace, Antiochus V treacherously destroyed the walls of Mount Zion (1 Macc. 6:62). Antiochus V then departed for Antioch, where he was forced to take the city by force from his erstwhile regent, Philip. His withdrawal from Jerusalem is probably to be dated to sometime in winter of 162 B.C.

7:1-25, The High-Priesthood of Alcimus.

Antiochus V and Lysias had no sooner succeeded in overcoming the challenge of Philip than they faced a more formidable opponent in Demetrius I Soter (ruled 162-150 B.C.), son of Seleucus IV Philopator (ruled 187-175 B.C.). Demetrius had been a hostage in Rome, from which he managed to escape after the death of his uncle, Antiochus IV. After establishing himself at Tripolis, in Phoenicia (Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 12.389; 2 Macc. 14:1), he took Antioch, and Antiochus V and Lysias were put to death. His accession is probably to be dated to October 162 B.C. (Goldstein).

The "lawless and ungodly men of Israel" (7:5, RSV) describes for the author the party of moderate Hellenizers. 2 Macc. 14:3 relates that Alcimus (whose Hebrew name was Jakim) had earlier been designated high priest. Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 12.385) says that he was appointed by Lysias after the execution of Menelaus. Perhaps our passage refers to his seeking confirmation from the new ruler. Alcimus and his supporters argued that Judah and his followers had made life impossible in Judea for the supporters of the Seleucid empire.

Bacchides, whom the new king Demetrius entrusted with the task of pacifying Judea, was one of the "Friends" of King Antiochus IV (Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 12.393) and must have been led to support Demetrius as a result of conditions under Antiochus V and Lysias. The province "Beyond the River" (RSV) was that of Coele Syria and Phoenicia. Demetrius' own involvement in pacifying the eastern part of his empire led him to put so distinguished a leader as Bacchides in charge of affairs in Judea. Alcimus was confirmed as high priest.

Although the Hasmoneans under Judah realized the purposes of the large expeditionary force sent with Bacchides, some of the Hasidim who did not share the Hasmonean insistence on Jewish independence, but who were concerned only for religious freedom, were lulled into Bacchides' trap (1 Macc. 7:12-18). Probably the presence of the priest Alcimus convinced them that the Seleucids could be trusted. But Alcimus and Bacchides proved treacherous, arresting and executing sixty of the Hasidim. Verse 17 is an adaptation of Ps. 79:2-3 and Jer. 14:16. The story of the execution of the Hasidim is not found in the parallel account of 2 Maccabees 14.

Beth-zait (1 Macc. 7:19) was about four miles north of Beth-zur on the road to Jerusalem. Here Bacchides again committed atrocities, denying the corpses burial (cf. v. 17). Manuscripts are divided as to whether he killed his own men who had deserted from him or some Jews who had deserted to him. If the latter, he would have killed them out of fear that they were disloyal. Despite the support Alcimus received from the Seleucid army and from the hellenizing Jews, he was unable to stabilize his power as high priest in the face of the opposition of Judah and his men.

7:26-50, The Defeat of Nicanor. In response to the appeals of Alcimus (v. 25), King Demetrius dispatched Nicanor to assist him. The parallel account in 2 Macc. 14:18-30 suggests the possibility that there was a period of friendship between Nicanor and Judah. When Nicanor turned against him, Judah escaped. According to 1 Maccabees, however, Nicanor was treacherous from the start (vv. 26-30). Abandoning his earlier tactics of entrapment, Nicanor met Judah in battle near Capharsalama, a site for which no convincing identification has yet been made. Verse 32 is somewhat ambiguous. The version in Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 12.405) to the effect that Nicanor was victorious and that Judah's men fled to the Akra is mistaken. The correct interpretation is that Judah was victorious and that Nicanor's men were sent scampering back to their fortress in the City of David. Otherwise, the oath of v. 35 in which Nicanor threatens to burn down the Temple would make no sense.

Nicanor's threat was made to the priests and elders who were showing him the burnt offering being made on behalf of the Seleucid king (v. 33). From the Persian period on, such offerings had been made on behalf of the king as a sign of loyalty (see Ezra 6:10). This token failed to convince Nicanor that the priests were loyal to the Seleucid empire. From the prayer the priests recited after his departure, it seems that he was correct. The first part of the poem in 1 Macc. 7:37-38 is influenced by 1 Kings 8:29-30, 43 and 9:3.

Nicanor repaired to Beth-horon, a strategic highpoint, where he met his reinforcements from Syria. Yet Judah outsmarted him by occupying Adasa, a village on the road from Jerusalem to Beth-horon, some seven miles southeast of Beth-horon. By blocking the road, Judah intended to stop Nicanor from fulfilling the oath of 1 Macc. 7:35 (Goldstein). In his prayer Judah recalls the destruction of Sennacherib's army, described in 2 Kings 19:35 (cf. 2 Macc. 15:22-24).

The battle took place in March of 161 B.C. While 1 Macc. 7:43 asserts that Nicanor was the first to fall, Josephus places the death of Nicanor later on in the battle (Antiquities of the Jews 12.409). The enemy was pursued westward, toward Gezer. The blowing of the trumpets by Judah's forces (v. 45) was intended to signal the surrounding villagers to block the path of escape of the Seleucid army so that the rout could continue. After the battle the victorious Jews cut off Nicanor's right hand as retribution for his having raised it in taking the oath to destroy the Temple (cf. 2 Macc. 15:32).

The Day of Nicanor, which was decreed as an annual festival (1 Macc. 7:49), was celebrated as a minor Jewish holiday as late as the end of the first century A.D. Fasting and mourning were forbidden on this and many other such days according to the early rabbinic text Megillat Ta'anit ("Scroll of Fasting"). The rabbis later abolished these minor commemorations in favor of Hanukkah and Purim, which remained as festivals of national deliverance.

8:1-32, Judah's Treaty with the Romans

The account of the greatness of Rome in 8:1-16 is a collection by the pro-Roman author of information and even misinformation about the power and glory of Rome. This material is intended to justify Judah's having allied himself with a foreign nation. The author accepts the tendentious claims of the Romans that those whom they had conquered had undertaken aggression against Rome (Goldstein). The Gauls referred to in v. 2 are either those of northern Italy defeated in 190 B.C. or the Galatians of Asia Minor conquered in 189 B.C. The Carthaginian colonies in Spain were conquered in the Second Punic War (218-201 B.C.). Philip was defeated in 197 and his son Perseus, last king of Macedonia, was defeated 168 B.C. Antiochus (III) the Great was defeated by the Romans at Magnesia in 189 B.C. He was not made a prisoner as v. 7 claims, but he was forced to accept the terms of the Romans. Although India is mentioned in v. 8, it was never conquered by Antiochus III, yet he did march toward it and was widely reported to have had elephants in his forces. Media was retained by Antiochus, but Lydia had to be surrendered to the Romans along with other parts of Asia Minor, most of which were then given to Eumenes II of Pergamum. Probably vv. 9-11 are an anachronistic description of the war with the Achaeans in 146 B.C. The Roman senate did not meet daily, as v. 15 states, but usually three times each month and on festivals. It began with 120 members, and it gradually increased to approximately 300, until it was further enlarged to 600 in 81 B.C. The author apparently did not realize that there were two consuls, rather than one ruler (v. 16). The allusion to harmony in v. 16 suggests that the passage was written before the Roman civil wars.

Judah chose two ambassadors to Rome, Eupolemus and Jason. Eupolemus was the son of the same John who, according to 2 Macc. 4:11, secured royal concessions for the Jews from Antiochus III. He is perhaps to be identified with the author of the Greek work Concerning the Kings in Judea. Goldstein's translation "of the clan of Hakkoz" is to be preferred to the RSV's "son of Accos" in 1 Macc. 8:17. (On this priestly clan see Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63; cf. 1 Chron. 4:8.) Jason is otherwise unknown. The Jews continued to be taxed by the Seleucid kingdom, even after the victory of Judah over Nicanor. Further, Alcimus still remained high priest, supported by the Seleucids. It was this yoke of slavery (1 Macc. 8:18) that Judah sought to cast off by entering an alliance with the Romans. As was usual at that time, the emissaries were invited to address the senate. The claim of v. 22 that the Romans sent a bronze copy of the treaty to Jerusalem was doubted by Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 12.416) in light of the usual Roman practice of depositing such bronze copies in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

The text of the treaty given in 8:23-32 generally follows Roman usage except that the form had to be somewhat modified since the other party was "Judah . . . his brothers and the people of the Jews" (RSV), not a sovereign kingdom. (For a complete comparison, see Goldstein.) If the document is indeed authentic, as most historians argue, some difficulties in legal terminology have resulted from the translation of the original text from Latin into Hebrew and then in turn into the Greek translation of 1 Maccabees. The terms of the treaty are that each side promises to aid the other if attacked and not to aid the enemies of the other. Some scholars take the postscript concerning Demetrius in vv. 31-32 to be a later addition to the text (Josephus omits it).

9:1-22, The Death of Judah. Bacchides and Alcimus, the high priest, had fought in Judea already, according to 7:5-25. After the failure of Nicanor (7:39-50), Demetrius I again sent Bacchides accompanied by Alcimus to Judea, this time with "the right wing of the army," i.e., half of his infantry. From 9:4 we gather that he had some 20,000 soldiers. The route taken by the army is uncertain. One should probably read "Galilee" in v. 2 instead of "Gilgal" (so Josephus, accepted by Goldstein). There is an Arbel in Galilee but none known near Gilgal. Mesaloth probably derives from Hebrew mesillot, "steps," a name given to the village because of the shape of the cliffs. Yet it is difficult to see why the Seleucids would have entered Galilee and attacked one obscure village that was in difficult terrain. In any case, after taking this village and slaughtering its inhabitants, the Seleucids turned toward Jerusalem where they encamped in Nisan (March/April) of 160 B.C. They then marched to Berea, probably the modern El-Bireh, opposite Ramallah, ten miles north of Jerusalem. Meanwhile, Judah was encamped at Elasa, probably to be identified with Khirbet el-'Assi, located off the Jerusalem-Nablus road, near Ramallah, across a valley from El-Bireh. The fright and desertion of so many of Judah's soldiers presumes that the camps were located close to one another. Judah insisted on fighting the battle despite the advice of his troops. His speech in vv. 8-10 foreshadows the coming defeat.

Verse 11 is ambiguous in not specifying whether it is Judah's army or Bacchides' that marches out first. Tedeschi translates literally, "The army set out from the camp and stood in battle line against them." Josephus took "the army" to be that of Bacchides who stood in battle formation arrayed against the Jews (Antiquities of the Jews 12.426). The second half of the verse does indeed describe a large army such as that of Bacchides, not a small band such as the one that remained with Judah.

Although vastly outnumbered, the Jews initially routed the right wing of Bacchides' phalanx. The phrase "as far as Mount Azotus" (9:15, RSV) makes no geographical sense and is generally regarded as a corrupt reading. In any case, as the Jews pursued the Seleucid right wing, the left wing moved in behind Judah's forces and defeated them. Judah died on the battlefield (v. 18).

Josephus suggests that a truce allowed Jonathan and Simon to recover the body of Judah and to bury it at Modein (Antiquities of the Jews 12.432). Goldstein suggests that this truce may have resulted from the brothers' agreeing to call off their resistance to Alcimus. The author's attempt to model Judah's life and death after those of Israel's heroes and kings can be clearly seen in vv. 21-22. Verse 21 is influenced by 2 Sam.

1:19, David's lament for Saul and Jonathan. 1 Macc. 9:22 is an imitation of the style of royal chronicles preserved in the books of Kings (e.g., 1 Kings 11:41).

9:23–12:53

The Leadership of Jonathan

9:23–73, Jonathan's Defeat of Bacchides.

Alcimus and the pro-Seleucid Hellenistic Jews, abetted by Bacchides, quickly gained the upper hand after Judah's death. The phrases "the wicked sprouted," "and the evildoers flourished" in v. 23 are allusions to Ps. 92:7 (Goldstein). Note that the populace supported Alcimus and even cooperated in turning Judah's supporters over to the authorities. It was the cruel punishment of these heroes that must have again created the climate for revolt. It fell to Jonathan to succeed his brother and to take up the struggle against both the Seleucids and their Jewish allies (1 Macc. 9:31).

Jonathan, aware that Bacchides sought to kill him, fled with Simon and their men to the wilderness of Tekoa. Tekoa is about five miles southeast of Bethlehem, and the wilderness extended from Tekoa toward the Dead Sea. The pool where Jonathan and Simon camped may be the modern Bir ez-Za'feran, about three miles south of Tekoa, although other possibilities can be suggested. The presence of a well must have been one of the main reasons for taking refuge in this place. Verse 34, which describes Bacchides' pursuit of Jonathan, is almost certainly out of place. Its similarity to v. 43 suggests either that it originally preceded v. 43 (so Zeitlin) or, more probably, that it was a scribe's explanatory comment on v. 43, which was later copied into the manuscript at the wrong place (so Goldstein).

Jonathan sent John with the noncombatants and the baggage to ask the Nabateans if they would store their possessions (vv. 35–36). The Nabatean Arabs must have maintained some degree of freedom from the Seleucids and seemed like a reliable refuge. On the way, John and his party were intercepted by the Jambrites, an Arab tribe from Medeba some twelve miles east of the Dead Sea, and taken captive. Whether the Jambrites were also a Nabatean Arab tribe is not certain, but the author of 1 Maccabees does not associate them with the Nabateans, who are portrayed as sympathetic to the Hasmoneans (see 5:25). From 9:38 and 42 we gather that John died in the attack. We do not hear of the fate of the others.

An opportunity for revenge occurred when Jonathan and Simon heard news of a large Jambrite wedding procession from Nadabath to Medeba (vv. 37–38). Nadabath is probably to be identified with Nebo, somewhat north of Medeba. After attacking the Jambrite wedding procession, Jonathan and his men took refuge in the swamps immediately north of the Dead Sea, on the east side of the Jordan. Bacchides and his troops crossed the Jordan on the Sabbath (reading v. 34 as an explanatory comment on v. 43; see above). They positioned themselves to the north of Jonathan facing south, so that the Jews were hemmed in by the Jordan on one side and the swamps on the north end of the Dead Sea on the other side. Jonathan's words in v. 44, "for today things are not as they were before" (RSV), is an allusion to the life-threatening situation that justified fighting on the Sabbath (cf. 2:34–41). Bacchides is pictured here as a coward who ran to take refuge in the rear when Jonathan attacked him. Jonathan and his men leapt into the Jordan and swam to the western shore, from which they made their escape. Bacchides suffered heavy casualties.

Bacchides fortified the citadel of Jerusalem (the Akra) and a string of towns to solidify his control of Judea. In all of them he built fortifications and placed garrisons that may have consisted of Jews loyal to Alcimus. The Akra was the base from which the Seleucids kept Alcimus' Hellenistic regime in power (cf. 1:29–40). It was there that Bacchides held hostages from among the aristocratic families to prevent them from throwing their lot in with Jonathan, whose exploits must have provoked widespread admiration.

According to 9:54, in May of 159 B.C. Alcimus altered the structure of the Temple, thus violating, in the author's view, the commands of the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, in whose time the Second Temple had been built. He attempted to tear down the barrier of the inner court. Most scholars consider this to be the wall that separated the Temple Mount from the Temple itself. Gentiles were permitted on the Temple Mount but not in the Temple itself. If so, Alcimus sought to discard the prohibition against allowing Gentiles access to the Temple. According to v. 55 he miraculously suffered a stroke and was unable to continue. Our author certainly sees this as divine intervention. Despite v. 57, which reports that Bacchides returned to Syria only after Alcimus' death, it is probable that Bacchides departed soon after completing the new fortifications, assuming Alcimus' control to have been established. In keeping with his attempt to model the history of the Hasmoneans after the early traditions of Israel, the concluding phrase of v. 57, "and the land of Judah had rest for two years" (RSV), is influenced by the language of Judg. 3:11, 30; 5:31; and 8:28.

The hellenized Jews summoned Bacchides back to Judea to deal with Jonathan and his men. Bacchides, seeking to avoid risking his forces, tried to get his allies in Judea to capture Jonathan. When the plan became known, Jonathan and his men took revenge, killing the fifty or so leaders of the pro-Seleucid party (9:61).

Bethbasi, where Jonathan and Simon assembled their forces, is to be identified with Khirbet Beit Bassa, about a mile southeast of Bethlehem. When Bacchides heard that Jonathan had fortified it, he tried unsuccessfully to conquer the town. Textual problems obscure the meaning of v. 66. The text followed by the RSV says that after leaving Simon in command at Bethbasi, Jonathan attacked two Arab tribes. Yet some manuscripts imply that he "placed in command" (so Zeitlin) these two allies in his battle against Bacchides. Goldstein similarly concludes that the text originally said that Jonathan summoned "Odamera and his brothers and the Phasironites in their encampment, so that they began to harass and attack Bacchides' troops." This view is supported also by Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 13.28).

After securing the support of these nomadic tribes, Jonathan attacked Bacchides from the rear, while Simon set out to destroy the siege machines from within (v. 67). Upon defeat, Bacchides turned against the Hellenizers who had summoned him to Judea and killed many of them. He then decided to return to Syria.

As soon as Jonathan learned of Bacchides' intention to leave Judea, he proposed an exchange of prisoners and a truce (v. 70). There now ensued a long period of tranquility for Judea, some seven years until the events described in 10:69. Michmash, where Jonathan settled, is present day Mukhmas, eight miles northeast of Jerusalem. It was there that Saul and Jonathan had defeated the Philistines (1 Sam. 13:2). Jonathan the Hasmonean was not secure enough to control Jerusalem. He still had no official position and was not high priest. Judea remained a Seleucid dependency. Yet Jonathan led as a charismatic leader, much like the biblical judges, as 1 Macc. 9:73 suggests.

10:1-21, Jonathan Confirmed in Office by Alexander Balas. By 152 B.C. the hostility of Rome and of a number of petty kingdoms against Demetrius I made the time ripe for the appearance of Alexander Epiphanes, known as Alexander Balas, a pretender to the Seleucid throne. His claim to be the son of Antiochus IV Epiphanes was widely doubted in antiquity, but his attempt to gain control of the empire was abetted by the fact that Demetrius had taken to drink and had secluded himself outside Antioch. By spring or summer of 152 B.C. Alexander Balas conquered Ptolemais (Acco) on the Mediterranean seacoast. When Demetrius I began his military offensive against Alexander, he sought to make Jonathan his ally. He therefore gave Jonathan the power to raise an army and delivered into his hands the hostages (cf. 9:53).

Jonathan's legal recognition allowed him to take up residence in Jerusalem (10:7). The actual text of the letter from Demetrius granting these privileges to Jonathan is not preserved. Although the men in the Akra were forced to accede to this letter, they still held their position, indicating that Judea was not yet independent of Seleucid rule. The rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem was also intended to enhance Jonathan's position, as well as to provide defense. These walls had been torn down under Lysias (see 6:62). Many of the Seleucid soldiers (see 9:52) fled, although the hellenized Jews remained in their refuge at Beth-zur (10:14).

Alexander felt constrained to better the offer of Demetrius, as he recognized the danger that an alliance of Demetrius and Jonathan would pose. In proposing to make Jonathan not only a Friend of the King (an honorary position) but also an ally, he intended to grant him some degree of autonomy. Accordingly he made him high priest (10:20), an office bestowed by the Seleucids only from the time of Antiochus IV. Indeed, the high-priesthood had been vacant since the death of Alcimus in 159 B.C. Jonathan was not of the appropriate priestly family, so that although the law of the Torah permitted him to occupy this office, his appointment was a departure from a tradition that extended from the time of Solomon up to his own day. Indeed, opposition to the Hasmonean takeover of the high-priesthood is probably the reason for the founding of the Qumran sect. The purple robe, always part of the garb of the Friends of the King, and the crown of gold were normal parts of priestly attire in the Hellenistic world. Jonathan assumed his position in 152 B.C. when he put on the Jewish high-priestly garments and celebrated the rites of the festival of Tabernacles (Sukkoth). At the same time he took advantage of his new autonomy to expand his army greatly (v. 21).

10:22-50, Demetrius I and His Defeat. Demetrius realized that he had been upstaged and sought to redress the balance by granting Jonathan even greater privileges. Since he was in fact the ruling sovereign, he was able to marshal a much more extensive list of concessions. Scholars have noted that his letter is addressed "to the nation of the Jews" (v. 25), not mentioning either Jonathan or his high-priesthood. It is possible that this was an attempt to woo the Jewish people away from Jonathan's leadership. Yet it is more likely that since he had not appointed Jonathan to his position, he preferred to make allusion simply to "the high priest" (v. 32). Demetrius ignored the agreement Jonathan had made with Alexander. The difficult syntax of this letter may be the result, if it is indeed genuine, of the fact that the author of 1 Maccabees translated it from Greek into Hebrew, from which it was later retranslated in the Greek text of 1 Maccabees.

The tribute mentioned in 10:29 refers to annual payments required from communities. The salt tax and crown levies were originally in-kind payments later converted to cash payments. All three taxes were to be abolished by Demetrius. The high proportion of the taxes on the grain and fruit (one-third and one-half, respectively) make it likely that these levies had been instituted to punish Judea for having revolted. The three districts to be added to Judea were Aphairema, Lydda, and Rathamin (see 11:34). These three areas, originally transferred to Judea from Samaria by Alexander the Great, had been taken away from Judea by Antiochus IV. In 10:38 Demetrius I proposes to join them again to Judea. Samaria and Galilee are mentioned together since they constituted a single province.

The granting of special status to Jerusalem (v. 31) meant that henceforth it would not be liable to attack except as a result of aggression by its citizens. It was also to be freed from Seleucid customs duties. Demetrius was even willing to surrender control of the citadel, the Akra, to the high priest. This would have meant the end of Seleucid domination over the city, tantamount to de facto independence for the Jews and recognition of the high priest as their ruler. Jewish captives, who must have been scattered throughout the Hellenistic world in the aftermath of the Maccabean wars, were all to be set free. Moreover, beasts of burden owned by Jews were to be exempt from forced service to the government (v. 33).

Demetrius also proposed that the days surrounding Jewish festivals and the festivals themselves were to be days of customs exemption for the Jews. They would not be compelled at these times to discharge civic duties or to appear in court. The right to serve as trusted members of the armed forces was to be restored to the Jews, who, led by Jewish officers, would be allowed to observe the laws of the Torah even while serving in the Seleucid army (v. 37).

The granting of Ptolemais and its revenues to the Temple (v. 39) was an empty gesture, since it was under the control of the pretender Alexander Balas. The grant may even have been intended to punish the city for supporting Demetrius' rival. Verse 41 is ambiguous. Tedeschi and the RSV take it to mean that "all the additional funds which the government officials have not paid as they did in the first years, they shall give from now on for the service of the temple" (RSV). Goldstein translates, "And if there should be any surplus which the officials in charge shall not have paid out, they shall apply it from now on, as in former years, to the needs of the temple." The disagreement concerns the identity of the officials. The RSV (following most scholars) assumes that these are Seleucid officials who from the time of Antiochus IV ceased paying various expenses of the Temple. Goldstein takes this statement as referring to the Jewish Temple officials. He conjectures that there had been a dispute regarding funds donated by the Seleucid rulers. Excess funds had been appropriated for building purposes, although the Seleucids expected them to be used for sacrifices. This letter formally permits the procedure of reassignment that had been used by Temple officials. Further, according to most scholars, v. 42 applies to the cancellation of a levy against the Temple by the Seleucids.

The right of asylum in the sanctuary, to which v. 43 refers, did not exist for any category of criminal in biblical tradition (Exod. 21:14), let alone for debtors. Here it is extended based on Hellenistic practice. In financing the rebuilding of the Temple and the city walls (v. 45), Demetrius follows the pattern set by the Persian kings (Ezra 6:8; 7:20).

The support of Alexander Balas by the Romans, long allies of the Hasmoneans (1 Macc. 8:1-32), must have been a factor in the decision of the Jews to reject the privileges offered by Demetrius. They chose to remain loyal to Alexander, judging his alliance as more reliable. After the defeat of Alexander Balas by Ptolemy VI Philometor and the establishment of Demetrius II, son of Demetrius I, as ruler of the Seleucid kingdom (11:14-19), these same privileges were reconfirmed by Demetrius II and, this time, accepted by the Jews (11:20-37).

Manuscripts of 1 Maccabees and interpreters are divided over the sequence of events in 10:48-50. After the initial confrontation, either the army of Demetrius or that of Alexander fled with the enemy in hot pursuit. If Alexander's army was in pursuit (RSV) we can easily understand how Demetrius was lost in battle. If it was Demetrius who gained the upper hand (Goldstein), then we must assume that Alexander rallied his men and turned the battle around, at which time Demetrius fell. (For a thorough discussion, see Goldstein.) In any case, with the death of Demetrius I in the summer of 150 B.C., Alexander emerged as undisputed king of the Seleucid empire.

10:51-66, Alexander's Meeting with Jonathan. Alexander asked for the hand of Cleopatra III Thea (v. 57), daughter of Ptolemy VI Philometor. (Alexander's letter of proposal is probably the composition of the author, not an authentic document.) Ptolemy VI had supported Alexander because of his hostility to Demetrius I, caused by the latter's attempt to take Cyprus from him in 156/155 B.C. The wedding took place in summer of 150 B.C., shortly after the defeat of Demetrius I.

Jonathan, invited to the wedding, took the opportunity to ingratiate himself with Ptolemy VI and Alexander Balas by giving manifold gifts to them and their officials, the Friends of the King (vv. 59–60). The protests of some hellenized Jews were of no avail. Jonathan was treated royally and elevated to a Chief Friend of the King (cf. 10:20, where he became a Friend). He was officially designated commander and governor of the province (v. 65). Jonathan's de facto control of the province of Judea had now become de jure.

10:67–89, Jonathan's Victories. Sometime after March of 147 B.C. Demetrius II, son of Demetrius I, attempted to recapture his kingdom from Alexander Balas. The latter had been an incompetent and unpopular king. Demetrius II had been sent by his father with a sum of money to the Greek city of Knidos, from which he set out with the help of mercenaries from Crete. Alexander returned to Antioch so as to cement his control of the Seleucid empire. In the meantime Apollonius, governor of Coele Syria (southern Syria) switched loyalties to Demetrius II, as he had originally been a supporter of Demetrius I. Camping at Jamnia (Yavneh on the Mediterranean coast) Apollonius challenged Jonathan to open combat (vv. 70–73). Jonathan, it seems, was the only local ruler to remain loyal to Alexander Balas.

Jonathan accepted the challenge together with Simon, his brother. Joppa, modern Jaffa, to the south of present day Tel Aviv, was a city on the coastal plain but adjacent to Jonathan's territory. He quickly overran the garrison of Apollonius' men.

Apollonius with his horsemen and infantry marched south through Azotus (biblical Ashdod), exposing his large force in the plain. Near Ashdod a major battle ensued, which turned out to be an ambush carefully laid by Apollonius (vv. 79–80). Jonathan's men held out until the enemy horses were exhausted. At that point Simon, whose men had been held in reserve and were fresh, quickly overwhelmed and dispersed Apollonius' forces. Jonathan pursued them to the temple of Beth-dagon, which he burned. The entire operation left Apollonius' army completely destroyed.

After hearing of his exploits at Ashdod, the people of Ashkelon quickly opened their city to Jonathan (v. 86). This foray into the coastal plain was the beginning of a process throughout the Hasmonean period of extending Jewish sovereignty to this region. Control of the coastal plain was necessary to stabilize Hasmonean rule over Palestine as a whole, as well as to make possible the economic prosperity that to a great extent depended on Mediterranean trade. Jonathan's defeat of an ally of Demetrius II led Alexander Balas to elevate Jonathan even further, from among the Chief Friends of the King (v. 65) to the status of Kinsman (v. 89). Since he already controlled Ashdod and Ashkelon, Alexander ceded Ekron to him.

11:1–19, Ptolemy VI's Invasion. Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 13.103–10) suggests that Ptolemy VI Philometor entered Palestine to help his son-in-law Alexander but soon discovered that Alexander plotted to kill him. As a result he decided to switch his allegiance to Demetrius II. 1 Macc. 11:1–8 presents Ptolemy's intentions as treacherous from the start. In any case, when he arrived, aided by Alexander's welcome, Ptolemy quickly took control of the country. He kept his intentions secret, pretending to befriend Jonathan, who accompanied him as far as the Eleutherus River, present-day Nahr el-Kebir, north of Tripolis in Lebanon.

Ptolemy took his daughter from Alexander and married her to Demetrius II, justifying his actions with the claim that Alexander had plotted to kill him. The author of 1 Maccabees sees this as a false charge, simply a justification for adding Alexander's territory to the Ptolemaic holdings (v. 11). Ptolemy soon took advantage of Alexander's absence in Cilicia (v. 14) and claimed the throne of the Seleucid empire for himself as well. Josephus, however, states that it was the people of Antioch who attempted to crown Ptolemy, although Ptolemy insisted they be ruled by Demetrius II (Antiquities of the Jews 13.113–115).

According to the first-century B.C. geographer Strabo, Alexander met Ptolemy in battle on the banks of the Oinoparas River in the plain to the northeast of the city of Antioch (Geography 16.2.8). Alexander fled to the east where he met his end at the hands of an Arab sheik (11:16–17). Ptolemy's death, laconically reported in 11:18, was said by the Roman historian Livy to have occurred as a result of surgery in July of 145 B.C. (Livy Summaries 52). The native population, to ensure that their cities would not be annexed by the Ptolemaic empire, immediately rose up and slaughtered the garrisons Ptolemy had posted in Seleucid territory (vv. 3, 18). By the summer of 145 B.C. Demetrius II ruled Syria after a five-year struggle to regain the empire of his father Demetrius I.

11:20–37, Jonathan and Demetrius II. Jonathan took advantage of the instability in the Seleucid empire to try to rid Jerusalem of the Seleucid garrison. (On the importance of control of the Akra, see the commentary above on 10:32.) Hellenistic elements in Judea appealed to Demetrius, so that Jonathan was forced to present himself at Ptolemais. There he demonstrated both his popular support and his wealth and declared his allegiance to Demetrius II. His tactics were successful, no doubt because the king was in need of such allies to consolidate his own power. He therefore confirmed the status of Jonathan as high priest and made him one of his Chief Friends, a status higher than that of Friend of the King.

The text of the letter that Demetrius issued (11:29–37) is parallel in many details to that of Demetrius I in 10:25–45, except that the mention of the Akra, which Demetrius I had offered to release (10:32), is conspicuously absent in the version of Demetrius II. From 11:41 we can gather that Jonathan had to agree at Ptolemais to lift his siege on the Akra, which he had left in place upon his departure (v. 23). The letter to Jonathan was in reality a copy of a letter Demetrius II sent to Lasthenes, chief of the mercenaries he had hired in Crete (Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 13.86). By now, Lasthenes had probably become Demetrius' leading minister (Goldstein). "Father" (v. 32) was an honorific title. In response to Jonathan's request (v. 28) Demetrius cedes three districts of Samaria to him (see 10:30, 38, and the commentary above). Aphairema is Ephraim; Rathamin is Ramathaim. (On the tax abatements of v. 34, see 10:29–30 and the commentary above.) Just as in 10:29, the exemption was for the Jews, designated in 11:34 as "those who offer sacrifice in Jerusalem," thus excluding the Samaritans (so Goldstein). Verses 32–36 are the text of Demetrius II's letter to Lasthenes. Verse 37 is an instruction from Demetrius to Jonathan to put a copy of his letter to Lasthenes prominently on display on the Temple Mount. The display of such decrees was common practice in the Hellenistic world.

11:38–53, Jonathan Aids Demetrius II. Demetrius made the mistake of retiring his troops, thus creating a large group of discontented, unemployed soldiers. He retained only the mercenaries who were probably hated by the population. This set the stage for Trypho's uprising. Trypho, whose real name was Diiodotus, was one of Alexander Balas's commanders at Antioch. He had been hostile to Demetrius I and II and had been involved in the attempt to crown Ptolemy VI Philometor in Antioch. By 144 B.C. he had taken the designation Trypho, "the magnificent." Then he convinced the Arab sheik raising Alexander's young son Antiochus to release the boy so that he could be crowned king. The Greco-Roman historian Diodorus gives the name of the guardian as Iamblichos, Semitic Yamliku (Diodorus Library of History 33.4a). This must be the origin of our author's Imalkue.

Jonathan turned now to diplomatic means to end Seleucid control of the Akra. The implication of Demetrius II's answer in vv. 42–43 was that he would relinquish control in return for Jonathan's sending him troops to help quell the incipient revolt against him in Antioch. As the rebellion increased in proportion, the king called on the Jewish soldiers (among other mercenaries), who through massive slaughter and destruction (the numbers in this passage all seem exaggerated) succeeded, at least temporarily, in keeping Demetrius in power. (See Goldstein, who supplies additional details from Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 13.135–41 and Diodorus Library of History 33.4.2–4.) Verse 53 implies that Demetrius did not turn the Akra over to Jonathan, despite his agreement (v. 42). The entire episode must have made the Jews unpopular in the Seleucid empire, since they had helped to preserve the rule of a brutal despot in the face of mass opposition. This opposition was now to lead to widespread support for Trypho.

11:54–74, Jonathan Is Again Victorious. Antiochus VI Epiphanes must have reigned, in name, from 145 to 142 B.C. Since he was the son of Alexander Balas and Cleopatra III Thea (daughter of Ptolemy VI Philopator), he could not have been born before 149 B.C. Clearly, his rule was but a fiction to legitimize that of Trypho. Demetrius II fled to Cilicia (Josephus) or to Seleucia (Livy), in either case continuing to hold parts of the kingdom. With the help of the disaffected veterans (see commentary above on 11:38–40), Trypho took Antioch. Over Antiochus VI's seal, Trypho confirmed Jonathan's high-priesthood, including its political powers, as well as naming him to be a Friend of the King, with all the attendant privileges. Simon's territory as commander (strategos) extended from Tyre (the Ladder of Tyre reached from Tyre to Haifa) to Wadi el-Arish, the border of Egypt. Trypho's alliance with so strong a supporter can only be explained in light of his need for Jonathan's wealth and military power. At the same time, Jonathan's survival among all these Seleucid pretenders could only be assured by such quick changes of allegiance.

"Beyond the river" (v. 60, RSV) refers to the area known in the Persian period as the province of 'Abar Nahara, "the Trans-Euphrates province" of Syria and Phoenicia (Goldstein). There Jonathan recruited allies. He then turned to establishing control of the Mediterranean coastline (see commentary above on 10:86–89). Gaza's resistance resulted from the close relations this city enjoyed with Demetrius II. Goldstein suggests that Jonathan was strategos of the province of Coele Syria, but not of Phoenicia. This would explain his reaching as far as Damascus.

Supporters of Demetrius II continued their resistance, assembling a large force at Kedesh, some four miles northwest of Meron. Meanwhile Simon successfully took the fortress of Beth-zur from the hellenized Jews. Jonathan and his men camped at the Sea of Galilee. The claim that all of Jonathan's men except two fled in the face of the ambush must be exaggerated, as realized already by Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 13.16), who suggested that about fifty men remained. Jonathan is here pictured as turning to prayer in the face of great danger. As the tide of battle turned, his men returned and defeated the forces of Demetrius II decisively, showing that Jonathan's prayer was answered. After this narrow escape, Jonathan returned to Jerusalem.

12:1-23, Alliances with Rome and Sparta. Because the time was propitious (Gk. kairos, "time," appears here in 12:1 in the sense of fortune or luck), Jonathan decided to renew the alliance with Rome (see chap. 8). The Spartans, to whom Jonathan also sent letters, had themselves demonstrated friendship to Rome. The description that follows is consistent with the diplomatic usages of the period. Jonathan's ambassadors were sent sometime between the start of the reign of Antiochus VI in 145 and the death of Jonathan in 143 B.C. As was customary, all ambassadors were allowed to address the senate. In addition, letters of safe conduct were normally granted.

What follows in 12:6-18 is the text of the letter from Jonathan to Sparta. (From v. 2 it seems that other such letters were sent to other places, but our author did not include them.) Goldstein argues at length for the authenticity of this letter. In v. 6 "the senate" (RSV) obscures the use of Greek gerousia, correctly rendered "the Council of Elders" (Goldstein). This is the first mention of the existence of such an institution in the Hasmonean era. Jonathan's government had been transformed from that of a rebel chieftain into an organized polity supported by a representative council. Jonathan refers to a letter (quoted in vv. 19-23) sent to Onias I, high priest from 320 to 290 B.C. (Zeitlin), or to his grandson Onias II, second half of the third century B.C. (Goldstein) by Arius I, king of Sparta in 309-265 B.C. Jonathan asks the Spartans to renew the terms of "alliance and friendship" that the original correspondence had proffered. The letter accents the renewal of the Hasmonean alliance with Rome in view of Sparta's close relations with Rome. Of the two ambassadors mentioned in v. 16, Antipater's father may be the Jason who made the first alliance with Rome in 8:17. Both men appear again in 14:22, 24 and may have been members of diplomatic families.

The letter that purports to be a copy of the one the Spartans sent to Onias I or II (v. 7) is judged by most scholars to be inauthentic, although some accept its veracity (see Goldstein for arguments in favor of its authenticity). The claim of v. 21 that the Jews and Spartans are both descended from Abraham must have come from some lost Hellenistic work. Such speculations on the kinship of nations appear in both pagan and Jewish histories of the Hellenistic era. The letter intended that the envoys who brought it would enlarge on the nature of Sparta, its culture and its people.

12:24-53, Trypho Captures Jonathan. The author returns to the narrative of chap. 11. Jonathan sought to avoid meeting the army of Demetrius II in his own territory, so he marched to the region of Hamath (modern Hama in Syria), known as the Amathitis, in the Orontes Valley. Goldstein's translation of 12:26, "were preparing to attack them," ignores the technical, military sense of Greek tassontai. Better is "were drawing up in formation to attack them [the Jews]" (cf. RSV; Tedesche). The enemy used a ruse to avoid Jonathan's attack and escaped across the Eleutherus river. Failing to overtake the forces of Demetrius, Jonathan attacked a local Arab tribe.

The tribe of the Zabadeans probably gave their name to Zebdani, northwest of Damascus. Jonathan had mastered an empire that in the east extended as far as that of the United Monarchy under David and Solomon. At the same time Simon was actively consolidating control of the coastal plain (vv. 33-34). Joppa (Jaffa) had apparently not been garrisoned by Jonathan after he took it (see 10:76). The area was in danger of coming under the control of Demetrius II, whose stronghold was on the coastal plain of Phoenicia.

Jonathan was constrained to consult the elders before undertaking the various projects. These elders were probably the members of the gerousia, the council. Jonathan's status in Antiochus VI's empire allowed him to fortify Jerusalem. He attempted to cut off the citadel (Akra), still occupied by the forces of Demetrius II, to starve the occupants out (v. 36). The wall of Jerusalem facing the Kidron Valley on the east was also repaired. Adida, which Simon fortified, is Hebrew Hadid (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37), located less than four miles east-northeast of Lydda, on a hill above the plains of Judea.

Goldstein's translation, that Trypho "plotted" to become king, is to be preferred to the RSV's "attempted" (1 Macc. 12:35), since the actual murder of Antiochus VI would not take place until after that of Jonathan. Trypho intended to remove the boy king and to assume the rule of the Empire ("Asia"). Jonathan had amassed so much power that he constituted the main threat to Trypho's assumption of the Seleucid monarchy. Apparently Trypho thought he would easily lure Jonathan to Bethshan, but Jonathan came so heavily escorted that Trypho had to resort to a ruse.

Trypho offered to grant Jonathan Ptolemais, that is, Hebrew Acco. Although Demetrius I had proposed to give it to the Jews (10:39), they had rejected his entire offer. Its inhabitants had remained hostile to the Hasmoneans.

Jonathan entered Ptolemais with only a thousand men. Trypho had sent ahead orders to seize Jonathan and kill the rest. Trypho's men attempted to overtake and destroy the other two thousand of Jonathan's soldiers who had been left in Galilee, but they were able to withstand the attack. Jonathan's troops thought, however, that he had been killed, and so, on their return all Israel mourned for him. 1 Macc. 12:53 indicates that both Seleucid pretenders, Demetrius II and Trypho, were now enemies of the Jews (Zeitlin).

The Rule of Simon

13:1–30, The Death of Jonathan. The death of Jonathan left the people shocked. Simon had to rally them to stand firm against the onslaught of Trypho. It is doubtful if 13:3–6 actually preserves the words of Simon. Rather, this speech is probably from the pen of the author. Simon is pictured as presuming his brother Jonathan to be dead. In response to his address, the people declare Simon to be hegoumenos (Gk.), "leader, chief." Jonathan had been designated archonta kai hegoumenon, "ruler and leader," in 9:30.

The walls of Jerusalem, which Jonathan had started to rebuild (12:36–37), were not yet complete, so Simon hastened to finish the work (13:10–11). Simon feared that the inhabitants of Joppa (Jaffa) would defect to Trypho, opening up for him the southern coastal plain. So he sent Jonathan son of Absalom to occupy it. He may have been the brother of Mattathias son of Absalom, favorably mentioned in 11:70.

When Trypho set out to invade Judah, taking the still living Jonathan with him, Simon confronted him from the fortified town of Adida (see 12:38). Again Trypho resorted to a ruse, claiming that he was holding Jonathan for non-payment of debt. The money he claimed must have been either an unpaid fee of some kind or a tax Jonathan had failed to collect (Goldstein). Although Simon saw through the promises of Trypho, he had little choice but to comply, fearing a loss of popular support if he did not (13:17–18).

Trypho finally was ready to face Simon in the field. Trypho's army traveled through the lowlands from the south, but Simon blocked him at every point from entering the hill country to approach Jerusalem. Adora, where Trypho tried to circle around Simon's forces, is biblical Adoraim, about six miles southwest of Hebron.

The men of the Akra were short of provisions as a result of the steps Jonathan had taken in 12:36. Their appeal to Trypho led him to finally chance cutting through, but at the last minute he was prevented by a snowstorm. Instead he turned toward Gilead where he killed Jonathan, probably out of frustration. Baskama, where he buried Jonathan, cannot be identified. It is curious that the people of the Akra, supporters of Demetrius II, turned to Trypho. If this report is accurate, it would indicate that now that Trypho had broken with Jonathan, they saw him as a potential ally.

Jonathan, who had been buried in Baskama, was disinterred and reinterred in Modein where 1 Maccabees says that Mattathias (2:70) and Judah (9:19) and, as we see, Eleazar, John, and now Jonathan were buried (13:25–30). The elaborate tomb and monument has been explained by Goldstein as including motifs common in the Hellenistic period for commemorating victory in both land and sea battles.

13:31–53, Simon Brings Independence to Judea. Trypho now felt powerful enough to have the young king Antiochus VI, probably seven years old at the time, murdered. Livy relates that Trypho arranged to have the king's surgeons kill him while supposedly operating to remove a stone. Thus in 143 or 142 B.C. Trypho crowned himself king of the Seleucid empire ("Asia"). The chaos that ensued allowed Simon to intensify his efforts to fortify Judea.

In addition, Simon was now in an enviable diplomatic position. Trypho had violated his agreements with Simon, and his military and political position was deteriorating rapidly. Demetrius II was in need of support and seemed about to emerge victorious. Simon therefore sent emissaries to Demetrius to ask for tax relief in return for his loyalty. Demetrius agreed, citing his earlier grant of privileges to the Jews (11:30–37), which he now reconfirmed. In his letter, quoted in 13:36–40, Demetrius alluded only subtly to the Hasmonean support of Trypho and Antiochus VI. Most significantly, he granted the tax exemptions.

To our author, this tax relief was tantamount to the culmination of the Hasmonean quest for freedom from foreign domination. Finally, from 142 B.C., tribute would no longer be paid to the Seleucids. Accordingly, documents would henceforth be dated according to the high-priesthood, not according to the reigns of Seleucid rulers. Simon, we may conclude, had been elected to the high-priesthood after Jonathan's death. (On the titles granted to Simon, see commentary above on 10:59–66; 11:54–59.)

Gezer (Gazara) and the Akra were the two remaining Hellenistic strongholds Simon had to conquer. (The reading “Gaza” in the Greek text of 13:43 must be corrected with Josephus.) After conquering Gezer, he set about turning it into a traditional Jewish town, expelling the Hellenistic pagans and destroying their idols, and, it seems, driving out hellenized Jews as well. He built a palace there, intending to guarantee his continued control of the region.

By 141 B.C., Jonathan’s walls (12:36), as intended, had led to a serious food shortage in the Akra (13:49). Its inhabitants sued for peace and were expelled by Simon. The idols were also removed. As in the case of the conquest of Gezer, Simon and his men sang hymns of praise, probably psalms. They carried palm branches as symbols of victory. Indeed, this day was decreed a holiday and was listed in the Megillat Ta’anit, the Scroll of Fasting. Only later were such minor feasts abolished in favor of Hanukkah and Purim. Although Josephus claims that Simon razed the citadel, the account of 1 Maccabees is to be accepted. Our author appends the remark that by this time John Hyrcanus, Simon’s son, was ready to assume a role of leadership. He was appointed as military commander (hegoumenon) and lived in Gezer, while Simon took up residence in the recently conquered Akra in Jerusalem.

14:1–15, The Glory of Simon. Trypho was by now extremely weak. The rising Parthian empire had by 142–141 B.C. already taken Babylonia from the Seleucids. Demetrius II marched off to oppose that threat. Our author interpreted this decision as an attempt to increase the size of his army so as to finally defeat Trypho (14:1). Arsaces VI (Mithradates I), king of Parthia in 171–138 B.C., was at this time in Hyrcania (near the Caspian Sea). He dispatched his generals, who soon took Demetrius captive. Other sources indicate that after he was exhibited as an object lesson for Parthia’s subjects, Demetrius was later married to Mithradates’ sister.

It is difficult to understand why a poem in praise of Simon appears at this point in the text (14:4–15). We would have expected it either at the end of chap. 13 or at the end of 14. The poem may originally have constituted the conclusion of the book, as Josephus ceases following 1 Maccabees in his account at this point. The poem praises Simon for his military exploits but, more importantly, for living in accord with the Torah and for bringing peace and prosperity to his people. In v. 15 we learn that he donated vessels to the Temple, a matter not alluded to elsewhere.

14:16–24, Alliances with Rome and Sparta. From vv. 16 and 17 it is clear that the rumors concerning Jonathan’s death and Simon’s accession circulated separately, so that the two events appear to have been separated by some time. In view of his still precarious position as high priest, an office in which the Seleucids had not yet confirmed him, Simon sought to gain the recognition of the allies of the Hasmoneans. Verse 18 reports that the Spartans wrote to Simon to renew the alliance previously established with the Hasmoneans (see 12:5–23). The envoys mentioned in the Spartans’ letter are the very same envoys who were sent by Jonathan to Sparta and Rome in 12:16–17. Simon relied on their previous experience and their personal contacts to ensure their success. Only Numenius proceeded on to Rome. The shield of gold he presented to the Romans is said to have weighed a thousand minas, over a thousand pounds (14:24).

Goldstein, to solve a variety of chronological and textual problems, places 15:15–24 (containing the conclusion of Numenius’ mission and the Roman’s letter of reply) between 14:24 and 14:25. In fact, the last part of 1 Maccabees (from the end of chap. 13 on) is poorly edited, and there is no reason to expect this letter to have appeared in its proper place.

14:25–49, The Great Assembly. In gratitude for the accomplishments of Simon and his family an assembly of the Jews promulgated a document in praise of Simon that was inscribed on bronze tablets and displayed on Mount Zion. The document was dated to September 13, 140 B.C. (Goldstein). There is one textual problem in v. 28. The RSV translates “in Asaramel,” taking Greek asaramel as a place name. The Greek word may be a rendering of a Hebrew phrase, either hasar ‘am ‘el, “the courtyard of the people of God,” or sar ‘am ‘el, “prince of the people of God.” Goldstein and Zeitlin prefer to assume that the text is corrupt and to translate “and prince of God’s People” (Goldstein), taking this phrase as a title given to Simon alongside that of high priest. The document was proclaimed in a great assembly. While some scholars wish to see this as indicating the existence of an ongoing Sanhedrin, the occasion should be understood instead as an ad hoc gathering that occurred only on such major occasions as the official installation of a new high priest.

The first section of the document (vv. 29–34) recounts the glorious deeds of Simon and is in many ways a prose parallel to the poem in 14:4–15. In addition to matters already narrated in 1 Maccabees, we learn here of Simon’s financial commitments to the liberation of his people. The passage stresses Simon’s efforts to bring the entire country under Jewish control, not only Judea but also the border town of Beth-zur and the cities of the coastal plain.

Verse 35 states that Simon became leader and high priest before capturing the Akra (so chaps. 13–14). Indeed, this document shows that the “great assembly” that issued it was convened only to confirm the high-priesthood and temporal rule of Simon; Simon’s status had already been recognized by Demetrius II (13:36) and by the people (13:42). Our text claims that Simon’s alliance with Rome led Demetrius II to recognize him. Yet the order of events in 1 Maccabees would place the Roman exchange after Demetrius II’s letter. It is possible that Simon had dispatched his ambassadors to Rome immediately after the death of Jonathan and that he had secured a response before Demetrius II’s letter. It is also possible that our author was confused about the chronology and drew this incorrect conclusion from the information before him.

The clause contained in 14:41–45 is the resolution that follows the series of “whereas” clauses in vv. 29–40. These, therefore, are the new conditions bestowed by the assembly. Simon’s high-priesthood is to be hereditary. Recognizing that he is not of the Zadokite line, the document provides that this status is to continue “until a true prophet shall arise.” In addition, the document spells out his power over the Temple and the privileges to be extended to him by the people. Verse 45 concludes the document with a clause indicating the consequence of its violation. Goldstein suggests that “shall be liable to punishment” (RSV) refers to the death penalty.

In 14:46–49 the text records that both the people and Simon officially accepted these conditions. Therefore, in accord with normal legal usage of the Hellenistic period, copies of the agreement were to be provided for both sides. The copy of the document for the people was to be set up in public (perhaps in the Temple; cf. v. 27) while that for the Hasmoneans was to be deposited in the Temple archives (so Zeitlin).

15:1–14, Simon and Antiochus VII. Antiochus VII Euergetes (reigned 138–129 B.C.) was known as “Sidetes,” since he grew up at Side in Pamphylia, in southern Asia Minor. He was the son of Demetrius I and younger brother of Demetrius II. After his brother was captured by Arsaces (see 14:2–3), he attempted to gain control of the Seleucid kingdom for himself. His main obstacle was Trypho, who was still in control of much of Syria. Naturally, he turned to Simon to enlist him as an ally. The “islands of the sea,” from which Antiochus wrote, is probably a reference to Rhodes, where Antiochus received news of his brother’s capture, according to the ancient historian Appian (Syrian Wars 68). He confirmed all the privileges accorded to Simon by his brother Demetrius II and the other Seleucid pretenders. The granting of rights of coinage was new and meant that Simon could produce bronze coins. This clearly represented a further step in the direction of independence. These promises, however, were apparently abrogated (see 15:28–31).

In 38 B.C. Antiochus VII arrived in the Seleucid territory. He was unable at first to make any headway until the advisers of Cleopatra III Thea, originally the wife of Alexander Balas (10:58), then of Demetrius II (11:9), advised her to throw her lot in with Antiochus VII and marry him. This alliance resulted in the mass desertion described in 15:10 (Goldstein, based on Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 13.221–222). Trypho took refuge in Dor, nine miles north of Caesarea, an ancient Phoenician port that had remained faithful to him. Antiochus VII had substantial forces, although the numbers in v. 13 are probably exaggerated. Excavations at Dor have revealed evidence of this battle. The account of this siege is continued below in v. 25.

15:15–24, Renewal of Ties with Rome.

Goldstein places this section between 14:24 and 14:25 (see commentary above on 14:24–25), and, indeed, in its present place it interrupts the description of the siege and capture of Dor. Further, the addressing of a letter to Demetrius II (15:22) can only be possible before the Romans learned of his capture by the Parthians. The consul Lucius, named as author of the letter in v. 16, has been identified by Goldstein as Lucius Caecilius Metellus, who was consul in 142. Goldstein considers this letter to be chronologically earlier than its place in the book. Zeitlin identifies the author as Lucius Calpurnius Piso, 140–139 B.C., assuming the text to be in order. In any case, this consul wrote letters to numerous kings and countries, and a copy of one such letter was delivered to Simon. The acceptance of the gold shield (see 14:24) indicated Roman willingness to renew their ties with the Hasmoneans. New to this document is the granting of the right of extradition to Simon. (For the identification of the kings and localities, see Goldstein and Zeitlin.)

15:25–16:10, Defeat of Cendebeus.

Verse 25 returns to the narration of the siege of Dor, after the interruption of vv. 15–24. Although there are some difficulties with the translation of v. 25, the verse seems to refer to a siege after the one Antiochus laid in v. 14. Simon, believing that he had entered into an alliance with Antiochus VII, attempted to come to his aid. By this time, after his marriage to Cleopatra III Thea and the attendant alliances, Antiochus no longer felt that he needed Simon, so he took a harder line. His envoy demanded the return of the Seleucid strongholds Simon had taken, seeing them as falling outside the privileges granted by Demetrius II. Further, he demanded the contraction of the Hasmonean realm to the original province of Judea, long outgrown by the exploits of Jonathan and Simon. Antiochus' true colors were shown when he demanded payment of tribute in lieu of the return of all these territories.

Athenobius, the king's envoy, delivered this message to Simon in person (v. 32). Simon argued that he had the right by law to reconquer Jewish territory and to protect his people from their enemies. For the gold and silver service that Athenobius observed, see 11:58, where Antiochus VI granted Jonathan the right to use such vessels. Simon's offer to pay only one-fifth of the tribute demanded (v. 35) left Athenobius and Antiochus VII offended.

Meanwhile, Trypho had succeeded in running the naval blockade (15:14), escaping through Ptolemais (Acco) to Orthosia, a few miles north of Tripolis. He then moved on to Apamea where he met his end, perhaps by suicide, after being besieged by Antiochus VII (Goldstein). Antiochus VII appointed Cendebeus commander of the coastal region and instructed him to invade Judea (vv. 38–39). Moving down the coast, Cendebeus first came to Jamnia (Yavneh), where he attacked the Jewish population. From there he proceeded to fortify Kedron (biblical Gederoth [Josh. 15:41], modern Katra, southeast of Ekron), using it as a guerrilla post from which to menace Judea.

John Hyrcanus, Simon's son, had been appointed commander of the army and was headquartered at Gazara (see 13:53). He must have seen firsthand the havoc wreaked by Cendebeus. Perhaps he realized that Simon's age was hindering him from taking decisive action. Simon is pictured in 16:1–3 as realizing his failing and passing this responsibility on to his sons Judah and John. The Greek text of v. 3 has Simon refer to his brother (sing.) but Tedesche and Goldstein think that the plural ("brothers") should be read.

The subject of v. 4 is ambiguous. The text says only "he selected . . ." The translators of the RSV assume that John Hyrcanus is meant. Goldstein, apparently following Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 13.226–227), assumes that Simon is the subject. That assumption raises problems, since Simon had just withdrawn from command in v. 3. The wording of v. 9, however, raises problems for the assumption that John is the subject of the preceding verses. If John were the subject, v. 9 might be expected to read "Judah, his brother," whereas the text has "Judah, the brother of John." On balance, though, John is the more likely subject. The battle described in vv. 5–10 probably took place near the brook of Ayyalon, a short distance from Modein (Goldstein). The use of cavalry by the Hasmonean forces (v. 7) is not mentioned earlier in 1 Maccabees. Placing the cavalry in the middle of his formation was certainly not a usual tactic. In any case, although Judah was wounded, the enemy was routed by the Hasmonean army.

16:11–24, The Death of Simon and Accession of John Hyrcanus. Ptolemy, Simon's son-in-law, was strategos of the region of Jericho. In 134 B.C. he succeeded in treacherously murdering Simon, as well as his sons Judah and Mattathias. The site of the murder, Dok, is probably to be identified with Jebel ed-Duq, near the spring 'Ain Duq, some three to four miles northwest of Jericho.

Ptolemy asked Antiochus VII to support him, offering to reduce the country to the status it held before Jonathan and Simon's military and diplomatic successes. His attempt to have John Hyrcanus assassinated was foiled, however, apparently bringing to an end the ignominious career of Ptolemy son of Abubus. The Dead Sea sect believed that the fate of Simon was a punishment for his having violated the curse against rebuilding the city of Jericho (see 4QTestim).

The author concludes in the style of the book of Kings. John ruled and served as high priest from 134 to 104 B.C. No chronicles of the high-priesthood as described in vv. 23–24 are known to have existed, although much historical material on the reign of John Hyrcanus is preserved in the writings of Josephus.

2 MACCABEES

LAWRENCE H. SCHIFFMAN

INTRODUCTION

For a discussion of the name of the Second Book of Maccabees and its historical background, see 1 Maccabees, "Introduction."

Composition and Contents

2 Maccabees is an abridgment of a lost five-volume work by an otherwise unknown author, Jason of Cyrene, North Africa. Both Jason's history and the abridgment were composed in Greek, and the present book exhibits a refined rhetorical style. 2 Maccabees begins its account in the time of Seleucus IV (187–175 B.C.) and details the events leading up to the Maccabean revolt. From this book we learn of the Hellenistic reform and of the various parties of Jews whose actions ultimately led to the decrees of Antiochus IV (175–164 B.C.). 2 Maccabees then continues to recount the career of Judah the Maccabee (whose name in Gk. is Judas Maccabeus), ending after his defeat of Nicanor in 161 B.C. The entire span of the period covered by the book is approximately fifteen years.

It seems most likely that the abridger worked directly from the works of Jason of Cyrene, shortening Jason's lengthy text into this small book. Either he or a later hand added the two letters in 2 Macc. 1:1–2:18. It is difficult to judge the full extent of the work of Jason. In view of its five-volume length, it is difficult to believe that it would only have been a more detailed history of these fifteen years. It may be that the abridger selected a period of great importance to him and prepared an abridgment and adaptation of Jason's account of that period. As to the letters, there are a number of indications that they were added by a third hand, since they are not fully integrated into the text as it now stands. They may have been added in an attempt to propagate the observance of the festival of Hanukkah, which celebrated the purification of the Temple by Judah in 164 B.C. A few other additions were certainly made by either the abridger or some other editor.

Sources

2 Maccabees quotes a variety of Seleucid documents. These, presumably, were already present in the work of Jason. The quoted documents are generally regarded as authentic, even if sometimes incorrectly placed in the history. Identifying other sources used by the author is more difficult. Because of the extensive similarities between 1 and 2 Maccabees, it has been claimed that the author of 2 Maccabees used 1 Maccabees as a source, but this is unlikely. There are too many discrepancies between the two works. The possibility that both 1 and 2 Maccabees had a so-called common source raises similar problems. Although the details remain speculative, we should probably assume that some of the sources of 1 and 2 Maccabees were common, such as a biography of Judah, while other materials were distinct to each work.

Relation to 1 Maccabees

The historical periods covered by 1 and 2 Maccabees differ significantly. Both begin with the events of the Hellenistic crisis (in the 170s B.C.), but 2 Maccabees ends its account with Judah's victory over Nicanor in 161 B.C., while 1 Maccabees continues until the death of Judah's brother and successor, Simon, in 134 B.C. Although much of the account given in 2 Maccabees agrees with that of 1 Maccabees, a number of small differences exist. In particular, 2 Maccabees sometimes follows an incorrect order of events. The prime example is the placement of the rededication of the Temple after the death of Antiochus IV, when it actually occurred before. On the other hand, the account 2 Maccabees gives of the events leading up to the revolt is far more accurate and detailed than the sketchy and incorrect summary in 1 Maccabees 1.

Dating

It is generally assumed that Jason used oral reports in his history, and, therefore, that he wrote not long after 161 B.C. Goldstein, however, argues that Jason wrote in about 90 B.C. and that he sought to refute the pro-Hasmonean bias of 1 Maccabees. This theory seems overly speculative and unlikely, however. It is certain that the abridgment was made before the Roman conquest of 63 B.C. and probably before 124 B.C., since that is the date of the first letter appended to the book (2 Macc. 1:1–9).

Theology

Jason, or the summarizer, emphasizes certain religious ideas: the centrality of Temple worship, supernatural intervention in human affairs, division of body and soul, and the bodily resurrection of the pious dead. He seeks to demonstrate several times that God punishes evildoers, measure for measure, with punishments that point out the wickedness of their deeds. Because history is a manifestation of divine justice and retribution, the misfortunes of the Jewish people result from their own transgressions. Hence, the text gives a full account of the events leading up to the revolt. The punishments Israel must suffer are designed to bring it back to the right path and are a manifestation of God's love for his people.

Circulation

The first-century historian Josephus apparently did not know 2 Maccabees, as it is not used in his account in The Antiquities of the Jews. The book of 4 Maccabees, however, is clearly dependent on 2 Maccabees. Among the church fathers 2 Maccabees was well known, especially because of the descriptions of martyrdom that became paradigmatic for the Christian church.

COMMENTARY

1:1-2:32

Introductory Materials

1:1-9, Letter to the Jews of Egypt. Although preserved now only in a Greek translation, the letter to the Jews of Egypt was originally written in Hebrew or Aramaic. Even in translation the introductory part of the letter (vv. 1-6) reflects the standard epistolary style of Hebrew and Aramaic letters from the Hasmonean period. Verse 1, the salutation, is notable for the prominence given to Jerusalem. The series of pious prayers in vv. 2-6 are conventional good wishes, included as a formality, and should not be taken to reflect particular problems among the Egyptian Jews or subtle criticisms by the senders that the Jews of Egypt are not doing the will of God "with a strong heart and a willing spirit" (v. 3, RSV).

The letter is a specimen of a well-known type, a festal letter, sent from Jerusalem to inform Jews in outlying areas of the correct way to observe an upcoming holiday. Such documents are attested from biblical times (see 2 Chron. 30:1-9; Esther 9:20-23) through the Talmudic period (b. Sanh. 11a-b). An actual copy of such a festal letter was recovered among the papyrus documents of the Egyptian Jewish colony of Elephantine, new modern Aswan. That letter, which was sent in 419 B.C., called on the Jews of Elephantine to observe the approaching festival of Passover.

The present letter, which is dated ca. 124 B.C. (2 Macc. 1:10), quotes an earlier festal letter (in vv. 7-9) that had been written during the reign of Demetrius II, in 143 B.C. Apparently, in 143 the Judeans had appealed to their Egyptian brethren to observe Hanukkah, and now, some twenty years later, they are again sending a festal letter to remind their coreligionists of the holiday and its significance. Verses 7-8 give a highly abbreviated version of the Maccabean crisis and its resolution. Jason, who is mentioned in v. 7 as the source of the troubles, had become high priest in 175 B.C. (His Hellenistic reform is described in 2 Macc. 4:7-22.) Jason's rebellion against "the kingdom" (1:7) probably refers to his usurpation of the high-priestly office. The burning of the gates of the Temple (v. 8) is mentioned in 1 Macc. 4:38. The shedding of "innocent blood" with which Jason is charged may refer to the murder of circumcised infants along with their mothers and other members of their families (1 Macc. 1:60-61). While Jason was not directly involved in these killings, the author of the letter traces ultimate responsibility to Jason. The author's understanding of the means by which the crisis was resolved is significant. The allusion in 2 Macc. 1:8 to the prayers of the community and God's help totally ignores the role of the Hasmoneans in overthrowing the Hellenizers. In the aftermath of the victory and the cleansing of the sanctuary, the regular sacrificial worship was restored. Verse 8b is a summary of the events described in 1 Macc. 4:36-51 and 2 Macc. 10:3. After quoting the letter of 143 B.C., the present letter goes on to call for the observance of Hanukkah (1:9). It is here designated "the feast of booths [Tabernacles, Sukkoth] in the month of Chislev [November-December]," since the first Hanukkah celebration had been celebrated in the manner of Sukkoth. The Maccabean soldiers had been unable to celebrate Sukkoth properly at its appointed time (2 Macc. 10:5-7; cf. 1 Macc. 4:52-59, where no mention of Sukkoth appears).

1:10-2:18, Second Letter to the Jews of Egypt. The salutation of the letter states that it was written by the Jews of Judea and Jerusalem, as well as the council of elders (Gk. gerousia) and Judah. Although it is undated, the letter claims to have been written shortly before the purification of the Temple, i.e., in 164 B.C. (1:18; 2:16). In fact, there is reason to believe that this letter is a much later composition. (See the lengthy argument of Goldstein, who dates the letter to 103/102 B.C.) The letter is addressed to Aristobulus, a Jewish philosopher who flourished during the time of Ptolemy VI Philometor (reigned 180-145 B.C.). There is no independent confirmation that Aristobulus served as a teacher of Ptolemy VI, though the fourth-century A.D. church historian Eusebius does preserve extracts of Aristobulus' philosophical treatise on the Torah, which he dedicated to Ptolemy VI. The letter further identifies him as a member of the family of "anointed priests," that is, of the high-priestly Oniad family. His lineage and his relationship to Ptolemy made him a key figure in the Egyptian Jewish community, and the letter was therefore addressed to him.

The letter thanks God for taking the side of the Judeans against Antiochus IV Epiphanes and for bringing about Antiochus' death at the hands of the priests of Nanea (vv. 11-17). Nanea was a goddess of Mesopotamian origin, identified by the Greeks with Aphrodite and Artemis, whose temple was in Elam. Antiochus feigned participation in a sacred marriage ritual in the hope of plundering the temple treasury. According to our letter, Nanea's priests killed Antiochus, a divine punishment for the robbery of temples. According to 1 Macc. 6:1-16 and 2 Macc. 9:1-28, Antiochus was not killed by the priests of the temple but died of illness sometime after his failed attempt to plunder the pagan temple.

This letter also seeks to enlist the Jews of Egypt in the observance of Hanukkah. It is to be celebrated "as Days of Tabernacles [booths, Sukkot] and Days of the Fire, as when Nehemiah, the builder of the Temple and the altar, brought sacrifices" (Goldstein; cf. Tedesche; RSV, which must be corrected accordingly). The author of the letter means that Hanukkah is to be celebrated in a manner like that of Sukkot and of the Day of the Fire. Nehemiah is here given credit for what the Bible records in the name of Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:1-13). While there is some late evidence that the two figures were identified or confused with one another (see b. Sanh. 38a), Ben Sira, writing in the early second century B.C., clearly distinguishes the two men and their accomplishments (Sir. 49:11-13).

2 Macc. 1:19-35 give an account of the origin of the festival of the Day of the Fire, a celebration not mentioned in any other text. The author of the letter recounts a legend in which the priests of the First Temple hid fire from the altar in a dry well when they went into exile. (The reference to Persia [v. 19] as the place of the Jews' exile is an anachronism. Babylonia, to which the Jews had been exiled in 587 B.C., became part of the Persian Empire only in 539.) The fire, which changed to the highly flammable liquid naphtha (vv. 20, 36), was retrieved at Nehemiah's direction and put on the altar of the newly rebuilt Second Temple. Its spontaneous combustion served to authenticate the altar and its renewed sacrificial service. Although otherwise quite unknown, the festival of the Day of the Fire was presumably commemorated by the lighting of lamps or fires. For this reason, the author of the letter uses it as a paradigm for Hanukkah. The entire story may have been influenced by familiarity with the role and transportation of sacred fires in Zoroastrianism (see Goldstein).

The author puts a prayer of supplication into the mouth of the people (vv. 24-29). Prayers of similar nature are known from the Dead Sea Scrolls and from rabbinic sources. The language of the prayer contains many biblical echoes (cf., e.g., Exod. 34:6-7; Neh. 9:31-33). Goldstein also notes that 2 Macc. 1:24-25 resembles the opening benediction of the Amidah, a traditional prayer it was obligatory for every Jew to recite. After the prayer, as the sacrifice was burning, the Levites (here called "priests") sang psalms. Verses 31-32 describe some further use of the naphtha to make fire, but unfortunately the Greek text of these verses is obscure and cannot be translated with confidence. The miraculous nature of the events is recognized by the Persian king who, himself a fire worshiper, established a shrine at that location. The author of the letter concludes with a folk etymology of the word "naphtha," claiming that it is derived from Hebrew niftar, "was exempted, freed," which he takes to mean "purified." The word actually comes from Akkadian naptu, "petroleum."

The narrative about Nehemiah and the miraculous fire provides the occasion for the author to introduce other legendary traditions associated with Jeremiah, whom the author claims was the person who ordered the fire of the altar to be taken and hidden during the Exile. The author of the letter makes repeated claims that what he says about Jeremiah is to be found in authoritative texts (2:1, 4). No other writing preserved from antiquity contains the legend of Jeremiah and the altar fire, however. Similarly, there is no other known source for the claim that Jeremiah gave the departing exiles a copy of the Torah (2:2a), although the warnings against idolatry (2:2b) are a reference to the contents of the apocryphal Letter of Jeremiah. There was an ancient tradition that Jeremiah hid the Ark of the covenant when the Babylonians sacked Jerusalem. Although the earliest version of the story is known only from the first-century B.C. Greco-Roman historian Alexander Polyhistor, he clearly derived his information from a Jewish source, perhaps Eupolemus, the author of a book entitled Concerning the Kings in Judea. This Eupolemus is perhaps the same man sent by Judah as an ambassador to Rome (see 1 Macc. 8). The claims of 2 Macc. 2:1–8, that Jeremiah also hid the tabernacle and the incense altar on Mount Nebo, near the place where Moses died, go beyond the information Alexander Polyhistor relates. All in all, 2 Macc. 1:10–2:18 reminds us that a lively literary tradition about the legendary accomplishments of various biblical figures developed during the Hellenistic period, even though most of these texts are now lost.

In 2:9–12 the author seeks to point out the parallelism between Moses' dedication of the altar and Solomon's. Both shared the miraculous, spontaneous consumption of the sacrifices, as had also occurred in the time of Nehemiah (2 Macc. 1:22). 2 Macc. 2:11, however, is enigmatic. The quoted words of Moses, which appear nowhere in Scripture, refer to a dispute between Moses and Aaron in Lev. 10:16–20 as to whether the meat of the sin offering was to be eaten by the priests. But it is not clear how Moses' words are to be related to that dispute or to the dedication ceremonies of the tabernacle and the Solomonic Temple which are the subject of vv. 9–10 and 12. The author understood 1 Kings 8:65 and 2 Chron. 7:9 to indicate that Solomon had celebrated an eight-day dedication ceremony. Goldstein is no doubt correct that our author meant in 2 Macc. 2:11 to establish that the eighth day (see Lev. 9:1) was part of the dedication ceremony. To this end he cited the requirement that the meat of the sin offering must be eaten on the eighth day as well (cf. Exod. 29:33–37). Hence the author asserts that the dedications of Moses and Solomon, like that of Judah—the festival of Hanukkah—were celebrated for eight days. He has therefore cited precedent for both aspects of Hanukkah, the use of fire, as exemplified in 1:19–36, and the eight-day period of celebration, in 2:9–12.

In the conclusion to the letter (2:13–16), Nehemiah is said to have celebrated the rededication of the Temple for eight days, a claim that cannot be paralleled from any other source. Nehemiah's founding of a library (v. 13) is also unknown. The letter informs the Jews of Egypt that Judah also collected all the sacred writings which Antiochus IV had attempted to destroy (see 1 Macc. 1:56). The materials listed in 2 Macc. 2:13 as the library of Nehemiah must, in fact, have been the contents of the protocanon reassembled by Judah. The author concludes the letter with the hope that the Jews of Egypt will join in the celebration of Hanukkah and that they will soon be gathered to the land of Israel.

2:19–32, The Abridger's Prologue. It is here with 2:19–32 that the book proper begins. The two letters (1:1–2:19) were placed at the beginning of the already complete abridgment. Since the book is an abridgment of the five-volume history by Jason of Cyrene, the author begins with a brief description of that work, the only information regarding it that we have. Jason's history was probably written in the mid-second century B.C. At the outset the abridger makes clear that Jason's emphasis was on Judah and his exploits. The abridger claims to have altered nothing, only to have shortened the work and to have made it more accessible to general readers. Such self-serving claims are common in the introductions of classical histories and must be taken with a grain of salt.

Background of the Revolt

3:1–4:6, Onias III and Simon. The history begins with a description of the idyllic conditions prevailing during the high-priesthood of Onias III, son of Simon the Just, who was high priest before 175 B.C. Contributions to the Temple had in fact been made by the Ptolemies (during the third century B.C.) and by the Seleucid king Antiochus III (reigned 233–187 B.C.). Seleucus IV Philopator (reigned 187–175 B.C., son of Antiochus III), continued this practice. Later sources reflect a debate as to who should pay for the daily sacrifices. The Pharisees insisted that the expense be paid from public funds, while the Sadducees required that the high priest defray the expenses. In any case, all agreed that Jews had to donate the daily sacrifices, although it was permitted for non-Jews to contribute voluntary sacrifices or funds for the upkeep of the Temple. It is most probable, then, that Seleucus IV contributed to the general upkeep of the Temple.

Verses 4–7 introduce the conflict that sets in motion the plot of 2 Maccabees. Unfortunately, textual problems complicate the identification of two of the protagonists of this section. While the Greek manuscripts describe Simon as “of the tribe of Benjamin” (RSV), Latin and Armenian texts have “from the [priestly] clan of Bilgah” (Goldstein). (The clan of Bilgah was condemned by later tradition for events that took place during the Maccabean revolt [m. Sukk. 8:8, t. Sukk. 4:28].) It is impossible that Simon's brother Menelaus could have served as high priest (see 2 Macc. 4:23–24) if he were of the tribe of Benjamin, since priests had to be of the Aaronidic clan of the tribe of Levi. The reading “Bilgah” is therefore to be preferred (Tcherikover, pp. 401–402). Apollonius is understood by the Latin versions to be “son of Tharseas” (so Goldstein), although some commentators, in light of the appearance of an Apollonius son of Menestheus with the same office in 4:4 and 21, have taken the text to mean that he came from Tarsus (so RSV; Tedesche). Simon was serving as the administrator of the Temple. If he was a priest, his office was probably identical with that known in rabbinic sources as segan ha-kohanim, "prefect of the priests," a title for the second in command below the high priest. The quarrel between Simon and Onias III concerned the office of market supervisor, to which Simon wanted to be appointed. This official in Greek cities was responsible for inspecting the quality of merchandise, licensing merchants to sell in a particular market, and recording legal transactions. The Temple funds about which Simon informed Apollonius were those of private individuals deposited for safe-keeping with the Temple. Simon argued (v. 6) that these could be appropriated without committing the horrible sacrilege of plundering a temple. Since the Seleucid kings were frequently short of money, the situation presented a tempting opportunity.

In claiming that Heliodorus' entire tour of inspection was a cloak for his plan to plunder the Temple (v. 8), the author undoubtedly reflects his own perspective more than the facts of the case. Probably Heliodorus was on a tour through the province and as part of his business in Judea intended to confiscate the money. When confronted by Heliodorus, Onias III identified a substantial sum as belonging to Hyrcanus, son of Joseph son of Tobias (v. 11). The Tobiards had been loyal to the Ptolemies until the conquest of Palestine by Antiochus III in 202-198 B.C. The other Tobiards switched allegiance to the Seleucids, while Hyrcanus took refuge in the Transjordan and remained a supporter of the Ptolemies. The fact that the Temple accepted private deposits from a sworn enemy of the Seleucid realm and that Onias III could relate this so casually led Heliodorus to move ahead with his plans.

Contrary to what Simon claimed (v. 6), the Jews saw Heliodorus' act as a sacrilege, even though the funds were those of private individuals. The sanctity of the Temple was supposed to render the deposits inviolable (v. 15). We can well imagine that many Jerusalem citizens who had their money there may have faced the prospect of economic ruin. The highly dramatic and emotional description of the people's distress in vv. 14-21 is characteristic of the author's style of history writing.

2 Macc. 3:24-29, as already observed by Bickerman (pp. 172-90), is a conflation of two different versions of how God intervened to protect his sanctuary. Verses 24-25 and 29 describe how a horse and rider, visible to everyone, attacked Heliodorus and left him and his bodyguards helpless. According to vv. 26-28, he is beaten by two young men who appear only to him, while his guards are unable to assist him. (The two young men reappear in v. 33, where they attribute Heliodorus' recovery to the intercession of Onias III.) Both of these versions have parallels in Greek literature. Apparently, the author of 2 Maccabees had two sources before him and wove the two versions into his composition.

Modern, rationalistic commentators have suggested that Onias III may have perpetrated a ruse on Heliodorus. Others suggest that in reality some diplomatic or financial accommodation was reached. Whatever may have happened, Heliodorus was forced to retreat from his plan. God's power had been demonstrated (see vv. 37-39), and the people of Jerusalem rejoiced. Our author tells us that Heliodorus was revived through the agency of Onias, who offered what must have been a burnt offering on his behalf. Upon his recovery, Heliodorus brought a freewill offering as was permitted for non-Jews, took leave of Onias III, and returned home. There he testified to the greatness of God and his protection of Israel. The author of 2 Maccabees uses this account of Heliodorus to present the theme of the entire book: "He who has his dwelling in heaven watches over that place himself and brings it aid, and he strikes and destroys those who come to do it injury" (v. 39, RSV).

Simon, as the true instigator of Heliodorus' abortive attempt to pillage the deposits in the Temple, sought to shift the guilt to Onias III, his rival. The sympathies of the author are not in doubt. He presents Onias III in the most favorable light (vv. 1-6), undoubtedly obscuring a political situation that was in reality much more complex. Simon had a powerful ally in the person of the governor, Apollonius son of Menestheus, who is perhaps to be identified with Apollonius of Tarsus (see commentary above on 3:5). Onias found it necessary to seek a personal interview with the king. Although we do not hear further about Simon, Onias seems to have remained permanently at Antioch (see v. 33).

4:7-50, The Hellenistic Reform. Seleucus IV died on September 3, 175 B.C. The ancient historian Appian claims that he was killed in a plot hatched by Heliodorus. Whether or not Appian's information is correct, Heliodorus himself was then driven out by supporters of the successor, Antiochus IV Epiphanes. 2 Maccabees is less interested in Seleucid dynastic politics than in the change in the Jewish highpriesthood that occurred shortly after the accession of Antiochus IV. Although Onias III was still alive, his brother Jason bribed Antiochus IV not only to appoint him high priest but also to allow him to institute the Hellenistic reform that would change the legal status of Jerusalem and reconstitute it as a Greek city or polis. Among other things, this meant the establishment of two central public institutions, the gymnasium and the ephebeion. 1 Macc. 1:14 mentions only the gymnasium, an educational and athletic institution. Yet the ephebeion was also central to the Hellenistic way of life. (The RSV's "a body of youth" for Greek ephebeion [2 Macc. 4:9] is too vague.) The ephebeion was an organization that provided civic, military, moral, and literary training for males within the walls of the gymnasium. Ephebic education opened to the "graduate" participation in the economic and social advantages of the Hellenistic world. In Jerusalem, the ephebeion was intended to engender widespread cultural change. The decision to reorganize the city of Jerusalem as a Hellenistic polis to be called Antioch and to enroll its citizens as Antiochenes was intended to effect the corresponding political change. Jason and his supporters sought to hellenize Jerusalem and, by extension, the entirety of Judea.

In setting up the polis, Jason abolished the decree of Antiochus III that had guaranteed the Jews the right to live according to the laws of the Torah and their ancestral way of life (Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 12.138-46). This decree had been negotiated by John, whose son Eupolemus negotiated the treaty between Judah and the Romans (1 Macc. 8:17). The gymnasium was located immediately below the acropolis, which may designate either the Temple Mount or the Akra, the citadel (Goldstein; see also 2 Macc. 4:14, which shows that the Temple and the gymnasium were in close proximity). In the Greek gymnasium, the exercises were performed naked, the participants wearing only the petasos, a broad-rimmed hat worn for protection from the sun. The report of the removal of circumcision (by epispasm) in 1 Macc. 1:15 suggests that Jewish youth also trained naked.

Although Jason is castigated by the author as wicked and as an illegitimate high priest (since Onias III was still alive and, technically, high priest), he also reports that there was considerable popular enthusiasm for Jason's reforms. Hellenism (our author is the first to use the term) must have already become influential even among elements of the priesthood well before the Hellenistic reform. The author of 2 Maccabees is fond of stating explicitly the moral lessons he wishes readers to learn from his narration. In vv. 16-17 he places the blame for the persecutions of Antiochus IV on the hellenizing tendencies of elements of the Jewish population, which he characterizes as "irreverence to the divine laws" (v. 17, RSV).

The Greek games of Tyre were held every four years, although it is not possible to identify the exact date of the games mentioned in v. 18. They were of sufficient importance for Antiochus IV to attend. The games were dedicated to the chief god of Tyre, Phoenician Melqart, who was identified with the Greek deity Hercules (or Heracles). Fees paid by participants were used for sacrifices in honor of the god. Unwilling to violate Jewish law and participate in pagan worship, even indirectly, the envoys whom Jason had sent with the money asked that their funds not be used for sacrifices but instead be applied to the building of galleys. Jewish attitudes about such matters were far from uniform. The Jewish author Eupolemus (probably to be identified with the Eupolemus mentioned in 1 Macc. 8:17 as the close associate of Judah the Maccabee and negotiator of the friendship treaty with Rome) noted with pride in his book Concerning the Kings of Judea that Solomon had sent a golden pillar to Hiram of Tyre "which is now set up in the temple of Zeus in Tyre." Although it is highly unlikely that there is historical substance to the claim, what is interesting is that Eupolemus evidently did not think the gift religiously improper.

In vv. 21-22 the author describes one final vignette of Jason's term as high priest, the visit of Antiochus to Jerusalem and his welcome by Jason and the city. The background to the visit is as follows.

Apollonius (cf. v. 4 and commentary) attended a royal celebration of Ptolemy VI Philometor (ruled 180-145 B.C.) that took place in about 172 B.C., when the king was fourteen years old. Cleopatra, mother of Ptolemy VI and sister of Antiochus IV, had recently died. As a result, the Ptolemaic house now had second thoughts about the peace treaty it had signed with Antiochus III in 192 B.C. This treaty had been sealed by the marriage of Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus III, to Ptolemy V Epiphanes. When Antiochus IV learned of this change of heart on the part of the Ptolemaic government, he moved southward, along the coastal plain (Joppa is modern Jaffa, south of Tel Aviv) to forestall any designs on Palestine that young Ptolemy VI's advisers might have. In this connection, Antiochus IV visited Jerusalem.

Three years after Jason's accession as high priest and during the same year as Antiochus' visit to Jerusalem (172 B.C.), Menelaus traveled to the king. The Greek of v. 24 is ambiguous as to whether Menelaus flattered the king or exaggerated his own importance. Like his brother Simon, he was a priest of the house of Bilgah (see commentary above on 3:4-7). In any case, he bought the high-priesthood by offering to raise the yearly tribute to 660 silver talents, a sum he was soon unable to pay. Jason's flight to Ammon (4:26) may have been to the fortress of Hyrcanus the Tobiad. Lysimachus now held the post occupied by his brother Simon in 3:4. When the commander of the Akra, who represented the interest of the Seleucid monarchy in Judea, was unable to get payment from Menelaus, the two of them were summoned before Antiochus IV. Lysimachus, the brother of Menelaus, was left in charge as Menelaus' deputy.

But the King was not in residence in Antioch, having left to put down a rebellion in Tarsus and Mallus, cities in Cilicia, in Asia Minor. Menelaus attempted to settle his affairs with Andronicus, the official Antiochus had left in charge, by using sacred vessels to pay Andronicus the tribute he owed to Antiochus IV. Onias III, the legitimate high priest, who had been living in Antioch since 175 B.C., took himself to the temple of Apollo and Artemis, located five miles outside of Antioch at Daphne. Temples were considered places of asylum in the Hellenistic world. From there he condemned the sacrileges of Menelaus. Although Josephus offers contradictory reports (Jewish War 1.33; 7.423), it does indeed appear that Onias III was killed by Andronicus at the instigation of Menelaus. Yet Andronicus actually was executed by Antiochus IV for killing the child Antiochus, son of Seleucus IV. Our author may have placed Jewish affairs at center stage, and hence, misinterpreted the execution of Andronicus (cf. Goldstein). The melodramatic style of the author is again evident in his account of Antiochus' grief at Onias' murder and his rage at Andronicus (vv. 36-38). The plundering of the Temple vessels was such a great offense that it led to rioting in Jerusalem, and, eventually, to the killing of Lysimachus (v. 42).

It is not possible to tell if Menelaus was taken to trial at Tyre from Antioch or if he had already returned home before he was summoned. The accusation that Menelaus had plundered the Jerusalem Temple was put forward by members of the gerousia, the council of elders. Menelaus again appealed to bribery. Ptolemy son of Dorymenes, who acted on Menelaus' behalf, is probably the governor of Coele Syria and Phoenicia in 8:8. In 1 Macc. 3:38 he is chosen by Lysias to fight Judah, along with Nicanor and Gorgias. (He is probably not to be identified with Ptolemy Macron [10:12], who is reported to have been well disposed toward the Jews.) Because of the intervention of Ptolemy son of Dorymenes, Antiochus IV decided to acquit Menelaus and to execute the members of the gerousia who had pressed charges. The author compares the "justice" of Antiochus unfavorably with that of the Scythians, a tribe from what is now southern Russia with a reputation for excessive brutality.

5:1-27, Antiochus IV and the Desecration of the Temple. 1 Macc. 1:20 dates Antiochus' plundering of the Jerusalem Temple to 169 B.C. Yet his second campaign against Egypt, which is associated with the attack on the Temple in 2 Maccabees 5, occurred in 168 B.C. While it is possible that our author considers the entry of the Seleucid army into Palestine in 172 B.C. (4:21-22) to be the first phase of the invasion, and this to be the second, Goldstein solves the problem by translating "Antiochus made preparations for his second departure against Egypt," thus making possible the dating of his plundering of the Temple in 169 and the invasion in 168 B.C. The report of apparitions of troops of soldiers in the sky (vv. 2-4) is similar to the types of omens recorded by various Greco-Roman writers as preceding significant events (see Josephus Jewish War 6.298).

Jason, the perpetrator of the Hellenistic reform (4:7-12), had been displaced by his agent Menelaus (4:23-25) and had fled to Ammon (4:26). When he heard the false report that Antiochus IV had died, Jason took advantage of the situation to try to regain the high-priesthood (5:5-7). He must have been opposed both by the followers of Menelaus, who took refuge in the Akra, and by the nonhellenized Jews as well (Zeitlin). This opposition must have led him at some point to give up the fight and to flee again toward Ammon.

Jason was imprisoned by Aretas, the Nabatean ruler. After escaping from or being freed by Aretas, Jason made his way to Egypt, expecting that the Ptolemies would welcome an opponent of the Seleucids. In 168 B.C., as Antiochus IV prepared to invade Egypt, Jason fled to Sparta (also known as Lakedaimon), appealing to the ancient legend that claimed common kinship for the Jews and the Spartans (1 Macc. 12:7). Apparently, he did not succeed in finding refuge there. Our author reminds us (2 Macc. 5:10) that he suffered measure for measure for the transgressions he committed, a theological notion already found in 4:8. The circumstances of his death, however, are not reported.

Jason must have fled (5:7) after hearing that Antiochus IV was returning from Egypt. Antiochus IV knew that both the pro-Ptolemaic factions and the traditionalists were united against his puppet, Menelaus, so he interpreted the strife in Jerusalem as directed against him. In light of his perception that Judea had revolted, he felt legally and morally entitled to massacre and despoil the city, actions that otherwise would have been considered prohibited by law and custom. It is probable that numbers in v. 14 are exaggerated, even in light of a population estimate of 120,000 offered by Hecataeus of Abdera (Josephus Against Apion 1.197).

By this time, Antiochus IV had liberated Menelaus from his refuge in the citadel. Menelaus then conducted the king on a tour of the Holy of Holies, within the area of the Temple non-Jews were forbidden to enter. The text of v. 16 is unfortunately corrupt, but should probably be interpreted to mean that Menelaus handed over certain sacred vessels to Antiochus.

Antiochus failed to understand that he was serving as the instrument of God's anger, which was but temporary. The idea that God used foreign kings to punish rebellious people had a long history in Israelite religion. In the eighth century B.C. the prophet Isaiah referred to Assyria and its king as "the rod of my anger" (Isa. 10:5). It is only because God was using Antiochus, the author reasons, that he did not suffer the same fate as Heliodorus (chap. 3). In 5:19-20 our author states one of his fundamental theological presuppositions. God sanctified the Temple Mount and the city of Jerusalem to raise the spiritual level of his people who dwelt in the land of Israel. Through the sanctuary they would be given the opportunity to commune with God through prayer and sacrifice. Therefore, the fate of the Temple would reflect the spiritual and religious state of the people. If they transgressed and had to be punished, the Temple might be defiled or destroyed. Yet when the people repented and returned to God, as in the days of Judah the Maccabee, the Temple would be restored to its sanctity and purity, reflecting that of the Jewish people.

Antiochus IV must have plundered both the deposits of individuals and the Temple funds belonging to the community designated for sacred purposes. He thought Judea so secure that he left various officials in Judea (5:21-23). Philip, from Phrygia in western Asia Minor, was probably appointed commander of Jerusalem and the highest Seleucid official in Judea. He appears again in 6:11 and 8:8 but is probably not the regent mentioned in 9:29. Andronicus (certainly not the one who intervened on behalf of Menelaus in 4:31-38, as he was executed) was in command over Samaria. Menelaus continued to serve as high priest.

Although the text of 5:24-26 is ambiguous, it must be Antiochus IV who sent Apollonius to Jerusalem after some two years (167 B.C.; see 1 Macc. 1:29), because disturbances against Menelaus continued in Judea. In 1 Macc. 1:29 Apollonius (whose name is not mentioned) is described as "a chief collector of tribute," no doubt a corruption of his real title of "Mysarch," commander of mercenaries from Mysia in northwestern Asia Minor. Apollonius employed a ruse, pretending to be friendly, and then attacking on the Sabbath, a fact omitted in the account in 1 Macc. 1:29-35. The account in 1 Maccabees also supplements 2 Macc. 5:26 in important ways. 1 Macc. 1:33-35 attributes the founding of the Akra, the Seleucid citadel of Jerusalem, to Apollonius' invasion.

Judah the Maccabee is described in 2 Macc. 5:27 as the earliest leader of the revolt, already beginning his guerrilla struggle at this time. Contrast the account of 1 Maccabees 2, which, besides identifying Judah's father, Mattathias, as the first to raise the banner of revolt, places the start of the revolt only after the decrees of Antiochus (1 Macc. 1:41-64; cf. 2 Macc. 6:1-11). Indeed, Judah is the central hero of 2 Maccabees, and it may be that our author wished to cast him as aware of the dire situation even before the repressive decrees of Antiochus IV. The accounts of both 1 and 2 Maccabees contribute to a correct historical reconstruction of the events, but neither is wholly accurate. 1 Maccabees is correct in attributing to Mattathias a role in the early stages of revolt. But 1 Maccabees incorrectly sees the decrees as the cause of the revolt, whereas 2 Maccabees understands that the decrees resulted from Antiochus' desire to support the Hellenizers in the internal Jewish struggle precipitated by the Hellenistic reform.

6:1-17, The Earliest Persecutions. The agent of the king is identified in v. 1 as geronta athenaion, an ambiguous Greek expression that may be rendered "Geron the Athenian," "the elderly Athenaeus," or "the Athenian Elder." This agent, whatever his name, was charged with enforcing the decrees of Antiochus IV, which are themselves omitted by our text (for the decrees see 1 Macc. 1:41-50). The author of 2 Maccabees probably thought it sufficient to relate the results of the decrees (6:3-7:42). Not only were the persecutions to be directed against the Jews, but the Samaritans, still considered as Jews in the Hellenistic world, were to suffer as well. The identification of the God of Israel with Zeus was meant to transform Judaism into one of the syncretistic religions of the Greek world in which Near Eastern and Greek traditions were combined. Indeed, in the period of the Israelite monarchy, some Israelites had similarly identified the God of Israel with the various local Baals (see the polemic of the prophet Hosea against such beliefs, e.g., Hos. 2:16; 5:6-7). The attributes selected for the names of the Jewish and Samaritan temples were themselves innocuous. Olympios meant "Most High" and Xenios meant "Protector of Strangers." Yet name changes would bring in their wake fundamental changes in worship and the prohibition of Jewish practice.

Sacred prostitution similar to that known from the old Canaanite cults was introduced into the Temple (v. 4). Since v. 5 refers to the offering of impure animals (including swine [1 Macc. 1:47]), it is likely that the end of 2 Macc. 6:4 should be translated with Goldstein, "and also brought forbidden things inside." This would be a reference to the introduction of the idol described in 1 Macc. 1:54. The prohibition of confessing oneself to be a Jew (2 Macc. 6:6) is taken by Goldstein as a reference to the twice daily recitation of the Shema ("Hear, O Israel"), which is already mentioned by Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 4.212) and which is attributed to Second Temple times in m. Tamid 5:1. The cessation of the Jewish sacrifices, mentioned in 1 Macc. 1:45, is not mentioned here.

2 Macc. 6:7-9 describe various attempts to coerce the Jews to participate in non-Jewish religious observances. The king's birthday was celebrated monthly in Hellenistic monarchies and involved sacrifices. Partaking of pagan sacrifices, however, was anathema to Jews and was prohibited by Exod. 34:15. The festival of Dionysus (Bacchus) occurred yearly, usually in the autumn around the time of the grape harvest. It was celebrated with orgiastic dancing, and the usually inebriated participants wore ivy wreaths. The beginning of 2 Macc. 6:8 may be translated "At the suggestion of Ptolemy" (RSV), referring to Ptolemy son of Dorymenes (see 4:45), although Goldstein argues for translating "on the proposal of the citizens of Ptolemais." In any case, these persecutions were extended beyond the borders of Judea to the Hellenistic cities of Syria and Palestine. The death penalty for those who refused to "hellenize" is mentioned in the decree of 1 Macc. 1:50 and in the narrative of 1 Macc. 1:57.

2 Macc. 6:10-11 briefly alludes to the killing of the women whose sons had been circumcised (cf. 1 Macc. 1:60-61) and the story of those who died in caves on the Sabbath (cf. 1 Macc. 2:29-38). Our text, however, neglects to explain that the victims would not fight on the Sabbath and, therefore, there is no mention of Mattathias' decree (1 Macc. 2:39-41). This omission fits well with the author's attribution of the initial leadership of the revolt to Judah, rather than Mattathias.

The author feels constrained to enter into the issue of theodicy (2 Macc. 6:12-17) before recounting the horrible suffering of Eleazar (6:18-31) and the mother and seven brothers (7:1-42). He proposes that God's quick punishment of the Jewish people for the sins of the Hellenists is evidence of God's mercifulness, since it prevents further transgression and punishment. In dealing with the non-Jews, God allows them to continue their misdeeds until they are worthy of complete destruction. Hence, readers should not question God's justice in chaps. 6 and 7.

6:18-31, The Martyrdom of Eleazar. The story of Eleazar (6:18-31) and the mother and seven sons (7:1-42) were independent stories of the genre of martyrdom accounts that our author incorporated into his work. Brief reference to these two stories occurs in 1 Macc. 1:62-63. In both cases the martyrdom came about because of the refusal to eat pork that was offered as a pagan sacrifice. Eleazar, one of the leading scribes, would not violate the Torah's restriction against eating pork (Lev. 11:7; Deut. 14:8) or the prohibition against eating pagan sacrifices (Exod. 34:15). Some of the hellenized Jews had respect for him and so suggested a ruse whereby he would eat kosher food, while appearing to eat the forbidden food. He judged even this a violation of the Jewish law, a position with which later rabbinic tradition agreed.

Eleazar's speech may have been composed by our author in the style of Greek historians who took the liberty of filling in such words. In any case, Eleazar argued that even if he might technically avoid violation of the law, the appearance of transgressing (Heb. mar'it 'ayin, a technical term in rabbinic parlance) would lead others astray and was, therefore, as serious a violation as the act itself. Further, he asserted that this violation would be punished in the hereafter, if not in this world. In v. 28 the reading "he went" must be preferred to "he was dragged," which occurs in some manuscripts, since it is clear that he voluntarily surrendered his life rather than violate the divine law.

The very same Hellenizers who had tried to save him turned against Eleazar (v. 29), probably because his heroism cast their compromise in a bad light. Goldstein contrasts this story with that of Mattathias in 1 Macc. 2:1-28. Whereas Eleazar, intending to serve as an example to his people, accepted martyrdom and did not rebel, Mattathias rose up in the same circumstances to lead his people to armed rebellion. In origin, then, the two stories presented very different ideal types, the martyr and the rebel. The author included the Eleazar story in 1 Maccabees, even though he would soon describe the rebellion of Judah and his brothers. He intended the Eleazar material as evidence of the extent of the persecution and the devotion of the Jews to their ancestral faith, not as a course of action preferable to revolt. Some Jews did believe that martyrdom alone would provoke divine intervention. Such a view is evident in the pseudepigraphical writing The Testament of Moses. The first edition of this work was written during the time of Antiochus' persecutions.

7:1-42, The Martyrdom of Seven Brothers and Their Mother. The story of the mother and seven sons that takes up all of chap. 7 is narrated in 2 Maccabees as another example of the horrors of Seleucid persecutions. Yet, like the story of the martyrdom of Eleazar (6:18-31), the original intent of this story may have been to counsel passive rather than active, military resistance. This story appears in various versions in ancient and medieval Jewish sources. The historicity of the story can no longer be determined in light of its appearance in the traditional form of a martyr legend. As is, the story lacks both geographical and chronological setting. Yet our author presents it among the events leading up to the revolt, indeed as a justification for taking up arms against the Seleucid rulers. The story alluded to in 1 Macc. 1:62-63, along with that of Eleazar. Here again, the Seleucids demanded that Jews eat pork, probably from pagan sacrifices (see 2 Macc. 7:42).

The family has been arrested for the practice of Judaism and is being interrogated. Horrible tortures of the sort described in chap. 7 are indeed known from the ancient world. (After the Crusades and the Holocaust, we have no reason to doubt the terrible inhumanity our author ascribes to those who persecuted the Jews.) In v. 6 the author refers to the poem in Deuteronomy 32, identifying it by an adaptation of the words of Deut. 31:21 as "The Song Which Bore Witness Against [the Jewish People]." The highly influential poem of Deuteronomy 32 accused the Israelites of disobedience and ingratitude toward God, as a result of which God would punish his people. But eventually, as Deut. 32:6 states, "He will have compassion on his servants." By quoting this ancient poem the author uses it to interpret the Hellenistic crisis. Jason's hellenizing innovations had been identified as a sin that would provoke divine anger (2 Macc. 2:16–17). But even in the midst of the persecutions the theological model provided by Deuteronomy 32 gave grounds for hope.

While the account of the torture of the first brother asserts only the justice of God, the second brother proclaims in the Hebrew language the concept of resurrection of the dead (7:8–9). The third son adds that at the resurrection, the dismembered bodies would be restored to perfection (v. 11). The fourth asserts that he will be resurrected, but that Antiochus, because of his transgressions, would not be (v. 14). The fifth calls attention to the temporal nature of Antiochus IV's power (vv. 16–17). God, he says, will torture the king and his descendants. (The horrible death of Antiochus IV is described in 9:5–9. Antioch V Eupator, son of Antiochus IV, was killed at Demetrius I's order according to 1 Macc. 7:4.) The sixth explains to the king why it is the Jews who suffer, while he does not (vv. 18–19). The explanation consists of the traditional Jewish theodicy: the Jewish people suffer because of their sins. Yet, says the sixth boy, despite the fact that Israel deserves its fate, he, Antiochus, will be punished for "having tried to fight against God" (RSV).

As her sons are being tortured, the mother encourages them in Hebrew (vv. 21–23). Her argument is that as God created her sons originally, he will give them back their life again. Although there are similarities between the mother's language and that of Ecclesiastes (see esp. Eccles. 11:5), she shares none of Ecclesiastes' skepticism about the afterlife (Eccles. 3:19–21).

As a last resort Antiochus appeals to the seventh son with offers of reward rather than threats of punishment (2 Macc. 7:24). (On the status of Friend of the King, see 1 Maccabees, "Commentary," 2:1–28.) When the son refuses, the mother leads Antiochus to believe that she would persuade her youngest son to eat the pork. Instead, in Hebrew, she begs him to stand steadfast (vv. 27–29). We follow most commentators in seeing in v. 28 an assertion of the theory of creatio ex nihilo, God's creation of matter out of nothing. She tells her son: just as God created the universe out of nothing, he will again bring you back to life in the end of days. She pleads with her last surviving son to give his life, for otherwise, if he fails to sanctify the divine name (to use classical rabbinic terminology), he will not be deemed worthy of resurrection in the end of days, and she will not be reunited with him. The seventh son's final speech (vv. 30–38) recapitulates the theological assertions of his six brothers who went to their deaths before him. The author of the speech assumes the notion of a division of body and soul, both of which the youngest son is prepared to surrender rather than to violate the laws of the Torah. The boy prays that, like ancient Pharaoh, Antiochus IV will come to acknowledge the God of Israel (v. 37). His sacrifice and that of his brothers should be the last his people must suffer. The manner of the mother's death is not described. Details are supplied in a variety of later sources (see Zeitlin). Throughout the episode (cf. vv. 24, 39) the king believes he is being mocked. To the very end, even after the horrible deaths of the seven boys, he fails to perceive the steadfast faith of the Jewish people and their devotion to their God and the Torah He gave them.

Judah's Wars Against Antiochus IV

8:1–36, Judah's Early Victories. The text now returns to the story of Judah's heroism, already introduced in 5:27. Here, as there, there is no mention of Mattathias and his role (see commentary above on 5:27). 2 Macc. 8:1–8 is parallel to 1 Macc. 3:1–9. The author of 2 Maccabees also includes in v. 5 a brief reference to Judah's early victories, which are recounted in 1 Macc. 3:10–26. His earliest efforts were directed to raising an army and mounting a guerrilla struggle against the Seleucids. (On the surname Maccabeus, see 1 Maccabees, "Introduction.")

1 Macc. 3:25–4:25 parallels 2 Macc. 8:8–36. Comparisons will be noted below. 2 Maccabees is, however, unaware of the information given in 1 Macc. 3:27–37 concerning Antiochus' departure for Persia and his appointment of Lysias to oversee affairs in his absence. According to 2 Macc. 8:8 Philip (see 5:22 and commentary), governor of Judea, appealed to his immediate superior, Ptolemy (see 4:45 and commentary) for help in resisting the guerrilla attacks of Judah and his men. In 2 Maccabees, Nicanor (cf. 14:12–15:37) is sent by Ptolemy, assisted by Gorgias. According to 1 Macc. 3:28 Lysias, the king's viceroy, at the command of Antiochus IV, was to send a force to oppose Judah. Lysias appointed Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias. 2 Maccabees preserves a more reliable account here, since it is unlikely that Judea stood at the center stage of Seleucid foreign and military policy at this time. Further, in the ensuing campaign in 1 Macc. 3:40–4:25, Ptolemy does not appear. This makes sense if, in fact, he was not one of the commanders.

The financial difficulties of the Seleucid empire were proverbial (cf. 1 Macc. 3:28–31). Our author, however, is incorrect in suggesting in 2 Macc. 8:10–11 that Nicanor wanted to raise money to pay off the tribute owed to the Romans as a result of their defeat of Antiochus III in 189 B.C. In fact, this debt had already been paid off by 173 B.C., according to the Roman historian Livy. The selling of slaves was a regular part of all ancient warfare, and slave traders assembled spontaneously when needed. Our author, in his attempt to portray Seleucid persecution of the Jews, suggests that this time a special invitation was sent out by Nicanor. The cities of the seacoast were predominantly inhabited by hellenized pagans who would have been happy to share in the spoils of Seleucid campaigns against Judah.

Verses 12–23 describe the manner in which Judah, serving as a priest, fulfilled the commands for the rites of battle found in Deut. 20:1–10. This same ritual is alluded to in 1 Macc. 3:54–57. According to 1 Maccabees the preparations took place at Mizpah (1 Macc. 3:46). The report that those who were cowardly fled (2 Macc. 8:13) alludes to Deut. 20:8–9, except that in 2 Maccabees 8, those who were afraid left of their own accord, even before the ritual. The selling of property undertaken in v. 14 refers to those who had built new houses or planted new vineyards. According to Deut. 20:5–6 such soldiers should have returned home. Rather than leave their stations, however, they sold the property in question. The Maccabean fulfillment of the laws of war of Deut. 20:1–10 indicates that they did not accept the later rabbinic interpretations (m. Soṭa 8:7) that limited the application of these laws to offensive warfare of an optional character. Here we have the Maccabees fighting a defensive war of obligatory nature and still observing these rituals.

2 Macc. 8:16–20 contains the exhortation that Judah, as a priest, delivered to his army in accord with Deut. 20:2–4. He calls attention to the defilement and plundering of the Temple by Antiochus IV (2 Macc. 5:15–16; 1 Macc. 1:20–24) and the Hellenistic reform, according to which the ancestral government by the high priests, in accord with the laws of the Torah, had been replaced by the decrees of Antiochus. The mention of divine assistance against Sennacherib is a reference to the narrative of 2

Kings 18:13–19:37, which recounts Sennacherib's unsuccessful siege of Jerusalem in which 185,000 were said to have died. The other occasion to which Judah refers is nonbiblical. The Galatians were Celts who settled in large numbers in central Asia Minor in the early Hellenistic period. The reference here must be to Galatian mercenaries. Goldstein suggests that these soldiers supported Antiochus Hierax in his war with his brother Seleucus II Callini (reigned 247–226 B.C.). Some Jews must have fought on the side of Seleucus II along with the Macedonians. Although vastly outnumbered by the Galatians, the Jews and Macedonians were victorious, a triumph Judah attributes to aid from heaven.

Judah, following his interpretation of Deut. 20:9, completed the rite by appointing the provosts and dividing the men into military units (2 Macc. 8:21–22). The list of Judah's brothers is incongruent with that of 1 Macc. 2:2–5. Rather than assuming the existence of two additional brothers, as some do, we prefer to understand Joseph as a confusion for John and to read Eleazar in 2 Macc. 8:23. Eleazar's appointment "to read aloud from the holy book" (v. 23) can only be understood in light of the parallel in 1 Macc. 3:48, which describes a public reading from the Torah as part of the assembly at Mizpah. The reading is described there as for the purpose of inquiring of God and receiving oracular guidance. For the password, cf. Ps. 3:8. Passwords and slogans figure prominently in Qumran War Scroll.

The battle took place to the south of Emmaus (see 1 Macc. 3:57). 2 Macc. 8:24 reports that 9,000 enemy soldiers fell, while 1 Macc. 4:15, in the context of a detailed description of the battle, presents a more realistic figure of 3,000. It is interesting that 2 Maccabees claims that Judah's men called off their pursuit of the enemy because of the impending onset of the Sabbath (v. 26), whereas 1 Macc. 4:6–18 presents this as a tactical decision based on Judah's fear of the army of Gorgias, which had been held in reserve. The author of 2 Maccabees apparently takes the view that fighting on the Sabbath, unless it is a matter of immediate threat to life, is forbidden (cf. 1 Macc. 2:29–41). The praise and thanksgiving that the Maccabean soldiers offered (2 Macc. 8:27) must have been in the form of hymns similar to those of the Qumran War Scroll. 1 Macc. 4:24 quotes part of such a hymn that is a biblical psalmic refrain. The reference to God in v. 27 as the one "who had preserved them to this day" has a verbal parallel in the rabbinic benediction she-heheyanu (cf. m. Ber. 9:3).

In accordance with an interpretation of Num. 31:27, half of the booty was apportioned to the soldiers who had fought and their families and half was apportioned to needy members of the community (2 Macc. 8:28). Our author departs somewhat from chronological order to relate how the spoils were divided in a similar manner after other battles (v. 30). Further, the arms were stored in caches for later use. The reference to carrying spoils to Jerusalem in v. 31 requires that we place these battles after the rededication in 10:1-8.

With 8:33-36 the scene shifts back to the victory celebration after the defeat of Nicanor. The RSV's "in the city of their fathers," i.e., Jerusalem, cannot be correct since Jerusalem was not yet conquered by Judah; it should be translated with Tedesche, "in the land of their fathers." According to 2 Macc. 8:33 Callisthenes and his followers had burned a gate in the Jerusalem Temple. In 1:8 the burning of "the gate" is attributed to Jason and his followers (cf. 1 Macc. 4:38). It is probable that Callisthenes was a hellenizing Jew who made common cause with Jason. Somehow Judah's men found them in a small house and burned them. Our author again repeats the notion that God's punishment was measure for measure. Those who had burned his house were themselves burned to death. In the same way Nicanor, who had intended to sell Jews into slavery, now fled like a runaway slave (2 Macc. 8:34), stripped of the purple broad-rimmed hat and cloak that were the usual attire of the Friends of the King. Israel's true champion and defender was its God, whose laws they followed and who protected them (v. 36).

9:1-29, Death of Antiochus IV. Some scholars have argued that the original order of the episodes of the text has been disturbed. The problem arises from the peculiar position of 10:9 ("Such then was the end of Antiochus, who was called Epiphanes," RSV). One would expect such a statement to follow immediately after the account of Antiochus' death, which is narrated in 9:1-29. As it stands, the statement follows the episode of the purification of the Temple (10:1-8). Moreover, in the present sequence of the narrative, Antiochus IV dies before the rededication of the Temple. In 1 Maccabees the Temple is rededicated first (4:36-61), before the death of Antiochus (6:1-17). Since the chronology of 1 Maccabees seems to be correct on this point, it is reasonable to conclude that the original sequence of the narrative as composed by Jason of Cyrene placed 2 Macc. 10:1-8 after 8:36, followed by 9:1-29, and then 10:9. It is noteworthy that the sequence of events as they are now narrated in the text of 2 Maccabees follows the chronology of the second festal letter appended to the book (1:10-2:18), which gives the impression that Antiochus died before the rededication of the Temple. Thus whoever was responsible for adding the letters at the beginning of the book, whether the abridger or a later editor, was probably also responsible for changing the sequence of the events narrated.

2 Macc. 9:1-2 recounts Antiochus' failed attempt to rob a Persian temple. Persepolis, near present-day Shiraz, was the capital of Persia and was founded by Darius I. 1 Macc. 6:1 and 2 Macc. 1:13-15 say that it was the temple of Nanea in Elymais (Elam) that the king attempted to plunder. 2 Maccabees 9 is the only source that identifies Ecbatana, the royal seat of the old Median Kingdom, as the place of Antiochus IV's death. 1 Macc. 6:4 places his death on the journey from Persia back to Babylonia. According to our interpretation of 2 Macc. 8:30-32, we must assume that the abridger misunderstood the parenthetical note there about the division of the spoils of later battles and construed the battles with Timothy as having occurred immediately after the defeat of Nicanor. Therefore, when he mentioned Antiochus' anger at learning of the defeat of Nicanor, he added "and the forces of Timothy" (9:3).

On the death of Antiochus IV, cf. 1 Macc. 6:8-16. Antiochus IV's campaign in Persia and Media had been a failure. According to 2 Maccabees, he attempted to allay his frustration by attacking Jerusalem. This intention, in the view of the author, soon led to Antiochus' death. The author stresses the sufferings of the king to emphasize that he was punished by God for his deeds against the Jews (2 Macc. 9:5-10). The very torments he suffered were the same ones he had mercilessly inflicted on the Judeans. It is another instance of the author's interest in a measure-for-measure conception of justice.

In vv. 11-17 the author presents Antiochus as undergoing a deathbed repentance. He offers to reverse every course of action he has taken with respect to Jerusalem. The claims of our author regarding the king's desire to convert to Judaism raise serious doubts about the historicity of the entire account. The author seems to have begun with a narrative similar to that of 1 Macc. 6:8-16 and to have embellished it with very unlikely details designed to place Judea at the center of the affairs of the Seleucid empire and to accent the just punishments meted out by the God of Israel.

The letter that follows in vv. 18-27 is presented here as if it were written only to the Jews and as if it followed on the decisions Antiochus IV supposedly reached in vv. 11-17. Yet investigation of the letter does not bear out this conclusion. First, its contents are not a reflection of vv. 11-17. Second, critical analysis of the letter raises serious questions about its authenticity. The letter does not consistently accord with Seleucid epistolary style. The inconsistencies with vv. 11-17, however, make it unlikely that Jason of Cyrene or the abridger composed the letter. On the other hand, as it certainly is not what our author claims, we must conclude that Jason or the abridger adapted a letter Antiochus had written to confer kingship on his son Antiochus V Eupator. This announcement would have been sent to all of the Seleucid empire and made no reference to the Jews. The letter was adapted and placed within our book as part of the tendency of the author to see Judean affairs as determining the fate of the Seleucid empire.

The "worthy Jewish citizens" of v. 19 are those who were enrolled in the polis of Antioch at Jerusalem, which was established as part of the Hellenistic reform (4:9). The stated purpose of the letter is to provide for an orderly succession in case of the king's death (9:21-24). Antiochus recalls the precedent of his father's similar action. Antiochus III, intending to march eastward, appointed his oldest son Antiochus, brother of Antiochus IV, as coregent and successor from 210/209 to 193/192 B.C. Seleucus IV was designated from 189 to 187 B.C. Antiochus IV was well aware of the powers both within and outside of his empire waiting for his death. Among them was certainly Demetrius I, son of Seleucus IV, who was at this time a hostage in Rome. For this reason he appointed his own son, the boy Antiochus V Eupator, as his heir and coregent.

Antiochus IV died in November or December of 164 B.C. (v. 28). 1 Macc. 6:14-15 relates that the king had appointed Philip guardian of Antiochus V and had entrusted him with the regency of the kingdom. Lysias, who had been appointed to rule over the western provinces and to care for Antiochus V in the absence of Antiochus IV (1 Macc. 3:32), moved quickly to consolidate his own power and immediately proclaimed his charge sovereign (1 Macc. 6:17). Philip found it impossible to gain control and had to flee Lysias (Antiochus V was merely a figurehead at this time). He took refuge with Ptolemy VI Philometor.

Purification of the Temple

On the possible displacement of these verses, see commentary above on 9:1-2. 1 Macc. 4:26-35 describes Judah's battles with Lysias as preceding the rededication of the Temple. The author of 2 Maccabees places these victories after the rededication (2 Macc. 11:1-15). In so doing the author incorrectly moved them to the reign of Antiochus V (so Goldstein). In actuality these battles took place while Antiochus IV was campaigning in Persia and Media. From 2 Macc. 11:13-38 we gather that these battles ended in negotiations leading to the rescinding of the decrees of Antiochus IV. The forces still stationed in the Akra may have made Judah hesitate to capture Jerusalem and the Temple. Before long though, Judah and his men made their move and succeeded in taking control of the Temple and rededicating it. The rededication of the Temple is narrated in 1 Macc. 4:36-60.

Greek temenos at the end of 2 Macc. 10:2 must be rendered "illicit shrines" with Goldstein, not "sacred precincts" with the RSV. Apparently, the Temple had been surrounded by pagan altars and shrines. Judah and his followers reinstituted the orderly conduct of the sacrificial ritual that had been suspended when the idol was brought into the Temple (1 Macc. 1:54) an event omitted in 2 Maccabees. Whereas our text says that sacrifices had been suspended for two years, 1 Macc. 1:54 and 4:52 indicate a lapse of three years. Again our author stresses that Antiochus IV and his persecutions were the instruments of God's anger, which the Jewish people had incurred because of its transgressions (v. 4).

The Temple was purified in 164 B.C. The celebration of the first Hanukkah was held in imitation of the feast of Tabernacles (Sukkoth; 2 Macc. 10:6). The lulav (Heb., "palm frond"), together with the willow and myrtle branches, and the etroq (Heb., "citron") were carried, in accordance with the traditional interpretation of Lev. 23:40. Following postbiblical custom, Judah and his followers recited the Hallel Psalms, known from later sources to be Psalms 113-118 (2 Macc. 10:7). It was decreed that Hanukkah should become a regular part of the Jewish calendar (v. 8). Although 1 Macc. 4:52-59 gives no explanation for the eight-day duration of Hanukkah, 2 Maccabees claims that the model of Sukkoth, seven days (Lev. 23:40, 42; Deut. 16:13; Num. 29:12-34) followed by the eighth day of solemn assembly (Num. 29:35-39) led to the eight-day celebration of Hanukkah. Tannaitic tradition (b. Šabb. 21b; cf. Megillat Ta'anit) relates that when the Maccabees purified the Temple, they found only one pure cruse of oil with which to light the menorah (cf. 10:3). Miraculously, it burned for eight days until additional ritually pure oil could be processed and brought to the Temple.

Judah's Wars with Antiochus V

10:9-11:15, Judah's Victories. On 10:9, see commentary above on 9:1-2. Antiochus V Eupator (reigned 164-162 B.C.) was later killed by Demetrius I (2 Macc. 14:2; 1 Macc. 7:1-4). His reign began when he was only nine years old, and his appointment of Lysias was a legal fiction. In fact, his father Antiochus IV had appointed Philip, but Lysias seized power (cf. 9:29 and commentary above), taking charge of the government and serving as "chief governor of Coele Syria and Phoenicia," a post similar to the one he had held under Antiochus IV (1 Macc. 3:32).

Ptolemy Macron (2 Macc. 10:12) was not Ptolemy son of Dorymenes mentioned in 4:45 and 8:8. The latter sought to exterminate the Jews entirely, while Ptolemy Macron was deposed because of his good relations with them. Ptolemy Macron was governor of Cyprus under Ptolemy VI Philometor. Then he transferred his allegiance to Antiochus IV, in the aftermath of the fall of Cyprus to Antiochus IV in 168 B.C. (Goldstein). At some point he was appointed governor of Coele Syria, a post Lysias took over for himself. It must have been during Ptolemy Macron's tenure that the Maccabees took control of the Temple and began to campaign against their pagan neighbors. These factors, no doubt, led Lysias to depose him. Some even accused Ptolemy of collusion or treason.

1 Macc. 5:3-5 records an abbreviated version of the same events as are narrated in 2 Macc. 10:14-23. Gorgias, the governor, was previously mentioned in 2 Macc. 8:9 as an associate of Nicanor (cf. 1 Macc. 4:1-25 where Gorgias appears as the field commander of the Seleucid army). Judah made a foray into Idumean territory that resulted in a great slaughter, although the numbers here must be exaggerated (2 Macc. 10:17). He left his brother Simon, along with Joseph (who may be his brother John; see commentary above on 8:21-23) as well as Zacchaeus (who may be the Zechariah of 1 Macc. 5:18) in command of the siege force. The incidence of treachery within Judah's forces (2 Macc. 10:20-22) is passed over in silence in the parallel account in 1 Maccabees 5.

Goldstein considers 2 Macc. 10:24-38 to be parallel to 1 Macc. 5:6-8. If so, our author has confused Yazer (in Transjordan) with Gazara (= Gezer in Judea), and this has led him to assume that the Ammonite force under Timothy had invaded Judea (cf. 1 Macc. 5:6-8; 2 Macc. 10:24, 32). Embellishments were then added to the story in 2 Maccabees concerning superhuman apparitions. Compare the earlier apparitions in 3:24-28 and 5:2-4 and the one recorded in 11:8-11. Although Jason may have been influenced by parallels from classical authors, the idea that God's heavenly armies fight with Israel is well attested in the Bible (see, e.g., Judg. 5:20; Josh. 5:13; Zech. 9:14-16). The RSV renders the beginning of 2 Macc. 10:24 as "Timothy who had been defeated by the Jews before . . .," but Goldstein's understanding, "the first of the two by that name to be defeated by the Jews," is consistent with the existence of two Timothys (see 1 Maccabees, "Commentary," 5:1-8). The Maccabean forces performed standard biblical mourning practices, which were considered appropriate at times of national crisis. Only after praying at the base of the altar for God "to be an enemy to their enemies and an adversary to their adversaries" (cf. Exod. 23:22) did they go forth to battle.

Gazara (2 Macc. 10:32) remained in the hands of the Seleucids until it was captured by Simon in 143 or 142 B.C. (1 Macc. 13:43-48). The reference here must be to Yazer in Transjordan (see above). The report of Timothy's death makes it certain that he is not the same Timothy who appears in 2 Macc. 12:2, 18-25.

The events described in 11:1-15 have been misplaced by the author. They took place before the rededication of the Temple and the death of Antiochus IV and are parallel to 1 Macc. 4:26-35. Lysias' stated intention in 2 Macc. 11:2-3 mostly parallels his instructions from Antiochus IV in 1 Macc. 3:35-36. Yet for our author, with his mistaken chronology, the goal of Lysias was to reverse the successes of Judah and his "de-hellenization" of Jerusalem (cf. Goldstein). According to 1 Macc. 4:7 and 24, the Seleucids had already sold the high-priesthood. The levying of tribute on the Temple (2 Macc. 11:3) sounds like a euphemism for plundering it.

Verses 5-12 record 2 Maccabees' version of the battle of Beth-zur (cf. 1 Macc. 4:28-34). Beth-zur is some twenty miles south of Jerusalem on the road to Hebron. Our author pictures the Maccabees as going out to battle from Jerusalem. Here again he follows his false chronology (see above). On the apparition of the horseman, cf. 3:25 and 10:29-30.

2 Macc. 11:13-15 continues with its mistaken chronology, according to which the nine-year-old Antiochus V was already ruling (10:10). Actually, the events occurred in 164 B.C. 1 Macc. 4:35 has Lysias depart immediately to Antioch after his defeat at Beth-zur to recruit a larger army. Soon after, Judah and his men take the city of Jerusalem and rededicate the Temple (1 Macc. 4:36-61). 2 Maccabees 11, however, preserves evidence that negotiations ensued (vv. 13-38). As an analysis of the diplomatic letter quoted in vv. 16-21 indicates, these exchanges were between Lysias and Menelaus, and Judah (despite v. 15) probably played no part. Nevertheless, he took advantage of the truce to take control of Jerusalem and rededicate the Temple.

11:16-38, Letters of Lysias, Antiochus V, and the Romans. Judah is nowhere mentioned in Lysias' letter to the Jewish people (vv. 16-21), written in 164 B.C. Most likely, this letter was written to a group of pious Jews who sought an end to the war and the persecutions, but who were not closely allied with the Maccabees. The letter may have been written as a result of the representations of the high priest Menelaus (cf. v. 29).

The second document, quoted in vv. 22-26, is a letter from Antiochus V to Lysias ("brother" is a term of endearment) and is to be dated early in 163 B.C., soon after the young king's ascension. Its actual historical context is the attempt of the king to reverse his father's mistaken policies to widen his base of support. Due to our author's incorrect dating of Lysias' campaign (see above), he relates this letter to Lysias' negotiations with the Jews in the aftermath of his defeat at Beth-zur.

The third letter (11:27-33), which is from Antiochus IV or from the young coregent Antiochus V to the gerousia, the Jewish council of elders, must be genuine, since no later forger would have cast Menelaus in so positive a light (v. 29). The letter proposes an amnesty for those who return home within fifteen days and desist from their military activities by March 27, 164 B.C. Further, permission is granted to the Jews to return to their ancestral laws, i.e., to reverse the effects of the Hellenistic reform. After Judah rededicated the Temple (following the correct chronology of 1 Maccabees), Menelaus must have rushed off to Antioch where he obtained this amnesty as a last-ditch attempt to preserve his own power and high-priesthood. His strategy was to separate the bulk of the pious Jews who wanted only religious freedom from the more "nationalistic" Maccabees. Menelaus' plan must have been partially successful and may have been a factor in the decline of Judah's power, which took place soon afterward.

The last letter quoted (11:34-38) purports to be from Roman envoys to the Jewish people. Although there is some reason to doubt the authenticity of this letter, the date and certain details of which are difficult to reconcile with the rest of the narrative, it was Roman policy to support Judea against the Seleucid empire. The Roman envoys requested information on the state of the negotiations so that they could help to press the case of the Jews. Despite some obscurities, the letter is probably authentic.

12:1-45, Judah Defends the Jews of Palestine.

Verse 1 is a transition necessitated by the incorrect placing of the events of chap. 11 after the rededication of the Temple. In fact, the events of 12:2 pick up immediately after 10:31. The truce of chap. 11 did in fact occur, but it preceded Judah's rededication of the Temple. The Timothy mentioned in 12:2 was commander of northern Transjordan and southern Syria (see 1 Maccabees, "Commentary," 5:1-8). Apollonius is distinguished by his patronymic ("son of Gennaëus") from others by that name who have appeared in 2 Maccabees. The other local commanders are unknown. Nicanor was not "the governor of Cyprus" (RSV; Tedesche), since Cyprus was under Ptolemaic rule until 58 B.C., but the commander of Cypriot mercenaries (Goldstein).

In the aftermath of the rededication of the Temple, the citizens of certain of the Hellenistic cities rose up against their Jewish neighbors. The inhabitants of these cities probably took Judah's rededication of the Temple as a violation of the truce. The atrocity at Joppa in which Jewish residents of the city were lured onto boats and drowned (12:3-4; cf. 1 Macc. 5:1-2) provoked Judah to avenge their deaths. Judah's forces were able to destroy the port but could not gain entry to the city itself (2 Macc. 12:7). To prevent a similar fate from befalling the Jews of Yavneh (Jamnia), some thirty miles south, his men destroyed that harbor as well (vv. 8-9).

The background of vv. 10-12, which record Judah's alliance with an Arab tribe, may be provided by 1 Macc. 5:9-13, in which Judah received a report that the Jews of Gilead were being besieged by Timothy. On the way to Gilead, the Maccabean army defeated an Arab force and made peace with them (1 Macc. 5:24-27). The events of 1 Macc. 5:14-23 are not related in 2 Maccabees. It is difficult to determine if the omissions resulted from the work of the abridger or from the original composition of Jason of Cyrene.

Of the events of 1 Macc. 5:35-36, only the taking of Chaspho is paralleled in our account of the conquest of Caspin (2 Macc. 12:13-16). Caspin is probably present-day Khisfin, east of Lake Tiberias, near a swamp that may be the lake mentioned here. Here, according to the narrator, Judah and his soldiers, egged on by the taunts of the enemy, invoked the memory of Joshua's capture of Jericho (Josh. 6) and stormed the city, even though they lacked the usual siege equipment.

For 2 Macc. 12:17-19 cf. 1 Macc. 5:30-34, which details Judah's first encounter with Timothy. "Charax" (2 Macc. 12:17) may be either the city of Kerak, or a common noun meaning "palisaded camp." In any case, it was the center of the Toubiani, i.e., the Jews of Tob or of the Tobiad household (cf. 1 Macc. 5:13) who had always been anti-Seleucid. The author assumes that their center was still at Araq el-Emir in Transjordan, some ninety-five miles south of Caspin, but this is highly unlikely. The itinerary from Caspin to Araq el-Amir and back to Carnaim is implausible (see Goldstein).

2 Macc. 12:20-25 is parallel to 1 Macc. 5:37-43, from which we learn that the battle described here took place at Raphon. According to 2 Maccabees, Judah appointed Dositheus and Sosipater (see v. 19) over the forces besieging Timothy's stronghold. The main body of Timothy's army (the numbers are surely exaggerated here) broke ranks and fled, according to our author, because they saw a divine apparition (v. 22). The two commanders who somehow captured Timothy (v. 24) are pictured as freeing him in the hope of securing the freedom of Jewish hostages.

2 Macc. 12:26-31 is paralleled by 1 Macc. 5:44-54. Carnaim, the ancient cult site of Ash-toret (Astarte), now housed the temple of Atargatis, a goddess identified with Ashtoret in Hellenistic times. The reference to Lysias in v. 27 is difficult to translate. We would suggest that Lysias had stationed katoikoi (Gk.), "military colonists," there. Again, the casualty figures must be reduced. Scythopolis (v. 29) is Beth-shan, seventy-five miles by road (but not as the crow flies) north of Jerusalem. It is noteworthy that 1 Maccabees, which has a more hostile attitude toward the Gentiles than does 2 Maccabees, does not mention the good relations between the Jews and Gentiles of Scythopolis (vv. 29-31).

For the parallel to 2 Macc. 12:32-45 see 1 Macc. 5:55-68. After the Feast of Weeks (Shavuot), the Jews again joined battle with Gorgias (cf. 2 Macc. 8:9; 10:14-15 and commentary), the governor of Idumea. Dositheos, one of the Toubiani (following Tedesche and Goldstein) was maimed in the battle, but succeeded in putting Gorgias to flight toward Marisa (Mare-shah), an Idumean city in the foothills southwest of Jerusalem. Esdras (12:36) must have been mentioned earlier in a passage omitted by the abridger. He may be Azariah, probably to be identified as Eleazar, Judah's brother. Only when Judah spurred his men on with Hebrew battle cries were they finally victorious. From the parallel we gather that the events of vv. 32-35 occurred while Judah was campaigning in the north. After his return, he had to intervene to turn the tide of battle against Gorgias and the Idumeans, as described in vv. 36-37.

Adullam (v. 38) is located seven and a half miles northeast of Marisa and was still in Jewish hands. There, in preparation for the Sabbath, Judah's men performed ritual immersion, a practice apparently widespread in Second Temple times, although it never acquired the force of law. After the Sabbath, when permissible (following Goldstein's translation), the bodies were recovered and buried, as required by Jewish law. In the process, they discovered that the dead men had picked up idolatrous figurines during the battles at Yavneh (cf. 12:8-9), thus violating Deut. 7:25-26. (1 Macc. 5:67 gives a different explanation for the losses.) Judah and his men prayed to God to expiate the sin of these soldiers and collected money for an expiatory offering on their behalf. These procedures are taken by the author as indicating Judah's belief in the resurrection of the dead. In view of Lev. 4:13-21, which provides for the expiation of a sin of the entire "congregation," and the fact that the concept of expiation after death is not known in this period, Goldstein suggests that in actuality this was an offering to expiate the collective guilt of the Maccabean army. The author of 2 Maccabees reinterpreted it as indicating Judah's belief in resurrection.

13:1-26, War with Antiochus V. The background to the invasion of Judea by the young king Antiochus V Eupator in 163 B.C. (13:1-2) must be sought in 1 Macc. 6:18-27, where Judah's siege of the Akra (the citadel of Jerusalem) and his fortification of the Temple Mount and Beth-zur are described. Upon learning these facts, Antiochus V, under the tutelage of Lysias, set out for Judea. As so often in these accounts, the numbers in 2 Macc. 13:2 and in 1 Macc. 6:30 must be scaled down.

1 Maccabees makes no mention of Menelaus' audience with the king or of the fate of Menelaus, as does 2 Macc. 13:3-8. Menelaus had been shunted aside by Judah's rededication of the Temple and therefore sought to have himself reestablished in office (Tedesche and Zeitlin assume he sought higher office). Lysias charged Menelaus (cf. 4:23-50) with being the instigator of the Hellenistic reform and the cause of all the troubles in Judea, for which Jason was really to blame (4:7-22). As a result Menelaus was cruelly executed in Beroea, modern Aleppo. Our author again stresses the notion of measure-for-measure punishment.

Faced with Antiochus V's impending attack, Judah ordered the people to undertake a three-day fast (13:9-12; cf. Esther 4:16). Judah consulted the elders before taking the offensive (v. 13). Similarly, the king is required to consult before offensive wars in m. Sanh. 1:5 (with the Sanhedrin) and in the Qumran Temple Scroll 58:18-20 (with the high priest). According to 2 Maccabees, a preliminary skirmish took place at Modein before the main battle of Beth-zur (vv. 14-17). This preliminary skirmish is unknown in 1 Maccabees. Further, the killing of the largest elephant and subsequent death of Eleazar in 1 Macc. 6:43-46 occur in the battle of Beth-zur, whereas here parallels to those events take place in the preliminary skirmish at Modein. In 2 Maccabees the killing of the elephant is attributed to Judah himself. Either the author of 1 Maccabees has telescoped two phases of the campaign, or the author of 2 Maccabees has invented a battle to take place at the Hasmonean ancestral home, Modein (cf. 1 Macc. 2:1). The password "God's victory" is similar to the one used in 2 Macc. 8:23, "God's help." According to 2 Maccabees, the skirmish at Modein ended with a Maccabean victory.

2 Macc. 13:18-22 parallels 1 Macc. 6:31-50. The Seleucid force repeatedly assailed Beth-zur, about twenty miles southwest of Jerusalem, attempting to enter Judea from the south. According to the account of 2 Maccabees, the treason of a Jew enabled the king to negotiate a truce at Beth-zur, after which he was defeated in a skirmish (vv. 21-22). The reality is probably closer to the account of 1 Maccabees, which mentions no treason and indicates that as part of the truce the Jews had to abandon the fortress and allow the Seleucids to garrison it. The author of 2 Maccabees is either unaware of the true outcome or hesitates to admit the failures of Judah.

At this point the account in 1 Macc. 6:48, 51–54 relates the unsuccessful attempt of the Seleucids to dislodge Judah's forces from the Temple Mount. The words of 2 Macc. 13:22, "he attacked Judah's men," probably are a reference to this abortive siege. Philip, identified in 1 Macc. 6:55 as the guardian of Antiochus V (cf. 2 Macc. 9:29), was now trying to take power in Antioch. The king, therefore, sought to wind up affairs in Judea and return home to protect his throne. Consequently, the king reinstated the rights of the Jews to live according to the Torah. (Cf. the letter of Antiochus V quoted in 11:27–33.) 1 Macc. 6:55–63 presents a more realistic account, excluding the fanciful meeting with Judah (2 Macc. 13:23–24) and including the destruction of the walls of Mt. Zion by the Seleucids (1 Macc. 6:62). The appointment of the new governor and the subsequent scene at Ptolemais (Acco) appear only in 2 Macc. 13:25–26.

The Battle of Nicanor

14:1–10, The Rise of Demetrius I. 2 Macc. 14:1–15:36 is parallel to 1 Maccabees 7. Demetrius I Soter (reigned 162–150 B.C.), son of Seleucus IV Philopator, made his escape from Rome, where he was being held as a hostage, in 162 B.C. Tripoli, where Demetrius landed, is north of Sidon. He soon took control of the Seleucid empire and killed Antiochus V and Lysias (cf. 1 Macc. 7:1–4).

For 2 Macc. 14:3–10 cf. 1 Macc. 7:5–25. 1 Macc. 7:8–24 has no parallel in 2 Maccabees, as our author telescoped into one account both visits of Alcimus to Demetrius I and the campaigns of Bacchides and Nicanor. Alcimus was probably appointed to replace Menelaus by Antiochus V (Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 12.383–85). Upon the accession of Demetrius I, Alcimus was confirmed as high priest at his first visit, in 162 B.C. (1 Macc. 7:9). Our text is describing his second visit in 161. After his appointment, Alcimus won the confidence of the Hasidim and other pious Jews, weaning them temporarily away from the camp of Judah. But Alcimus betrayed their trust (1 Macc. 7:12–16), hence the statement of 2 Macc. 14:3 that he "had willingly defiled himself" (RSV). A priest who was implicated in murder was disqualified from service at the altar. The speech of Alcimus in vv. 6–10 is clearly the composition of our author. The RSV's "I have laid aside . . . the high priesthood" (v. 7) must rather be translated "I have been deprived of" (Goldstein; cf. Tedesche).

14:11–30, Judah's Pact with Nicanor. Paralleling 2 Macc. 14:11–15:36, 1 Macc. 7:26 reports the battle with Nicanor. Nicanor is appointed by Demetrius to reinstate Alcimus to the high-priesthood and to destroy Judah and his forces (2 Macc. 14:11–13). 1 Maccabees omits the account of 2 Macc. 14:15–17, which describes how the Jews observed mourning customs (cf. 10:25) and prayed for divine help. Expecting a full-scale attack, Judah sent a detachment with Simon to block the enemy at a village named Dessau (to be identified with Adasa, 1 Macc. 7:40–45). Simon seems to have been less than successful because the enemy surprised him.

Among the delegation that Nicanor sent to open negotiations with Judah was at least one hellenized Jew, named Mattathias (2 Macc. 14:19). Although Judah was somewhat suspicious, he entered into discussions with Nicanor (vv. 21–22). Cf. 1 Macc. 7:27–29 in which dishonest motives are imputed to Nicanor. 2 Maccabees rather blames the failure of negotiations on Alcimus (vv. 26–27).

Only 2 Maccabees stresses the friendship of Judah and Nicanor. The author credits Nicanor with encouraging Judah to settle down to marry and raise a family (vv. 23–25). Yet Nicanor's desire to have Judah constantly with him and his desire to see him tied down to house and family can be taken as a tactic designed to neutralize Judah's ability to function as a guerrilla leader. Tedesche translates v. 24 "He kept Judah under surveillance."

According to vv. 26–30 it was Alcimus who engineered the breakdown in relations between Nicanor and Judah. To advance his own interests as high priest he sought to be rid of Judah's opposition. Alcimus complained to Demetrius I that Nicanor had appointed Judah as diadochos, "successor" (RSV and Tedesche; Goldstein's "deputy" is not precise). Demetrius I's response produced discomfort on the part of Nicanor (v. 28), and Judah perceived it (v. 30; cf. 1 Macc. 7:30).

14:31–15:36, Judah's Final Victory. In a passage without a parallel in 2 Maccabees, 1 Macc. 7:31–32 describes a skirmish between Judah and Nicanor at Capharsalama which resulted in defeat for Nicanor and motivated his threat against the Temple (1 Macc. 7:33–38). In 2 Macc. 14:31 Nicanor is provoked when he discovers that Judah has outwitted him and gone into hiding.

The gruesome tale of martyrdom found in 2 Macc. 14:37–46 has no parallel in 1 Maccabees. It is indeed difficult to understand its place in 2 Maccabees, unless we assume that Razis knew the whereabouts of Judah. Otherwise, all it does is to demonstrate the cruel lengths to which Nicanor, now a persecutor of the Jews, would go (v. 39). Verse 46 emphasizes belief that at the time of resurrection the martyred body of Razis will be restored to wholeness (see 7:11 and commentary).

There is no parallel to 2 Macc. 15:1–5 in 1 Maccabees. Judah had taken refuge either within the province of Samaria or very close to the border. Nicanor's plan to attack on the Sabbath was opposed by Jews in his army (cf. 14:19 and commentary). These hellenized Jews must have been supporters of Alcimus, but even they sought to observe the Sabbath. Nicanor's haughty reply to them is seen by our author as having been his undoing (v. 5).

At this point 1 Maccabees gives the location of the battle, information either unknown to or omitted by 2 Maccabees. According to 1 Macc. 7:39–40, Nicanor positioned himself in Beth-horon and Judah in Adasa. There is no parallel in 1 Maccabees for 2 Macc. 15:6–19, Judah's preparation of his army. As he had on previous occasions (see 8:16–20), Judah followed the instructions of Deut. 20:3–4 and addressed his army with encouraging words. Judah also reminded his men that Nicanor had entered into an agreement with him which was now being violated. Finally, Judah recounted a dream or vision in which he saw Onias III (cf. 3:1–10 and commentary) and the prophet Jeremiah. Both were praying for a Maccabean victory. Jeremiah's presentation of a sword to Judah is symbolic of that victory (15:12–16). Judah's men were greatly encouraged by his exhortation, including his description of the vision. In Jerusalem, both the supporters of Judah and those of Alcimus realized that the hour of decision was at hand (v. 19).

Just before the battle was joined, Judah offered a prayer (vv. 20–24). Cf. the parallel in 1 Macc. 7:40–42, where the prayer is strikingly similar. The battle itself, which is described in 2 Macc. 15:25–30, is narrated in more detail in 1 Macc. 7:43–47. The author of 2 Maccabees emphasizes that the praises offered at the conclusion of the battle were recited in Hebrew (v. 29). He seems surprised that Judah could order the dismembering of even one so despicable as Nicanor (v. 30). 1 Macc. 7:47 does not mention Judah's role in the mutilation of Nicanor.

Judah easily advanced on Jerusalem, which was not protected by any substantial Seleucid force. He showed Nicanor's head and arm to the inhabitants of the Akra so that they would see that Nicanor was dead. Again our author emphasizes measure-for-measure punishment: the head and tongue were severed because of blasphemy, and the arm was cut off because he had lifted it when taking an oath threatening the Temple (2 Macc. 15:32–33). 1 Macc. 7:47, conscious of the laws of ritual impurity, has the head and hand put on display just outside of Jerusalem.

It was decided to observe the commemoration of Nicanor's defeat on the thirteenth of Adar, the day before Purim or Mordecai's day (Esther 9:21), as an annual minor holiday (v. 36). As such it appears in Megillat Ta'anit. This holiday ceased to be celebrated when the minor holidays of Megillat Ta'anit were displaced by Hanukkah and Purim, which then served as the sole occasions commemorating national deliverance.

Epilogue by the Abridger

"And from that time the city has been in the possession of the Hebrews" (v. 37, RSV). The abridger must have written these words before the conquest of Jerusalem by Pompey in 63 B.C. Our author writes as if Judah succeeded in restoring freedom to his people, ignoring the fact that he was soon killed on the battlefield and that it took years of struggle for his brothers to achieve his goal of Jewish independence (1 Macc. 9–13). Perhaps the author realized that Judah had set in motion a struggle for religious freedom and national aspirations that would occupy the Jewish people for more than two thousand years.

3 MACCABEES

JOHN J. COLLINS

INTRODUCTION

The Third Book of Maccabees is found in some manuscripts of the Greek Bible (Alexandrinus and Venetus, but not Vaticanus or Sinaiticus), in the Syriac Peshitta, and in the Armenian Bible (→ Texts, Versions, Manuscripts, Editions). It was not included in the Latin Vulgate and consequently not in the canon of the Roman Catholic church or in the traditional Protestant Apocrypha. It is, however, regarded as canonical in Eastern Christianity.

Despite its title, the book has nothing to do with the Maccabees. (The title was probably suggested by the fact that it follows 1 and 2 Maccabees in the manuscripts and is set in the Hellenistic period.) Instead it describes three episodes involving Ptolemy IV Philopator, king of Egypt (221–204 B.C.; → Ptolemy). The first is an introductory paragraph (1:1–5) that describes how the Ptolemy was saved from assassination at the battle of Raphia (217 B.C.) by the intervention of one Dositheus, an apostate Jew. The second, 1:6–2:24, tells of the king's unsuccessful attempt to enter the Jerusalem Temple. The third episode, which is the main body of the book (2:25–7:23), describes the Ptolemy's persecution of the Jews of Egypt.

Date

There is universal agreement that 3 Maccabees was written in Greek, most probably in Alexandria, Egypt, at some time after the battle of Raphia and before the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple (A.D. 70). Attempts to fix the date more precisely hinge on the relation of the narrative to history. The plot to assassinate the Ptolemy (1:2) is also reported by the second-century B.C. Greek historian Polybius, but not the role of the Jew Dositheus, which is reminiscent of the role of Mordecai in Esther 2:21–23. The second episode, the unsuccessful attempt to enter the Temple, has a parallel in 2 Maccabees 3 in the story of Heliodorus. A variant of the third, main episode is found in the writings of the first-century A.D. Jewish historian Josephus (Against Apion 2.53–55), where the Ptolemy in question is not Philopator but Ptolemy VIII Euergetes II (Physcon, 144–117 B.C.). The historical value of these accounts is assessed in different ways. Kasher claims that they are “genuinely historical” reports from the time of Philopator. A key element in his argument is the fact that Philopator is said to have attempted to enroll the Jews in the religion of the Greek god

Dionysus, a cult that this Ptolemy did, in fact, promote. Nonetheless the genre of the narrative must raise grave doubts about its historical value. It is a historical romance with strong legendary features. It is concerned with the wonderful and the miraculous and aimed at edification. Such stories may contain historical reminiscences, but their historicity is incidental and unreliable. The very fact that part of the story is variously attached to Philopator (in 3 Maccabees) and to Physcon (Josephus) shows that it became a traditional tale in which historical accuracy was not the primary concern. Tcherikover argues that the story was more likely to preserve reminiscences of Physcon than of Philopator, but at most it would symbolize a general threat to the Jews at that time and not describe an actual event. Tcherikover, like many scholars, sets the composition of the book in the Roman period (after 30 B.C.).

There is internal evidence that the book as we have it cannot have been composed in the time of Philopator. 3 Macc. 6:6 refers to the Greek addition to the book of Daniel, and this allusion was scarcely possible before the first century B.C. Resemblances in style and language to 2 Maccabees and the Letter of Aristeas, a Jewish composition from the late second century B.C. (Emmet, pp. 156–57), suggest a date no earlier than the late second century B.C., while its probable dependence on Greek Esther would require a first-century B.C. date at the earliest. Tcherikover and Hadas argue more specifically for a date in the Roman period because of the statement in 2:28 that the Jews should be reduced to the popular census and slave condition. While the Greek word laographia simply means “census,” and censuses had been taken in Ptolemaic times, the word acquired a special connotation in Roman times because of the poll tax introduced by Augustus in 24/23 B.C. This was the only laographia that involved a reduction of status for the Jews, because it made a clear distinction between Greeks and non-Greeks. The fact that political parity with the Alexandrians was an issue (2:30) also fits a setting in the Roman era. Kasher disputes Tcherikover's arguments in detail, but the fact remains that the laographia of the Roman era did affect the status of the Jews, while such a census in the time of Philopator is unattested apart from the legendary narratives of 3 Maccabees.

The different episodes of 3 Maccabees find their parallels in different sources and were probably originally independent. The decision of the author of 3 Maccabees to combine the story of the threat to the Temple with the perils of Egyptian Judaism may contain a clue to the time of composition. In Embassy to Gaius, the Jewish philosopher Philo describes the two dangers that confronted Judaism in the time of Caligula—the pogrom in Alexandria in A.D. 38 and the attempted violation of the Jerusalem Temple. While the stories in 3 Maccabees are traditional tales and were not composed as allegories for the Roman era, the troubles in the time of Caligula may well have been the occasion for the combination and edition of these stories in the present book. While certainty is not possible, the reign of Caligula (A.D. 37–41) provides a more plausible setting than any other that has been proposed. The objection of Anderson (p. 512) that 3 Maccabees does not read like a “crisis document” assumes that the only Jewish response to crisis in this period was the apocalyptic one (→ Apocalyptic Literature). The nonapocalyptic response of 3 Maccabees reflects its distinctive social ideology and the situation of Alexandrian Judaism from which it arose.

Historical and Social Significance

The historical significance of 3 Maccabees lies not in the uncertain references about its setting but in the picture of Diaspora Judaism it presents. The Jews are loyal servants of the king but also strict observers of the law, including the distinctive dietary laws (3:3–4). While these observances provide an opportunity for their enemies, they win the respect of many, including “the Greeks,” who were in no way injured and who tried to comfort the Jews (3:8–10). 3 Maccabees here distinguishes between “the Greeks” and the Alexandrian enemies of the Jews. This distinction is of dubious historical value but is also found in Philo and Josephus. The Alexandrian Jews sought the acceptance and respect of “the Greeks” and were unwilling to dignify their enemies with that name. Most fundamentally, the problems confronting the Jews in 3 Maccabees are traced to the arrogance and even madness of the king and to his bad advisers. There is no objection to pagan rule as such. In the end, when the king comes to his senses, all is well for the Jews. 3 Maccabees, then, sees persecution as an aberration that can be rectified without the removal of the pagan kingship.

Not all the hostility of 3 Maccabees is directed toward the king. The Jews who betray their religion are singled out for contempt (2:33) and eventual vengeance (7:10–16). Equality with the Alexandrians cannot be bought at the price of idolatry. Even the king acknowledges that those who “transgressed the divine commandment for their belly’s sake would never be well disposed to the king’s estate either” (7:11) and gives permission that they be slaughtered.

3 Maccabees, then, attests loyalty to the letter of the law among Egyptian Jews without any of the allegorical rationalization associated with Philo or the Letter of Aristeas. Yet this religious particularism is maintained in the context of loyalty to the pagan rulers. Loyalty to the law is the basis of solidarity for the Jewish people in exile.

Theological Significance

Insofar as 3 Maccabees is a historical novel (a fictional tale with a realistic historical setting) it stands in a tradition that is attested in the Hebrew Bible in Esther and in Daniel 1–6. Like those stories, it is set in exile, and the Jews are exposed to danger at the whim of a gentile king. Yet the danger proves ephemeral, and the welfare of the Jews proves to be quite compatible with gentile rule. In 3 Maccabees, the removal of danger results from divine intervention in response to prayer. This is explicit in 2:21 (protection of the Temple) and again in 5:28 and 6:18. The book maintains the traditional Deuteronomic belief in retribution and makes no appeal to the ideas of immortality or afterlife that were widely accepted in Hellenistic Judaism. The fundamental faith attested by the book is in the omnipotence of God. This faith is expressed in the great prayers in chaps. 2 and 6, while the divine power is dramatized in the miraculous acts of deliverance. While 3 Maccabees lacks the philosophical depth of Philo or the Wisdom of Solomon, it is more likely to represent the faith of the rank and file of Egyptian Judaism. Its faith that God would set things right in this world was adequate for much of the history of the Diaspora, including the crisis under Caligula, but did not anticipate the disasters that would befall Egyptian Judaism in A.D. 66 and especially in A.D. 115–117 when the Alexandrian community was nearly destroyed.

The picture of Jews being rounded up for destruction (3 Macc. 4) remains, sadly, hauntingly relevant to the twentieth century.

1:1–5

The Battle of Raphia

The narrative begins abruptly with an account of Philopator’s march to Raphia. The abruptness suggests that this passage was excerpted from a historical source. The main point at which 3

Maccabees differs from the account of this battle in Polybius in the role assigned to Dositheus, who intervenes to save the king. The analogy with Mordecai in Esther 2:21-23 would seem to suggest that Dositheus is introduced as a Jewish hero, but the fact that he is explicitly said to have abandoned his religion makes this unlikely. 3 Maccabees leaves us in no doubt of its opinion of those who voluntarily forsook the law—they could not be good servants of the king and deserve death (7:11-12). There is considerable irony in the role of Dositheus. By saving Philopator's life, he indirectly causes the persecution of his people. Moreover, he causes an innocent "undistinguished person" to be killed in place of the king. Dositheus, then, is scarcely a hero. In the second century B.C., a Jew named Dositheus became a general in the army of Ptolemy Philopator (together with Onias IV, the founder of Leontopolis; Josephus Against Apion 2.49). "Dositheus son of Drimylus" occurs as the name of a pagan priest in a papyrus from the third century B.C., and it has even been suggested that this was, in fact, the apostate Jew (Kasher).

Philopator's Visit to Jerusalem

Philopator's visit to Jerusalem is not otherwise attested but is not implausible. He is said to have acted respectfully until he resolved to enter the Temple. We know that the Roman general Pompey did, in fact, enter the Temple in 63 B.C., but the closest parallel to 3 Maccabees is undoubtedly the story of Heliodorus in 2 Maccabees 3. In both stories a foreign dignitary attempts to enter the Jerusalem Temple over the protests of the priests. The attempt causes consternation in the whole Jewish population. Finally there is a miraculous intervention. The details of the stories are quite different: Heliodorus wants to seize the Temple treasure, Philopator merely to see the interior. There is a lengthy prayer in 3 Maccabees; in 2 Maccabees the miraculous punishment of the intruder is administered by angels. Heliodorus repents at the end; Philopator does not. The strongest case for literary dependence concerns the reaction of the Jewish populace: in both stories priests prostrate themselves, maidens who had been secluded rush outdoors, and all make supplication to God. The dramatic and emotional account is typical of Hellenistic historiography. Comparable incidents are reported by Josephus from the first century A.D., when Pilate introduced standards into Jerusalem (Jewish War 2.169-74; Antiquities of the Jews 18.55-59) and when Caligula ordered the erection of his statue in the Temple (Jewish War 2.184-203; Antiquities of the Jews 18.269-72). A noteworthy feature of the account in 3 Maccabees is that some people propose armed resistance (1:23) but are dissuaded by "the old men and the elders." Such a division of opinion on the issue of violence was characteristic of Judaism in the first century A.D., but there was already some disagreement on the subject in the time of the Maccabees (see 1 Macc. 2).

2:1-20, The High Priest's Prayer. The high priest at the time of the battle of Raphia was Simon II, who is extolled in Sirach 50. The prayer attributed to him here resembles a type that is very widespread in postexilic Judaism and is shaped by traditional Deuteronomistic theology (Ezra 9; Neh. 9; Dan. 9; Bar. 1:15-3:8). It begins by affirming the righteousness of God and recalling his mighty deeds, including the Exodus. It also recalls the promise of 1 Kings 8 that God would heed the prayers offered in the Temple. The prayer proceeds to confess that it is "for our many and great sins" that the Jews are now troubled and concludes by asking God to blot out their sins and act "lest the transgressors boast." This prayer differs from the other Deuteronomistic prayers insofar as the distress of the Jews is not related to the exile, and there is less emphasis on the confession of sin, but the logic is the same. God is urged to act for his own sake, not because of any merit on the part of the Jews.

2:21-24, The Divine Intervention. Like Heliodorus in 2 Maccabees 3, Philopator is said to be "scourged" and knocked to the ground, although in this case there is no apparition of angels. Divine chastisements of pagan kings are often (though implausibly) reported in Jewish writings of the Hellenistic period—e.g., Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel 4 and Antiochus Epiphanes in 2 Maccabees 9. Such punishment normally leads to repentance and conversion. The dramatic conception of 3 Maccabees, however, requires that Philopator's change of heart be delayed until after his major attack on the Jews.

The Attack on Egyptian Jewry

2:25-33, The Demand Made on the Jews. The action of the king on his return to Egypt is presented as a direct result of his misadventure in Jerusalem. The proclamation "that none of those who did not sacrifice should be permitted to enter their temples" (trans. Anderson, 2:28) amounts to a proscription of Jewish synagogue worship. Moreover, the Jews are subjected to the census and reduced to a servile condition. Registration would involve branding with the emblem of Dionysus and a reduction in status. Some Jews, however, were given the option of being initiated into the mysteries of Dionysus and enjoying equal rights with the Alexandrians.

The nature and purpose of these proposals is the most controversial question in the study of 3 Maccabees. It is well known that Philopator promoted the cult of Dionysus and associated it with the royal cult. A decree preserved on papyrus provides an interesting parallel to 3 Maccabees: "By decree of the king. Persons who perform the rites of Dionysus in the interior shall sail down to Alexandria . . . and shall register themselves . . . and shall declare forthwith from what persons they have received the transmission of the sacred rites for three generations back and shall hand in the sacred book sealed up . . ." (see BCU, p. 1211). This decree shows an attempt to regulate the cult of Dionysus by registering its practitioners. A recollection of such an attempt by Philopator may underlie the narrative of 3 Maccabees.

The God of the Jews was often supposed by Greeks and Romans to be identical with Dionysus, in accordance with a common trend to identify Near Eastern gods with their more familiar Western counterparts. (Even the Letter of Aristeas suggests that the God of the Jews is identical with Zeus.) The identification with Dionysus is most fully argued by the Roman author Plutarch (Table Talk 4.6.1-2) who points to the festival of Tabernacles at the height of the vintage, Jewish ritual use of wine, and the observance of the Sabbath (Dionysus was identified with Sabazius, whose name suggested the connection with the Sabbath). During the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes in 167 B.C., Jews were compelled to walk in the procession in honor of Dionysus, wearing wreaths of ivy (2 Macc. 6:7). It is possible that Philopator thought Judaism was a Dionysiac cult and tried to regularize its practices. 3 Maccabees, however, is our only testimony for such an action by this Ptolemy, and it is a dubious historical witness. The fact that the story contains credible historical elements does not guarantee that the main incidents happened.

The custom of branding or tattooing was associated with the cult of Dionysus from ancient times. It is likely that Philopator himself was so branded. Branding was also used to mark slaves, so that they could be captured if they ran away. 3 Maccabees appears to confuse the two kinds of branding, since the Jews are said to be reduced to servile status. The "former limited status" (2:29) probably refers to the condition of Jewish captives before their liberation by Ptolemy Philadelphus (Let. of Arist. 22).

The central issue in the interpretation of this passage concerns the laographia or census. The term could refer simply to the registration of worshipers of Dionysus. It is probable, however, that the usage in 3 Maccabees was colored by the Roman association of a census with the poll tax, which was imposed on noncitizens (see Tcherikover, Hadas). Hence, the entire proposal of the Ptolemy is construed as an attempt to lower the status of the Jews.

The issue of citizenship is raised again by the offer of the king that those who were initiated into the mysteries would enjoy equal rights with the Alexandrians. It is not clear whether this offer is extended to all the Jews or only to a few. Underlying the episode is the dilemma of Diaspora Jews, especially in the Roman era. They aspired to equal rights with the Greeks, but citizenship would involve the worship of pagan gods in the course of civic functions. 3 Maccabees, like Philo and others, regards this price as unacceptable. There were always individual Jews who paid this price to advance their careers. (Dositheus son of Drimylus may have been such; the most famous example is Philo's nephew Tiberius Julius Alexander). 3 Maccabees not only disapproves of such people, but extols those who were willing to risk death rather than betray their religion.

3:1-10, The Slander Against the Jews.

The refusal of the Jews to comply with the registration leads to an escalation of the threat. The decision to gather the Jews of the countryside to Alexandria is reminiscent of the papyrus on the cult of Dionysus, quoted above. Here, however, the purpose is not only registration but extermination. The king's resolve is supported by people who plot against the Jews. The author insists that the Jews were loyal to the king but incurred enmity because of the strangeness of their customs. The charge that Jews were disloyal because they did not worship the pagan gods is found already in the book of Daniel, but there, as in Esther, the professional rivalry of courtiers is a factor. The scandal of Jewish difference was an issue in the Diaspora. The Letter of Aristeas tried to overcome it by providing an allegorical interpretation of the dietary laws. There was a tradition of anti-Jewish polemic in Egypt, beginning with the Egyptian author Manetho (about 300 B.C.) and reaching a crescendo in the first century A.D. The recurring charges were "atheism" and "inhospitality" (see Josephus Against Apion). 3 Maccabees, like Josephus, refuses to ascribe this slander to "the Greeks." Josephus insists that the detractors are "Egyptians." 3 Maccabees calls them "foreigners" (somewhat enigmatically) and insists that "the Greeks" were well disposed to the Jews and tried to help them.

3:11-30, The Ptolemy's Decree. The remark that the Ptolemy had no regard for the power of God suggests that he was guilty of hubris—the typical sin of tyrants in Greek tragedy on the one hand and in Hebrew tradition on the other (see the treatment of Babylon in the Prophets and of the Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes in Daniel). In his decree, Philopator places the blame on the Jews for their inhospitality at the Jerusalem Temple and their rejection of the cult of Dionysus and the offer of citizenship. The decree condemning a whole people to death seems wildly out of proportion to these charges. The threat of virtual genocide was a specter that had long haunted Diaspora Judaism, as can be seen already in the book of Esther. It had acquired some substance in the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes (167 B.C.) and again in the pogrom in the time of Caligula (A.D. 38). While there is obvious similarity between these incidents and the anti-Semitism of modern times, it is important to bear in mind that there was no racial theory in the ancient disputes. In part, the hostility to the Jews in Egypt came from the fact that they had no sympathy with Egyptian nationalism and were all too loyal to the Roman overlords, who were thought to favor them unduly. In both ancient and modern times, however, some of the hostility came from the fact that Jews were a clearly identifiable foreign body and so an easy scapegoat on which their neighbors could vent their frustrations.

4:1–21, The Imprisonment of the Jews.

The arrest of the Jews is described with considerable pathos in the emotional style of Hellenistic historiography. The use of the hippodrome anticipates the Roman use of the circus for tormenting Christians. Two anomalies in the story require comment. First, it seems that the death sentence at first only applied to the Jews from the countryside and that their kinsfolk in the city were only included because of their show of sympathy. Yet there is no apparent reason why this should have been so. Second, all those condemned to death are registered at considerable inconvenience. The registration may conceivably have been in preparation for seizing the property of the condemned, but this is not indicated here (note, however, 7:22, where the Jews recover their property according to the registration). Both these anomalies may result from the adaptation of an older story about a census, such as is described in the papyrus quoted above. That census was specifically for country folk, who were required to come to Alexandria, and the registration had a more obvious purpose.

In 3 Maccabees the registration becomes the occasion of a miracle when the paper mill and pens give out. The incident underlies the implausibility of an attempt to register the whole Jewish population of Egypt at one location. 3 Maccabees, however, construes it as “the working of invincible providence.” It becomes a forewarning of the frustration of the king’s further plans against the Jews.

5:1–51, The Frustration of the King’s Plans.

The proposed manner of execution was that the Jews be trampled by elephants who had been drugged with frankincense and wine. (The elephants are also made drunk in the parallel story in Josephus.) Intoxicating the elephants made little practical sense: war elephants were trained to kill by trampling and might be more difficult to control if they were drunk. Kasher suggests that the wine and frankincense were given as part of a Dionysiac ritual and that the execution was likewise ceremonial. The number of elephants, five hundred, is excessive: Philopator has only seventy-three elephants at the battle of Raphia. The name of the keeper of the elephants, Hermon, is reminiscent of Haman, enemy of the Jews in the book of Esther.

The story skillfully builds suspense, as the plans of the king are frustrated three times. First, the king is overcome by sleep at the appointed hour. On the second occasion he becomes forgetful of his purpose. In each case he is said to be thwarted by God, in response to the prayers of the Jews. The suspense is heightened by the prolongation of the third attempt. This time the king, who is compared to Phalaris (a sadistic tyrant of the sixth century B.C.), resolves not only to destroy the Egyptian Jews but also to attack Judea. The entry of the elephants into the hippodrome is described along with the supposed last farewells of the Jews, who fling themselves prone and cry out with a final prayer. The outcome is further delayed by the prayer of Eleazar.

6:1–15, The Prayer of Eleazar.

The name Eleazar was popular in Hellenistic Judaism. It was the name of the high priest in the Letter of Aristeas (in 3 Maccabees, Eleazar is “one of the priests”) and of a martyr in 2 Maccabees 6 and 4 Maccabees 5–6. Like the Maccabean martyr, this Eleazar is advanced in years. His prayer recalls previous tyrants who were humbled by God (Pharaoh in Exod. 14; Sennacherib in 2 Kings 18–19) and acts of miraculous deliverance (Daniel in Dan. 6; the three young men in Dan. 3; Jonah; the references to Daniel show the post-Maccabean date of the book). Like the earlier prayer of Simon, this one stands in the Deuteronomistic tradition, but the confession of sin is even more muted here. Eleazar asks, “If our life is forfeit by reason of irreverent deeds during our foreign sojourn, deliver us.” This is the only suggestion that the persecution is a punishment for sin. God is not asked to intervene because of any merit of the Jews but lest the enemy say that God failed to deliver them. Instead, God should remember them “even in the land of their enemies.” The latter phrase reflects a measure of alienation from their environment that is quite different from the perspective of Philo, who said that Jews "severally hold that land as their fatherland in which they were born and reared" (Flaccus 46).

The Deliverance of the Jews

6:16–41, The Reversal of Fortune. The story moves to its climax as the king enters the hippodrome. As in the story of Heliodorus (2 Macc. 3:26), two angels appear. It is not clear why they should not be visible to the Jews. Hadas suggests that the apparition was part of a source and that the author's own theology had no place for intermediary beings (there are no angels in the Temple incident in chap. 2). If that were so, the author could easily have omitted the angels here. The fact that they were not visible to all underlines their supernatural character. The parallel story in Josephus (Against Apion 2.53–54) also has the elephants turn on the Ptolemy's army. (Cf. Dan. 3, where the fire from the furnace burns some of the executioners, and Dan. 6, where Daniel's accusers are cast into the lions' den and devoured.)

The conversion of the king is a standard element in such stories (cf. Dan. 2–6, where pagan monarchs regularly praise the God of Daniel). Philopator passes the blame on to friends. In the stories of Daniel (3 and 6) and Esther, the primary blame clearly rests with the king's advisers, but here the Ptolemy himself had taken the initiative. In these Diaspora tales, however, it was reassuring to think that the highest authority was not itself hostile, although it might be swayed against the Jews from time to time.

The establishment of a festival (3 Macc. 6:36) has an obvious precedent in Purim in the book of Esther (chap. 9). Josephus also speaks of the deliverance from the elephants as "the origin of the well-known feast which the Jews of Alexandria keep, with good reason, on this day" (Against Apion 2.55; trans. Thackeray, Loeb Classical Library). Presumably there was such a feast. We do not know just what it was or how it was related to Purim.

7:1–9, Ptolemy's Letter. The letter formalizes what the king has said in chap. 6, blaming his "friends" and praising the Jews and their God. "The most high God" is a common appellation for God on the lips of Gentiles in the Hellenistic period (compare "the God of heaven" in Ezra and Nehemiah).

7:10–16, Revenge on Apostates. At the end of the book of Esther, the Jews take vengeance on their gentile enemies and slay them by the thousand. In 3 Maccabees, these enemies get off lightly. The king accepts no blame, and, while he upbraids his "friends," he spares their lives. The vengeance of the Jews is directed toward those of their own people who voluntarily transgressed the law (even though they did so under duress). The king agrees that such people cannot be trusted, and more than three hundred of them are put to death.

The motif of the destruction of the enemy is a standard motif in stories of this kind, as a counterpart to the salvation of the righteous. In apocalyptic literature it attains a more definitive character as eternal damnation. 3 Maccabees, however, is not merely repeating the standard motif. The fact that Jews rather than Gentiles are singled out for vengeance suggests the animosity that observant Jews felt for renegades, especially in a time of crisis when the survival of the people was at stake.

7:17–23, The Departure. The story ends happily with the return of the Jews to their homes. We should note that the happy ending is "by the ordinance of the king"—there is no aspiration to independence. The festival mentioned here is presumably an extension of the one mentioned in chap. 6. The registration proves to have a providential purpose after all, as it enables the Jews to recover their possessions. The book closes appropriately with a benediction to God as "the Deliverer of Israel."

4 MACCABEES

STANLEY K. STOWERS

INTRODUCTION

The Fourth Book of Maccabees occurs in important manuscripts of the Greek Bible and was also circulated with the works of Flavius Josephus, the Jewish historian. In the latter it was given the apt title, "On the Sovereignty of Reason." To the eyes of modern interpreters accustomed to making a sharp theologically motivated division between "Greek" and "Jewish," the work has seemed strangely dual, even artificial. Its explicit topic is the rule of reason over the passions or emotions. The theme pervades the book and is repeated throughout (1:9, 13, 19, 30; 2:6, 24; 6:31; 7:16; 13:1; 16:1; 18:2). The topic belongs to Greek philosophy. 4 Maccabees is also about martyrs from the Maccabean conflict and expresses a kind of Judaism that partially defines itself over against the Greek way of life. Using the language and concepts of Stoicism (→ Stoics), 4 Maccabees argues that Jews can dominate their passions through reason trained and taught by the law and thus resist challenges to faithfulness even at the cost of life.

Literary Characteristics

The book is also literarily dual. Indeed the author is explicit about the work falling into two parts (3:19; cf. 1:2, 7–12). The first section, 1:1–3:18, is the discursive argument of a thesis. After an introductory narrative (3:19–4:26) that provides the dramatic setting, the second part of the work (3:19–18:24) focuses on the stories of the Maccabean martyrs: the martyrdom of Eleazar (5:1–7:23); the martyrdom of the seven brothers (8:1–14:10); and the mother of the seven (14:11–17:6). Even though the work provides substantial accounts of the martyrs' defiance and torture, it is misleading to think of the second half as essentially "historical" narratives. Argumentation and the rhetorical praise known as encomium are as important there as narrative.

The variety of generic descriptions proposed for 4 Maccabees reflects the difficulties that interpreters have experienced in providing an overall description of the work. It has most commonly been called a diatribe. Until recently scholars have usually employed "diatribe" to mean any brief popular ethical and philosophical work with dialogical characteristics. With its hypothetical objections at 1:5 and 2:24, the first part of the book, 1:1–3:18, fits this definition of the diatribe fairly well. The second part, with its long narrative sections, however, does not. Moreover, recent scholarship on the diatribe has shown that it is better defined as a type of rhetoric that has its setting in the classroom discussion of the philosophical schools. Thus while the work has some similarities to the diatribal literature, diatribe is wholly inadequate as a generic description.

Others have described 4 Maccabees as a synagogue sermon but have not provided any examples for comparison, since we know almost nothing about synagogue "preaching" in the time of 4 Maccabees. The description of 4 Maccabees in terms of the styles of oratorical praise common in Greek and Latin culture (i.e., as an encomium or panegyric) partially fits the second half of the work. There, praise of the martyrs and their virtues is a significant element. It is even possible to call the latter part of the book an epitaphios logos (Gk.), a commemorative funeral oration. This genre is related to panegyric, and genuine similarities to it do appear in the last chapters of 4 Maccabees.

The combination of observations that are the basis for the preceding generic descriptions are best accounted for by the techniques of the rhetorical thesis. The thesis is known from numerous rhetorical handbooks and student manuals known as elementary rhetorical exercises, as well as from examples of the genre and miscellaneous discussions, especially in Cicero. Theses were general theoretical and ethical questions first discussed and written about in the philosophical schools. Many of these topics were taken into the rhetorical schools where "thesis" came to mean "the investigation of a topic without reference to specific circumstances." Students were trained in how to develop theses rhetorically. Theses were contrasted with hypotheses, which were topics including specifics such as person, time, and place. The following are examples of theses: "whether one ought to worship God"; "whether the wise man can suffer distress"; "whether one can trust the evidence of sense perception." A thesis could be transformed into a hypothesis by adding specific circumstances and treated as a judicial case, a matter of advice, or a subject for praise or blame (i.e., treated encomiastically). Quintilian, a Roman teacher of rhetoric, gives "whether one ought to marry" as an example of a thesis that could be turned into the following hypothesis: "Should Cato have married?" (Institutio oratoria 3.5.8).

4 Maccabees is the rhetorical treatment of the thesis formally stated in 1:1, "whether religious reason is sovereign over the passions." In 1:1–3:18 the orator treats the subject as a typical thesis. In 3:19–18:24 the author continues to argue the thesis but fixes on the one example of the Maccabean martyrs, so that, in effect, he has added person, time, and place. The second half of the work then resembles the argument of a thesis combined with its hypothesis treated encomiastically. Thus the subject of the second half becomes "we ought to praise the martyrs if they are shown to have mastered the emotions through religious reason." This explains why 3:19–18:24 contains so many characteristics of encomium or panegyric and yet continues to argue the philosophical theses. Since the commemorative funeral oration was a speech praising dead war heroes and civic martyrs, it is not surprising that the Maccabean heroes would be praised in similar terms. Thus the common techniques of developing a thesis explain 4 Maccabees' similarities to the diatribe, panegyric, sermon, and funeral oration.

A number of commentators have thought that 4 Maccabees is the record of a speech delivered orally at a festival or occasion in honor of the martyrs. In 1:10 and 3:19 there is reference to "the present occasion." The same expression is used in funeral orations and panegyrics that were at least purportedly delivered in public. A reference to the tomb of the martyrs occurs in 17:8, and a grave site commemoration is conceivable. Students of rhetoric, however, were taught to develop hypotheses so as to portray a courtroom situation, an advisory speech to Cato, or a civic oration. Thus one can only say that 4 Maccabees literarily presents itself as an occasional oration with a live audience.

In sum, 4 Maccabees represents the perfect form for a rhetorically trained orator who is also committed to philosophy. It both rhetorically argues a philosophical thesis and develops that thesis into an encomium of those examples that are used as evidence for the thesis. The elements of encouragement and consolation in 4 Maccabees are natural to panegyric. This complex mixture of praise, moral example, and exhortation is specified in the introduction to the funeral oration in Plato's Menexenus (236E): "The proper speech will sufficiently praise the dead and gently exhort the living, encouraging their descendents and brethren to imitate their virtue—and to console survivors—praising the good men who in life brought joy to friends by their virtue, and gave their lives in exchange for the salvation of the living."

Authorship, Date, and Place of Origin

Although at one time 4 Maccabees was attributed to Josephus, its author is unknown. The author was almost certainly a Hellenistic Jewish man. He spoke fluent Greek and was highly trained in rhetoric. The book reflects a broad knowledge of Greek culture. He had at least a basic knowledge of Greek philosophy, namely, some form of later Stoicism. He was probably a public figure and one of the literati in some Jewish community (see 1:12). He knew Scripture, namely, the Law and the Prophets, but used Scriptural examples in a typically Greek rhetorical way. He employed the Septuagint Greek translation (LXX), and 4 Maccabees is free of Semitisms that might suggest that Greek was the author's second language. The author drew on various legends from the Maccabean period. His most important source for 4 Maccabees, however, was 2 Maccabees. The narrative portions of chaps. 3–18 are largely an expansion of 2 Maccabees 6:12–7:42.

Scholars have proposed many dates between 63 B.C. and A.D. 120 for the writing of 4 Maccabees. Since there is no clear evidence for dating, no proposal can be much more than an educated guess. The most probable suggestion would place its composition in the first century A.D. The one argument for dating that carries some weight was made by Elias Bickerman. He points to 4:2 where Apollonius is called governor of Syria, Phoenicia, and Cilicia and shows that Cilicia was only an administrative part of Syria between about A.D. 20 and 54. The administrative arrangement mentioned in 4:9, then, may be an anachronism reflecting the author's own time.

The work itself gives no evidence for place of composition. The literary setting for the martyrdoms is clearly Jerusalem. Scholars have most often proposed Alexandria and Antioch as places of composition, the former because of its famous Greek-Jewish intellectual tradition and the latter because a Christian cult of the Maccabean martyrs in Antioch seems to go back at least to the fourth century. Jerusalem or any of the Greek, Phoenician, or Jewish cities of Palestine are even more likely. Greek was a literary and administrative second language of upper-class Jews in Palestine, and Greek education continued in Jerusalem even after the Maccabean revolt. Substantial numbers of Jews who spoke Greek as a first language also lived in Palestine. Palestine and Syria together produced more Stoic teachers than any other region. Finally, however, the lack of evidence means that the author could have come from any urban setting in the Greek East with a Jewish community and could have composed the work anywhere.

Significance and Thought

To the historian of religions, 4 Maccabees is important as a witness to one way of being Jewish in a world where many types of Judaism flourished. Already in the time of the Maccabees being a Jew was, for the majority, a matter of belonging to two cultures. It was never a matter of merely choosing between Hellenism and Judaism but of continually adapting some form of Judaism to a Hellenistic world to which it already belonged. Although 4 Maccabees takes the strongest stand against compromising practices deemed essential to "the Jewish way of life," it also assumes a large area of commonality and rapprochement with "the Greek way of life." For the author this commonality surely included concrete and practical areas of social and cultural intercourse, but in 4 Maccabees it is conceived in terms of Greek philosophy.

In the world of 4 Maccabees there is a Greek way of life, a Jewish way of life, and a large area of the universally true that substantially overlaps with both ways of life. This common ground is primarily conceived in terms of human nature and worked out in psychology and ethics. The four cardinal virtues (prudence, fortitude, temperance, and justice), their subvirtues, reason, the emotions, and instincts are human. Both the Greek and Jewish ways of life aim for the virtues, although the Jewish law that produces the Jewish way of life is a superior means to them. There is no opposition between nature and the law (e.g., as human convention or supernatural) because both were ordained by God and made compatible by God. At the same time the book does not universalize the law. It is the constitution of the Jewish people.

There has been great confusion in the scholarly literature concerning the philosophical kinship of 4 Maccabees. It has been called Platonic, Aristotelian, and, most often, Stoic. Most unsatisfactory of all is the claim that it is a mishmash of philosophical commonplaces. 4 Maccabees is a rhetorical oration and not a philosophical treatise. That, however, does not mean that its philosophical thought is incoherent. In several respects its thought is definitively Stoic. This has never been clearly shown in the scholarly literature because Stoicism with its long and complex history has been treated in terms of a superficial caricature. The task is also difficult because certain types of later Stoicism adapted Platonic and Aristotelian elements into their systems and certain Platonists borrowed much from Stoics.

What is most Stoic about 4 Maccabees is the role of reason in relation to the emotions and irrational dispositions. Although all of the Hellenistic schools agreed that reason was to be master of the emotions, what this meant was developed in quite different ways and expressed in their depictions of the ideal wise man. Stoics thought that reason should thoroughly dominate the emotions. There is no room in Stoic theory for the continual and often creative struggle between the two that is characteristic of Platonism or the integration of emotion into the higher form of reason as in Aristotelian thought. The older or orthodox Stoics taught that the typical emotions of most people were diseased states of the soul that needed to be replaced by rationalized emotions. The so-called middle Stoics, especially Posidonius, taught that the emotions were innate and could not be eradicated or rationalized. They could only be tamed and mastered.

4 Maccabees stands very close to the middle Stoicism of Posidonius on several points of psychology. The emotions and dispositions are innate and cannot be eradicated but must be thoroughly subjugated by reason. The Stoic character of the work's philosophy is most clear in its depictions of the martyrs who resemble the figure of the Stoic wise man. The mother, for example, so thoroughly mastered her emotions and irrational impulses by her reasonings that she suppressed her maternal love and did not even flinch or grieve when she saw her children being burned alive and dismembered. The chief virtue of the work is courage, which is defined in a typically Stoic way as endurance and constancy. The martyrs, like the wise man, know what must be endured (i.e., that which is not morally good, the emotions, and fortune). Through the power of reason they are able to endure these things. In sharp contrast to Philo's Platonic-Stoic synthesis (→ Philo) there are no traces of Platonic elements and no criticism of any Stoic doctrines in 4 Maccabees.

It is impossible to know what 4 Maccabees meant to its first readers or hearers. We can only know what it meant for the author and his implied literary audience. The latter are imagined to be Jews for whom the philosophical doctrines of 4 Maccabees are for the most part accepted as scientific knowledge. 4 Maccabees' way of arguing by means of a decisive empirical example, the endurance of the martyrs, resembles a type of "proof" for which Posidonius was famous. The work uses the thesis to define the nature of Israel's inviolable integrity as God's people. History, including the events of the Maccabean struggle, had shown that military power and political-religious institutions could not be the basis for Israel's integrity. Through the argument of its thesis concerning the endurance of the martyrs, the book seeks to show that the integrity of the whole nation can be guaranteed by the faithful sage's inner invincibility. The essential premise is that obedience to and education in the law produces virtuous character in those who are faithful. Antiochus Epiphanes violated the physical and symbolic boundaries of the nation, but he was not able to destroy the moral-religious integrity of the martyrs even though he violated their physical bodies. Therefore the soul of the nation was inviolable. 4 Maccabees answers the question, "What shall we be in order to survive?" In the form of encomium that praises the martyrs' virtues, it also contains a strong element of exhortation. What it praises, it also recommends.

The impregnable boundary may be the faithful Jew's religious reason, i.e., moral-religious character, but the faithful Jew is not merely an individual. As a member of Israel the individual bears a part of Israel's corporate responsibility to God's justice. In turn the individual can affect the whole. The martyrs in 4 Maccabees affect the whole nation in two ways. First, the example of their faithfulness had great paradigmatic power, and that helped to effect faithfulness in the rest of the nation. Second, their endurance was so meritorious that God regarded their suffering as sufficient atonement for the nation's apostasy. 4 Maccabees interprets the significance of their deaths within the tradition of "the merits of the fathers." Some individuals like Abraham and Moses were so virtuous that God henceforth blessed the whole people or all descendants on the basis of their faithfulness. Thus all Israelites receive the blessings of the covenant on the basis of God's regard for Abraham's faithfulness. So God also restored the nation's fortunes because of the Maccabean martyrs.

Apart from Christian groups, 4 Maccabees does not seem to have been known to any later types of Judaism. Christians transmitted the book, which may have been significant for early Jewish followers of Christ. Some scholars have argued that 4 Maccabees' conception of the martyrs' expiatory suffering influenced Paul's interpretation of Jesus' death. While there is virtually nothing about the atoning effect of a person's death in Jewish literature before the turn of the era, the theme is extremely important in Greek literature. Some, then, have argued that 4 Maccabees may have mediated such concepts to the earliest followers of Jesus.

This theory would also help to explain why 4 Maccabees was read as a Christian book by the later church. It was clearly important to the later church's cult and theology of martyrdom and was a force in forming that tradition. The Martyrdom of Polycarp (second century A.D.), the earliest piece of Christian martyr literature, seems to contain literary and conceptual echoes of 4 Maccabees. 4 Maccabees was popular among the representatives of the golden age of patristic literature in the fourth and fifth centuries. Gregory of Nazianzus, John Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, and Jerome preached and wrote about the martyrs. These authors treat the Maccabean heroes as Christian protomartyrs. Thus although 4 Maccabees never achieved a canonical status in either Western or Eastern churches, it was influential especially in the latter.

COMMENTARY

1:1-12

Introduction

The introduction in 1:1-12 exhibits the advice of certain rhetoricians that writers of theses should use a special type of careful and artful introduction instead of the normal rhetorical introduction. Thus the author not only attempts to make the audience attentive but also lays out his thesis and exactly how he will treat it.

1:1-6, Statement of the Thesis. The orator announces the thesis (1:1a), urges its importance (1:1b-2), and clarifies it with a qualification (1:3-6). Modern philosophy is an academic discipline that concerns theories of knowledge and their implications. For our author and Greco-Roman culture, philosophy meant wisdom in living life. On the basis of medieval and modern assumptions about "faith and reason" interpreters have claimed that "religious reason" is an oxymoron. But with rare exceptions ancient philosophy understood reason and piety toward the gods to be integrally related. For Stoics "religion" or "piety" was one of the virtues. Like Philo and many other Jews, the writer of 4 Maccabees believed that the wisdom of philosophy found its highest expression in the teachings of the five Mosaic books of the law (see, e.g., 2:16-17). Thus the author speaks of "religious reason," probably adding "religious" to a thesis that may have already been current in the rhetorical schools.

Verse 2 not only claims importance for the thesis but also suggests the twofold treatment that the author will give to it. The rhetorical handbooks divide theses into theoretical and practical subjects. Theses were sometimes treated encomiastically, praising and recommending moral virtues. The first part of 4 Maccabees treats the thesis theoretically (1:12-3:18), while the second is encomiastic and exhortatory (3:19-18:24). Verse 2 suggests this distinction: the work will encompass both "theoretical knowledge" and praise of "practical moral thinking" (i.e., "prudence").

Verses 3-4 elaborate the thesis. The four cardinal virtues of the Platonic and Stoic schools,

"rational self-restraint," "justice," "courage," as well as "practical moral thinking" in verse 2, are set against a miscellany of opposing emotions and dispositions that are all called passions (Gk. pathê). The word may also be properly translated as "emotions," but no modern English concept fully corresponds to the ancient idea of "passions."

Some of the rhetorical handbooks instruct authors of theses to use objections from imaginary interlocutors to sharpen the discussion and answer typical criticisms of the thesis. The objection in 1:5 is repeated in 2:24. It allows the clarification of two possible counterarguments: first, that reason cannot control emotions (i.e., passions) because it cannot even control ignorance and forgetfulness that affect the intellect itself; second, that mastery of the emotions means their elimination. The latter was a common misunderstanding of the orthodox Stoics who taught that the diseased emotions such as "irrational fear" had to be entirely eliminated and replaced with the good emotions such as "rational caution."

1:7-12, The Examples to Be Used. The second part of the introduction explains how the orator will treat the thesis in the second part of the work (3:19-18:24) by turning to the martyrs in order to illustrate it. This procedure resembles what the rhetoricians called developing a hypothesis, i.e., adding person, specific events, and place to a thesis. Verse 10 probably means that although the author could give a standard speech of formal praise of the martyrs's virtues (i.e., an encomium or panegyric), he will give an oration that commemorates dead heroes. It was customary to speak of the dead as "blessed." The expression "at this time" (1:10, 3:19) may indicate that the oration was delivered at a festival commemorating the martyrdoms.

1:13-3:18

Theoretical Development of the Thesis

In 1:13-3:18 the thesis is developed with various arguments. In 1:13-30a the author follows the practice in theoretical theses of beginning with definitions and distinctions regarding the key concepts. The following section, 1:30b-3:18, provides illustrations showing that reason has mastery over each type of emotion.

1:13-30a, Definitions and Distinctions. The definition of wisdom in 1:16 may possibly have originated with the Stoics but had come to be a philosophical commonplace used by writers from various backgrounds. 4 Maccabees has assimilated Greek ethics and psychology and yet remains definitively Jewish. It is the law, the five books of Moses, that gives content to the faculty of reason (1:17). Reason is almost the will to do God's law. The law teaches and trains the intellect (2:23; 5:24, 34; 13:24) and enables reason to develop the virtues (5:23; 13:13; cf. 11:27). The second half of 1:24 is textually problematic and the translation uncertain.

1:30b-2:23, Examples of the Power of Reason. Here the author advances examples to show how reason allows the person to master the emotions and thus obey the law. The discussion falls into three parts: reason's rule through rational self-control (1:30-2:6a); reason's rule through courage (2:6b-14); reason's rule over violent emotions through the rationally self-controlled mind (2:15-23). The most important concept in 1:30b-2:23 is "rational self-control," the most characteristically Greek virtue, which is often poorly translated as "temperance."

There are two quite different ways to translate the second part of verse 30. Hadas (similarly Anderson) renders the phrase in question, "in the case of the deeds which hamper temperance." But the following translation is equally possible (similarly the RSV and Townsend): "by means of the restraining effects of rational self-control." The first translation has the advantage of being parallel to 1:3 and 2:6. One reason that rational self-control looms so large in 4 Maccabees is that such self-control was traditionally the habit of resisting temptations to overeat or eat the wrong kinds of foods. The Jewish food laws become the central test case in the account of the martyrdoms (1:33-34; cf. 5:16-24). Rational self-control was also the means of restraining sexual desire. The story of Joseph (2:2-3) became the example that epitomized this virtue in Jewish and early Christian literature.

In 2:6b-14 the author provides examples from the law that he treats as general humanitarian principles. In the law, lending without interest applies only to Jews (Exod. 22:25; Lev. 25:36; Deut. 23:20). Similarly, on gleaning (4 Macc. 2:9) see Lev. 19:9-10. 4 Macc. 2:9-10 shows clearly how the law provides the content for reason. Verse 14 is quite elliptical and difficult to construe precisely, although the general idea is clear (cf. Deut. 20:19-20; Exod. 23:4-5).

In discussing the hardest case of the most violent emotions (4 Macc. 2:15-23), the author will finally clarify his philosophical position on human psychology. The concepts contained in verses 21-23 are Stoic and probably come from the middle Stoicism of Panaetius and Posidonius, who emphasized that the emotions were innate and could not be eradicated. Reason's role is to subdue and master the passions completely. There is not just a standoff or creative struggle between the two parts of the soul as a Platonist might have taught. At the same time, the passions cannot be cut out. God himself created humans with passions and inclinations (2:21) that through the agency of the senses are to be ruled by the governing power of the intellect (2:22). For orthodox Stoics, the mind has no innate ideas but is consubstantial with universal divine reason. The senses work together with reason in apprehending the world empirically. Passions arise when the intellect errs about the value and nature of objects. The middle Stoics modified this position by making the passions innate. For our Jewish author the Mosaic law educates the faculty of reason and is also an object of perception. The Stoics, in one of their famous paradoxes, said that the wise man, who lives according to reason, is the only true king. He controls the only thing over which a person truly has power, the inner moral state. Our author says that the one who lives according to the law reigns over a kingdom of the virtues (2:23).

2:24–3:18, The Example of David's Thirst. Although there is no manuscript warrant, several commentators reject the phrase "those of the body" in 3:1 and replace it with the corresponding answer in 1:6. They do this because the examples of passions in 3:2–4 are not passions of the body. The author's contrast, however, is not between passions of the body and those of the soul (RSV misleadingly translates "soul" as "mind" in 3:3) but between passions of the body and those of reason. Reason is merely the governing aspect of the soul. "Passions of the reason" (2:24–3:1) refers to states of the intellect like forgetfulness, which are basically involuntary. The point then is not a contrast between soul and body but the extent to which reason controls soul-body. The author could as well have written, "those of the body and irrational aspects of the soul" in 3:1.

In introducing "desire" in 3:2, the example of King David is already in view. The Greek Bible uses "desire" of David in 2 Sam. 23:15, and desire in the focus of the story in 4 Maccabees (3:11, 12, 16). The writer already emphasized that some desires are of the body and some of the soul (1:32). The story about David illustrates both as it creatively embellishes the biblical account. The "tensing and loosing" in 3:11 reflects the Stoic explanation of the emotions. The story is yet another argument for the power of the mind when it exhibits the virtue of rational self-control (3:17; cf. 1:35; 2:16, 18; 3:19). The reason for this emphasis is clear: through this virtue a martyr can "overcome the sufferings of the body regardless of how extreme" (3:18).

In sum, 1:1–3:18 argues for the thesis in a way that stresses rational self-control over the appetites, especially appetites of eating, and over the emotions of pain. Courage is also important. This philosophically informed orator has given a scientific explanation of the ability to endure in the face of temptation, persecution, and torture. In 3:19–18:24 he will rhetorically narrate stories that he believes profoundly prove the truth of his thesis and show that "even women and children," if they have cultivated these virtues through the law, can endure the most extreme persecution.

Development of the Thesis Through the Example of the Maccabean Martyrs

4 Macc. 3:19 is the major transition of the whole discourse. After 3:19 the style changes from the popular philosophical argumentation of a thesis to emotionally charged narratives and panegyrics. The differences, however, should not be overplayed. The first part already uses narratives about Joseph, Jacob, Moses, and David as examples, and the second part argues the thesis. The rhetorical genre of 3:19–18:24 is epideictic, the rhetoric of praise and blame customary on occasions such as weddings, funerals, commemorative celebrations, and award ceremonies. The author continues explicitly (6:31–34; 7:16–23; 13:1–7; 14:11–15:1; 16:1–4) and implicitly (throughout) to argue the thesis but also mixes argumentation with praise, or panegyric. The latter in turn is implicitly a kind of exhortation for the audience to emulate the virtues of the martyrs (see 18:1–2). The statement in 3:19 that "the proper time calls us to demonstrate the theme of rationally self-controlled reason" may refer to an occasion commemorating the martyrs at which the speech was given (cf. 1:10).

Historical Background to the Persecution

After the transitional verse 19, 3:20–4:26 provides a preface to the discussion of the martyrs. The first part (3:20–4:14) tells the story of Apollonius' attempt on the Temple treasury, and the second (4:15–26) narrates the background to Antiochus' persecutions. Here, and in the narratives that follow, the author probably drew on 2 Maccabees, but not always accurately. The author has confused "Seleucus Nicanor" (actually, Nicator) who lived ca. 358–281 B.C. with Seleucus IV Philopator (ruled 187–175 B.C.), the actual predecessor of Antiochus. Similarly, "governor of Syria, Phoenicia, and Cilicia" (4:2) is anachronistic. Cilicia was part of the province only in A.D. 20-54. Verse 5 contradicts 2 Macc. 3:7-8, where Heliodorus is put in command, not Apollonius. Such details are of little importance to the author's purposes. The orator need only provide enough narrative to make sense of the tyranny of Antiochus and his persecution of the martyrs.

Verse 15 is also inaccurate: Antiochus IV Epiphanes was not Seleucus' son but the brother of Seleucus IV Philopator. Verse 21 attributes Antiochus' attack to "divine justice" because of national apostasy from the law. The faithful endurance and deaths of the martyrs are more than isolated incidents with an exemplary personal significance in 4 Maccabees. They are an atonement and purification for the sin and apostasy under Antiochus (1:11; 17:21; 18:4). The work makes the story into a personal struggle with cosmic implications between the demonically anti-Jewish Antiochus, who is being used by God to punish and test his people, and the unlikely martyrs: an old man, seven boys, and an old woman. 4 Maccabees clearly has the struggle take place in Jerusalem, although the later church believed that the martyrdoms occurred in Antioch.

The Martyrdom of Eleazar

The section 5:1-7:23 comprises the martyrdom and eulogy of Eleazar (cf. 2 Macc. 18-31). The narratives of Eleazar's and the youths' martyrdoms have a very similar structure: the tyrant's exhortation to apostasy (5:5-13); a speech of defiance (5:14-38); torture of the hero (6:1-25); final words and death (6:26-30). In each case the narrative is followed by an encomium in praise of the martyr(s) and an appeal to their behavior as evidence for the thesis. The mother is treated differently in several respects due to the ancient hierarchical conception of gender.

5:1-4, Narrative Setting. The events unfold at a preeminent public place in Jerusalem. When Eleazar speaks, he speaks to the "people" of the city (5:15). Many Jews have already chosen apostasy by participating in the abolition of the constitution and way of life taught in the law (4:18-20). The story of Apollonius is told to show that such a thing would have been impossible if the Jewish leaders were faithful and God was with them. But now God is justly angry and sends Antiochus to punish his people (4:21). When Antiochus arrives many people bravely resist apostasy but without God's help are killed (4:24-26). In this dramatic setting, all eyes are focused on Eleazar, the boys, and the mother. In likening the martyrdoms to an athletic contest, 17:14 describes "the world and humanity as the spectators." They are public examples and the narrative will make it clear that the fate of the nation hangs on the strength of their character.

Verse 4 introduces and characterizes Eleazar. He is a priest, skilled in the law, an old man, and a philosopher. In 2 Maccabees he is a ninety-year-old scribe. That he is a priest and known to Antiochus' court for his philosophical way of life reflects the peculiar perspective of 4 Maccabees. As a priest and expert in the law he is definitively loyal to the integrity of the Jewish nation-people-religion. As a philosopher he also lives in a larger Greek world that is partially reconcilable with Judaism. The irony of 4 Maccabees is that Greek philosophy explains how the utmost loyalty to Judaism is possible. 4 Maccabees emphasizes that each martyr faces torture and death with a disability that makes their endurance more remarkable. For Eleazar it is his old age.

5:5-13, Antiochus' Exhortation to Apostasy.

Antiochus' exhortation to apostasy (5:5-13) and Eleazar's reply (5:14-38) comprise opposing philosophies. The tyrant's speech takes the form of an exhortation to adopt a certain philosophy and its way of life. His argument against Eleazar's philosophy occupies vv. 8-10. It is unjust to reject the gifts of nature such as pork; such pleasures are a good not to be rejected by those who are truly wise. The mention of pleasure and nature makes Antiochus sound vaguely Epicurean. In a way typical of Stoics and other Hellenistic schools our author has nothing positive to say about "pleasure" (see 1:20-33), even if he believes that the capacity for pleasure is inherently human.

5:14-38, Eleazar's Defiant Reply.

In his reply Eleazar says that the law, in teaching "rational self-control," allows him to dominate his impulse toward pleasure (5:23). Summing up what Eleazar's case demonstrates about his thesis, the author includes the ability to dominate pleasure (6:35). Antiochus calls Eleazar to a philosophy of what is "beneficial" rather than to risk death on the basis of his philosophical doctrines (5:11). The king is enticing him to think personally and selfishly about his situation.

Eleazar, the philosopher tutored by the law, cannot reason as Antiochus urges. His defiant reply outlines the essential philosophical-religious notions of 4 Maccabees. In essence vv. 16-18 mean that Eleazar's transgression would not be a personal matter. The argument carries force if one remembers the dramatic setting. Eleazar's behavior is on display before the Jewish nation at a moment when either survival or assimilation to the Greek way of life is a real possibility. The way the nation will go depends upon whether or not the old philosopher upholds his "reputation for piety" (v. 18). In such a public situation, whether the particular transgression be minor or serious in itself, symbolically it would represent the rejection of the law (5:19-21; cf. v. 13).

The basic line of Eleazar's argument for observing the law is as follows: living by the law actually produces the virtues in us (vv. 23-24), therefore we do not eat unclean foods but believe that the law corresponds to the way that God has created us (vv. 25-27). The virtues in question are three of the four cardinal virtues generally regarded in Hellenistic culture as the mark of the wise man, plus "religion" or "piety," which was also considered an important virtue. Verses 25-26 are crucial for understanding how the author has reconciled his Greek and Jewish heritages: "Believing that God established the law, we know that the creator of the world, in giving the law, has cared for us according to nature. He has allowed us to eat the things which are well-disposed to our souls but has commanded us not to eat meats which are contrary to our souls." Now it is clear why the law produces virtues that for the author constitute the human good. God who created both the law and nature has made the teachings of the law correspond to the spiritual nature of the Jewish people. 4 Maccabees does not go on to argue that the natural constitution of all humans is created to conform to the food laws. The word translated as "well-disposed" was an extremely important concept for the Stoics. Verse 26 is reminiscent of what the Stoic Chrysippus said: "In constituting the creature, Nature made it well-disposed to itself so that it repels the harmful things and allows the things which are well-disposed" (Diogenes Laertius 7.85).

Verses 27-38 provide a rhetorical display of defiance against the tyrant. Socrates was the beginning of a long tradition of philosopher-martyrs. Under the early empire Stoics developed a reputation for opposition to tyranny. Eleazar's words are reminiscent of such Stoic defiance. Epictetus said that the tyrant could chain his leg or kill his body but never control his moral reasoning. Eleazar says the same in vv. 27-38. For 4 Maccabees, reason and the emotions are not abstract philosophical concepts. These doctrines mean that Judaism need not be subdued by a superior political power. Eleazar like the Stoic sage displays complete inner freedom. Unlike the Stoic sage he also is emboldened by belief in a future life and future retribution (5:37; cf. 13:17; 17:12).

6:1-30, The Torture and Death of Eleazar. In the lurid description of his torture (6:1-25), Eleazar is the synthesis of a Jewish "saint" and a philosopher-martyr. He raises his eyes to heaven in the attitude of prayer and dying martyrs (6:6, 26; cf. Acts 7:55). In the language of Hellenistic moral exhortation, he is a noble athlete (4 Macc. 6:10). Athletic imagery, so important in Hellenistic moral-philosophical literature, is one of the most important figurative motifs in the work (e.g., 17:11-14). Above all, Eleazar is a model or example for his people (6:19). The narrator gives him a last chance to save himself (6:12-15), so that the old philosopher can interpret his behavior as an example (6:16-23). Within the narrative it is an example most explicitly for the youths who will follow him (6:19, 22). Eleazar's example effects a reaction of imitation beginning with the boys and their mother that will finally save the whole nation. Cynics and the later Stoics spoke frequently of the philosopher's behavior under hardship and pain as an example for imitation. The example of the perfected philosopher, the wise man, was believed to have amazing power over people's lives.

From ancient literary practice, one expects final words in a death scene (6:26-30) to express key notions for the piece of literature in question. Verses 27-29 contain concepts that are virtually without precedent in Jewish literature, including the Hebrew Bible, but that were extremely important in ancient Greek literature, especially tragedy. These also became central ideas for interpreting the meaning of Jesus' death. Eleazar could have saved himself but remains faithful to God in order to die for his people. He asks God to regard his death as a "ransom" (cf. Mark 10:45) and "purification" for the sin of his people (cf. 4 Macc. 1:11; 9:24; 12:17; 17:21-22; 18:4). In other words, Eleazar is asking God to consider his faithfulness to death as sufficient punishment for the apostasy of Israel under Antiochus. He is asking for the return of God's protecting presence as it was in the days of the Apollonius incident.

6:31-35, Eleazar's Death as Philosophical Proof. Having depicted Eleazar's remarkable suppression of immediate self-interest for the sake of loyalty to God and the greater good of the nation, our author abruptly asserts what for him is the inescapable logic. Thus vv. 31-35 claim the narrative as "proof" of the thesis. Eleazar's self-giving is explainable by and demonstrates the governing power of reason over the irrational impulses of physical pain and the enticements of pleasure. Before amplifying Eleazar's case as proof of the thesis (7:16-23), the orator celebrates the old man in a brief encomium.

7:1-23, An Encomium and Further Argument. The model figure for the encomium in 7:1-15 is the Stoic wise man. The metaphor of reason as pilot is common in Hellenistic philosophy, but it was the Stoics, especially in the early Roman empire, who likened the wise man fortified with his reason to a besieged city (cf. Paul's opposition to such an attitude in 2 Cor. 10:3–6). The Stoics derived the imagery from Antisthenes who said, "Prudence is a most secure fortress which is never broken or betrayed. We ought to construct walls of defense with our own impregnable reasonings" (Diogenes Laertius 6.13). Instead of being compared with Stoic sages, however, Eleazar is compared to Aaron and Isaac, models of self-giving for their people through the power of reason. Eleazar himself has entered the ranks of these powerful moral examples (7:9). When the author returns to arguing his thesis (7:16–23), he raises a possible objection (7:17). What if many cannot attain the impregnable prudence that Antisthenes and our author recommend? Stoics thought that the true wise man was extremely rare and that most people did not live by reason. 4 Maccabees seems to agree. The answer to the objection seems to be that while only some will attain prudent reason, anyone who trusts in God and is devoted to his ways can fully develop his or her reason (7:18–19, 21–23). Like the Stoics, our author can say that only the wise man rules his emotions (7:23). The objection has no force for the author. Perfection is what reason and religion demand. In fact, 4 Maccabees polemicizes against Jews who would argue that torture and duress make lapses in keeping the law excusable (8:16–26). As with the philosophers, healthy reasoning is based on sure belief in true doctrines. These illustrate the author's Jewish-Stoic synthesis. Only the person who believes that they, like the patriarchs, will not die to God but live to God (7:19) and that it is blessed to suffer for the sake of virtue can attain prudent reason (7:22).

The Martyrdom of the Seven Brothers

This section, which treats the martyrdom of the seven brothers, seems to be a rhetorical expansion of 2 Macc. 7:1–38. If Eleazar's disability was old age, that of the seven brothers is youth. Stoics most often taught that children only attained the capacity for reason at age fourteen, although some held that it came earlier. It is unclear just how the author stands on this issue, except that the children are presented as exceptional because they are Jewish (e.g., 9:18). Stoics believed that children, because they were not fully rational, could only receive training; adults needed doctrines and training or in some cases doctrines alone. The youths in 4 Maccabees have received both. They were "nurtured in doctrines" (10:2), which probably include those mentioned in 7:19–22. Their victory is also attributed to the power of their reason (e.g., 8:15). The second youngest appeals to the invincibility of "religious knowledge" (Gk., epistēmē) in 11:21. The narrative, however, also emphasizes their "training" (paideia) and "discipline" (askēsis), e.g., 10:10; 13:22–24.

8:1–14, Narrative Setting and Exhortation to Apostasy. Antiochus' "violent rage" (8:2) is in marked contrast to the emotional self-control of the martyrs. There are also sexual overtones to the king's admiration for the boys (8:4–5). He offers to make them friends of the king, which means employment in his government (8:5, 7). The weakness of the tyrant's philosophy and his defeat by mere boys is a major theme of 8:1–14:10. The boys conquer him by testing his arguments with reason and standing firm in their own philosophy (8:15).

8:15–9:9, False Arguments and the Brothers' Defiant Reply. False arguments that the brothers might have used but did not are given in 8:16–26. This section functions as a model of how not to think, and the orator may be polemicizing against less rigorous members of the Jewish community. Instead of excuses, the boys collectively sing out a defiant response, like a Greek dramatic chorus (9:1–9). The boys are following a long line of Jewish martyrs that includes "old men of the Hebrews" (9:6) who endured torture. By the beginning of the common era there were legendary traditions attributing martyrdom to many figures in the Hebrew Bible (cf. Heb. 11:35–37). Stoic themes reappear in 4 Macc. 9:7–8: physical suffering cannot affect the inner rational nature of the wise man; suffering is managed by the virtue of endurance. The boys can endure because they know that they will be with God and that the tyrant will be punished eternally (9:8–9).

9:10–12:19, Account of the Torture of the Seven Brothers. In a pattern that is followed with minor variation for each of the youths, the eldest son's torture, defiant words, and death is described in 9:10–25. The narration illustrates the orator's complete freedom with the account in 2 Maccabees. In the latter, the boy's tongue is cut out, he is scalped, his hands and feet cut off, and he is burned in a pan. Here he is flogged, broken on the wheel, and burned in a fire. Verse 22, "as if transformed into incorruption by the fire he endured," shares language with the Letters of Paul (Phil. 3:21; 1 Cor. 15:51–53; 2 Cor. 3:18) and certain Hellenistic philosophers. Here the reference is probably to the divine and incorruptible nature of reason and virtue rather than end-time events as in Paul. As Eleazar encouraged the boys, so the eldest son exhorts his brothers to imitate him (9:23). The third and fourth brothers will explicitly appeal to brotherhood in accepting death (10:3, 15). The narrative of the second eldest follows briefly on the first (9:26–30). The boy's insolent reply in vv. 30–32 mixes two themes: virtue is the greatest reward while vice entails the worst punishment; the judgment of divine wrath is inescapable. The latter is an important theme in both Jewish and Greek literature.

The martyrdoms of the other brothers occupy 10:1–12:19. For ancient readers, each is yet more amazing, as the boys are successively younger. The assumption is that, the younger the child, the less his reason. In the account of the third brother, only some manuscripts have 10:4, which is probably an interpolation. The third brother's "boldness" outrages the tyrant. None of the martyrs are merely loyal to their cause; they are outspoken and insolent. "Boldness" was associated especially with the speech of Cynic philosophers but was also an attribute of the Stoic wise man. The characterization of Antiochus becomes progressively more malevolent. In 10:17 he is "bloodthirsty, murderous, and completely abominable." This characterization does not square with what is known about Antiochus. The exaggerations are created to achieve a high level of pathos. The fifth brother volunteers himself for torture so that the king will receive even more punishment (11:1–3). 4 Macc. 11:7–8 are not found in some important manuscripts and may be an addition to the text.

The narrative emphasizes the youth of the sixth and seventh brothers (11:13–14; 12:1–2). The sixth proclaims that he is nevertheless equal to his older brothers in intellect (11:14). The last is so young that even the wicked king feels strong compassion for him (12:2). There are few indications, however, of their "actual" ages. In 16:9 the orator mentions that some were married and some not. The accounts of the last two emphasize with great irony the utter helplessness and defeat of the tyrant by these young boys (e.g., 11:20–27). The speech of the youngest stresses the eternal torture that the king will receive as punishment both for rejecting God's blessings and for persecuting the truly faithful (12:11–19).

The story of the seventh son breaks the tiresome pattern and concludes with a twist. Out of compassion the king sends for the mother, hoping that she will persuade her son to eat (12:6–7). The actual words of the mother are postponed (see 16:12–24, although here she is inconsistently made to encourage all of the sons), and she speaks in Hebrew so that the tyrant will not hear her exhortation to martyrdom. Feigning acceptance of the king's offer, the boy is set free and commits suicide after a defiant speech. Stoics argued that suicide was justified in cases where there was no escape from the tyranny of a despot without compromising virtue.

13:1–7, The Brothers' Example as Certain Evidence. One implication is that any Jew who is trained by the law and believes its doctrines can be fully rational and prevail over all of the nonrational impulses and dispositions of soul and body. A second implication is that the real struggle between good and evil takes place within the individual's soul. Although Antiochus is the external enemy, the real opposition to be conquered is that produced by the nonrational impulses (e.g., 13:2). This attitude is characteristically Stoic. The author believes this to be a basic teaching of the sacred Scriptures (e.g., use of David, Moses, and others as examples; "reason commended by God" in 13:3).

13:8–14:10, An Encomium and Further Argument. In 13:8–18 the author begins to praise the brothers' reason. He employs the common rhetorical device of imaginary dialogue to illustrate the thesis further. The brothers speak in turn to one another, using the typical style of moral exhortation, e.g., encouragements to virtuous behavior with reasons for such action and examples. Chap. 13:9 refers to the Daniel legend (Dan. 3) and 13:12 to Isaac who was often considered the prototype of the self-giving Israelite. In 13:19–14:1 the author provides an encomium to the brothers and brotherhood. The orator treats brotherhood as both an asset and a liability. It was a liability for the brothers because their mutual sympathy had to be overcome in order to encourage one another to accept the martyrdom (13:27). It was an asset because it made their mastery of the emotions even more remarkable, and their common brotherhood became the basis for mutual encouragement to a common cause. The Stoics showed more interest in children and "natural" familial bonds than did the other Hellenistic schools. They extensively discussed the interrelationship of natural instincts toward familial affection and "sympathy" (lit., "shared passions") and stages in the development of reason. They also discussed the rational limitations of such bonds and their relationship to socialization and moral habituation. All of these topics appear in 13:19–14:1, e.g., the physical basis for natural instincts (vv. 19–21); socialization and moral training (vv. 22, 24, 27); familial sympathy (v. 23); the rational mastery of the emotion of brotherly love (14:1). Chap. 13:27 mentions natural instincts, socialization, and moral habituation.

The orator ends his discourse on the brothers by elevating his rhetoric to a higher level of elegance and pathos in 14:2–10. He begins the section with a direct address to reason, a rhetorical device known as an apostrophe. Verse 2 echoes the Stoic paradoxes that only the wise man (i.e., fully rational person) is king and only the wise man is free. The apostrophe immediately shifts into a eulogy of the seven brothers and their brotherly harmony (vv. 3–8). “Running the course to immortality” is yet another of the numerous athletic metaphors (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24–27). The number seven was considered to have special, almost mystical, significance (4 Macc. 14:7–8). The orator concludes by addressing the audience and contrasting their mood to that of the brothers (vv. 9–10).

14:11–17:6

The Martyrdom of the Mother

2 Macc. 7:41 mentions only the mother's death. Our orator treats her torture as the climax of the story. But it is precisely because she is a striking exception to her gender that she receives the honored place. Her treatment illustrates much about the ancient construction of gender, albeit a construction modified by philosophical beliefs. If the orator presents it as amazing that boys could attain such reason and thus overcome their natural emotional bonds, it is even more amazing that a woman could do the same. Women were commonly thought to have only part of the rational capacity of men and to have much stronger passions. Cynicism and Stoicism taught that men and women had equal capacity for reason. In principle Stoics stood for sexual equality, although in practice they were inconsistent.

14:11–20, Maternal Affection. The first two verses set forth the theme: “The mind of even a woman” prevailed over the passions. Eleazar's disability was his old age, not his gender. Even though the author mentions the mother's advanced years as a disability, his emphasis is on her gender (e.g., 16:1–2). Accordingly, the orator immediately digresses into a discussion of maternal love in 14:13–20. Maternal affection is described as a very bodily and instinctual as opposed to rational disposition (14:13–19). Even birds and bees share it. Because of the great natural power of these emotions her mastery of them is the ultimate proof of the thesis (14:20; cf. 16:1–2).

15:1–32, An Encomium. The author's praise of the mother is based on a comparison between what she might have done according to her “natural” constitution and what she actually did on the basis of religious reason. At bottom, when all of the psychological mythology is stripped away, the opposition is between loyalty to her nation-culture-religion and love for her sons (15:1–2): “she loved religion more.” Mothers are supposed to have stronger parental affections than fathers (vv. 4–5), and this mother loved her children more than any other woman (v. 6). Verse 5 means that because women are “weaker souls” and give birth to many children they have a more passionate nature. There was, however, more than an instinctual component to this mother's love. She also loved her sons because of their virtue (vv. 9–10).

Verses 11–28 elaborate the theme of the mother's rational mastery of maternal affection and the nature of her suffering. While Eleazar and the boys primarily endured physical suffering, the mother's suffering is a hideous affective and psychological suffering since she has to watch and commend the cruelest torture and death of her sons. The point is made in the most gruesome way (vv. 12–15, 18–21). She did not even cry. In many ways her description approaches the stereotypical characterization of Stoic apatheia (Gk.), lack of emotion. But she is an exception to her gender: “Religious reason gave her a man's courage” (15:23). At the same time her disability makes her endurance more noble than that of men (15:30). In vv. 25–27 the orator employs the image of casting a ballot in the council, a choice for or against argued in her heart. The orator finishes with a eulogistic flourish as he rhetorically addresses her directly as “mother of the nation” and victorious athlete (15:29). She possessed to a greater degree than men (15:30) the two most important virtues of a martyr, “constancy” and “endurance,” both subcategories of courage.

16:1–11, False Arguments Considered.

Verses 1–4 return to explicit argumentation of the thesis. The author regards the mother's case as the most decisive, since her maternal passions are regarded as the strongest possible. Her passions were more intense than the perils that Daniel (Dan. 6:16–18) and Mishaël (i.e., Meshach, Dan. 3:19–23) faced. To heighten the emotional impact of his point, the orator employs the rhetorical technique of characterization to depict how the mother might have but did not reason (4 Macc. 16:5–11). It is an amplification through contrast (cf. 8:16–26).

16:12–17:1, The Mother's Speech to Her Sons; Her Suicide.

From the contrast, 16:12–15 returns to praise of the mother. She is very much the figure of the Stoic wise man. For a dramatic conclusion the orator now introduces the delayed speech of the mother to her sons from 12:7. In 2 Maccabees the story of Eleazar is not connected with the mother and her sons as it is in 4 Maccabees 16:15. Verses 16–23 comprise her exhortation to martyrdom. The mother's speech appeals to the sense of honor and shame so important in that culture (e.g., v. 17). In 9:5–6 the sons already proclaimed it their greater duty to die, being young men. Shame and honor form a system of comparative behavior in hierarchical societies. In that culture the mother's comparison with the old man's behavior would have been a compelling argument. She again appeals to the orator's favorite examples of martyrdom, Abraham, Isaac, and the young men from Daniel. As Moses Hadas suggests, v. 18 seems to be an argument against the view expressed in 8:23 that the pleasures of life are reason to avoid martyrdom. But 16:25 does not imply the resurrection. Indeed the oration's conception of a future life is very unclear, although frequently suggested. It may be a vague immortality of the soul. In places where 2 Maccabees mentions and emphasizes the resurrection, 4 Maccabees is silent. The mother's suicide in 17:1 exhibits her modesty. The ancients considered modesty to be especially important for women. Her suicide is not mentioned in 2 Maccabees.

17:2–6, Concluding Praise of the Mother.

The section on the mother concludes with a final panegyric in 17:2–6. It stresses the unity of mother and sons in martyrdom. The reference to the stars in v. 5 may reflect the author's conception of immortality. The ancients widely believed that the stars were living beings and sometimes that the purified soul substance of the virtuous returned to them at death.

17:7–18:24

A Final Encomium

The final encomium or panegyric to the martyrs in 17:7–18:24 emphasizes the effects and benefits of their deaths. The section contains many similarities to the commemorative funeral oration that honored dead heroes of the city-state and focused civic ideology. This kind of speech was particularly important in Athens. Similarities include references to an epitaph (17:7–10); the image of the contest (17:11–16); discussion of the virtues, honor, and benefits of the heroes' sacrifice (17:17–24; 18:3–5); exhortation for the living (18:1–2); a lament (18:20–21); and a consolation (18:22–24). These elements are not put together in quite the same way as in a funeral oration, and there are important differences; but the similarities are significant. It is clear that this oration, especially if read at a commemorative event, would have performed many of the same functions as the Athenian commemorative funeral oration.

The reference to the tomb and inscription in 17:8–10 may be the rhetorical device of concrete description, as is the reference to the painting in 17:7. A number of commentators have believed that the passage indicates delivery of the oration at the tomb sites of the martyrs. The use of imaginary epitaphs in Greek literature makes a decision impossible. In Athenian funeral orations the Persian king was depicted as the cruel tyrant out to destroy the Greek way of life. The dead heroes were remembered as saviors of their people and city. The epitaph is reminiscent of these themes.

4 Macc. 17:11–16 constitute the most extended and the climactic use of the athletic metaphor. The image has a different use here. Elsewhere the emphasis was on the contest between reason and the emotions and victory of reason. Here the struggle is external and public. The tyrant is the athletic opponent and the whole world and the human race the spectators. This suggests the national and international effects of the martyrs' faithful endurance that the orator will soon spell out.

The effects of the heroes' endurance and death are recounted. Perhaps surprisingly, the first effect is on the tyrant. His amazement is mentioned in 17:17 and detailed in 17:23–24. Antiochus commends the martyrs' example to his own soldiers, and they are so emboldened that they win great victories. In view of the just retribution that will be the king's ultimate fate, this benefit is an anomaly. It is well, however, to remember that our author lived in a Greek world and that he believes that integrity as a Jew and openness to Greek culture are both possible. Verse 19 is a quotation of the LXX (Greek) translation of Deut. 33:3.

Not only do the martyrs have the honor of immortality in the presence of God, but they actually saved the nation from foreign takeover (4 Macc. 17:20). On the one hand, their example of virtue enabled others to resist and demonstrated to Antiochus that he could not hellenize the nation. On the other hand, God regarded their faithful deaths as "a ransom for the sin of the nation," an "expiation" that was "through their blood." Because of their virtue God overlooked the apostasy of the nation and returned his favor. The combination of language and concepts here are most closely paralleled in early Christian texts about the effects of Jesus' death, especially Rom. 3:21–26.

Exhortation to his audience has been implicit throughout, but in 18:1–2 there is an explicit appeal to obey the law and understand the power of religious reason over the emotions. Verses 3–5 again take up the benefits effected by the martyrdoms. Verse 4 makes explicit the exemplary power of the martyrs' faithfulness to the law on the whole nation. The author perhaps suggests that Antiochus' involvement in the Parthian (i.e., Persian) War that drew him away from Judea and his ultimate failure were acts of divine punishment. Verse 5 is quite awkward, and its connection is unclear in the Greek.

Since the mother's case is treated as the climax of the story, the discourse returns to her in 18:6–18. The passage has seemed to many to be a rhetorical blunder that does not fit in the oration's conclusion. Some think it an interpolation. It does, however, draw together a picture of the piety and religious pedagogy of the family that produced seven of the eight martyrs. It particularly serves as a reflection on the power of religious education in the home. The passage is also unique in 4 Maccabees because of its many quotations from and references to Scripture. Although the style is unique, it is exactly what one would expect in a hortatory speech with the topic of childhood education.

The last four verses consist of a concluding lament (vv. 20–21) and consolation (vv. 22–24). The lament was a standard part of funeral speeches. An author influenced by later Stoicism would naturally keep grieving to a minimum. In fact, in 16:5–12 a lament was used to illustrate how the mother would have reacted if she had not been steadfast. The lament in 8:20–21 is brief and restrained. Typically, lament leads to words of consolation that point to reasons why grief should be limited. Verses 22–24 serve this purpose.

PSALM 151

DANIEL J. HARRINGTON

INTRODUCTION

Before the discovery of the Dead Sea Psalms Scroll from Qumran (11QPs<sup>a</sup>), Psalm 151 was known in its Greek version and the texts dependent on it (Syriac, Latin, Ethiopic). The Greek Psalm recounts God's choice of David (vv. 1–5) and David's victory over Goliath (vv. 6–7). David speaks in the first person, narrating events in and using phrases from 1 Samuel 16–17. Though it is easy to grasp the basic content, the Greek text sometimes gives the impression of incoherence and anticlimax. The discovery of a Hebrew version in column 28 of 11QPs<sup>a</sup> has clarified the Greek text considerably. It is now obvious that the Greek Psalm 151 was a shortened version of two originally distinct Hebrew poems. The first of these (corresponding to vv. 1–5 of the Greek text) is fully preserved. Of the second (corresponding to vv. 6–7 of the Greek) only the first two lines remain. Both the Greek and Hebrew versions are translated in the expanded edition of the Apocrypha in the Oxford Annotated Bible (RSV). It is not possible to ascertain whether the abbreviation and the translation were done by the same person, though they may have been.

The alleged speaker of Psalm 151 is David. His use of words and phrases from 1 Samuel 16–17 indicates that the text is a poetic midrash or interpretation placed on David's lips. Since 11QPs<sup>a</sup> can be dated through an analysis of the script to the first half of the first century A.D., the Hebrew Psalm must have been written before that time and may have been much earlier. There is nothing distinctively Essene in the text. It may have been composed before the Qumran community was founded.

The first part of the text (vv. 1–5) tells how God chose the young shepherd David to rule over his people. The emphasis on David as a musician, especially in the Hebrew version, is significant. The second part (vv. 6–7) summarizes David's victory over Goliath as the removal of Israel's shame (Gk.). In the poorly preserved Hebrew fragment the victory is associated with the power David received from his anointing. The Psalm's use of 1 Samuel 16–17 illustrates the Jewish interest in retelling the biblical story and the method of composing new poetry out of older biblical phrases.

J. A. Sanders defends 11QPs<sup>a</sup> as reflecting an early form of the Hebrew Psalter made before the content and arrangement of the traditional canon of Psalms were fixed. Other scholars consider it a late, nonauthoritative hymnbook of both canonical and apocryphal psalms, made after the canonical Psalter had been fixed.

The Septuagint version (LXX) was known as Psalm 151 in the Syro-Hexaplar, a Syriac translation of Origen's third century A.D. critical edition of the LXX. It comes first in the group of five Syriac noncanonical psalms. Though not considered canonical in Protestant and Catholic churches (as the Greek superscription states), it appears after Psalm 150 in modern editions of the LXX.

COMMENTARY

The various versions of Psalm 151 contain different superscriptions: "A hallelujah for David the son of Jesse" (Heb.); "A thanksgiving of David" (Syriac); "This psalm was truly written by David, even though it is outside the number, when he fought alone against Goliath" (Gk.). The "number" in the Greek text refers to the canon of 150 psalms in the Hebrew Bible. The Goliath episode is described only at the end of the Greek psalm; the Hebrew Goliath psalm was separate and had its own superscription.

1–5, God's Choice of David. Psalm 151:1–5 retells the story of 1 Samuel 16 with David as the speaker. It shows how the one who was ruler over Jesse's flock became ruler over God's covenant people. The description of David in v. 1 as the youngest of Jesse's sons and a shepherd derives from 1 Sam. 16:11. The Greek version destroys the symmetry of the Hebrew text. For David's musical skill (v. 2), see 1 Sam. 16:14–23. The Greek corresponds with the beginning of the Hebrew verse except that it contains an additional verb ("fashioned") in the second member. The remainder of the Hebrew ("And I rendered glory to the Lord, I spoke in my soul. The mountains do not witness to him and the hills do not tell. The trees have cherished my words and the flock my deeds!") is absent from the Greek. The difficulty of translating and interpreting these lines has given rise to the suggestion that the picture of David here has been influenced by that of the legendary Greek musician Orpheus, but the hypothesis of Orphic influence is unlikely. The Greek text of v. 3 could suggest that David's musical activity was futile since the Lord proclaims to himself. The Hebrew version shows that the text continues the reflection on praising and glorifying the all-knowing God. The omniscient God knew David as the one whom he would choose. Verses 4-5 are a poetic retelling of 1 Sam. 16:4-13. The order of events in the Greek version (anointing of David, description of his brothers) is anticlimactic. The Hebrew version maintains the proper suspense by describing first David's brothers and then God's choice of David.

6-7, David's Victory over Goliath. The first part of the Hebrew text ("The beginning of David's might after the prophet of God anointed him") is a superscription. Then David begins to narrate his battle with Goliath (see 1 Sam. 17). The Greek text is an epitome of a longer Hebrew poem. The idea of Goliath cursing by his gods appears in 1 Sam. 17:43. David's beheading of Goliath is described in 1 Sam. 17:51.

THE GOSPELS AND ACTS

INTRODUCTION TO THE GOSPELS AND ACTS

N O R M A N R. P E T E R S E N

Although the Gospels and Acts have been preserved for about two thousand years as parts of the Christian Bible, none of them was composed for the purpose of inclusion in such an anthology of texts. Each was written for quite other purposes, and each is related to other texts that were not included in the Bible. This article is devoted to a number of general issues important to readers who wish to consider the Gospels and Acts in terms of the literary and historical contexts in and for which they were written.

---

THE NEW TESTAMENT, ITS BOOKS, AND THEIR TITLES

Both the book known as the NT and most of the titles and authorial attributions given to its books emerged in the last half of the second century A.D. The NT is basically a selection from a much larger body of texts, many of which were written anonymously or pseudonymously by Christians of various sorts over a period of about seventy-five years, from around A.D. 50 to 125. None of the texts in the NT was written for the purpose of inclusion in the NT, the very idea of which had yet to be conceived when they were written, but were composed for specific communities and their immediate needs, much as the NT itself was created for the needs of a group of communities in the northwestern sector of the Mediterranean basin. This coalition of churches is the ancestor of the Eastern and Western (Roman) catholic or universal churches and those that came later, and its Bible was formed as a part of its own differentiation of itself from others whom it called heretics. Therefore, in order to understand the NT books in their own frames of reference, we have to consider each book as a communication between an author and an audience.

By the same historical token, it is also necessary to recognize that the titles and authorial attributions of the Gospels and Acts are neither original nor peculiar to them. The "Gospel According to" and "Acts of" titles originated at the end of the second century A.D. and were applied to other, noncanonical texts as well as the ones we have today in the NT. And from the end of the century and through the third century, numerous other "Gospels" and "Acts" were written, some similar to those in the NT and others quite different.

The titles of the canonical Gospels and Acts are related to the division of the NT into two sections, one devoted to "Gospels," the other to apostolic writings, the first of which is the book of the Acts of the Apostles. This distinction has two major consequences for subsequent readers. On the one hand, by identifying the first four books as "Gospels," the creators of the NT imputed to the four a commonality that obscures their different form and content. "Gospel" does not refer to a literary genre but to the later churches' classification of their sacred writings into "Gospels" and apostolic writings, the former having to do with Jesus and the latter with apostles.

But though each of the Gospels has to do with Jesus, it is also self-evident from them that each represents him and his significance for believers in a very different way from the others. Thus two treat him as a man born of woman (Matt.; Luke), while one represents him as a man from heaven (John). One sees him as the end-time judge who came before the end to deliver the commandments on the basis of which he will judge (Matt.), another as the God-man, belief in whose "signs" will bring, possibly spontaneously, eternal life (John). And one sees Jesus' return from heaven as in the immediate future (Mark), while others see it coming only after a delay (Matt.) or after a period of history has been completed—"the time of the Gentiles" (Luke).

In addition, by looking up the word "gospel" in a concordance one can see that only Mark may have conceived of his narrative as a Gospel (Mark 1:1), although even his use of the word is problematical because it is not clear that he means by it what Paul meant some decades previously (cf. Rom. 1:1-6; 1 Cor. 15:1-7). Matthew does not use the word in the same way as Mark, while Luke never uses the noun at all, only the verb "to proclaim [good] news." And John does not use either the noun or the verb. Historically, these four different books, rather than only one, were included in the NT to represent the diversity permissible in the catholic coalition of churches, but no sooner had this been done than their unity became focal and their differences were de-emphasized.

The second consequence of placing the four books under the heading of "Gospel" is that it obscured the fact that Luke's "Gospel" is but the first volume in a two-volume, consecutive narrative, the second half of which is in the NT called the Acts of the Apostles (cf. Luke 1:1-4; Acts 1:1-5). Whatever the reasons may have been for the ordering of the first four books, it is apparent that the position of John between Luke and Acts interrupts the literary continuity of two volumes that were composed to be read sequentially. Luke did not write a "Gospel" and "Acts"—he wrote a consecutive narrative in two parts. Indeed, when this insight is added to the foreignness of the category "Gospel" to the books subsumed under it, we can see that the creators of the NT viewed its texts in quite a different way from their authors and original readers. At least for Luke's narrative, if we only read the first volume because it is called a "Gospel," we will only be getting half of the story. We will not be able to see either where the narrative begun in the first volume ends or how its ending in the second volume informs the system of characterization, plot, and thematics that governs the whole work. But what is true of Luke-Acts is also true of Matthew, Mark, and John. Each must be read in terms of its own literary character.

THE LITERARY CONTEXTS OF THE "GOSPELS" AND "ACTS"

While the NT provides its books with a context relevant to the interests of its compilers, there is a vast body of other writings that provides a context more relevant to the individual books as they were originally composed and read. It is the literary and cultural context of the times, places, and communities in and for which the books were written that informs them, not the context in and for which the later anthology was created. Just which texts are pertinent to our books depends on relations of form and content. These relations will often be referred to in the commentaries on the individual books, but for purposes of illustration a few examples are in order. The examples selected highlight both the individuality of our books and their differences from one another.

It is widely but not universally held that Matthew used Mark as a source for his narrative, indeed, as the narrative base into which he inserted a large amount of sayings material from yet other sources (see below "The Synoptic Problem"). But regardless of the question of Matthew's sources, it is important for our reading of his narrative that we see that one of the principal differences between it and Mark tends in the direction of rules for community living until Jesus' return, while Mark seems most concerned with what his readers understand about when and how the return will take place (Mark 13). Matthew represents the commandments Jesus issued for the life of believers until he returns to judge them and others. In this light, it is useful to look at other texts that are concerned with the same kinds of issues. Important are such texts as the various community rule documents found among the non-Christian Dead Sea Scrolls, Paul's extensive instructions in 1 Corinthians, the Didache or Teaching of the Apostles, a text some parts of which may be roughly contemporaneous with Matthew and now found in an anthology called The Apostolic Fathers, and the later apostolic constitutions and monastic rules. Like any other text, Matthew's stands on its own, but reading it in the context of these documents can help us understand how his views of Jesus and of community life differ from the views of other texts and communities. Comparison reveals not merely dependencies of one sort or another but it also discloses the individuality of texts that are similar.

So also with John and Luke-Acts. In the case of John, it is of comparable use to look at other ancient texts treating divine beings who appear to humans in human form and disclose to them their true identity. It is useful because such disclosures are relatively rare; it is much more common to have the incognito divine beings conceal their identity for a while, as in Mark, where it is unclear whether or not he thinks of Jesus as a divine being as John and Paul do (cf. Phil. 2:6-11).

As for Luke-Acts, its author claims to be writing a historical or at least an accurate account of certain events (Luke 1:1-4; Acts 1:1-5), and therefore knowledge of other ancient history books can help us to discern what is distinctive about Luke-Acts, even how to interpret speeches he attributes to his characters. In ancient history writing it was common for authors to create the speeches felt to be appropriate to the situation, and Luke also does this. Indeed, many historical writings of his time make the same claim he does about writing an accurate account. Luke's claim must therefore be read in terms of ancient conventions, not of modern expectations. Such comparative, literary-historical observations as these indicate the value of finding the contexts appropriate to the original composition of our texts.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE "GOSPELS"

The literary contexts in which we read the "Gospels" and "Acts" are significant for our understanding of them, but each of them also raises a number of other important issues equally and perhaps more directly pertinent. To address these issues, it is necessary to be aware of certain textual problems and the ways in which scholars have dealt with them.

We possess no original text of any NT document, only a large number of copies and quotations from writers from the second century and after. Because the copies do not always agree with one another, the discipline of text criticism evolved to try to adjudicate the different readings. Annotated editions of the Bible usually employ footnotes to show readers where the more significant differences occur, but every translation of the Bible entails decisions about numerous text-critical problems, not to mention the linguistic problems of finding adequate translations for original language words and expressions. Serious study should use at least two translations to see both how translators render the original language and how they resolve text-critical problems. Commentaries too address these issues.

While the scholarly reading of our texts produced the awareness of text-critical problems, it also discovered problems about the literary integrity of each of the texts with which we are concerned. Once an adequate text had been established, critics sought through literary-critical means to identify the linguistic, stylistic, compositional, and conceptual integrity of the texts. The results of this early literary criticism are complicated, but a few major points stand out as worthy of special attention. First, each of the five texts employs other texts as sources for its composition, and therefore all are redactions, or editions, of other texts. In the case especially of John, it also appears that someone has added or interpolated other material into John after its original sources had been edited to form an extended narrative. Second, Matthew, Mark, and Luke are so closely related as to require us to hypothesize that two of them used one of the others and probably other sources as well. The question of who used whom is the problem represented in the notion of the "Synoptic Problem." And, third, John is not related to the other three "Gospels" in the same way as the others are to each other, yet its author may have had knowledge of one or more of the others in addition to his own peculiar sources. Each of these points requires fuller consideration because each has profound consequences for our reading of the texts.

Sources, Redaction, and Interpolation

Although literary critics sought to discern the integrative features of our texts, they quickly found themselves occupied with disintegrative features. Their explanation of these was that they reflected the authors' use of other texts as sources for their own. In addition to the distinctive relations between Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and between aspects of John and both Mark and Luke, Luke already self-consciously refers to his knowledge of other narratives (Luke 1:1-4). Because he does so at the beginning of Luke-Acts, his comment suggests that he knew and used other texts in the composition of both volumes. Beside his dependence on Mark or Matthew, critics have suspected sources behind at least three segments of his second volume: the Jerusalem episodes (Acts 2-5); the Antioch-oriented episodes (Acts 6:1-8:4; 11:19-30; and 12:25-15:35); and the travel narrative from 16:10 on, in which the narrator atypically speaks in the first person plural (16:10-17; 20:5-15; 21:1-18; and 27:1-28:16). Also, even though the author does not seem to have known Paul's Letters, his knowledge of such events as Paul's escape from Damascus by being lowered from a wall in a basket (Acts 9:23-25; 2 Cor. 11:32-33) suggests that he also had access to stories about Paul.

Scholars still dispute specific identifications of sources in all of our texts, but there is little disagreement about the fact that our authors used sources. This fact is perhaps more significant than the difficulty of actually pinning down a source at any given point. It is significant because it means that we cannot simply assume that our authors were either freely creative writers or eyewitness reporters. In other words, many of the words we read in our texts are words that came from other writers, not directly from our authors or from the characters our authors are writing about. But this point raises in turn the further problem of how we are to know just what the authors of our texts were trying to say in their use of other texts. Two disciplines have emerged to deal with this problem: redaction criticism and a new form of literary criticism.

Redaction or composition criticism is the other side of the coin of the source criticism that emerged out of the old literary criticism. Redaction critics seek to find the author's point from the ways he has used his sources. The method has a certain validity, but it is usually limited both by its focus on the differences between redaction and sources and by its narrow concentration on the theological motives of the author/redactor. The problem is twofold: there is disagreement about where the sources are, making the distinction between redaction and sources problematical; and it is entirely gratuitous to think that motivation is solely theological.

It was in part the result of these deficiencies that a new literary criticism was developed. Informed by modern literary criticism and narrative studies, the new criticism goes beyond redaction criticism by going back to the old literary criticism's focus on textually integrative features. But whereas the old criticism concentrated on matters of language, linguistic style, and ideas, the new criticism is also concerned with such things as the plots of narratives, the narrator's perspective, and characterization. The new literary criticism thus builds on the old one and provides a broader base than redaction criticism for identifying the integrative features of our texts.

The problem of interpolation is yet another one readers should be aware of, because like textual variants it raises the question of which text we are to read. Interpolation entails the addition of material to an already existing text, and its presence is suspected when we come across internal contradictions or discrepancies that cannot be explained by the use of sources. When such material is placed in brackets, the text reads more coherently. Some of the best examples of interpolation are to be found in John. John 21 is a classic case of an interpolated addition because John 20:30–31 is clearly the ending of the extended narrative that precedes it; John 21 therefore continues a text that has come to an end. But interpolation is also found in other forms. In John 3:22 the narrator says that Jesus baptized people, but in 4:2 another, interpolated voice says that Jesus himself did not baptize, but only his disciples. Similarly, in John 13:36 Peter asks Jesus where he is going, but in 16:5 Jesus asks why no one asks where he is going. In John 10 too there is no little confusion engendered by the assertions that Jesus is both "the door of the sheep" (10:7b, 9) and "the good shepherd" (10:11; cf. 10:1–5). John 10:1–15 makes much more sense if 10:7b and 9 are bracketed as interpolations. Thus too in John we have to reckon with a text that has used sources (see below "John and the Synoptics") and also received interpolations. "John" is therefore two texts, one with and the other without interpolations.

The Synoptic Problem

The best way to observe the Synoptic Problem is to read Matthew, Mark, and Luke in a book in which they are printed in parallel columns. Such books are called "Gospel parallels" or "synopses," and some include John, even though it is not related to the other three in the same way that they are related to one another. Matthew, Mark, and Luke are called the "synoptic Gospels" because when read comparatively, i.e., synoptically, one can readily see detailed verbal and sequential agreements between them that can only be accounted for by hypothesizing that two of them used at least one of the others. The Synoptic Problem consists of the question, "Who used whom?" But before addressing the answers to this question, it is well to consider why the question is relevant to readers.

The close relationships between the synoptic Gospels are significant because the differences between them are often indicative of what is peculiar to each. Regardless of the answer to the question of who used whom, reading any one of them in a synopsis discloses its differences from the others. By exploring patterns of differences throughout one of them, we can gain insights into its distinctive composition and message. Thus, if Matthew or Mark differs from the other in a passage they have in common, the difference in a word, a phrase, an idea, or a story is something to be explored further in each narrative. For example, if Matthew differs from Mark in his use of the word "gospel" in one place, we can turn to a concordance and find out where each of them uses the word and then check them all out in each text in our synopsis. The results are striking, as noted earlier. Similarly, it is distinctive of Mark that he characterizes Jesus' disciples as being exceedingly obtuse; they do not understand much of anything. How, viewed in a synopsis, does Matthew render the behavior of the disciples in passages he has in common with Mark? Are Matthew and Mark saying the same things about the disciples? What are they saying about them and, within the frameworks of their own narratives, why are they saying these things about them? The same kinds of questions can be asked about the characterization of Jesus.

However, this kind of comparative reading and thinking only answers the question of why synoptic relations (and editions) are important for readers, not the question of why the synoptic problem is important. The former is a literary matter, the latter a historical one, as is evident from another way of describing the problem, namely, as a question of temporal priority: who came first, who second, and who third? Priority has to do ultimately with the understanding of the history of early Christianity that results from our answer to the question of who used whom. Each text comes from a different point in time and space, and therefore the sequence in which they were written enables us to trace some of the history of the early churches. In turn, the history is important because it bears on the contexts in and for which the narratives were written. In addition, and as redaction critics have seen, if we know which text(s) a writer has used and changed, the changes and the implicit motives for them are of both literary and historical interest. Literarily, the changes and their motivation reflect one author's understanding and intent in contrast with another's. Examples of these implications of the priority of one or another of the "Gospels" can be considered after we have observed the main solutions to the Synoptic Problem. First, the proposed solutions. The following comments should be read with the help of a synopsis.

Because most introductions to the NT contain detailed discussions of the history of the Synoptic Problem, we can concentrate on the broader contours of the two main solutions, that of Matthean priority and that of Marcan priority, also known as the Two-Source or the modified Two-Source Hypothesis. Marcan priority is the most widely accepted solution, but in recent years Matthean priority has been revived by a number of scholars dissatisfied with the prevailing opinion. Importantly, however, both solutions are hypotheses, not provable solutions. For this reason, each stands or falls on its own plausibility as an answer to the question of who used whom. The accompanying diagrams represent the two solutions. The arrows on the diagrams point from the gospel or source to the one that used it.

Matthean priorists argue that Matthew was the earliest Gospel, that Luke used Matthew, and that Mark used both of them, reducing their extent by abbreviating and conflating them, that is, by taking two versions of the same passage and putting them together so that portions of each are visible in Mark. For example, Matt. 13:31 has the word "parable," Luke 13:18 the word "compare," and Mark 4:30 has both words. (Note, however, that Marcan priorists can also point to conflation in the same parable, where Mark 4:32 has "shrubs," Luke 13:19 "tree," and Matt. 13:32 both words!)

Marcan priorists, on the other hand, argue that Mark was first and that Matthew and Luke used Mark plus another source consisting largely of sayings called Q (from the first letter of Quelle, the German word for "source"). This is held to account for those cases where Matthew and Luke have material in common that is not in Mark or is in addition to something that Mark has in another form (the latter are called "doublets," meaning that one version comes from Mark, the other from Q). In addition, in the modified form of this hypothesis, material found only in Matthew is attributed to an M source, while material found only in Luke is attributed to an L source.

Now, Matthean priorists find Marcan priority weakened if not falsified by cases where Matthew and Luke agree with one another against Mark while allegedly following him (e.g., Matt. 13:11 and Luke 8:10 have in common "to know the secrets," while Mark 4:11 has only "the secret"). Marcan priorists respond by hypothesizing either that Matthew and Luke had different editions of Mark, or that later copyists harmonized Matthew and Luke, or that Matthew and Luke coincidentally improved Mark in the same manner. Suffice it to say, neither camp has persuaded the other. Nevertheless, the significance of the Synoptic Problem can now best be illustrated by some examples showing the literary and historical implications of the two solutions.

Regardless of which solution one prefers, it is apparent that two of the writers radically altered the earliest narrative. This is of interest for two reasons. One is that on either account the earliest narrative was not yet of such authority that it could not be significantly changed; the Jesus story had yet to become fixed and there was considerable freedom available to the tellers of it. Another, more literary reason has to do with the nature of the alterations required by each solution. Thus, on Matthean priority, Luke must have destroyed everything that is characteristic of Matthew, from the turning upside down of Jesus' genealogy to the redistribution of Jesus' teachings from five major discourses to a very long journey from Galilee to Jerusalem into which many sayings of Jesus have been fitted. Similarly, Mark must have destroyed everything that is characteristic of both Matthew and Luke, especially their representation of Jesus as a teacher. Mark represents a minimal amount of Jesus' teachings and rather depicts him as more of a wonder worker (cf., e.g., Mark 1:34; 3:11-12; 5:43). From the perspective of Marcan priority, on the other hand, the last two writers appear to have been more constructive than destructive in their alterations of Mark. Matthew and Luke must have built longer narratives out of multiple sources, perhaps even offering a more accurate picture of Jesus than Mark, who lacks their strong image of Jesus as a teacher because he does not have the large number of sayings found in Q, M, and L. Matthew and Luke must have used Mark's text as their narrative base, to which each added in his own way the other sources available to him. Indeed, they have conserved their sources, whereas according to Matthean priority Luke and Mark have defaced their sources. Each solution therefore provides a very different picture of the respective authors.

The historical implications of the two solutions are much more complicated than the literary ones, because the modified Two-Source Hypothesis posits three other sources, Q, M, and L. Whereas Matthean priorists only have to identify the temporal sequence of three texts, Marcan priorists have to identify the sequence of six. Their task is therefore twice as complex, but the history they can produce will also be twice as rich. Be this as it may, some general observations can be made about the historical implications of the solutions. Perhaps the most significant issue concerns the relationship between eschatology—the expectation of an imminent end to history—and institutionalization in the early history of the churches. Did the Jesus movement begin as a loosely knit collection of people who looked for the imminent coming of the Kingdom of God, but who, as decades passed, became a structured institution with fixed beliefs and behavioral rules? Or did it begin as such an institution and from time to time produce eschatologically oriented splinter groups that reacted against institutionalization? The former picture results from the Two-Source Hypothesis, the latter follows from the hypothesis of Matthean priority. Two textual examples will suffice to show how the hypotheses produce two different historical pictures.

As noted earlier, in the so-called synoptic apocalypse (Matt. 24:1-25:46; Mark 13:1-37; Luke 21:5-38), Mark's focus is on the Kingdom's coming within the lifetime of Jesus' generation. Mark says that some people will say that the end is now, but Mark's point is that the end will not be then, but very soon afterward. Matthew, on the other hand, has in addition to Mark's material several sayings that are concerned not with the presence or nearness of the Kingdom, but with its delay (24:48; 25:5, 19). Luke too differs from Mark and Matthew and looks both backward on the destruction of Jerusalem as God's vengeance on his people and forward to a period of time before the Kingdom's coming, one he refers to as "the times of the Gentiles" (21:20–24). Thus Mark is oriented toward the Kingdom's nearness and Matthew and Luke toward its distance.

A second and not unrelated case concerns the twelve disciples. Only once do Matthew and Mark use the word "apostle" for any of the Twelve, whereas Luke not only thinks of the Twelve as twelve apostles (already in Luke 6:13), but he sees them as the apostolic leadership formed in Jerusalem at Pentecost, an event only he among early Christian writers reports (cf. Acts 1–2). Remember too that unlike Luke (and John 20) Matthew and Mark make no reference to the disciples meeting the risen Jesus in Jerusalem, let alone as forming there an apostolic institution with worldwide responsibilities. Luke-Acts is therefore highly institutional. But so, in another way, is Matthew, who presents the commandments of Jesus that are to be enforced by the church and especially by Peter (cf. Matt. 16 and 18). Mark knows nothing about either a group of twelve "apostles" or an apostolically organized worldwide institution centered in Jerusalem.

There are numerous other examples that might be added to these, but these are sufficient to show that the answer to the question of who used whom has profound consequences for our understanding both of the history of early Christianity and of the location of each of the Synoptics in that history.

John and the Synoptics

It is as evident from a reading of the four "Gospels" independently as it is from reading them in a synopsis that includes John, that John is vastly different from the Synoptics. In it, Jesus is clearly a divine being from the beginning of creation, and his human form is not his real form; in it, Jesus has a three-year career (three Passovers are mentioned, and Passover is an annual festival), not a one-year career; in it, Jesus neither exorcizes nor speaks in synoptic-like parables; in it, his deeds are signs that he has come from somewhere else and his speech, when compared to that of other actors in the story, is decidedly enigmatic; in it, Jesus appears to his disciples both in Galilee (John 21; cf. Mark 16 and Matt. 28) and in Jerusalem (John 20; cf. Luke 24 and Acts 1); and so on. John has clearly not used the Synoptics to the degree that any one of them has used any one of the others. Indeed, it appears from the peculiar designation of Jesus' wonders as "signs" that John had a source containing largely such "sign" stories, possibly including stories of Jesus' arrest, trial, death, and postresurrection appearances (cf. John 20:30–31). The question of John's relationship to the Synoptics is therefore not so much one of use as of knowledge, for John also says a number of things that are like things found in one or more of the Synoptics.

Scholars are widely divided as to the sources of John's synoptic-like knowledge, some seeing textual dependence upon Luke and/or Mark, others seeing reliance on forms of synoptic-like preliterary traditions, and yet others finding both sources possible.

Moreover, when this array of opinion is related to the distinction between sources, redaction, and interpolation in John, the points and kinds of dependency become considerably more complex. To take but four examples, we can observe that: first, John 20 agrees with Luke who, alone among the Synoptics, has Jesus appear to his disciples in Jerusalem after his resurrection, while Matthew and Mark refer to Galilee, as does John 21; second, John 13:27 agrees with Luke alone (Luke 22:3; cf. 4:13, not in John) that Satan entered Judas before he betrayed Jesus; third, in John 21:3–8, there is a story of a postresurrection wonder in which the disciples enjoy a miraculous catch of fish, while in Luke 5:1–11 a clearly related story is told in the context of Jesus' calling of his first disciples at the beginning of his career; and fourth, in John 6:1–21 are stories of Jesus' wondrous feeding of a multitude and of his walking on the lake, both of which are paralleled in the same sequence in Mark 6:30–52. Each of these cases together with others suggests that John had some knowledge of either the synoptic Gospels or traditions found in them.

The various kinds of relationships between the four Gospels thus only reinforce the conclusion drawn earlier about the apparent unity imposed upon them by their classification in the NT as "Gospels." Each text must be read as a message communicated by particular believers in particular times and places.

TRADITION HISTORY

Regardless of how one resolves the Synoptic Problem, or the problem of sources in John and Acts, it is evident from the several decades between the times when the texts were written and the times of the events recounted in them that we have to reckon with a period during which sayings and stories were orally transmitted before being written down either in our present texts or in their sources. The principal evidence for this process of oral transmission consists in multiple versions of sayings and stories that cannot well be accounted for by simply attributing them to the use of written sources. Multiple versions of many traditions are to be found both within and between the canonical Gospels, but also in noncanonical texts like the Gospel of Thomas and possibly the Gospel of Peter, where it seems likely that, regardless of their use of the canonical texts, they at points contain independent versions of traditions.

Comparative study of the multiple versions of gospel traditions has led to the conclusion that from the time of Jesus' utterance of his words and of the formation of stories about his deeds, the words and stories were transmitted orally and independently of the narrative contexts in which we now read them. Narrative contexts were first provided with the first written Gospels, whose writers drew from the available pool of individual traditions or from small collections of them, like the three seed parables in Mark 4 and the stories of Jesus' wondrous feeding and walking on the lake in John 6 and Mark 6.

One scholar described the relationship between preliterary traditions and their later narrative contexts as analogous to (traditional) pearls on a (narrative) string. This means, of course, that prior to our extended narratives there was no tradition containing an outline of Jesus' career, except for the last days of his life, for which two traditions may have provided a basis for an extended story (1 Cor. 11:23–25; 15:3–5; cf. Mark 14–16; Matt. 26–28; Luke 22–24). Interestingly enough, despite the differences between their stories of Jesus' last days, the four canonical Gospels agree most in them and differ much more widely on the chronology and topography of Jesus' preceding activities. Indeed, they differ most in the links they create between the traditions, as is immediately evident in any synopsis. But perhaps a better analogy than pearls on a string would be mosaics composed out of variously colored and shaped stones. The authors of our texts are mosaicists who fit the stones available to them into their own designs and for their own purposes.

The significance of this image for readers of our present texts is that it requires us to look at and admire the mosaics before us rather than think of the material as a window on history, through which we can see the historical Jesus doing or saying this or that. To read our texts in this historicizing way would be comparable to confusing a movie with a newscast. For example, if in reading the Sermon on the Mount in Matt. 5–7 one thinks exclusively of the historical Jesus doing and saying what is described there, rather than, in the first instance, of Matthew's depiction of this "event" as an episode within his story, one will miss Matthew's point. By reading Matthew's episode in a synopsis, one will quickly find out how wrong a historicizing reading is, for much of Matthew's Sermon on the Mount is also in Luke's sermon on the plain (Luke 6:20–49), much more is found elsewhere in Luke, and much of both is found independently and without such narrative contexts in the Gospel of Thomas. By studying the history of the traditions in the two "sermons" we can confirm the mosaic stone analogy—and go a step further to conclude that Jesus himself was not a sermonizer; the form of his speech was that of brief aphoristic and parabolic utterances. The authors created both the sermons and the image of Jesus as a sermonizer. And as for John, the discourses of Jesus are without parallel in the Synoptics and totally different from the Synoptics in content, style, and length. Study of the history of the traditions underlying our texts therefore once again directs us back to a literary appreciation of the texts.

FORM CRITICISM

Closely related to the history of traditions is the discipline of form criticism. At the same time that scholars became aware of the role of preliterary traditions, they realized that the traditions were shaped according to a limited number of formal types like aphorisms, parables, similitudes, predictions, and miracle stories. These typical forms are believed to have been the products of equally typical social situations either in the time of Jesus or that of his followers. Study of these forms or genres led, on the one hand, to formal criteria for identifying the history of individual traditions and, on the other hand, to sociological insights into the times when the traditions originated and were passed on. Form criticism is therefore a historical tool. It also has, however, certain literary dimensions.

The first form critics viewed our present texts as collections of the various types of preliterate traditions, including what they called mythic traditions like Phil. 2:6–11 and the heavenly wisdom or Sophia tradition behind John 1:1–18, both of which represent Jesus as a divine being. For form critics, the Gospels consist of the merger of traditions about the historical human being Jesus of Nazareth with a myth of a divine being, the Son of God or Word. The myths thus interpret the life of the historical Jesus as the presence in human form of a divine being. Our present texts are therefore the end products of the history of Jesus traditions. To be sure, form critics recognized that our texts were also more or less coherent narratives, but they tended to see these narrative qualities as the accidental illusion created by the juxtaposition of preliterate traditions. Our texts do not, they said, belong to the history of literature, but to the history of religion and dogma. Gospel is for them either not the designation of a literary genre or the sole genre created by early Christians, all other genres being borrowed from their cultural environment.

The literary views of form critics have not been accepted by all scholars, and some who appreciate form criticism have gone beyond it to deal with both internal literary aspects of our texts and comparative, literary-historical aspects of their similarities to other literature from antiquity, relating the texts to a variety of genres, including biography, lives of the prophets, historiography, and apocalyptic. Presently, however, there is no consensus on the generic identity of the canonical texts. Rather, the main direction of research in the Gospels and Acts is on the internal literary and narrative characteristics of the individual texts.

REGINALD H. FULLER

INTRODUCTION

Structure

The plot or story line of the Gospel According to Matthew falls into six parts: 1:1-4:16, the person of Jesus the Messiah; 4:17-11:1, Jesus, Messiah of word and deed; 11:2-16:20, Israel's unbelief and the disciples' incipient faith; 16:21-20:34, the journey to Jerusalem; 21:1-25:46, the ministry in Jerusalem; 26:1-28:20, the Passion and resurrection.

Composition

The author of Matthew was an unknown Jewish Christian of the second generation writing around A.D. 90 in or near Antioch in Syria. The bitter criticism of the Pharisaic leaders of Jerusalem (chap. 23) and the distance from which Matthew speaks of the Jewish community ("their" synagogues, 4:23 and elsewhere) suggest that he wrote after the emergence of new rabbinic institutions at Jamnia (after A.D. 70) and that the Christian groups he was addressing were no longer part of the Jewish community. Matthew writes to provide his community with an alternative to rabbinic instruction, the Torah (→ Torah); Jesus as the founder of the true Israel (16:17-19) and the messianic expounder of the new and better righteousness (5:17-20).

Matthew's church, then, has moved away from the synagogue. As a result, it is opening itself to mission to the Gentiles (24:14; 28:19), cooperating perhaps with Jewish Christians of a different type who had long engaged in gentile mission, bringing into its fold enthusiastic prophets who neglected the ethical dimension of Christianity (7:15-20). Matthew is fighting on two fronts, against legalism on one side and antinomianism (neglect of the new righteousness) on the other. But it would be wrong to think of Matthew as primarily a polemical work. The author's purpose was pastoral, to protect his church from dangers that threatened from within.

It has often been thought that 13:52 discloses something of Matthew's background and method. He was perhaps himself trained as a "scribe for the kingdom of God." He "brought out of his treasure store things new and old," drawing upon earlier traditions and contributing new insights of his own. Among these earlier traditions was the OT, which provided him with a number of "fulfillment quotations" (see the Short Essay "Matthew's Fulfillment Citations"). Most scholars also think that he used Mark's Gospel and the lost source, commonly referred to as Q, which is reconstructed from the non-Markan material, mainly sayings of Jesus, common to Matthew and Luke, as well as special traditions of his own, often referred to as M. (→ Synoptic Problem, The). These critical assumptions are accepted in this commentary. Note: in the commentary we shall use "stage 1" to denote authentic words of Jesus and authentic memories of his actions and incidents in his career, "stage 2" for pre-Gospel (oral) traditions, and "stage 3" for the Evangelist's redaction (i.e., material composed by the Evangelist himself; → Biblical Criticism).

Importance

There are indications, such as the Greek word biblos, "book," in the title and the five major discourses in chaps. 5-7, 10, 13, 18, and 24-25, that Matthew intended his work to serve as a foundation book for his community, like the Torah or five books of Moses in the synagogue. In fact, Matthew came to serve as the preeminent Gospel for the church as a whole. From the second century on, it is the most widely cited Gospel and the most frequently read in ancient liturgical lectionaries.

COMMENTARY

PART ONE: 1:1-4:16

The Person of Jesus the Messiah

This section forms a coherent block of material. The opening words, literally "The Book of the Genesis of Jesus Christ," could suitably cover not only the genealogy or the birth narrative but the whole of 1:1-4:16. This section shows how Jesus appeared in history, when his public ministry began in Galilee (4:12). Part One is marked off from Part Two by the words "From then Jesus began to proclaim and to say: 'turn around . . .'" and by the fact that from that verse onward Matthew closely follows Mark. The introductory section is glued together by a series of fulfillment citations marking each successive movement of the story from Bethlehem to Egypt to Nazareth to Capernaum. This section answers such questions as who Jesus was, where he came from, how he entered human history (the genealogy, 1:1-17, and again the fulfillment citations). Finally, in various ways Part One foreshadows the subsequent story of Jesus, e.g., the plot of Herod to put him to death, the homage to Jesus by the gentile magi.

1:1-17, The Genealogy. Matthew constructed this genealogy out of traditional materials to serve a Christological purpose indicated by the opening words "son of David, son of Abraham" (v. 1). Jesus emerges from Israel and fulfills the OT promise of a messianic king. The neat pattern of the genealogy (three groups of fourteen ancestors each) indicates God's carefully planned execution of his purpose. The special mention of dubious women in the genealogy (Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and the wife of Uriah, i.e., Bathsheba) foreshadows the dubious circumstances surrounding Jesus' birth (see commentary below on 1:18-25). God worked out his purpose through scandalous or irregular unions. Readers should not be troubled by the discrepancies between Matthew's genealogy and the one provided by Luke (Luke 3:23-37). These genealogies serve not a biological but a theological purpose, and Luke's purpose is different.

1:18-25, Jesus' Conception. Annunciation stories form a regular literary genre in the Bible. They serve not to record historical fact but to interpret the role a child is destined to play in salvation history and to emphasize that that role is initiated by God. The appearance of an angel and the announcement of the child's future destiny form the core of the genre. Usually there is some impediment to the birth, e.g., sterility or old age. The situation here is that Mary has become pregnant between her betrothal and the consummation of the marriage, with the apparent suggestion of illegitimacy. In this case, the angel also serves the further purpose of inducing Joseph to adopt Jesus as his son, so that the child becomes a son of David. To the ancient world there would be no inconsistency here, for adoption provided one with ancestors as assuredly as did biological descent. The story's insistence that the conception was virginal and caused by the intervention of the Holy Spirit is not a historical statement but a Christological affirmation. It asserts that God initiated the appearance of Jesus into the world. The citation of Isa. 7:14 (Gk.) stresses not Mary's virginity but the fulfillment of the promise that God would be with his people, a promise that received its definitive realization after Easter (28:20). The virginal conception through the Spirit has nothing to do with the preexistence and incarnation of the divine being: that is a different Christology (understanding of Jesus' identity) found in John (who does not assert Jesus' virginal conception through the Spirit) but not in Matthew.

2:1-12, The Coming of the Magi. The story of the Wise Men is like a "haggadah," i.e., a story made up from biblical materials to make a theological point (→Haggadah). Such OT passages as Num. 24:17, Ps. 72:10-11, and Isa. 60:1-7 have contributed to the composition. In fact, these texts continued to influence the tradition after Matthew's time, so suggesting that the Magi become kings as well as wise men (→Wise Men), a point Matthew himself does not make. Luke (2:15-20) also knew of a tradition of homage to the Christ child. Coupled with the memory of an unusual astral phenomenon around the time when Jesus was likely to have been born, the materials were thus at hand for the development of Matthew's story. Chap. 1 had stressed Jesus' origin in Israel. The Magi story opens the possibility of mission to the Gentiles, thereby reassuring the Jewish members of Matthew's community that the recent development of a gentile mission, however suspect to some stricter Jewish Christians, was in fact foreshadowed in Jesus' birth.

2:13-23, The Christ Child Delivered from Herod. The ground for the three scenes in this unit has been prepared in the previous unit, namely, the enquiry of the Magi at Herod's court. Scene 1 (vv. 13-15) is the flight to Egypt. Scene 2 (vv. 16-18) deals with the massacre of the children of Bethlehem. Scene 3 (vv. 19-23) narrates the return of the holy family to their homeland and their settlement in Nazareth. The three scenes are bound together by several factors. First, each move of the Christ child is undertaken by Joseph as the result of the appearance of an angel in a dream. Second, each section includes a fulfillment citation. Third, the whole narrative is governed by a certain correspondence with the story of Moses and the Exodus. These three features are integrated with Matthew's overall theological concerns. The Christ event represents the culmination of God's plan in salvation history. The whole fate of Jesus is controlled by the divine initiative. The flight into Egypt recalls the protection of the infant Moses from the plot of a wicked tyrant; the massacre of the innocents recalls the slaying of the Hebrew children by Pharaoh; the return from Egypt is explicitly linked to Israel's Exodus from Egypt. To some extent, Matthew portrays Jesus throughout the Gospel as a new Moses, the founder and lawgiver of the true Israel who in his career recapitulates the story of Moses and the Exodus.

3:1-12, The Ministry of John the Baptist.

As in the other Gospels, the ministry of Jesus is preceded by the ministry of John the Baptist. In this section Matthew follows Mark and Q but makes two important modifications to his sources. First, Matthew carefully avoids saying that John offers baptism for release from sins (cf. Mark 1:4). This is something reserved for Jesus through his sacrificial death (note the addition of "for the forgiveness of sins" in Matt. 26:28). Second, John's preaching of repentance is addressed not to the crowds (as in Luke and probably in Q) but to the Pharisees and Sadducees (→ Pharisees; Sadducees). Thus, the Baptist's preaching becomes a warning to the Judaism of Matthew's day. The adherents of the synagogue have refused to flee from the wrath of God by responding to the gospel, and God has raised up children to Abraham in the shape of the Christian church. The Stronger One who was to come after John (11-12) had by Matthew's time purged his granary in the fall of Jerusalem and is already gathering the wheat into his barn (cf. the seed parables in chap. 13) and preparing to burn the chaff with unquenchable fire.

3:13-17, Jesus' Baptism. Matthew is following Mark, and possibly Q as well, but with ■ significant addition (vv. 14-15) of his own composition: Jesus came forward for baptism, and John, recognizing in him the Stronger One who was to bring a greater baptism with the Spirit and with fire, "tried to stop him." Jesus, however, insisted on going on with it; "Don't interpose, let God's plan in salvation history take its course." Upon this, John "lets it happen" (v. 15). The divine plan is that Jesus should in obedience take upon himself the role of the Son of God. With this inserted dialogue between the Baptist and Jesus, Matthew is wrestling with a problem that was embarrassing for the early church. Why was Jesus baptized by John? Does this not mean that John was the greater one? This was made specially acute because of the continuing followers of John the Baptist. The voice from heaven is not a private communication ("you are") as in Mark and Luke, but a public proclamation: "This is my Son, the Beloved One, on whom I have set my choice." The Baptist has to hear it too. And his followers must know that their master really points them to Jesus. Now in Matthew, Jesus was already announced as the messianic savior at his conception and birth. The baptism marks the point at which Jesus publicly commits himself to the role for which he had been destined at birth. The voice from heaven forms the climax of Part One.

4:1-11, The Temptation. Matthew takes the beginning (v. 1) and the end (v. 11b) of the temptation story (→ Temptation) from Mark and uses it as a setting for the body of the story (vv. 2-11a), which he takes from Q. Following this source, Matthew binds the temptation closely to the baptism through Satan's twice-repeated address "Son of God" (first and second temptations). Its repetition after the third temptation would be inappropriate. The Spirit "snatches" Jesus away. The word translated "snatches" shows that Matthew thought of a visionary experience, like the seer in Rev. 17:3 who was also "snatched away." The three temptations come from a later stage of the Q tradition in which the title "Son of God," which was originally attached to the moment of the resurrection (Rom. 1:4), has been retrojected into the earthly life of Jesus. In form, the temptations are a scriptural "midrash" (→ Midrash) on the saying at Luke 10:18, "I had a vision of Satan having fallen like lightning from heaven." Matthew has heightened the Moses typology of the temptations by a few significant touches (cf. the flight into Egypt above, Matt. 2:13-23). Like Moses in Sinai, Jesus "fasts" (Luke: "ate nothing") for forty nights as well as days (cf. Moses in Exod. 34:28). Jesus is shown the kingdoms of the whole cosmos, like Moses, when he was shown the Promised Land from Mount Nebo (Deut. 34:1-4). This prepares the way for the Sermon on the Mount, which is to follow, and is relevant to the Matthean church's situation: the synagogue has Moses as its founder figure; the true Israel has Jesus, the giver of the messianic Torah that fulfills and supersedes the Mosaic Torah. Also, the temptations show Jesus to be the true Son of God, obeying God's command in Deuteronomy where in the wilderness, Israel, the predecessor of the post-Jamnia synagogue, had been disobedient.

4:12-16, Jesus Enters Galilee. According to Matthew's presentation, Jesus' transfer to Galilee and the beginning of his independent ministry were occasioned by two factors: first, the baptism and temptation; second, the "delivering up" of John the Baptist. Thus, Jesus was led to move his residence from "Nazara" (sic; also Luke 4:16, which suggests that both Evangelists took this from Q) to Capernaum, which will be his base for the time being. What Matthew does not make clear is whether he thinks that Jesus returned to Nazareth after the baptism. Matthew was interested not in the precise sequence of Jesus' movements, but in the way these movements executed God's plan as announced in Scripture. The fulfillment citation in Matt. 4:15-16 closes the series that brings Jesus finally to Galilee. Its salient feature is the designation of Galilee as the "place of the Gentiles." This does not mean that Jesus is about to embark at once on a gentile mission. In fact, Matthew will stress that Jesus' earthly mission was generally confined to Israel (10:5; 15:24). So the citation points forward to the postresurrectional commission of the disciples in Galilee (28:16–20). This will be the final outcome of the earthly ministry of Jesus. Israel will reject the message, and the good news will consequently go forth to the Gentiles. What has happened in the recent history of Matthew's church (ejection from the synagogue and subsequent mission to the Gentiles) is therefore in accord with the saving plan of God as announced in the OT.

Matthew's Fulfillment Citations

Definition. "Fulfillment citation" or "formula citation" designates those quotations of the OT that Matthew introduces with the set formula: "This was done in order that what was spoken by the prophet [name] might be fulfilled when he says . . ." There are some ten such citations in Matthew: 1:22–23 (Isa. 7:14); 2:15 (Hos. 11:1); 2:17–18 (Jer. 31:15); 2:23 (source uncertain); 4:14–16 (Isa. 9:1–2); 8:17 (Isa. 53:4); 12:17–21 (Isa. 42:1–4); 13:35 (Ps. 78:2); 21:4–5 (Isa. 62:11; Zech. 9:9); 27:9–10 (Zech. 11:12–13, but erroneously attributed to Jeremiah). There are three other citations where the formula is imperfect: 2:5–6 (Mic. 5:2); 3:3 (Isa. 40:3); 13:14–15 (Isa. 6:9–10). In 26:56 the formula occurs without a citation. The distribution of fulfillment citations is interesting. No less than seven, including the imperfect instances, occur in Part One and mark the geographical progression of the narrative. Four occur in Parts Two and Three and comment in general on Jesus' teaching and healing. Three occur in Parts Four and Five and are attached to specific incidents of the passion narrative. Five are attached to Marcan material, the rest to Matthew's special material (M). From this fact we may conclude that all of them are attached to narratives that existed prior to Matthew and that none of them formed the nucleus from which Matthew created narratives or incidents. They serve to comment on already existing traditions.

Source. There has been much discussion as to whether Matthew first selected the citations or whether they were already in use before him (perhaps in a collection of testimonia), so that Matthew drew from this source. Some of the citations in Parts Two–Five occur also outside of Matthew (e.g., Zech. 9:9 [Matt. 21:4–5] is also cited in a similar context in John 12:15) or have influenced Mark without being explicitly quoted (e.g., Isa. 6:9–10 has already influenced Mark 4:12). Thus, at least some of the citations outside of Part One were already in use prior to Matthew. As for those in Part One, they are new to Matthew, with the possible exception of Isa. 7:14, which may have influenced Luke's account of the virginal conception (Luke 1:31). Thus, Matthew's policy seems to have been to make explicit those citations that had already influenced his sources and also to introduce new ones, especially in material peculiar to himself.

Text. There has been much discussion among scholars over the question of whether the fulfillment citations were taken from the Hebrew or from the Greek OT. This is a very technical and complicated question. The most probable conclusion is that where Matthew was following Mark (and Q, for that matter, although in Q there is only a general OT background, no actual use of fulfillment citations), he used the same text as his source, sometimes conforming it more closely to the Septuagint (LXX). But when introducing previously unused fulfillment citations in Part One, Matthew followed a text closer to the Hebrew text (Masoretic text, MT) or to other non-LXX texts such as the Targums (Aramaic paraphrases). What it does show is that Matthew was conservative in the use of his OT texts and that he selected from the versions available those most suitable for his purposes.

Purpose. It is generally recognized that the fulfillment citations play a central role in Matthew's theology. They are also related to the situation of his church. They show that the synagogue does not have a monopoly on the interpretation of the foundational Scriptures, that the real purpose on the OT Scriptures is to point to the Christ event, to the origin, ministry (including the preaching, teaching, and healing) of Jesus, his rejection and death. This perspective on the OT is not unique to Matthew, but Matthew worked it out most systematically in relation to the story of Jesus. The fact that the quotations come from the Prophets and the other writings, rather than from the Mosaic Torah, suggests that Matthew was writing for his own Christians. He did not write to convince the synagogue, for the Torah would have had primary authority there, and any citation from the other books alone would have carried less weight. For the Christian community, by contrast, the Prophets (and Psalms) were of paramount authority.

PART TWO: 4:17–11:1

Jesus, Messiah of Word and Deed

Having introduced Jesus in Part One as the Messiah of God, Matthew in Part Two presents him as the Messiah of word (chaps. 5–7) and of deed (8:1–9:35) and then in 9:36–11:1 extends Jesus' messianic word and work through the Twelve. Note how 4:23 and 9:35 are almost identical. These verses thus serve as an inclusio, i.e., they enclose the intervening material 4:24-9:34, which presents Jesus first as Messiah of word and then as Messiah of deed.

Matt. 4:17 (note the connecting link, "from then") marks the opening of Part Two. In it, Matthew takes over but abbreviates Mark's summary of Jesus' preaching (cf. Mark 1:14-15). This serves as a title for Parts Two and Three. The whole of Jesus' ministry is a proclamation of the kingdom of the heavens (→ Kingdom of God). Matthew nearly always uses "heavens" for God in his text: the meaning is identical. Note how the Baptist (Matt. 3:2), Jesus, and the Twelve (10:7) preach the same message. "Kingdom" means the salvation of God, deliverance from sin. This salvation will be accomplished through the cross (26:28), realized in the church, and consummated at the End (28:20).

The Call of the First Disciples

This unit is placed here to give Jesus an audience for the Sermon on the Mount and to allow the disciples to witness his deeds in chaps. 8 and 9 (cf. Mark 1:16-20). This experience will prepare them for their own mission in chap. 10.

5:1-2

The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount

Matthew has carefully composed this setting. Jesus "saw" the crowds. He delivered the great sermon not to the crowds directly but in their hearing. He went up into "the" mountain, i.e., the place of revelation, as Moses went up on Sinai. He sat down—the posture assumed by authorized teachers of the law (cf. 23:2). His disciples came to him: the sermon was addressed directly to them. The setting will provide an important clue when we discuss the contemporary meaning of the sermon. Finally, "he opened his mouth," a solemn phrase that tells us that Jesus is about to deliver divine revelation. Matthew's church is thus assured that this is messianic Torah, replacing the Mosaic Torah of the synagogue.

5:3-7:29

The Sermon on the Mount

The Sermon on the Mount is based on the Great Sermon of Q (cf. Luke 6:20-49). Both versions begin with the Beatitudes (→ Beatitudes), proceed to the commandment of love for the enemy, the prohibition of judgment on others, the test of true goodness (good and bad fruit), and conclude with the parable of the two houses (hearers and doers of the word). Thus, the basic structure of the sermon comes from Q. Matthew has added to the Great Sermon materials gathered from other parts of Q and from M. He has carefully organized this material in a neat structure including nine Beatitudes, six antitheses, and three works of mercy.

5:3-12, The Beatitudes. Matthew's first, fourth, fifth, and ninth Beatitudes are shared by Luke and are therefore from Q. Of these, the first three in the Lucan form (Luke 6:20-23) constitute the original stock, i.e., authentic Jesus or stage 1 material. They are brief, simple, and direct. They promise salvation to the oppressed (the poor, the hungry, and those who weep). They are addressed directly to the hearers in the second person, "Blessed are you." Between Q and Matthew's redaction the following changes have occurred: first, in conformity with Jewish Beatitudes generally, Jesus' original Beatitudes were changed into the third person plural; second, a new Beatitude of the "meek" was added to Jesus' original three Beatitudes. This is similar in kind to Jesus' Beatitudes, for it is pronounced upon the have-nots. Three more activist Beatitudes pronounced upon the merciful, the pure in heart, and the peacemakers were also added, all of them formulated in the third person. These new Beatitudes were inspired by certain psalms and by Isa. 61:1-2.

Matthew has in turn given a more activist twist to the original Beatitudes. "Poor in spirit" (v. 3) suggests not so much economic poverty and political oppression as an interior disposition. "Mourning" (v. 4; cf. Ps. 37:11), contrasted with Luke's and Q's "weeping," suggests sorrow for one's sins and a desire for moral reformation. "Meek" (Matt. 5:5) has a more ethical nuance for Matthew (cf. 11:29; 21:5, where it is predicated of Jesus); it suggests humility and kindness. The Beatitude upon the hungry has been similarly ethicized. While "thirst" was probably added before Matthew (stage 2) the addition of "for righteousness" is undoubtedly his. Righteousness for Matthew usually means not the saving power and activity of God, as it does in Paul, but the radical demand of God to which those who have responded to Jesus' offer of salvation are obligated (cf. 5:10, 20; 6:1, 33; 21:32). With v. 7, the more activist group of Beatitudes begins. "Merciful" means performing acts of mercy (cf. James 2:13). "Pure in heart" (Matt. 5:8; cf. Pss. 24:4; 73:1) denotes unreserved commitment to the will of God, i.e., the new righteousness. It is contrasted with the merely outward purity of the synagogue (cf. Matt. 23:25-26). "Peacemakers" (v. 9) could hardly have meant to Matthew what we mean by pacifism. In his situation it would have meant working for harmonious relations within the Christian community. This was particularly relevant in a community that included Jewish Christians of various types and recent gentile converts.

Matthew's eighth Beatitude is redactional (stage 3). It adds nothing new that is not already included in the first and ninth Beatitudes, but it does disclose important information about Matthew's church. It is addressed not to those who are being but to those who have been persecuted. Their persecution by the synagogue lay by now back in the past, a recent past no doubt. They had been persecuted because of their adherence to "righteousness," i.e., to the messianic Torah of Jesus rather than to the Mosaic Torah.

The ninth and final Beatitude envisages persecution as a present possibility, this time no doubt at the hands of the Romans in the time of Domitian (A.D. 81-96). Note that this Beatitude, unlike the others, contains an explicit Christology ("for my sake").

The Beatitudes contain three elements: first, the pronouncement of blessedness; second, the present attitude, state, or activity of those so pronounced; and third, the promise of salvation at the end. "Blessed" means that they already now enjoy the promise of future salvation. The future salvation is described under a number of different metaphors: possession of the kingdom of the heavens, consolation, inheritance of the land (i.e., the kingdom of God, of which the Promised Land of Canaan is a type), and satiety (i.e., the messianic banquet); the reception of "mercy" is the forgiveness of sin and final salvation; the seeing of God is not a mystic vision but saving encounter with God at the end; and the status of sonship is a life like that of angels (22:30). These promises are final rewards for radical obedience in this present age.

5:13-16, The Community as Salt and Light. This unit serves as transition from the Beatitudes to sayings relating the new righteousness to the Torah (5:17-48). The sayings about salt and light, authentic wisdom sayings of Jesus originally addressed to his disciples, are reapplied by Matthew to his church under persecution. The church is a "contrast society," distinctive from the surrounding world, including the synagogue. Its role is to show forth what it is by its good works (v. 1, a redactional addition), to be described in the antitheses. These good works are not its own achievement, for they will lead the world to praise not the church but the heavenly Father. For the way of righteousness is both taught and made possible by Jesus.

5:17-20, The Fulfillment of the Law. This unit serves as Matthew's introduction to the antitheses. It forms one of the most difficult yet most important passages in Matthew and one whose meaning is most disputed among interpreters. It consists of four separate sayings, one in each verse. It will help in their interpretation if we reconstruct a possible history of the tradition behind the unit. Although the present wording of v. 17 bears the marks of Matthew's editing, the basic substance of the saying could well go back to Jesus (stage 1). In response, e.g., to the criticisms of his opponents for the breach of the Sabbath, Jesus claimed that he was fulfilling the Sabbath law, since the Sabbath rest was a symbol of the coming kingdom of God. Palestinian Jewish Christians who thought that Paul was encouraging their coreligionists in the Diaspora (→ Diaspora) to abandon the law (see Acts 21:21) took up and expanded Jesus' saying in Matt. 5:17 and expanded it with vv. 18-19 (stage 2). Jesus, they argued, never encouraged his Jewish followers to abandon circumcision or the food laws (which was true to a degree, though for Jesus the kingdom of God took priority even over the Torah). Matthew then took up these three sayings, conformed them to his own style, and added the fourth saying, v. 20 (stage 3). In doing so he sought to apply vv. 17-19 about the law to his own church, a church that contained both Palestinian and Hellenistic Jewish Christians represented by M and Mark respectively, plus recent gentile converts. For such a church the Torah was still valid, but only as reinterpreted by Jesus, as the messianic Torah, as the better righteousness that surpasses that of the synagogue (v. 20). As the antitheses will explain, the better righteousness is the Mosaic law reinterpreted as love (→ Love) or rather interpreted according to God's original intention as love. Jesus had come to reinterpret and fulfill (v. 17) the Torah. What then of every "jot and tittle" of the law (v. 18)? Did Matthew expect his Jewish Christians to continue to observe circumcision? He never says, but we may suppose that they would have continued it as Torah for them but in a spirit of tolerance toward the gentile Christians. That would mean neither forcing the rite upon them nor regarding themselves as superior to the Gentiles who did not practice it. And what of the kosher and Sabbath laws? Love perhaps required that the Gentiles eat kosher food in their table fellowship with their Jewish fellow Christians, a fellowship that would have included the Eucharist. As for the Sabbath, presumably, Jewish Christians continued to observe it on their own, while both they and the Gentiles celebrated Sundays as the fulfillment of the Sabbath. In ways like these, perhaps, Matthew's church would have implemented the teachings of vv. 18-19 in the spirit of the better righteousness of the antitheses, the Golden Rule, and the double commandment of love.

5:21-48, The Antitheses. There are six antitheses. They all have the following form: first, thesis (citation from the old Torah); second, antithesis proper = radical reinterpretation of the Torah; third, specific illustrations of the radical command, often in picturesque terms. Three antitheses (the first, second, and fourth) are peculiar to Matthew (M); three come from Q (the third, fifth, and sixth). The latter group appears in Luke (and therefore, presumably, in Q) without the antithetical form, so the form has clearly been introduced by Matthew into the Q sayings, doubtless on the model of the antitheses in M. Does the antithetical form go back to Jesus himself? Arguably it does. The divine passive ("it was said" = "God said") is characteristic of Jesus. So too is the daring with which Jesus revises what God has said in former times, "I say to you," a way of speaking that denotes a claim to immediate and direct authority. Also the hyperbolic illustrations are characteristic of Jesus.

The antitheses fall into two groups of three (the first through the third, fourth through the sixth). They are separated structurally by the full introduction that prefaces the first and the fourth, and by the "again" that links the second group of three to the first. Further, two of the first three are based on the Ten Commandments (Exod. 20) and two of the second group on the Holiness Code (Lev. 19–20), while the respective items follow in the same order in which they occur in the OT. Matthew's aim is to provide his church with its own radicalized Torah, its own Decalogue and Holiness Code. The radicalized version of the Torah covers not only the outward behavior but also inner disposition; it claims the obedience of the whole person. Matthew sets the antitheses under the title of the "greater" or "superior righteousness" (5:20).

5:21–26, First Antithesis: On Murder. Jesus radicalized the sixth (fifth) commandment to include the prohibition of anger. Matthew appends two illustrations that give a positive force to this prohibition: believers must strive to be reconciled with their fellow believers so that the church may be a community of love. This was very relevant in a church where long-standing Jewish Christians and recent gentile converts were trying to settle down in a single community. In this antithesis, Matthew had in mind relationships within the Christian community. In the sixth and final antithesis, he will be concerned with the relationship between Christians and the outside world.

5:27–30, Second Antithesis: On Adultery. Jesus radicalized the seventh (sixth) commandment to include the prohibition of the lustful glance. Matthew adds a double saying about offenses found also in the Marcan tradition (Mark 9:43–48) that Matthew reproduces in Matt. 18:8–9. Matthew appends these extreme injunctions—to pluck out the eye, etc.—as advice in carrying out Jesus' radical command. He can hardly mean it literally: it is figurative, an expression for drastic action to avoid situations where temptation is likely. Jesus' and Matthew's basic concern is to protect the institution of marriage. Perhaps also, given Jesus' free and open treatment of women, so different from that of the rabbis, he was concerned to recognize women as persons rather than objects of male gratification.

5:31–32, Third Antithesis: On Divorce. This antithesis is tacked on to the preceding one, as is shown by its brief introduction "you have heard that . . ." and by its related subject matter. It appears to abolish rather than radicalize the Torah. This saying occurs twice in Matthew, here with a parallel at Luke 16:18 (Q) and also in Matt. 19:9 (= Mark 10:11–12). Paul also knows of Jesus' prohibition of divorce (1 Cor. 7:10–11), which gives it triple attestation. The tendency is to modify Jesus' absolute prohibition. Matthew concedes it on the ground of porneia. The traditional interpretation, "adultery," must be rejected for these reasons: first, the Greek word used is different from the word for adultery in the preceding antithesis; second, "adultery" is used where the wife's infidelity is clearly in view (John 8:3); third, the punishment for a wife's extramarital relations was stoning (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22–24), and one would therefore expect the exception to be formulated as an antithesis. It has been suggested that "sexual immorality" here refers to unions with kin forbidden by the Torah (Lev. 18:6–18), contracted by pagans prior to their conversion. This would accord with the situation of Matthew's church, for such previous pagan marriages would be a problem in a Jewish church open to gentile mission.

5:33–37, Fourth Antithesis: On Oaths. This is the first of the second set of three antitheses (note "again," the full introduction as in the first antithesis and the switch from the Decalogue to the Holiness Code). The prohibition is first stated in general terms, and four specific oaths are mentioned, concluding with a positive injunction to tell the truth in all circumstances without invoking the sanction of an oath (→ Oath; cf. Lev. 19:12).

5:38–42, Fifth Antithesis: On Retaliation. The old Torah injunction was not intended to encourage revenge, but to restrict it: only an eye, not a life. Once again, the general injunction is followed by four specific examples (cf. Exod. 21:24; Lev. 24:20; Deut. 19:21).

5:43–48, Sixth Antithesis: On Love of the Enemy. The last antithesis forms a climax to the series. Here above all the "better righteousness" is expressed. The command itself is from Q (Luke 6:27–32, 35), but Matthew has reformulated it as an antithesis to Lev. 19:18. The saying is substantially authentic to Jesus. However, the command to hate the enemy occurs nowhere in the Torah, so Matthew must have a later Jewish interpretation in view such as is found at Qumran (1QS 1:9–10); Matthew is perhaps inferring from the behavior of the synagogue toward his church that such teaching was current there too.

Matthew has altered the wording of the injunction to pray: Luke (Q) has "for those who treat you wrongfully," which Matthew changes to "those who persecute you." This shows that Matthew has in mind not personal adversaries but the enemies of the church, whether Jewish or gentile, who were persecuting Christians for their faith.

Matthew has no compunction in offering a reward for the love of the enemy. The reward is that his community will become sons of God at the end (cf. the seventh Beatitude, Matt. 5:9). Love of the enemy for Matthew involves imitating the action of God in creation (v. 45) not as in Q, basing one's conduct on his mercy in offering the gift of the kingdom to sinners (Luke 6:35).

The concluding saying, "Therefore you shall be perfect as your Father, the heavenly One, is perfect" (Matt. 5:48), concludes not only the sixth Beatitude as in Luke 6:36 (which has "be merciful," referring only to the last command) but the whole series. Perfection for Matthew (cf. Matt. 19:21) means the better righteousness of 5:20 as expounded in the six antitheses, the total and unreserved obedience of the whole person. Here is another echo of the Holiness Code (Lev. 19:2), with Matthew substituting perfection for holiness. God's perfection, like his holiness in Leviticus, provides the motivation for human conduct.

6:1-18, The Deeds of Righteousness. The synagogue across the street had its own list of deeds of righteousness (almsgiving, prayer, and fasting). Matthew provides his community with the same list, but in each case the pious deed is radicalized. In this systematized form they are clearly due to Matthew. How much of the substance goes back to Jesus? On the one hand, the teaching on fasting seems to contradict Mark 2:19a. On the other hand, the picturesquely hyperbolic imagery of each of the injunctions, including that on fasting, seems characteristic of Jesus. Certainly we can accept all three injunctions as the result of his teaching. In any case, the original nucleus of the Lord's Prayer (→ Lord's Prayer, The) is authentic to Jesus (see commentary below on 6:9-15). Probably Matthew took over the three items from a written source (where they already appeared in verse form), prefaced it with an introduction that is in prose form (6:1), and inserted the Lord's Prayer (6:9-15).

6:1, Introduction. The better righteousness includes for Matthew not only a radicalization of the Decalogue and Holiness Code but also of the Jewish rules of piety that go beyond the Torah. 6:2-4, Almsgiving. All three rules are radicalized in contrast to the behavior of the "hypocrites," i.e., the synagogue across the street. In Greek, "hypocrite" is a neutral term meaning "actor," one who plays a role wearing a mask. Here it means those whose outward behavior stands in contrast to their inward disposition. They assume a mask of benevolence but are really concerned with their own glory and the praise of others. This will be the principal charge leveled against the Pharisees in chap. 23. Matthew again has in mind the people in the synagogue.

6:5-8, On Prayer. In Judaism, prayer was closely connected with almsgiving (e.g., Tob. 12:8). Jesus here had private prayer in view. That he did not exclude public or corporate prayer is shown by Matt. 18:19-20.

6:9-15, The Lord's Prayer. Since the Our Father interrupts the poetic structure of the three precepts, it is clearly an insertion by Matthew into his M source. It has a parallel in Luke 11:2-4, but Matthew's version is expanded. These additions are also found in Did. 8:2 and represent liturgical expansions. Jesus invited his disciples to address God as "Abba, Father," a privilege accorded to those who had responded to his message, not a right for everybody. Matthew has reverted to traditional Jewish practice by expanding it to the more fulsome "Our Father, the One in the heavens." This emphasizes God's transcendence, which Jesus himself expressed in other ways. Following the second petition, "may your reign come," Matthew has added "may your will be done, as in heaven so too on earth." This was intended to amplify and clarify the petition for the coming Reign of God; it does not really add anything new. When God's Reign comes, his will is effectively asserted on earth. The powers of evil will be overthrown and the plan of salvation accomplished. By placing the Lord's Prayer in the sermon and in the exposition of the better righteousness, Matthew probably intends the third petition to be a prayer for the fulfillment of the better righteousness through Christian obedience. In the fifth petition, Matthew reads "debts" (Luke: "sins"). Probably the tradition followed by Luke (Q or some special source) also read "debts" originally, for in Luke the ensuing clause reads "for we ourselves also forgive everyone who is indebted to us." Those who are privileged to call God "Father," i.e., the members of Matthew's community, have received forgiveness of sin. Yet they still sin daily and, therefore, need constantly to pray for forgiveness. The seventh petition should probably be translated "but deliver us from the evil one" (i.e., Satan). Like the other additions by Matthew, this does not add anything essentially new to the petition before it. The trial referred to in the sixth petition is the last great trial before the end, the time of the messianic woes, when Satan seeks to deceive the elect and tempt them to be unfaithful.

The KJV included the familiar doxology, which is absent from the more ancient texts, and therefore not original. However, according to Jewish custom, Jesus would have expected users of his prayer to ad-lib a doxology every time they said the prayer.

6:16–18, On Fasting. Prayer and fasting often went together in Jewish practice. Fasting added force to the prayer and made it more urgent. From Mark 2:18–19 it would appear that when Jesus and his disciples were on the road in Galilee they dispensed with the additional fasts of the Pharisees and of the Baptist's disciples over and above the Day of Atonement (→ Atonement, Day of), which all Jews practiced. This was due to the emergency situation created by the in-breaking of God's Reign, which was like a wedding feast. It would not, however, have been inconsistent for Jesus to tell his followers how they were to keep the regular fast of the Day of Atonement. Such teaching would lead to the post-Easter observance in Greek-speaking communities of the "day when the bridegroom was taken from them" (Mark 2:20). Matthew omits "on that day" (9:15), so presumably Jewish Christians continued to observe Yom Kippur rather than Good Friday.

6:19–7:11, Instructions for the Community. These instructions are loosely attached to the Lord's Prayer. Verses 19–34, which contain teaching on wealth, can be connected with the petition, "Give us today enough bread for tomorrow" (v. 11). Matt. 7:1–5, on judging, may be linked to the petition on forgiveness (v. 12). Less plausibly perhaps, 7:6, on casting pearls before swine, may be tied in with 6:13, the petition for delivery from trials and evil. The longer section on prayer (7:7–11) is obviously a continuation of the teaching in 6:5–15. Most of this material is inserted by Matthew into the sermon from other parts of Q: Matt. 6:19–21 = Luke 12:33–34; Matt. 6:22–23 = Luke 11:34–36; Matt. 6:24 = Luke 16:13; Matt. 6:25–34 = Luke 12:22–31; Matt. 7:7–11 = Luke 11:9–13. Only in Matt. 7:1–5 is Matthew following the Great Sermon from Q (= Luke 6:37–38, 41–42); Matt. 7:6 is from M. 6:19–24, On Treasures. We have here three distinct sayings (vv. 19–21, 22–23, 24) that were probably independent traditions. They all have a poetic structure characteristic of Jesus. Matthew has added v. 24 from elsewhere in Q (= Luke 16:13) to the first two. This combination provides a clue to his understanding of the two sayings about the single eye: it is an eye that is exclusively fixed upon the service of God and not on material possessions. Thus, the whole unit serves to introduce the following unit on anxiety.

6:25–34, On Anxiety. It will clarify Matthew's understanding of these sayings if we reconstruct their earlier history. Stage 1: Jesus was not adressing humanity in general or even Israel in particular but his disciples, those who had accepted his message of the coming Reign of God. They are to renounce their earthly callings and possessions to follow him and proclaim his message. Theirs was to be the radical obedience of itinerant charismatic preachers (cf. the rich young man, Mark 10:17–31 = Matt. 19:16–30). Stage 2: without losing the primary meaning they had for Jesus, the injunctions are now treated as conventional wisdom teaching about riches (vv. 27–29)—you don't gain anything by being anxious. Stage 3: Matthew's church no longer consisted of itinerant charismatics but was a settled community of the relatively well-to-do. Accordingly, the Evangelist prefaces the unit with the sayings on the single eye and serving two masters. Matthean Christians do not have to give up their possessions, but they must get their priorities straight. Thus, Matthew adds the word "first" to the injunction "seek God's reign" (v. 33) plus "and its [or his, God's] righteousness," the better righteousness of the antitheses and the devout precepts. It is worth noting that Matthew's Jesus addresses those "of little faith" (v. 30), a favorite designation for Matthew's church. A puny faith has many consequences; one is that it leads people to trust in uncertain riches and therefore makes them prone to anxiety.

7:1–5, On Judging. This unit represents a combination of two separate traditions. The first saying (vv. 1–2) is couched in the second person plural (you). The string of sayings that follows (vv. 3–5) is addressed to the individual (thou). This is an important clue to their meaning. Jesus prohibited his itinerant charismatics as a body from going to law courts in any circumstances. Q individualized this teaching: the post-Easter community did not condemn law courts as such but expected its members not to go to law when they had disputes with one another (cf. 1 Cor. 6:1–11). Matthew, in turn, places these injunctions in the context of the teaching on material possessions: those who get their priorities straight with regard to such possessions will never want to go to law. 7:6, On Not Desecrating the Holy. It is hard to fit this saying into what we know of the Jesus who consorted with the outcast and who healed lepers. It must be an expression of the exclusiveness of the narrowly Jewish Christian community that formulated the M tradition. How did the Evangelist himself understand it? That is even more puzzling now that his community had embarked upon a mission to the Gentiles. The Didache (9:5) applied the saying to the Eucharist, which is to be withheld from the profane. Given the affinities between Matthew's community and the audience for the Didache (they shared the Lord's Prayer and baptism in the threefold name) we may conjecture that Matthew understood it in the same way. It is, however, difficult to relate it to the context in which Matthew has placed it.

7:7–11, Confidence in Prayer. This unit exhibits many characteristics of Jesus' speech: poetic structure, the divine passive ("it will be given to you . . . it will be opened to you," i.e., God will give . . . God will open), the picturesque illustrations (bread/stone; fish/serpent), the argument from the less to the greater ("if . . . how much more"), the realism about human nature ("you, being evil"). Above all, Jesus was absolutely certain of the goodness of God, his Abba, who was drawing near in Jesus' own ministry. It is coherent with Jesus' message that he should seek to inculcate the same confidence not in humanity in general, but specially in those who had responded to his message. The "good things" are the blessings of God's coming Reign, the things Jesus taught his disciples to pray for in the Our Father.

Q was already aware of the relation between this unit and the Our Father. In Luke 11:9–13, this teaching on prayer follows almost immediately after the Lord's Prayer (11:2–4). Jesus and Matthew have been criticized for naïveté and lack of realism. But that is because the very specific context of this teaching—its relation to the coming Reign of God—has been ignored and the promise generalized.

7:12, The Golden Rule. This saying stands on its own between the two main parts (5:17–6:18; 6:19–7:11) of the sermon and the final section (7:13–29). It harks back to the introduction of the better righteousness in 5:17–20. In Q (cf. Luke 6:31) it rounded off the command to love one's enemies. For Matthew, the better righteousness is summed up in the Golden Rule. The rule itself is not unique to Jesus. It is found in Greek and Latin literature and was adopted by Judaism from the Greco-Roman world. The early church (if not Jesus himself) then took it over from the synagogue fully aware that it was not distinctively Christian as a rule of thumb for applying the love commandment. It is often (but erroneously) claimed that elsewhere it appears only in the negative form ("Do not do to others"). Matthew has added to it v. 12c, "for this is the law and the prophets," thus showing that for him it is an aid in practicing the better righteousness that is the fulfillment of the Torah. Thus, Matthew links the Golden Rule to 5:17. And as 22:40 also shows, the quintessence of the new righteousness is the love commandment.

7:13–29, Final Injunctions. The conclusion of the Sermon on the Mount consists of four units. Each unit features a contrast: broad/narrow gate or road (vv. 13–14); good/bad fruit (vv. 15–20); lawlessness/righteousness (vv. 21–23); house on rock/house on sand (vv. 24–27). Choices made right now determine the believers' fate at the End: "life" in v. 14 means life in the age to come; "fire" in v. 19 means the last judgment; note also "the kingdom of heaven" (v. 21) and "on that day" (vv. 22–23); the winds, rain, and overflowing rivers is imagery for the last judgment (vv. 25, 27). Matthew likes to conclude his speeches with references to the End (cf. 18:34–35; 25:31–46).

7:13–14, The Two Ways. The antithetical parallelism and rhythmic structure suggest that the basic tradition goes back to Jesus himself. This makes the form in Luke 13:23–24 an abbreviation. However, the switch from "gate" to "way" is awkward. Perhaps Matthew added the "way" to the picture (cf. 21:32; 22:16) to conform to the conventional Jewish teaching about the two ways. For Matthew the "way" is the better righteousness. Here he has in mind not the synagogue across the street but false prophets within the Christian community (see the next unit).

7:15–23, False Prophets. This unit contains two parts, a warning against false prophets (→Prophet) and the test of the prophets by their fruits. The test of fruits is from the Great Sermon in Q (Luke 6:43–44) where it had a more general application. Thus, v. 15 is the key to Matthew's intention here. His community was troubled by a problem that plagued other communities at this time, that of itinerant prophets. Various tests were offered to distinguish false from true prophets. For Paul (1 Cor. 12:3) and for the Johannine community (1 John 2:22), the test was one of orthodoxy. The Didache imposed a practical test: did they overstay their welcome? Matthew's test is to ask whether they practice better righteousness. We do not know exactly who these antinomian prophets were. Probably they were Greek-speaking Christians who had joined Matthew's community as a result of its recent mission to the Gentiles. This explains why Matthew deliberately omitted Mark's story of the strange exorcist (Mark 9:38–41).

7:21–23, Saying and Doing. Matthew has combined two separate units from Q (Luke 6:46 and 13:26–27) and introduced the motif of prophecy (Matt. 7:22), thus relating this unit to the preceding one and giving a more specific application of the test of fruits: they preach the better righteousness but do not practice it. As charismatics, the false prophets appeal to their miracles: Matthew tests them by their practice.

7:24–27, The Two Houses. Matthew takes over Q's conclusion to the Great Sermon (cf. Luke 6:47–49). This is an authentic Jesus parable based on Noah's Flood (cf. Matt. 24:37–39, also from Q). The Deluge is a symbol of the last judgment. Elsewhere Jesus used the last judgment in a nonparabolic context as a sanction for the decisiveness of his message (Luke 12:8–9 Q). Already in Q the application of the parable of the two houses has been modified: the believers must not only hear Jesus' message but practice his precepts. Matthew, in turn, identifies "these words of mine" (v. 26; cf. 24) with the better righteousness. This links the parable of the two houses to 5:17-20. Matthew also describes those who practice the new righteousness as "prudent" (v. 24) in their present conduct. They weigh the prospect of final judgment. Those who hear but do not translate what they have heard into practice are "foolish." Matthew will pick up the same terms, "prudent" and "foolish," in the parable of the ten maidens (25:2).

7:28-29, The Conclusion of the Sermon. Matthew has taken over the substance of this conclusion from Q (Luke 7:1) but reworded it into a formula that he will repeat with appropriate variations at the end of each of his major discourses (Matt. 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1). The mention of the "crowd" and of the "teaching" points back to 5:1 and marks off the sermon from the surrounding narrative. Also, the reference to Jesus' authority (v. 29) prepares for the ensuing section on his mighty deeds.

The Sermon on the Mount Today

Jesus addressed his radical teaching to a band of wandering charismatics who preached the impending advent of the Reign of God. They were to renounce property, lawsuits, oaths, and (apparently) either forego marriage and leave family (19:11-12) or, if married, never avail themselves of divorce and remarriage.

Already the Q tradition found it necessary, as we have seen, to modify these demands for a more settled community. Matthew was writing for a situation that had changed even more: his was a completely settled, relatively prosperous urban church. It had undergone two traumatic experiences: expulsion from the synagogue and the opening up of mission to the Gentiles. In this situation, Matthew reformulated Jesus' ethic in antithesis to the ethic of the synagogue, providing precepts of piety, seeking to make his church a community of love and reconciliation. Unfortunately, he does not seem to have thought of applying the command to love the enemy to the synagogue.

More than two centuries after the time of Matthew, the church became tolerated, and, in due course, Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire. When church and state entered into partnership, a double-standard ethic evolved. Only monastic communities practiced the absolute ethic of the Sermon on the Mount. Christians in the world were expected to live only according to the Decalogue. The Reformation revolted against this double standard. Right-wing Protestantism generally operated with a distinction between private and public life. Public life was governed by the rules of the Decalogue, private life by the Sermon on the Mount reduced to a matter of inner motive and disposition. Left-wing Protestantism withdrew from the world, organizing its communal life in accordance with the absolutes of the sermon.

Today we live in an increasingly secularized society. In the West, Christians still share political responsibilities with their post-Christian, secularized neighbors. In the Communist countries, Christians are excluded from political responsibilities. But on both sides of the Iron Curtain the state is almost completely secularized.

How are the teachings of the sermon applicable in this situation? The first point to note is that the sermon is addressed directly not to the world outside (represented by the crowd) but to the disciples, that is, to those who have responded to Jesus' message of the kingdom. It is totally unrealistic and impossible to expect the "world" to practice the better righteousness of the sermon. Even European states that made a public and official profession of Christian faith never lived up to the sermon. Those states professed themselves to be subject only to the standards of the Decalogue, and the established church's role was to hold the state by its proclamation to that subjection (cf. the Elizabethan Book of Homilies, a handbook for English preachers that became a classic). The church could never expect even the professedly Christian state to follow the better righteousness. Some remnants of this older situation survive even in the United States with its "civil religion."

With the growing secularization of both the state and society, however, the church will be challenged by the sermon to become increasingly a "contrast society"—one in which the better righteousness is practiced not just by individual Christians, but corporately by the Christian fellowship as such; this will require church discipline (cf. Matt. 18). Such a church would not be turned in upon itself: the sermon was delivered in the presence of the crowds who overheard it, and the contrast society was meant to be a light to the world and the salt of the earth. The world outside was meant to see the good works done by the contrast society and to glorify the heavenly Father.

8:1-9:35

Messiah of Deed

Chaps. 8-9 are predominantly a collection of miracle stories (→ Miracles). They are, for the most part, derived from Mark (chaps. 1-2, 4-5) and rearranged in the following sequence: (1) the healing of the leper (Matt. 8:1-4; = Mark 1:40-45); (2) the centurion's servant (Matt. 8:5-13; = Luke 7:1-10 Q); (3) Peter's mother-in-law (Matt. 8:14-15; = Mark 1:29-31); (4) summary of healings at eventide (Matt. 8:16-17; = Mark 1:32-34); (5) stilling of the storm (Matt. 8:23-27; = Mark 4:35-41); (6) the Gadarene demoniac (Matt. 8:28-34; = Mark 5:1-20); (7) the paralytic (Matt. 9:1-8; = Mark 2:1-12); (8) the ruler's daughter and the woman with the hemorrhage (Matt. 9:18-26; = Mark 5:21-43); (9) two blind men (Matt. 9:27-31); and (10) the dumb demoniac (Matt. 9:32-34). The ninth and tenth appear to be Matthew's own compositions. They are rather colorless compilations from other miracle stories. The concluding summary (9:35) corresponds to Matt. 4:23-25 and marks off the two sections that present Jesus as Messiah of word and deed.

These colorless compositions suggest that Matthew was at some pains to produce ten miracle stories (if we count only the specific incidents, omit summary 4, and take summary 8 as two separate stories). It has often been suggested that these ten miracles are intended to parallel the ten plagues of Egypt and are therefore part of Matthew's portrayal of Jesus as a new Moses. This is not entirely convincing, but no other plausible explanation has been offered.

There are other episodes in this section that interrupt the series of miracles. These are the would-be disciples (Matt. 8:18-22; = Luke 9:57-60 Q); the call of Matthew (Matt. 9:9-13; = Mark 2:13-17; in Mark the name is Levi; →Matthew); the question about fasting (Matt. 9:14-17; = Mark 2:18-22). These two episodes follow the healing of the paralytic in both Mark and Matthew. Matthew is combining the two themes of miracles and discipleship. Overarching these two themes is the further theme of Jesus' authority, which had been enunciated in 7:29. This combination of themes prepares readers for the commissioning of the disciples in 9:36-11:1. They will extend Jesus' messianic words and deeds further afield.

Matthew achieves his editorial purpose by providing a new context for his materials, by abbreviating his sources, by additions, and by internal modifications. We will examine the two most significant episodes in this section, namely, the stilling of the storm (8:23-27) and the paralytic (9:1-8).

8:23-27, The Stilling of the Storm. Notice the context in which Matthew has placed this episode, namely, immediately after the story of the would-be disciples. The two units are linked together by the catchword "follow." In 8:22 Jesus challenges the second would-be disciple: "follow me, and leave the dead to bury their dead" (8:22). Then at the beginning of the next unit we are told that the disciples "followed" Jesus into the boat (8:23). This suggests that the journey across the sea is a parable for the journey of discipleship. The "little ship" (as so often in the writings of the early church fathers) is a symbol for the church. The storm, described in apocalyptic terms as an earthquake, becomes a symbol for the tribulations of Matthew's community: its expulsion from the synagogue, the trauma of the admission of Gentiles, the persecution by the Roman authorities. Matthew cuts down the story to the bare minimum, drawing our attention away from the miracle as such to its symbolic meaning. The description of the storm is abbreviated. We are simply told that Jesus was asleep (nothing about Mark's famous cushion!). The disciples address Jesus not as "Master," but as "Lord," the title of majesty by which he was known in the church. As so often in Matthew, Jesus reproaches the disciples for their "puny" faith. This is what was wrong with Matthew's church: its faith was not strong enough to face up to the apocalyptic tribulations through which it was passing. Finally, the disciples' concluding response is slightly reworded: "What kind of person is this?" Matthew thus prepares for the answer that will come in the second crossing of the lake: "God's Son" (14:33). Thus, once more the disciples in the ship symbolize Matthew's church, which confesses Jesus as the Son of God.

9:1-8, The Paralytic. Matthew reduces the story by four verses (cf. Mark 2:1-12). All non-essentials, even the elaborate demonstration of the four friends' faith, are cut out. The miracle recedes into the background and everything is concentrated on the declaration of the remission of the sick man's sins. The scribes' objection is reduced to the lapidary statement, "This fellow is blaspheming" (Matt. 9:3). Above all, the choric ending is reworded to refer not to the miracle, as in Mark 2:12, but to Jesus' pronouncement of absolution. The scribes were amazed that such authority was given to "human beings" (the same word that occurred in the choric ending of the stilling of the storm in reference to the disciples in the ship, symbolizing Matthew's church). Here is the point of Matthew's editing: Jesus' authority to remit sins devolves upon the church, as will be made clear in 18:18.

9:36-11:1

The Mission of the Twelve

Mark and Q each contained a mission of disciples during the Galilean ministry of Jesus (Mark 6:6-13; Luke 10:1-12 Q). That such a mission (perhaps even several) took place during Jesus' lifetime is probable. It has multiple attestation (Mark, Q, and perhaps M). The instruction to take the minimum of equipment is consistent with Jesus' itinerant radicalism. The terms of the commission (to preach the kingdom, rather than Jesus as the saving act of God) are pre- rather than post-Easter.

Matthew has combined material from the Marcan and Q versions of the charge. Unlike Mark, Q gives the content of the message (Matt. 10:7; = Luke 9:2).

Matthew has removed some of the sayings from the discourse about the End in Mark 13 and placed them here. He has also added sayings from M (10:5, 23). Thus he has shaped a second major discourse.

The charge consists of the following items: an exhortation to prayer for laborers for the harvest (9:36-38); the commissioning of the Twelve with a list of their names (10:1-4); instructions on the content of their message (10:5-8); directions concerning the equipment they are to take with them (10:9-10); their behavior in towns/houses (10:11-16); the prospect of persecution (10:17-25); the cost of discipleship (10:26-39); and the rewards of discipleship (10:40-42). The usual concluding formula marks the end of the discourse (11:1), thus indicating that it is the second of five major discourses.

Thus far we have seen that Matthew's primary concern is not a biography or history of Jesus but a manual for the church of his day. The puzzle of the missionary charge is that the earlier part, down to 10:23, seems irrelevant to the conditions of Matthew's community. The minimal equipment the disciples are to take with them was suited to itinerant charismatics in Palestine but hardly to the Evangelist's settled community. Even more difficult is the restriction of the mission to Israel (10:5, M), a restriction that in any case is lifted at the end of the Gospel (28:19) and from which Matthew's own community had successfully emancipated itself in its recent history. Then there is the unfulfilled promise of 10:23 (also M). Is Matthew deliberately trying to "historicize"—i.e., to reconstruct how things actually were in Jesus' time, a time very different from his own? Is Matthew just a conservative editor content simply to preserve traditions even when they have lost their relevance? Perhaps Matthew was more aware of the difference between Jesus' time and his own than modern scholars give him credit for. Perhaps he believed that this charge containing sayings that were designed for very different situations from his own still has something relevant to say. Perhaps missionaries still go out from Matthew's community, and their requirement of a minimum of baggage is meant to symbolize the urgency of the mission. Perhaps Matthew's community needs reminding that, although they have turned toward the Gentiles, they must not give up on Israel. And what about the coming of the Son of man before the completion of the mission to Israel? Perhaps Matthew still felt that this promise provided an incentive to urgency in mission not only to Israel, but also to the Gentiles. In any case, the changes he has made make the discourse relevant to his own community. Note especially the predictions of persecution, transferred from the "little apocalypse" (Mark 13), and of division in households from Q (Luke 12:51-53). These were real experiences in Matthew's community.

PART THREE: 11:2-16:20

Israel's Unbelief and the Disciples' Incipient Faith

In Part Three, the hostility of Jesus' opponents (the Baptist movement, the Galilean cities, the relatives of Jesus) develops, and gradually Jesus extricates his disciples from Israel and welds them into a "church." This part not only intends to narrate in a historicizing way what happened in the lifetime of Jesus but to reflect the recent history of Matthew's community. This community likewise had experienced the hostility of the synagogue and had been forced to withdraw and constitute itself a distinct community with its own confession of Jesus as the Messiah (→ Messiah) and the Son of the living God (cf. 14:33; 16:16).

John the Baptist

The first opponents Matthew has in mind are the continuing disciples of John the Baptist. Matthew adapts four units about the Baptist from Q: the answer to John (Matt. 11:2-6; = Luke 7:18-23); Jesus' testimony about the Baptist (Matt. 11:7-11; = Luke 7:24-28); the saying about the kingdom (Matt. 11:12; = Luke 16:16) to which further sayings peculiar to Matthew are appended (Matt. 11:13-15); and finally, the parable of the children in the market place (Matt. 11:16-19; = Luke 7:31-35). As a result, Matthew has produced a minidiscourse on the Baptist. This is not one of his major discourses, for it lacks the standard concluding formula (cf. Matt. 11:1).

This minidiscourse puts the Baptist firmly in his place. He is only the forerunner of Jesus the Messiah, not the final emissary of God before the End. The message that Jesus has proclaimed (chaps. 5-7) and the works he has performed (chaps. 8-9), both of which were continued by the Twelve in chap. 10, show that Jesus is indeed the coming One to whom the Baptist has pointed (first unit). Jesus' testimony to the Baptist equates him with the return of Elijah, one who stands on the frontier of the coming Reign of God. Consequently even the most insignificant person in that kingdom is greater than John (second unit). John was like the children playing at funerals, for he preached judgment and repentance. Jesus brought the good news of the promised salvation and was like the children playing at weddings (fourth unit).

The minidiscourse is climaxed by the saying "But wisdom has been vindicated by her works" (11:19). To figure out what Matthew means by this we must look at the Lucan parallel (which is presumably identical with Q): "wisdom has been vindicated by all her children." In the Lucan or Q version, wisdom had sent a series of envoys ("children"); John the Baptist and Jesus were the last of the series. By substituting "her works" for "all her children," Matthew downgrades the Baptist. The works are exclusively the works of the Messiah (cf. Matt. 11:2), who is not just the last in the series of wisdom's envoys but the final agent of wisdom.

Judgment and Jubilation

After the woes on the Galilean cities (11:20-24; = Luke 10:13-15 Q), which highlight the failures in Jesus' Galilean ministry and indicate the growing opposition to his message, comes the cry of jubilation that already in Q (Luke 10:21-22) followed the woes on the cities and that initiates the process in which Jesus turns his back on unrepentant Israel and begins to form a new community of disciples. The unrepentant are ironically characterized as the "wise and understanding"; "the immature" are Jesus' disciples.

11:28-30

The Savior's Appeal

This saying is not found in Luke, but is so closely tied in location and theme to the cry of jubilation that it seems quite probable that it already stood here in Q (if not, it must be from M). Both cry and appeal present Jesus as wisdom's spokesperson. In the cry of jubilation, the Son reveals the Father (v. 27). To reveal God is the function of wisdom in the OT and in early Judaism (→ Wisdom). Still more striking is the parallel between the appeal of vv. 28-30 and wisdom's invitation in Sir. 51:23-27. This helps to make sense of the appeal. On the face of it, it would seem arrogant for Jesus to invite people to come to him, to promise them refreshment, and to claim that he himself was gentle and humble in heart (shades of Uriah Heep!) or that his yoke was kindly and his load light. But the moment we realize that it is not Jesus speaking in his own capacity but wisdom speaking through him, everything falls into place. Jesus is not personally identified with wisdom, as the prologue of John identifies him with the Logos or Word, or as the Son in that Gospel speaks of himself as a divine being who had been preexistent. Matthew knows nothing of this higher Christology.

Growing Hostility

At this point, Matthew returns to Mark's story line and will continue to follow it closely. He will for the most part omit only what he has already used such as the miracle stories and other incidents in chaps. 8-9 and in the appointment and mission of the Twelve in chap. 10. As before, Matthew abbreviates Mark's stories, cutting the individual units down to the bare essentials. But he also adds significant materials from other sources (Q and M). With these changes he creates a new story line, different from Mark's and serving his editorial purposes. In this section, Matthew traces the growing hostility between Jesus and his critics, a hostility that foreshadows church-synagogue relations in Matthew's own day.

12:1-8, The Plucking of the Grain.

Here Matthew adds three verses (vv. 5-7) reinforcing the justification for the disciples' breach of the Sabbath. First comes a saying recalling the Stephen (→ Stephen) circle's controversies over the Temple (vv. 5-6). "Something greater than the Temple" means for Matthew the presence of Jesus, who is Immanuel, God with us (cf. v. 41). Next comes the quotation from Hos. 6:6 already used in Matt. 9:13 and therefore representing Matthew's own redaction. The effect is to provide Matthew's community with further ammunition in its own controversies with the synagogue. The Sabbath is meant not for ritualistic observance but for humanitarian deeds, in other words, for the love command.

12:9-14, The Man with the Withered Hand.

Matthew slightly shortens this story from Mark 3:1-6 and then adds a Q saying (Matt. 12:11-12; = Luke 14:5) together with a concluding statement (Matt. 12:12b) that summarizes teaching found elsewhere in the Gospel tradition.

12:15-21, Summary of Healings. Matthew has drastically shortened this Marcan summary (Mark 3:7-12), then added to it an extensive fulfillment citation (Matt. 12:18-21 from Isa. 42:1-4). This servant song (→ Servant) expresses two important points in Matthew's theology: first, Jesus is the gentle or meek One who deals tenderly with his own (cf. Matt. 11:28-30); second, Jesus' ministry will later open up the mission to the Gentiles, which has been temporarily prohibited in the missionary charge (10:5-6).

12:22-37, The Beelzebul Controversy. In Mark this episode was simply an abstract debate between Jesus and the Pharisees. Matthew, however, prefaces it with an exorcism, following Q. The debate occurs both in Mark and Q, and Matthew, as often, conflates the two accounts. Matthew also appropriates material from elsewhere in Q about the good and bad trees (v. 33) and the saying about the idle word (vv. 36-37) either from his own version—different from Luke's—of Q or from M. The effect is to enhance the anti-Pharisaic polemic and to provide further ammunition for Matthew's controversy with the synagogue.

12:38-42, The Sign of Jonah. Following Q, Matthew places the demand for a sign immediately after the Beelzebul controversy but alters it significantly. The sign of Jonah is not just his preaching but his deliverance from the belly of the whale, seen as a type of the death and resurrection of Jesus, who is greater than Jonah. Matthew's synagogue opponents ("this generation") have been confronted by this sign, the Christian preaching of Christ crucified and risen, but have refused conversion.

12:43-45, The Return of the Evil Spirit. This came at the end of the Beelzebul controversy in Q (= Luke 11:24-26). By placing it here, Matthew makes the saying a further judgment against "this generation," i.e., the synagogue. Post-Jamnia legalism has made the last state of the house of Judaism worse than the first when it originally rejected Jesus.

12:46-50, Jesus' Earthly Family. In Mark (Mark 3:20-21, 31-35) this episode is treated in a highly negative way: Jesus' earthly family is there repudiated at the expense of his new family, the disciples. Matthew has modified this tradition. Mark had introduced the approach of Jesus' kinsfolk before the Beelzebul controversy: they were coming to fetch him because they thought he had gone mad. They were as opposed to Jesus as were the Pharisees. Matthew omits this earlier part. The family members approach Jesus after the Beelzebul section. They merely wanted to speak to him. Thus Jesus' statement about his new family loses its polemical thrust. The contrast between the two families is toned down in a manner consistent with Mary's positive role in the birth narrative.

The Parable Discourse

Following Mark's story line, Matthew reaches Mark's parables chapter (Mark 4:1-34). Matthew uses this material as the basis for his third major discourse, which concludes with his standard formula (Matt. 13:53). As before, Matthew adapts his Marcan materials to suit his editorial purposes. The sower and its allegorical interpretation remain almost intact, apart from stylistic alterations (13:1-9, 18-23), but the difficult intervening section about the purpose of parables is significantly modified and expanded (see below). A Q saying on the blessedness of the eyewitnesses is also inserted between the parable and its allegorical interpretation. Mark's unit on the right use of parables (Mark 4:21-25) is reduced to a single verse, since the omitted material occurs elsewhere in Matthew (Matt. 5:15; 7:2; 10:26). These omissions are curious, for Matthew is not generally averse to repeating himself, as we have seen in the case of the saying on divorce (5:31-32; 19:9). For Mark's parable of the seed growing secretly (Mark 4:26-29), Matthew substitutes the parable of the wheat and the tares (from M), to which he will later give an allegorical interpretation composed by himself (Matt. 13:36-43). He then inserts between this parable and its interpretation two further parables, namely, the mustard seed (Matt. 13:31-32 from Mark 4:30-32) and the leaven from Q (Matt. 13:33; = Luke 13:20-21), followed by Mark's concluding summary to his parable collection (Matt. 13:34; = Mark 4:33-34). At this point he inserts a fulfillment citation from Ps. 78:2 (Matt. 13:35). He then concludes the parable discourse with three further parables, the twin parables of the hidden treasure and the pearl of great price, plus the dragnet, all of them from M. Then he adds a final parabolic saying about a householder who brings out of his treasure things new and old. This provides an interesting clue to Matthew's understanding of what he was doing throughout his Gospel (see below).

In his two previous chapters, Matthew has been tracing the growing hostility of the people (representing the synagogue of Matthew's day) and the gradual emergence of the disciples as a distinct entity, foreshadowing Matthew's own church. The changes Matthew has made to his Marcan source serve these same themes.

The parables reveal the mysteries (so v. 11 in place of Mark's singular "mystery"). Mark meant by it the mystery of Jesus' messiahship. For Matthew as for Luke (Luke 8:10) what is at stake in the parables is not the messiahship of Jesus, which with the infancy narratives is known from the start, but the revealed truths about God's purpose in salvation history. For Matthew these are judgment for Israel now, salvation for the Gentiles now, and judgment of the lawless members of the church at the End. These mysteries are set out in the parable discourse. The lawless within the church are the false prophets, i.e., those condemned in the allegorical interpretation to the parable of the wheat and tares. There were doubtless people in Matthew's community who were opposed to the mission to the Gentiles and people who wanted to oust from the church those Gentiles who wanted to abandon the Torah altogether, even in its Christian interpretation. The answer is "Let both [the Jewish and Gentile Christians] grow together until harvest time" (i.e., the final judgment, Matt. 13:30). Meanwhile, Matthew's church is to remain a mixed body of wheat (those who live up to the better righteousness) and tares (those who fall short).

In this chapter, the Evangelist is acting as a scribe trained for God's Reign (v. 52) who brings out of his cupboard things new (the Matthean redaction) and old (the Jesus parables as told by himself and as preserved in the tradition).

Finally, we should note how differently Matthew portrays the disciples compared with Mark. In Mark, they constantly misunderstood Jesus (see esp. Mark 8:21), whereas in Matthew they understand all the parables without difficulty (see Matt. 13:51!). Similarly, Matthew expects his church will be able to comprehend God's purposes in salvation history once they have been explained to them, whereas it is the synagogue that will be blinded (→ Parables).

13:53–16:20

Israel's Unbelief and the Disciples' Incipient Faith

This section is based on Mark 6:1–8:30, which already had overtones of the theme Matthew develops, namely, the welding of the disciples into a community (cf. the feeding of the multitude and the dismissal of the crowd, the separation of the disciples and period of foreign travel culminating in the confession of Peter at Caesarea Philippi). However, this last episode is not so decisive for Matthew, for the disciples have already recognized Jesus as the Son of God in Matt. 14:33, while his death and resurrection had already been foretold in the Jonah saying in 12:40.

In following Mark's story line, Matthew skips from the end of the parable chapter (Mark 4:34) to the rejection at Nazareth (Mark 6:1). This is because the intervening miracles had already been used in chaps. 8–9.

13:53–58, Rejection at Nazareth. Here Matthew makes four notable changes in Mark's account. First, he speaks of "their" (Mark: "the") synagogue, indicating the recent separation of synagogue and church. Second, whereas in Mark the people call Jesus "the carpenter, the son of Mary," Matthew has them ask, "Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother said to be Mary?" (13:55). These changes are surprising since Mark's version would seem to be more consistent with the virginal conception, which Matthew and Luke feature but not Mark. We should recall, however, that Joseph's adoption of Jesus was important to Matthew (it made Jesus a son of David), an idea that was not inconsistent with the virginal conception since in the social world of Judaism adoption was understood quite realistically and with it went the acquisition of ancestors. The third change from Mark is that Matthew omits the reference to Jesus' relatives from the list of those who joined in rejecting him. This again is consistent with the earlier portrayal of Jesus' earthly family (see commentary above on 12:46–50). Matthew is concerned to reduce the hostility of Jesus' family toward him to an attitude of neutrality (Luke makes it positively favorable). The fourth change is that whereas Mark states that Jesus could do no miracle in Nazareth, Matthew simply notes that he "did" no miracle there. Matthew wants to heighten his portrait of Jesus: it was his free choice as the divine agent to do no miracles there.

Finally, it should be noted that by placing this episode immediately after the parables, with their judgment on Jesus' opponents, the impact of the rejection at Nazareth is strengthened.

14:1–2, Herod's Opinion of Jesus. This unit continues the theme of Jesus' rejection and prepares the way for the disciples' confession of him as Messiah and Son of God. Matthew drops Mark's allusion to what others are saying, and concentrates on Herod's assertion that Jesus must be the Baptist raised from the dead.

14:3–12, Herod Executes John. An abbreviated version of the Baptist's execution foreshadows the culmination of Jesus' rejection in his crucifixion.

14:13–21, First Feeding. In Mark (6:30–31) this feeding took place during the disciples' postmission retreat. Matthew places it immediately after the account of the Baptist's death: it was because Jesus heard of that that he went into retreat. Matthew has Jesus perform healings at this point. Further, he stresses the role of the disciples in distributing the provisions to the crowds (Matt. 14:19)—their function has a dignity of its own. The Evangelist also conforms the account of the blessing of the loaves to the institution narrative in the Last Supper. The loaf miracle foreshadows the church's Eucharist.

14:22-33, Walking on the Water. In Mark (6:45-52) the story of the walking (of Jesus) on the water was presented as a misunderstood epiphany. Matthew changes it by inserting a Petrine scene (14:28-32) between Jesus' self-manifestation (14:27) and the conclusion (14:33). This is the first of three such scenes involving Peter (cf. 16:17-19; 17:24-27). When Jesus says, "It is I. Have no fear!" Peter calls out from the boat, "If it's you, Lord, command me to come to you upon the waters" (14:28). Jesus thereupon invites him to come. Peter sets out but loses confidence and starts sinking, crying out, "O Lord, rescue me" (v. 30). Jesus stretches out his hand, grasps him, and reproaches him for his puny faith and for giving way to doubt. Jesus and Peter get into the boat. Instead of reacting, as in Mark, with incomprehension, the whole crew confesses Jesus as Son of God. There is a partial parallel to this scene in John 21:7-8, which suggests that it is pre-Matthew tradition and in origin a postresurrectional appearance. Peter's doubt and the disciples' confession of faith in Jesus as Son of God would fit in with an Easter setting.

As before (see commentary above on 8:23-27) the boat symbolizes Matthew's church. Here the disciples represent the church's leadership. They have been demoralized by the recent events in the community (expulsion from the synagogue; influx of Gentiles, the intrusion of false prophets). But the risen Lord is stretching out his hand to restore their morale.

14:34-36, Transition. As a transition to the discourse on purity, Matthew inserts a generalizing summary of Jesus' healings (14:34-36), an abbreviated version of Mark 6:53-56.

15:1-20, Discourse on Purity. Matthew takes up the next unit in Mark, abbreviates, rearranges, rewords it, and adds fresh material. Whereas Mark was writing for a gentile community, Matthew was writing for a community that was primarily Jewish. Consequently, he drops Mark's explanation of the purity regulations as unnecessary for his community. The clue to Matthew's other changes lies in his omission of Mark's comment "pronouncing all foods pure" (Mark 7:19). Matthew boggles at the abandonment of the kosher laws and, by adding "mouth" in 15:11 and 17, restricts the scope of Jesus' attack on the tradition of purity laws to contaminated foods. Also, by reversing the order of the discussions of hand-washing and corban (offerings dedicated to God), the Evangelist makes the gravamen of Jesus' charge against the Pharisees and scribes their neglect of the love command. Matthew further inserts a vehement attack on Jesus' opponents (vv. 12-14), who of course represent the synagogue leaders of his own day. They are blind guides who have forfeited their teaching authority. His advice is, "Ignore them!" (v. 14).

15:21-28, The Canaanite Woman. The next episode in the Marcan source is the Syro-phenician woman. Again, Matthew introduces a number of changes. The woman is now a Canaanite. The actual healing of the woman's daughter is reduced to a brief statement of the fact (v. 28c; cf. Mark 7:30). Thus, the emphasis is thrown upon Jesus' dialogues. First, there is a new preliminary dialogue between Jesus and his disciples (Matt. 15:23-24). Jesus is made to represent the earlier, strict Jewish Christian point of view that the mission was confined to the (lost) sheep of the house of Israel. Matthew assures his Jewish Christians that the difference between Jew and Gentile must be taken very seriously. (Matthew is no starry-eyed dreamer who thinks that human differences do not matter.) It is only the redeeming work of Christ and the human response of faith that can overcome that barrier. But the barrier can be overcome. That is something Matthew's Jewish Christians must now realize.

15:29-31, Summary of Healings. Matthew replaces Mark's healing of the deaf mute (Mark 7:31-37) with a generalized summary of healings. These healings take place in gentile territory. They are thus intended as a bridge between the story of the Canaanite woman and the feeding of the four thousand (15:32-39), which already in Mark was probably intended to symbolize the church's ministry to Gentiles. Note that Jesus goes up to the (sic; not "a") mountain and that he sits there. This recalls the opening of the Sermon on the Mount and the fact that Matthew intends to portray Jesus as the new Moses. Thus, he is assuring his Jewish Christians that the mission to the Gentiles has the backing of the new Moses. Also, each feeding is preceded by multiple healings (14:14).

15:32-39, Second Feeding. As in the first feeding, Matthew makes a number of minor changes from his Marcan source. These changes emphasize the role of the disciples and recall the institution of the Eucharist. This is the Eucharist for the Gentiles as the first feeding was for the Jewish Christians. Did Matthew envisage a separate Eucharist for his gentile members, such as happened at Antioch after the fracas in Paul's time (Gal. 2:11-14)? Or does the Evangelist intend to say that the Gentiles have now been admitted to the one Eucharist? Maybe the latter, for he assimilates the two feedings. The Eucharist, which had previously been confined to Jewish Christians, is now opened up to gentile converts.

16:1-4, The Demand for a Sign. In the Marcan parallel (Mark 8:12) the refusal of the sign was absolute. Here an exception is made, namely, the sign of Jonah. A cross reference to Matt. 12:38-40 is clearly intended. There we saw that the sign of Jonah was his being swallowed and regurgitated by the great fish, a type of the death and resurrection of Jesus. Matthew is continuing his anti-Pharisaic polemic. This evil generation (unbelieving Israel) had ignored that sign, and judgment had fallen upon it in the fall of Jerusalem.

16:5-12, The Leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees. For this minidiscourse Matthew again follows Mark. But once more he has made a number of changes. For Mark's "Herod" (Mark 8:15) he substitutes "Sadducees" (cf. Matt. 16:1). This is a little surprising since Matthew was writing at a time when the Sadducees had disappeared after the Jewish war of A.D. 66-70 and were no longer a threat to Matthew's church. Maybe he sees the synagogue of his day as the heirs of all the traditions of Judaism, including that of the Temple, and it is meant as a general denunciation of the synagogue authorities of his day. The treatment of the disciples in this episode differs noticeably from that of the Marcan source. In Mark (8:17-21), the disciples fail completely to comprehend and are hardened in heart. Matthew omits most of the reproach of the disciples, leaving only the words "do you not yet understand?" and showing that they will eventually do so. Once again the real problem is the disciples' puny faith (Matthew inserts the words "O you of little faith" in 16:8). The whole passage is enigmatic, and Matthew does not seem to have made it much clearer. What have the two feedings to do with the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees? What teaching has Matthew in mind? Perhaps he is thinking of that exclusiveness that would deny the possibility of Jews and Gentiles sitting down at the one table, a possibility that many of Matthew's own Jewish Christians were reluctant to admit. Note that Matthew adds to Mark the assertion that the disciples did, in fact, come to understand what Jesus meant (v. 12).

16:13-20, Peter's Confession. Matthew omits the healing of the blind man at Bethesda (Mark 8:22-26). Our Evangelist has seen that for Mark this story symbolized the disciples' blindness—and Matthew's disciples are not blind, they are only deficient in faith. So Matthew passes straight from his notice about the disciples' understanding to the confession of Peter. This confession is thus seen in a highly positive light. The disciples are well on their way to understanding Jesus. The changes Matthew has made to Mark 8:27-30 are in accord with this.

The first change is to replace "me" in Jesus' opening question with "Son of man" (→ Son of man). If Son of man were a messianic title, this would make no sense. Jesus would simply be answering his own question! If, however, we understand Son of man as a self-effacing definition of Jesus' call, mission, and destiny, it does make sense. Jesus is saying to the disciples, "Given what you know about me, what you know of my calling, my activity, and the course of my ministry thus far, what is your understanding of my identity?"

We come now to the second Petrine insertion (16:16b-19). It reads: "... Son of the living God. In response, Jesus said to him, 'You are blessed, Simon son of Jonah, for flesh and blood did not reveal it to you but my Father, the One in the heavens. And I tell you, you are Peter (Rock), and on this Rock I will build my end-time community, and the gates of Hades will not overpower it. I will give you the keys of the Reign of the heavens, and whatever you bind on earth God will bind in the heavens, and whatever you loose on earth God will loose in the heavens.'" This passage seems to draw on traditions similar to the earlier Petrine assertion in 14:28-30. Both contain echoes of the resurrection appearance to Peter (cf. 1 Cor. 15:5; Luke 24:34; John 21:15-19). The Beatitude to Peter as the recipient of a revelation also suggests a postresurrectional encounter. It was the appearance to Peter, the first of the series, that constituted him in person as the Rock on which the church was built. Peter took the all-important step of reassembling the Twelve and thereby founding the church. "Church" means the end-time people of God, a meaning underlined by the promise that the power of death cannot overcome it. Peter too was given the power of the keys (cf. Isa. 22:15-22), the authority to bind and loose, to admit or exclude people from the community, to grant or withhold baptism.

Matthew has relocated this tradition in the earthly life of Jesus and, in doing so, transformed its meaning. The binding and loosing now refer to the authority to expound the better righteousness. (On the authority of church leadership in Matthew's community, see the Short Essay "The Church in Matthew.")

Peter's confession is not the turning point of Matthew's Gospel as it was for Mark. The disciples have already confessed Jesus as Son of God in Matt. 14:33. In Mark, Peter's confession was ignored by Jesus, who after charging him with strict silence went at once to reveal his intent to go up to Jerusalem and face death and subsequent resurrection. Matthew separates the ensuing prediction of the Passion by the words "From then." This marks not only the division between two units but also the end of the major section of his work and the beginning of a new one.

PART FOUR: 16:21-20:34

The Journey to Jerusalem

In this part, Matthew follows Mark's story line very closely, except that he makes a major division at 16:21 with the opening words "From then." Matthew is concerned with the disciples overcoming their puny faith, while Mark was concerned with their failure to understand. In fact, Matthew has his eye on the situation in his own community during the 90s of the first century. He also seeks to consolidate his community into a well-organized church, with its own standards of discipline. This concern is especially prominent in the "community discourse" of chap. 18, which is the major feature of Part Four.

First Passion Prediction

In Mark, the first passion prediction (Mark 8:31) was closely tied to Peter's confession and stood in sharp contrast to it: at one moment Peter confesses Jesus as Messiah, and in the next moment he deprecates Jesus' insistence that as Messiah he must suffer as the Son of man. Instead of rebuking Jesus, Peter in Matthew says, "May God in his mercy spare you this fate" (v. 22), a much milder reaction. Yet Matthew surprisingly enhances Jesus' retort: "You are a stumbling block to me" (v. 23). As will become clear later in this section, it is not that Peter misunderstands, as in Mark, but that his faith is meager: it is Peter's puny faith that is the stumbling block.

The Cost of Discipleship

This teaching is addressed exclusively to the disciples, not to the crowd as well (as in Mark). In Matthew, the crowd represents the synagogue across the street, and this teaching is aimed exclusively at Matthew's church. Matthew omits Mark's words "and the gospel's" from the phrase "for my sake" and drops the saying about fearless confession (Mark 8:38), thus concentrating on the theme of the last judgment when each (disciple) will be rewarded according to his or her praxis of the better righteousness (Matt. 16:27) at the coming of the Son of man. Matthew is writing for a settled community, rather than for a group of wandering charismatic preachers, which Mark still envisages. Finally, Matthew changes Mark's predication of the "coming of the kingdom in power" to a promise of the Parousia or Second Coming: "Amen, I say to you, there are some of those standing here who shall not taste of death until they see the Son of man coming in his kingly rule" (v. 28). Since Matthew was writing at a time (around A.D. 90) when most, if not all, the original disciples would have died already and before the Parousia, we must suppose that "some" refers either to the one or two who are still surviving or, more likely, to the church of Matthew's own day. Matthew believes that the Second Coming will occur within the lifetime of a few of his generation: it has been postponed, but not indefinitely. And Jesus, the Son of man, will return not as their advocate (so Mark), but as the judge of their moral behavior. This fits in with Matthew's teaching in the parables of the tares (see above), the ten maidens, the talents, and the sheep and goats (see below).

The Transfiguration

As we have seen, Matthew is concerned to portray Jesus as a Moses-like figure. This motif is enhanced by the changes he makes to Mark's version of this unit (Mark 9:2-8). In Matt. 17:2 he calls attention to the face of Jesus: it shone like the sun (cf. Moses, Exod. 34:29-30—though the sun is not mentioned there). Matthew has used this motif from Matt. 13:43 where it describes the transfiguration of the righteous at the end. In Mark, Moses tags along with Elijah (Mark 9:4), whereas in Matthew he appears first. Later on, after the voice from heaven, Matthew adds two verses (17:6-7) describing the disciples' reaction of fear. Seeing them, Jesus approached them, touched them, and commanded them to arise and not be afraid. This latter verse is strikingly reminiscent of the resurrection appearances and suggests that the transfiguration points forward to the resurrection as well as to the Second Coming. Thus, the scene reinforces the lessons of the preceding unit about discipleship: Matthew's church is to stand under the sovereignty of the risen Lord who is the second Moses and lawgiver to his church and who will come at the end to judge that church according to its praxis of the new or better righteousness (→ Transfiguration, The).

Dialogue During the Descent

Most of Matthew's changes from Mark are made to improve the organization of the passage, but there is one significant change. In Mark, the disciples' reaction to the teaching about Elijah/John the Baptist is unnoticed, thus creating the impression that they failed to understand, whereas Matthew adds a verse to show that the disciples did indeed understand that Jesus was referring to John the Baptist (cf. 11:14). Their problem is not misunderstanding and perplexity, but insufficient faith.

17:14–21

The Epileptic Boy

As before (see chaps. 8–9), Matthew abbreviates this miracle story but expands the element of teaching. This he does in v. 20, which develops Matthew's favorite theme of faith: "He said to them, 'It was because of your inadequate faith [that you could not heal him].'" On the one hand, Matthew drops the poignant dialogue between Jesus and the boy's father in which the father struggles to overcome his unbelief; on the other hand, Matthew shifts the focus to the disciples' meagerness of faith and adds the saying about faith moving mountains, which occurs in Mark and Q and which Matthew typically conflates (v. 20; 21:21 = Mark 11:22–23; Luke 17:6 Q).

Second Passion Prediction

Matthew's changes in the actual prediction (cf. Mark 9:31) are minimal and merely stylistic. But the reaction of the disciples is altered significantly. In Mark, we are told that they failed to understand the utterance and were afraid to ask him (what it meant). In Matthew, however, they were "greatly distressed." They understood only too well: their problem once more was lack of faith.

The Temple Tax

This unit is peculiar to Matthew. Indeed, the style and phraseology suggest that Matthew has composed the whole unit himself. However, there are signs that he has used earlier tradition. The issue (payment of the Temple tax) could only have arisen prior to A.D. 70, for after the destruction of the Temple, the tax was diverted to the imperial treasury. Also the incident presupposes that the Christian Jews are still part of the Jewish community. The command to Peter to go fishing also recalls the tradition enshrined in Luke 5:1–11 and John 21:1–14. Matthew has inserted this unit in a context provided by Mark 9:33 (Capernaum, the house). Here Jesus, ostensibly traveling from Caesarea Philippi to Jerusalem, turns up again in Capernaum. (Jesus' itinerary is a problem for the study of Mark rather than for Matthew: Matthew is simply following his source.) We can see two reasons why Matthew should have put the episode here. First, the tax theme was already associated with Capernaum (see Matt. 9:1, 9–13 and cf. 4:13). Second, it forms a transition to the ensuing community discourse (chap. 18) since it is a rule for the life of the community. The story has a three-fold structure: first, the setting—Peter and the tax collectors; second, Jesus' pronouncement; third, the fish/coin miracle (if, indeed, it is meant to be a miracle; we are not told that it actually happened).

The point of the story lies in the pronouncement. Roman citizens were exempt from taxation; taxes were paid only by the subject peoples. The disciples are citizens of the kingdom of God and therefore (in principle) free from taxation. But to avoid scandal (cf. Paul's teaching in 1 Cor. 8 and Rom. 14) they should voluntarily comply. They should not flaunt their freedom: to pay the tax does not involve any sacrifice of principle.

18:1–35

The Community Discourse

This is the fourth of Matthew's major discourses, as indicated by the use of the concluding formula (19:1). Like the other Matthean discourses, it is compiled from three sources, namely, Mark, Q, and M. As usual, the context is provided by Mark, who in 9:33–37 records the disciples' dispute about who was the greatest among them. This provides Matthew with the opening of the discourse (Matt. 18:1–5). Matthew then combines this saying with the other Marcan saying about little children (Matt. 18:3–4; = Mark 10:15). Matthew then picks up the warning against "scandals" (offenses) from Mark 9:42–48 and reproduces it in Matt. 18:6–9. He next introduces the Q parable of the lost sheep (Matt. 18:10–14; = Luke 15:3–7), followed with the unit on reproving fellow church members (Matt. 18:15–18), the opening saying of which is from Q (Matt. 18:15; Luke 17:3). The rest of the unit (Matt. 18:16–18) is an elaboration of the first saying, perhaps from M (note in v. 17 the word "church"—Gk. ekklesia—also found in the M addition to Peter's confession; see commentary above on 16:17–19). The saying about binding and loosing (18:18), which in 16:19 is applied to Peter alone, is addressed here to the disciples at large ("bind and loose" are here plurals). See also the introduction (18:1) of the discourse, which shows that it is addressed to "the disciples." Next comes the promise of Christ's presence (18:19–20) from M. The saying about reconciliation from Q (18:21–22 = Luke 17:4) serves as the introduction of the concluding parable of the unmerciful servant, which is from M and does not altogether suit the context in which Matthew has placed it, namely, of repeated forgiveness.

Some have questioned the appropriateness of the title, "Community Discourse" (alternative designations are "Community Rule" or "Church Order") on the ground that, strictly speaking, only 18:15–17 deal with church discipline and that other topics normally found in church orders are missing, such as the appointment and duties of church officers. But since most of it concerns relationships within the community, "Community Discourse" seems a fairly neutral title that does not claim too much.

In our detailed comment we shall confine ourselves to the parables and to selected sayings in the discourse (see also the Short Essay "The Church in Matthew").

18:10–14, The Parable of the Lost Sheep.

Luke places this parable in quite a different context than Matthew, using it to justify Jesus' conduct in eating with the outcasts, which is probably the context in which Jesus first told it. Matthew ties it in with church discipline. The lost sheep represents erring fellow Christians. When such a one goes astray (apostatizes), the community must expend every effort to get that person back into the fold. This places a limit on the exercise of church discipline, which is dealt with in the next unit and which, as we shall see, stands in tension with the parable.

18:15–18, Church Discipline. The original Q saying (Matt. 18:15; = Luke 17:3) simply enjoined the forgiveness of an erring church member. We may suppose that Matthew is not responsible for its expansion (18:16–18) but that this had already taken place in the pre-Gospel tradition. It sets up a three-stage process for dealing with refractory members, leading, if the person remains obdurate, to final excommunication.

This drastic outcome seems inconsistent with the point made by the preceding parable of the lost sheep (18:10–14). Is the excommunicated person to be finally given up for lost? Perhaps Matthew intends the parable to modify this ruling, which he found in his strict Jewish Christian source. When persons have been finally excommunicated, the community must spare no effort to win them back.

In its earlier context in 16:19, the saying about binding and loosing referred to doctrinal decisions (see above). Here (18:18) it refers to decisions on matters of church discipline.

Matt. 18:19 is an assurance that God will answer prayer. Such assurances occur frequently in the Jesus tradition, especially in John. This assurance is, therefore, probably authentic in its basic content. It is placed here because church discipline must be exercised in the context of prayer. The promise of Christ's presence, in v. 20, is one of those Jesus sayings that, beyond all doubt, originated in post-Easter Christian prophecy. It is closely akin to the promise of the abiding presence of the risen One in Matt. 28:20, and both sayings are the fulfillment of the Immanuel quotation from Isa. 7:14 in the birth narrative (Matt. 1:23). The saying here closely parallels a rabbinic saying about the Torah: "If two or three sit together and the words of the Law [are spoken] between them, the Divine Presence [Shekinah] rests between them" (m. 'Abot 3:2). How do the disciples gather "in the name of Jesus"? The rabbinic saying helps us to interpret it. The rabbis gathered to study the Torah; Matthew intends his Christians to gather to study the Torah as fulfilled by Jesus. Again, Matthew has his eye on the synagogue "across the street." They think they have the Shekinah—God's presence. Matthew assures his community that it is the risen Christ who is Immanuel, God present with the community. This promise is placed in the context of church discipline. Church discipline must be administered with the prayerful study of Jesus' teaching—as given in the discourses of Matthew's Gospel. In such a context, the decisions of the community will be legally binding.

The saying about forgiveness (Matt. 18:21–22; = Luke 17:4) is accentuated: the offended Christian must forgive the fellow believer seventy-times-seven times, i.e., with no limit. Matthew uses the saying to introduce the parable of the unforgiving servant (not very appropriately, for the point of the parable is rather different: those for whom God has forgiven so much must forgive the relatively minor offense of the erring fellow Christian). In the parable itself, the figures are exaggerated (in a manner typical of Jesus) to the point of absurdity. The exact value of ten thousand talents is uncertain, for it is always difficult to assess the value of ancient coinage. However, it gives us some idea of the amount involved to note that the revenue of Herod's kingdom came to nine hundred talents per annum. The amount owed the unforgiving servant was paltry by comparison—one hundred denarii.

Matthew intends this to be a parable of the Last Judgment—as shown by the chief character, the king, i.e., God (cf. 25:34). Forgiveness for Matthew is the quintessential expression of love (6:14–15). Love must temper even the exercise of power and discipline in the community. In the last analysis, Matthew's community lives not under the law—not even under the Torah as reinterpreted by Jesus—but because of the forgiving grace of God that becomes actual only through the cross (26:28).

The Church in Matthew

Matthew's Gospel has often been called the "ecclesiastical Gospel," for a number of reasons. Matthew is the only Gospel in which the word "church" (Gk. ekklesia) occurs, once in the story of Peter's confession (16:18) and twice in the Community Discourse (18:17). Critical opinion holds that the term "church" did not figure in the teaching of the pre-Easter Jesus: the burden of his message was the coming Reign of God. But since “church” means the end-time people of God, the coming of the church was implicit in his message. After Easter the earliest community very soon (see Acts 5:11; Gal. 1:13, 22) came to understand itself to be the “church of God.” Matthew or M has retrojected the word into the pre-Easter tradition.

This concern for the church is exhibited throughout Matthew. The Evangelist’s understanding of the church as the true Israel is expressed in many ways: through the fulfillment citations, the treatment of Jesus as a Moses-like figure, the reinterpretation of the Torah in the Sermon on the Mount, the five major discourses corresponding to the Pentateuch, and in Jesus’ extrication of the disciples from the earlier Israel and his consolidation of them into a body, which takes place from 13:54 through 19:1. But this foundation of the church is only anticipatory. Its actual foundation is not accomplished until the death and resurrection of the Messiah, when the church’s mission is finally launched (28:16–20).

With all this concern for the church, Matthew shows remarkably little interest in its organization under a formal ministry. Although Peter is commissioned in chap. 16 to exercise authority to bind and loose, this authority is extended to “the disciples,” i.e., to the whole community, in chap. 18. Peter, however, has certain unique functions that do not devolve on the disciples in chap. 18: he is the prime recipient of divine revelation (16:17, originally in the postresurrectional appearance to him, see above) and as such is the Rock on which the church is to be built (through Jesus’ death and resurrection). These unique features are inalienable because they belong to the once-for-all events of salvation history connected with the foundation of the church. No one succeeds Peter in his church-founding functions, whereas the pastoral functions that continue in the church are apparently invested in the community as a whole. If Matthew’s Gospel emanated from Antioch (→ Antioch), as is widely supposed, this is all the more surprising since a generation later, by the time of Ignatius (ca. A.D. 110), Antioch had a well-organized leadership consisting of a single bishop presiding over a committee of presbyters and assisted by deacons. One would also suppose that Matthew’s church, with its strong Jewish roots, already had a presbyterial organization like that of the synagogue from which it sprang (→ Presbyter, Presbytery). One must suppose that if this was so, then Matthew was anxious to portray the presbyters of his community as possessing no inherent authority of their own, but as simply the instruments through which the church exercised the authority that had devolved upon it from the apostles.

Matthew is opposed to any personal claims to authority made by whatever office bearers there may have been in his community: disciplinary decisions have to be made not autocratically but with corporate prayer and study of the teaching of Jesus (chap. 18). Office bearers must not arrogate to themselves personal honors, titles, or privileges, like the scribes and Pharisees (23:8–9): “You are not to be addressed as ‘rabbi’ for there is one who is your teacher, and you are all brothers and sisters. And do not call anyone your father on earth; for you have one father—the one in heaven.” It is hard to suppose that there was no office of teacher (Gk. didaskalos, 23:8, or kathēgētēs, 23:10) in Matthew’s community. What mattered was to distinguish between the person and the office. The office was performed by representatives of the whole community whose task was to point away from themselves to God, the only true teacher and father.

The Journey to Jerusalem

Having founded the church (in anticipation), Jesus continues his journey to Judea. He had supposedly set out for there after Peter’s confession—see the “from then” in 16:21—but had stopped off at Capernaum en route.

19:1–2, Departure from Judea. Matthew notes that the crowds “followed” Jesus. The crowds are an elastic conception in Matthew. Sometimes they represent the adherents of the synagogue in Matthew’s day: here they are the converts to discipleship, at least potentially. Matthew alters Mark’s statement that Jesus “taught” them to Jesus “healed” them. The gift of salvation must precede teaching on the Christian way.

19:3–15, On Divorce, Celibacy, and Children. Matthew is following Mark 10:2–12, but with some noteworthy changes. First, as earlier in the discourse on purity (15:1–23), he rearranges the dialogue, placing 19:7–8 after the reference to the original law of creation (contrary to Mark 10:4–5). The effect of this change is to set up an antithesis between Jesus’ teaching and that of Moses, like the antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount. Second, Matthew inserts here, as in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:32), the exceptive clause. He had already prepared the way for this in 19:3. There he changed the Pharisees’ question into one with hostile intent and added to it the words “for any reason whatever.” This was a matter of dispute among the Pharisees.

Finally, Matthew adds the little dialogue between the disciples and Jesus on the subject of celibacy. Celibacy is permissible for the sake of the Reign of God. This is not the ascetical celibacy of later monasticism, but a renunciation of marriage to devote oneself to the life of a wandering charismatic preacher of the coming End. Thus, eschatological celibacy is comparable to the "military celibacy" at Qumran, which envisaged a time when marriage would be renounced to engage in the final battle between the children of light and the children of darkness. We may reasonably presume that Jesus (and later Paul) practiced eschatological celibacy. For Matthew, such celibacy may be a "higher standard" (see below, next unit). As in Mark, the marriage unit is followed by the blessing of the children (vv. 13-15).

19:16-30, The Rich Young Man. Matthew had difficulty with Mark's opening of this story. This can be seen from a comparison of the two versions:

MARK	MATTHEW
"Good teacher, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?"	"Teacher, what good shall I do to possess eternal life?"
Jesus said: "Why do you call me good? No one is good, but God alone."	But he said to him, "Why do you ask me concerning the good? One is the good."

Matthew shows here the same Christological sensitivity as he showed in the baptism story (see commentary above on 3:14-15). Jesus must not be allowed to appear to deny his own goodness. Nor must he be allowed to draw too sharp a line between himself and God. In enumerating the commandments, Matthew drops "do not defraud" (Mark 10:19), which was not part of the original Decalogue. But he does add the summary of the law "you shall love the neighbor as yourself" from Lev. 19:18. Matthew is probably following the same early Christian catechism followed by Paul in Rom. 13:9, where the command to love one's neighbor similarly sums up the second table of the Decalogue. For Matthew, the love command is the quintessence of the fulfilled Torah.

Another important change is made by Matthew in 19:21:

MARK	MATTHEW
"You are lacking one thing, go, sell all you have . . ."	"If you want to be perfect go, sell all your property . . ."

This alters the whole meaning. In Mark (as for Jesus), selling all one had and giving to the poor was simply a preliminary for the life of a wandering charismatic. For Matthew, in his settled community, voluntary poverty was a higher form of life. "Perfect" is used in a somewhat different sense from Matt. 5:48. It is a higher standard of Christian life. Commentators usually shrink from this obvious interpretation, but it seems undeniable that we have here the beginning of the double standard as it was developed later in monasticism (see the Short Essay "The Sermon on the Mount Today"). This interpretation is strengthened by its closeness to the previous unit with its teaching on celibacy. The double standard was an adjustment necessitated by the change in the church's social setting. It was the only way to preserve Jesus' requirement of the renunciation of wealth in a totally new situation.

Matthew follows Mark in appending to the story of the rich young man a dialogue between Jesus and the disciples on the danger of riches and the rewards of discipleship (Matt. 19:23-30). He stays close to Mark's wording, though with some abbreviation and stylistic improvement, until v. 28, where he inserts a new saying either from Q (cf. Luke 22:28-30) or from M. Probably Luke's form is more original and is basically an authentic Jesus saying spoken where Luke puts it, at the Last Supper. In Matthew, it is developed in accord with his interest in the picture of the Parousia: Christ will return as the Danielic Son of man and preside over the last judgment (cf. Matt. 13:36-43; 25:31-46), seated on his glorious throne (Dan. 7:9-14). "Regeneration" (Gk. palingenesis; → Regeneration) occurs only here in Matthew. It refers to the renewal of the world, the new heaven and earth of the end time. It is equivalent to Matthew's favorite phrase, "the consummation of the aeon" (e.g., 13:39). Since Matthew dropped "twelve" before "thrones," it would seem that he is not thinking of the Twelve but (as in chap. 18) of the whole church. The entire body of the faithful will share with the returning Son of man his function (cf. 1 Cor. 6:2-3) of judging the whole world, including Torah-Israel (the twelve tribes).

20:1-16, The Laborers in the Vineyard. At this point, Matthew inserts into Mark's outline a parable peculiar to his tradition (M). It serves to illustrate 19:30, "Many who are first shall be last, and the last first." This verse is repeated at the end of the parable (20:16) and ties in with the mention of the "first" and "last" in the body of the parable (20:8). Despite its single attestation, this is probably an authentic parable of Jesus, as is shown by the presence of a good deal of local color and by the surprise ending. In his historical situation, Jesus used the parable to interpret his conduct in eating with the outcast; for Matthew's church it would have answered Jewish Christian discomfort with the new mission to the Gentiles.

20:17-34, The Journey to Jerusalem Concluded. Matthew follows Mark fairly closely in the rest of chap. 20. The third passion predication (20:17-19) has an abbreviated introduction (no fear or amazement of the disciples), while the question of the sons of Zebedee (vv. 20-28) is transferred to their mother. Both changes fit in with Matthew's more favorable view of the disciples compared with Mark's. Mark's healing of blind Bartimaeus becomes the healing of two anonymous blind men. Matthew has a predication for blind healings in pairs (cf. 9:27-31). The reason for this is not clear. Possibly Matthew wishes to enhance the miraculous element. Possibly he wants to underline the truth of their confession (two witnesses!) of Jesus as the Son of David, one of his favorite Christological themes.

PART FIVE: 21:1-25:46

The Ministry in Jerusalem

Matthew follows Mark in portraying the Jerusalem ministry as Jesus' final confrontation with Torah-Israel and its final judgment. The Evangelist enhances both themes in the light of the fact that this rejection has in his own day reached a new climax with the expulsion of the Christian Jews from the synagogue.

21:1-11

The Entry into Jerusalem

Among the many changes Matthew has made to his Marcan source, three are particularly noteworthy. First, instead of an ass only, Matthew has Jesus ride on a she-ass with her colt. This is to square with the second change, the fulfillment citation in vv. 4-6 (see the Short Essay "Matthew's Fulfillment Citations"). The citation (a combination of Isa. 62:11 and Zech. 9:9) speaks of "the meek king" who comes "riding an ass and a colt, the progeny of a beast of burden." Grammatically, this is what is known as a "hendiadys," a figure of speech in which two nouns are joined with "and" represent a single noun and its modifier. The whole phrase simply means a pack donkey. Matthew, however, has chosen to take the text literally, so keen is he on the fulfillment of detail. The citation sets the keynote of Matthew's presentation of the Passion: Jesus suffers as the meek and humble king (see the Short Essay "The Passion According to Matthew"). Third, the final change occurs in the crowd's acclamation:

Hosanna to the Son of David,
Blessed is the One who comes in Yahweh's name;
Hosanna in the heights of heaven.

Matthew has doubtless conformed the acclamation to the liturgical use of his community.

21:12-17

Cleansing of the Temple

In Mark, Jesus concludes his entry by looking around the Temple, withdrawing to Bethany for the night, and returning for the cleansing the next morning. Matthew (like Luke) wants the cleansing to be the goal and climax of the entry. Matthew omits Jesus' declaration that the Temple was to be "for all nations." The Temple had been destroyed by the time Matthew's church launched its mission to the Gentiles, so the prophecy was out of date by then.

21:18-22

Cursing of the Fig Tree

Matthew omits Mark's difficult observation, "for it was not the time for figs," because it makes the cursing unreasonable. Also by Matthew's time the "time of figs" had already passed—for the Jerusalem war of A.D. 66-70 was the final hour of decision for Israel.

21:23-27

The Question of Authority

This challenge follows immediately on the cursing of the fig tree, as in Mark 11:27-33. Matthew then reaches the point where Mark has the parable of the wicked vinedressers (Mark 12:1-12). Matthew is fond of sets of threes, so he has both prefaced and followed the vinedressers with a non-Markan parable. Thus, the interpretation of the first and third parable depends on the interpretation of the middle parable, the vinedressers, which, as we shall see, is an allegory of salvation history.

Two Sons

The parable of the two sons has some similarity to Luke's story of the prodigal son, and one is tempted to suppose that it is the original form of the longer story. Matthew's short form is most likely an authentic parable of Jesus, the point of which was the contrast between the reaction of the religious authorities to his preaching and that of the outcasts. Matthew could apply the parable to the circumstances of his church without difficulty. The synagogue was like the son who said, "I go," and did not, while the gentile converts in Matthew's community were like those who said, "I will not go," but in the end did.

21:33-46

The Parable of the Wicked Vinedressers

Whatever may have been the earlier history of this parable, in Matthew and Mark it is an allegory of salvation history. The earlier servants stand for the OT prophets, and the son is equated with Jesus as the last of God's emissaries. Matthew coalesces previous emissaries into two groups, representing the Former Prophets and the Latter Prophets of the OT canon (the second group was larger than the first!), thus clarifying the allegory. Matthew notes (21:38a) that the vinedressers "recognized" the son—thus enhancing Israel's guilt. The reversal of the order in v. 39 (cast outside . . . killed) reflects the crucifixion (cf. Heb. 13:12). In Matt. 21:41, Matthew extends salvation history to cover the period since the rejection of the son: God "will destroy those wicked ones with dire punishment and will let out the vineyard to other vinedressers who will produce the fruits for him in their season." Once more Matthew portrays the traumatic experiences of his community: the disaster to Torah-Israel in A.D. 70 and the establishment of the true Israel, which practices the fulfilled Torah of the better righteousness. To drive the point home, Matthew also adds vv. 43 and 45, which repeat the point of the allegory in nonallegorical form (nation instead of vinedressers). He notes in v. 45 that Jesus' audience (the Pharisees, representing the synagogue of Matthew's time) realized that Jesus was directing the parable against them (note esp. that v. 44 is probably an early interpolation from Luke 20:18).

The Great Supper

The parable of the great supper has a parallel in Luke 14:15-24. Matthew's version of it, like the vineyard immediately before it, has been transformed into an allegory of salvation history. The host of the dinner party becomes a king (= God), the dinner a marriage feast for the king's son, i.e., the messianic banquet. In Matt. 22:6-7 we have a highly remarkable scenario. The invited guests murder the king's servants who come to remind them of the invitation: "The rest, seizing his servants, subjected them to abuse and killed them" (v. 6). This is followed by even more drastic action: "The king, infuriated, sent his armies, destroyed those murderers, and set fire to their city" (v. 7). All this would be quite unrealistic in a parable drawn from life, but as an allegory it makes sense: it reflects the events of the Jewish war of A.D. 66-70. Tacked in to the end is part of another parable, the man without a wedding garment (vv. 11-14). This too is quite unrealistic, for the poor man could hardly have been expected to have a wedding garment if he had just been dragged in off the street! Again, it is meant to be taken allegorically: the man represents those Gentiles who have joined Matthew's church as a result of its mission, and it is a protest against their admission on too easy terms. Some of them were sitting loose to the requirements of the Torah, and the wedding garment represents the better righteousness that is expected of all, even gentile Christians.

Four Conflict Stories

At v. 15, Matthew returns to Mark and presents four units in which Jesus is in conflict with his adversaries. They are the tribute money (vv. 15-22); the Sadducees' question (vv. 23-33); the great commandment (vv. 34-40); and the question about David's son (vv. 41-46). Most of Matthew's changes are stylistic, but a few betray the Evangelist's special interests. For instance, he makes the raising of the question of the tribute money a deliberate plot engineered by the Pharisees: they "took counsel to ensnare him in his talk" (v. 15). However, writing at a time when the Sadducees were no longer a threat to his community, Matthew minimizes the hostility of that confrontation. Jesus does not say to them, as in Mark, "you are badly off the tracks" (cf. v. 32 with Mark 12:27). "The Pharisees," not just a single scribe, initiate the question about the great commandment. They come together to do so, evidently with hostile intent (Matt. 22:34). And when their spokesman asks the question he is "putting him [Jesus] to the test" (v. 35). In Mark, the scribe agrees with Jesus' answer and, in fact, elaborates on it himself, whereupon Jesus compliments him for his intelligent response and assures him that he is not far from the kingdom of God (Mark 12:32-34). Matthew drops all this. It is not a friendly encounter but a hostile confrontation that brings out the main issue between church and synagogue: the fulfillment of the Torah in terms of radical love. Finally, in the unit about David's son, Matthew has Jesus address the question directly to the Pharisees while they were "gathered together" (Matt. 22:41) and emphasizes in a concluding verse (v. 46) that Jesus had effectively silenced his opponents. This statement is derived from Mark (12:34b) but shifted to this point and expanded.

23:1-36

Discourse Against the Scribes and Pharisees

Some commentators treat this discourse as part of the final apocalyptic discourse that runs through the end of chap. 25 (see the concluding formula in 26:1). The objection that the scene changes in chap. 24:1 (see vv. 1 and 3) is not fatal since there is also a change of scene in the parable discourse (13:1 and 36). The change of subject matter from an attack on the Pharisees to an apocalyptic forecast is also not decisive since it would be in accord with literary convention to include a denunciation of false teachers in an apocalypse (see, e.g., Mark 13:22). At the very least, Matt. 23 serves as a bridge between the conflicts and the apocalypse. Like the other discourses, it is compiled out of materials from Mark, Q, and M. It consists of introductory warnings (vv. 1–12), of seven woes (vv. 13–33), and a prophetic oracle of judgment (vv. 34–36).

This denunciation of the Pharisees makes painful reading in the post-Holocaust era. How much of it is authentic to Jesus and how much reflects the sentiments of the post-Jamnia Matthean community? Some of the sayings, namely those from Mark and Q (23:5b = Mark 12:38b–39; [Matt. 23:14 = Mark 12:40 is absent from the best manuscripts and is clearly an interpolation]; Matt. 23:16 = Luke 6:39 Q; Matt. 23:23 = Luke 11:42 Q; Matt. 23:29–30 = Luke 11:47–48 Q) represent pre-Gospel tradition. Given this double attestation, it is difficult to eliminate all denunciation of the Pharisees from the authentic Jesus tradition as some are understandably trying to do since Auschwitz. What Matthew (or M before him) has done is to expand the amount of this material to enormous proportions and to cast much of it into the woe form, thus creating a much stronger impression of Jesus' anti-Pharisaism than is historically justified. We must also remember that the language of religious invective was much more virulent in those days. The synagogue liturgy in Matthew's time contained a petition that the Nazarenes (i.e., Christian Jews) might be blotted out of the book of life. It should be emphasized that Matthew himself was of course a Jew too, so he cannot be accused of anti-Semitism. This fact is only too often lost sight of completely. Lastly, Matthew is not anti-Torah. He expressly recognizes the Mosaic authority of the scribes (Matt. 23:2) and urges his church to obey their teaching. In accusing the scribes (v. 3) of saying and not doing, he evidently means they do not in their behavior obey the radically interpreted Torah as enunciated by Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount. To put it succinctly, they do not carry out the radical commandment of love.

The seventh woe (vv. 29–31) makes the point that in rejecting Jesus' teaching, the scribes and Pharisees are simply repeating what their ancestors did for the prophets. This paves the way for the wisdom oracle that predicts the persecution of the church by the synagogue (vv. 34–36 = Luke 11:49–51 Q). The persecution will be the climax of Israel's rejection of God's emissaries throughout salvation history. There are a number of interesting changes that Matthew has made to the Q form of this saying. In Luke (and almost certainly in Q), Jesus is quoting a saying of "the wisdom of God." In Matthew, it is a saying of Jesus himself. Thus, as in Matt. 11:25–30, Jesus is speaking as the personal embodiment of wisdom (= Torah). Next, Matthew defines the persecution more precisely as involving crucifixion. Torah Jews could hardly have crucified Christian Jews, for crucifixion was a Roman punishment. It must mean that they will hand the Christians over to the Roman authorities. The whole saying has been adjusted to reflect the recent experiences of Matthew's community.

Lament over Jerusalem

The denunciation concludes with the lament over Jerusalem (cf. Luke 13:34–35). The only major difference from Luke's version is its context. In Luke, it occurs earlier in the ministry while Jesus is still in Galilee on his way to Jerusalem. It therefore precedes the Palm Sunday entry, and the prediction "Blessed is the One who comes in the name of Yahweh" will, in Luke's perspective, be fulfilled on that occasion. In Matthew, the entry has already taken place, so the prediction can only refer to the Second Coming of Christ. Since Jerusalem will then welcome Christ at his return ("Blessed," v. 39), Matthew must mean that Israel's apostasy was not final. Jerusalem apparently will still be saved (cf. Rom. 11:26).

The Apocalyptic Discourse

As in Mark, the Jerusalem ministry ends with the so-called "little apocalypse" (→Apocalyptic Literature). Jesus is represented as predicting future history until the End. Mark knows that history down to about A.D. 68; after that it becomes vague because it still lies in what for him is the future. Matthew, writing around A.D. 90, knows what has happened since Mark, so he is more definite about those events; the unknown future begins later in his version.

24:1–36, The Little Apocalypse.

Matthew makes changes in Mark very cautiously, showing great respect for Mark's wording (unlike Luke, who updates the apocalypse more drastically). As a result, Matthew welds vv. 4–28 together to make a unity covering the Jewish war and the desecration of the Temple and then, at v. 29, he turns to the future: the return of Christ and the last judgment.

Matthew elaborates the description of the Second Coming in vv. 29–31. First the "sign" of the Son of man appears, preceding his actual coming (v. 30). This sign is probably the raising of the standard, as if to rally troops on the battlefield. At the appearance of this sign, all the tribes of the earth lament. Another pictorial element is the sound of the trumpet, a common feature in apocalyptic tradition (v. 31). We have already noted Matthew's love of apocalyptic embroidery (cf. 13:36-43; 16:28).

24:37-51, Parables of the End. Mark already had an appendix at the end of his apocalypse (Mark 13:28-37). It consisted of the parable of the fig tree and an exhortation to watchfulness. Matthew enlarges this appendix considerably by adding seven more parables of the End. It is worth noting that, whereas the group of parables in chaps. 21 and 22 were parables of judgment directed against the Pharisees, this group consists of parables of judgment addressed to the church.

The first of these additional parables is the Flood (Matt. 24:37-44; = Luke 17:26 Q). As Noah's Flood overtook the ungodly, so will the Second Coming be a surprise. Alone of the Evangelists, Matthew calls the Second Coming "parousia" (Matt. 24:37, 39; → Parousia), which means "arrival" and "presence."

The second parable, or rather two parabolic sayings, consists of the workers in the field and the women at the mill (vv. 40-42) with parallels in Luke 17:31, 35 Q. The third parable is the thief at night (Matt. 24:43-44; = Luke 12:39-40 Q).

The fourth parable is that of the faithful and unfaithful servants (Matt. 24:45-51; = Luke 12:41-46 Q). The point of all these parables, which are taken from the apocalyptic passages in Q, is that the Second Coming will be sudden and incalculable. Therefore, the disciples must watch for its coming at any moment.

There is some tension between the Second Coming as it is portrayed in Mark's little apocalypse and the view found in the Q passages. In Mark, the End occurs after a schedule of events leading up to it; in Q the End will be sudden and unexpected. Matthew combines the two perspectives. The known and calculable events had already occurred when Matthew wrote his Gospel. Only the Parousia was still future and would come suddenly and as a surprise.

This brings us to chap. 25 and the three great parables of the last judgment. Each of them will receive comment in turn.

25:1-13, The Ten Maidens. As it now stands, this is an allegory. The groom is the Messiah and his arrival at midnight the Parousia. The two groups of maidens stand for two different groups in the church. The ones with oil are probably those who had practiced the better righteousness of the fulfilled Torah, while those who have used up their oil will be the ones who have sat loose to the law (an-tinomians). While this allegory is peculiar to Matthew, it has affinities with parabolic sayings elsewhere (Mark 13:33-37; Luke 12:35-38). It is tempting to suppose that Matthew (or M) has developed the allegory out of these materials with the traditional image of the Messiah as the bridegroom (Matt. 9:15).

25:14-30, The Talents. Three versions of this parable exist: the present one, Luke's (Luke 19:11-27), and a third version in the Gospel of Thomas (→ Gospel of Thomas). Critical opinion is inclined to view Matthew's as the earliest version. However, even this form already includes secondary features: the large amounts involved (talents); an allusion to the delay in the Parousia (Matt. 25:19); a hint of the messianic banquet ("joy," vv. 21, 23); and Matthew's favorite phrases "outer darkness" and "wailing and gnashing of teeth" (cf., e.g., 22:13), all of which is apocalyptic imagery. This means that the talents, like the ten maidens, is really an allegory and has a similar meaning. The servant who buried his talent failed to pursue the better righteousness of the fulfilled Torah.

25:31-46, The Sheep and the Goats. This is neither a parable nor an allegory, but a direct description of the last judgment. However, it contains a few parabolic images with allegorical significance: shepherd, sheep, goats, and the separation of the herds to the right hand and to the left. These images may be leftovers from a genuine parable of Jesus. The shepherd is equated with a king (v. 34), the sheep with those who have fed the hungry, etc., and the goats with those who have failed to do so. Everything else is direct apocalyptic scenery: the Son of man, his angels, the gathering of all the nations, the reward and the punishment. We have noted that this cluster of parables depicts God's judgment over the church. This means that the nations will be those who have been made his disciples as a result of the church's mission (see 28:19, where the same phrase, "all the nations," occurs). Nowhere else does Matthew make it so crystal clear that the criterion to be applied to the church at the last judgment will be that of the better righteousness and that the righteousness is the praxis of love.

Matthew concludes this discourse with his usual formula (26:1a), only this time he writes "all these words," i.e., all five major discourses.

PART SIX: 26:1-28:20

The Passion and Resurrection

Matthew follows Mark quite closely throughout the passion narrative and, indeed, until the point in the empty tomb story where Mark suddenly ends. Only then does he go his own independent way.

26:1–27:66, 28:11–15, Matthew's Retelling of Mark's Story. Matthew makes stylistic improvements to Mark, as elsewhere. He also adds explanations. Pilate, we are told, is the "governor" (27:2). The high priest's name is "Caiaphas" (26:3, 57), a point on which Matthew agrees with John. Joseph of Arimathea is described as a "wealthy person" (27:57). The tomb was a new one (27:60). More significant is the addition of the formula citation in 27:9. This is about the thirty pieces of silver that Judas received for betraying Jesus (see the Short Essay "Matthew's Fulfillment Citations"). Most striking, however, are the insertions that Matthew has made at a number of points. Some of these are clearly redactional. Others seem to come from special traditions (M). The first group tends to be theologically significant, the second legendary in character.

We take the redactional additions first. In 26:1–5, Matthew rewrites the introduction to the passion narrative. First, he provides a concluding summary to the five discourses (v. 1, see above). Then in v. 2, Jesus himself (rather than the Evangelist, as in Mark) announces the approach of the Passover to his disciples and adds a new Son of man prediction to the Passion. This shows that Jesus is in control of the situation. Matthew then inserts a fuller description of the Sanhedrin's plot (→ Sanhedrin). It is worth noting that Matthew recognizes that it was the high priest and elders, not the Pharisees, who were the chief instigators of Jesus' arrest. While his anti-Pharisaic concern led Matthew to exaggerate the polemic against them, he did not falsify history and make the Pharisees responsible for the crucifixion.

Next, Jesus prefaces his directions to the disciples for the Passover preparations with the words "My hour of crisis is fast approaching" (26:18), thereby showing again that he is in charge of events.

In the account of Judas's betrayal Matthew states that the authorities actually gave him thirty pieces of silver. This paves the way for the later insertion about Judas's suicide (27:3–10) and for the accompanying fulfillment citation (see above).

To the prediction of the betrayal at the Last Supper, Matthew adds 26:25, in which Jesus explicitly names Judas as the betrayer. Judas says, "Is it I, rabbi?" Note that here Judas calls Jesus rabbi (cf. v. 49), not "Lord." This shows that Judas has put himself outside the circle of the disciples who in Matthew always call him "Lord." Jesus replies, "You have said it yourself."

In the institution of the Lord's Supper (26:26–29), Matthew rewrites Mark's account to conform it with the charter narrative as it was current in his own community. Note particularly that he has added to the pronouncement over the cup the phrase "for the remission of sins" (v. 28; on the importance of this, see the commentary on 3:11, the preaching of John the Baptist above). The forgiveness of sin becomes effective only at the moment of Jesus' death. All the allusions to the saving significance of Jesus' message and activity during the ministry were conditional upon their fulfillment in his death on the cross.

Matthew makes two small but important additions to Jesus' prediction of the coming messianic banquet, which comes immediately after the words of institution: "I shall not drink from this moment on" and "until I drink it new with you in the Reign of God." These little additions make it much clearer than Mark does that, for Matthew, the death of Jesus inaugurates the Reign of God and that in it the disciples will participate in the messianic salvation.

Matthew drops the scribes from the contingent that comes to arrest Jesus (26:47), thus showing once again his respect for past history as distinct from present controversies. When Judas comes forward to identify him, Jesus urges him to get on with the job: "Do what you are here for" (v. 50), thus initiating the whole train of events. Still in charge, Jesus orders the unnamed disciple to put his sword away (v. 52).

In the procedure before the Sanhedrin, the high priest puts Jesus under oath (26:63). To the question whether he is the Messiah, Jesus replies not "I am," as in Mark, but more plausibly, "You have said it" (v. 64; i.e., "it's your word, not mine"). His reply continues with the assurance that from now on they will see him enthroned at God's right hand, indicating Jesus' firm confidence in his vindication by the heavenly Father. And the Evangelist introduces this statement with the word "But," thereby showing that Jesus is contradicting the high priest's attempt to embroil him in a political kind of messiahship.

There is an interesting variant reading in the account of Pilate's attempt to release Jesus under the Passover amnesty. Some ancient manuscripts read "Jesus Barabbas" (27:16–17) where the majority read simply "Barabbas." This would set up an ironic contrast between Jeshua son of Abbas (meaning "father") and Jeshua called the Messiah. Its omission in most manuscripts would be explained by the increasing reverence among Christians that led (outside Hispanic countries) to the avoidance of "Jesus" as a first name for others.

Opposite: The trial of Jesus before the Roman prefect Pontius Pilate (see Matt. 27:11–26; Mark 15:1–15; Luke 23:1–25; John 18:28–19:16) as depicted in the Rossano Gospels manuscript, Italy, sixth century.

As the crucifixion squad sets out for Golgotha (27:32) and Simon of Cyrene is pressed into carrying the cross, Matthew drops Mark's note that this Simon was the father of Alexander and Rufus, presumably because they were not known in the Evangelist's church as they were in Mark's.

In the crucifixion scene (27:33-43), Matthew adds that the sour wine proffered to Jesus was laced with gall (v. 34), a detail taken from Psalm 69:21. This is in line with Matthew's fondness for fulfillment citations, although he does not actually use the citation formula here.

In the account of the mockery at the cross, Matthew adds 27:43, quoting Psalm 22:8, together with the explanation "for he said he was the Son of God." This recalls the temptation story (Matt. 4:3, 6) and so presents the crucifixion as Jesus' "last temptation." "Son of God" does not mean one who displays miraculous powers, but one completely surrendered to the will of God.

At the death of Jesus (27:45-54) "those with him" join the centurion in declaring that Jesus was "God's Son" (v. 54). This is not a confession of faith on the part of the gentile world as in Mark but, as Matthew explains, an expression of fear at the earthquake and its accompanying phenomena (see below).

In addition to these editorial modifications there are six major insertions into the passion narrative. All of them represent traditions peculiar to Matthew.

The first insert occurs at the arrest (26:52-54). When the disciple (unnamed) takes up the sword to resist, Jesus tells him to put it back in its sheath. Then comes an important Jesus saying attested only here: "Those who take up the sword shall perish by the sword." Jesus goes on to express his confidence that his Father could, if he so willed, provide legions of angels for his defense. But, Jesus says, the Scriptures must be fulfilled. This remarkable passage (different from the other inserts in that its character is not legendary) portrays Jesus as living out the demands of the Sermon on the Mount (see 5:39). The better righteousness is not just a theory: it was fully practiced by Jesus, and, in that sense also, it was "fulfilled."

The second insert (27:3-10) concerns the suicide of Judas, a variant of the story found in Acts 1:18-19. It is a legendary explanation of the name of Akeldama ("field of blood"; → Akeldama). Matthew wishes to emphasize that Judas's end was a self-inflicted divine judgment. The accompanying fulfillment citation is the last one in Matthew and the only one added by him to the passion narrative. Matthew ascribes the citation to Jeremiah. Most of it, however, comes from Zech. 11:12-13, though there are slight reminiscences of Jer. 32:6-15 and 18:2-3. It was difficult to verify references when there were no chapter and verse numbers and when books were in scroll form.

In the third insert, Pilate's wife comes into court, warns her husband not to have anything to do "with that innocent man," and tells him of a bad dream she had had about Jesus that morning (27:19). As we recall from the birth narrative, Matthew regarded dreams as a mode of divine revelation. This insert means that for the Evangelist the doctrine of Jesus' sinlessness was not a human assessment but a matter of divine revelation.

The fourth insert is the scene in which Pilate washes his hands (27:24-25) and protests his innocence of Jesus' death. Upon this the "people" (the word [Gk. laos] means not just any crowd, but the holy people of God) cry out, "may his blood be on us and on our children." Here is a further attempt by Matthew to shift the blame for the death of Jesus upon Torah-Israel. This explains the disaster of A.D. 70. It does not mean that the Jews for all time are guilty of "decide." Their judgment had already been fulfilled when Matthew wrote these words.

The fifth insert occurs at the moment of Jesus' death (27:51b-53). There was an earthquake; rocks were split, graves were opened, and many saints were raised bodily. Coming out of their tombs, they entered the holy city after Jesus' resurrection and appeared to many. This is a strange story. One wonders what the resurrected saints were doing between Good Friday and Easter. The story flatly contradicts Paul's teaching that other resurrections will occur only at the Parousia (1 Cor. 15:23). To understand it we must recall that in apocalyptic expectation the resurrection hoped for was a general one. It upset apocalyptic calculations when only one person, Jesus, was resurrected at Easter. This legend was evidently designed to stress the fact that the resurrection (→ Resurrection) is essentially a corporate event and that the resurrection of Jesus is the cause of all other resurrections, since his resurrection was the victory over death. It cannot be stressed too strongly that this legend is peculiar to Matthew and that it should be ignored in any attempt to reconstruct what happened on Good Friday.

The sixth insert is the story of the guard at the tomb. It is dispersed into three separate installments: first, 27:62-66, the posting of the guard at the request of the high priests and (note!) the Pharisees; second, 28:4, a series of remarkable events witnessed by the guards on the Sunday morning, namely, an earthquake and the appearance of an angel, which leaves the guards convulsed with fear as dead men; third, 28:11-15, the conclusion in which some members of the guard report their experiences to the high priests, who bribe them to say that Jesus's disciples had stolen the body while the guards were asleep. This story, we are told, is still current among the Jews at the time Matthew wrote.

There are a number of problems with this story. It is unlikely that the Jewish religious authorities would have gone to see Pilate during the Passover Sabbath. The reference to Jesus as an "impostor" (27:63) seems to presuppose the church's post-Easter proclamation and Israel's rejection of it. The claim that Jesus had foretold his resurrection (27:63) presupposes the development of the passion/resurrection predictions as "prophecies after the event." The request for the tomb to be sealed "till the third day" presupposes the church's Easter message and the connection of the "third day" with the empty tomb. And the resurrection is treated as an observable event rather than as a revelatory encounter and call to faith. The reference to the Pharisees' involvement in the plot, and the statement that the slanderous story was current among the Jews until Matthew's day, betrays its origin: it is an apologetic legend designed to counter the Torah-Israel's slander about the origin of the Easter faith.

28:1–8, The Empty Tomb. Matthew makes a number of striking changes from Mark's account. The purpose of the women was not to complete the burial rites (as in Mark) but simply "to see the grave." With the sealing of the tomb and the presence of the guard it would be impossible to get to the body, as the women hoped to do in Mark. We have already looked at vv. 2–3, but we should also note the descent of the angel (sic; Mark has simply "young man"), the rolling away of the stone, and the angel sitting on it. This is the nearest that any NT writer comes to describing the actual resurrection. Earthquakes are conventional apocalyptic symbols. It shows that the resurrection is an end-time event.

In v. 7 the women carry out the command to report to the disciples. Matthew could not use Mark's conclusion, "they said nothing to anyone," as he wished to complete the Easter story with an appearance in Galilee as Mark had suggested.

28:9–10, The Appearance to the Women. Matthew evidently had access to a tradition similar to that in John 20:14–18. We cannot be certain how ancient this tradition is. There is no mention of it in the earliest list of appearances (1 Cor. 15:3–7). There are two tendencies at work: to make the male disciples witnesses of the empty tomb and to give appearances to the women at the tomb. In the earliest tradition, the women were the sole witnesses of the empty tomb (Mark 16:1–8) and Peter the sole recipient of the first appearance. This is not to say that no woman ever saw the risen One: at the very least, women could have been among the five hundred (1 Cor. 15:6). The appearance in Matt. 28:9–10 is depicted in physical terms, a sign of later tradition (cf. Luke 24:39, 41–43; John 20:24–29). This appearance, curiously, serves no purpose except to allow the risen One to repeat the angel's charge to the women. Why then does Matthew record it? Perhaps he wants to make the women the first witnesses of the resurrection. Later tradition has called Mary Magdalene the "apostle to the apostles."

28:16–20, The Great Commission. Mark (14:28; 16:7) had pointed to an encounter between the risen One and the disciples in Galilee, but did not go on to relate this appearance. What Matthew offers here is not, strictly speaking, an appearance story. We are not told that the risen One appeared to them but simply that they "saw him" (Matt. 28:17). Nor is there anything said of his disappearing at the end. The story simply concludes with the risen One's assurance of his continuing presence. Indeed, Matthew does not seem to have taken this story from M but to have composed it by himself. But he does use pieces of earlier tradition: the doubt motif (cf. Luke 24:11; John 20:25); the commissioning, a central feature of the Easter experience; the command to baptize (this may be traditional, as is suggested by the charge to remit sins in the appearance to the Twelve as recorded in Luke 24:47 and John 20:20–23); the declaration of the risen One, that "God has handed over to me all power in heaven and upon earth" (Matt. 28:18), is based on the Son of man tradition (Dan. 7:14); the idea of a farewell charge prior to departure is a common biblical genre. Matthew probably had Moses' farewell discourse in mind (Deut. 33). Its location "on the mountain" (cf., e.g., Matt. 5:1) also reminds us of Moses.

In the actual charge, Matthew obviously betrays his hand in the command "to make disciples" (rather than "preach the good news" as in the parallel found in late manuscripts of Mark 16:15). A second sign of Matthew's hand is to be seen in the phrase "teaching them to observe all the things I have charged you." This points back to the teaching of the five discourses. The promise of the abiding presence recalls the Immanuel promise at Matt. 1:23 and its reiteration in 18:20. The abiding presence is the Matthean equivalent of the gift of the Holy Spirit, which is elsewhere associated with the resurrection appearances (Luke 24:49; John 20:22). Finally, "the consummation of the age" is a favorite expression of Matthew's, occurring five times in the Gospel. That Jesus is constantly present with his church, working through its teaching mission, is a fitting conclusion and an effective summary of the Gospel.

The Passion According to Matthew

If we wish to reconstruct what happened at the first Easter, from the plot of the Sanhedrin through the final postresurrection appearance, this can only be done through a critical analysis of all the traditions. Matthew's version is secondary and basically reproduces Mark, whose account by and large is closest to the original Jerusalem Passion narrative. In our opinion, there are only four points at which Matthew offers a valuable supplement or correction to Mark: first, the saying about those who take up the sword perishing by the sword (26:52); second, Jesus' reply to the high priest, "You've said it" (26:64); third, the name "Jesus Barabbas" (27:15, 16); and fourth, the explanation of the women's purpose on Easter morning as simply in order to see the grave (28:1). Apart from that, Matthew's additions are either theological (e.g., 27:43) or legendary (the six inserts).

The value of Matthew's passion narrative lies in the overall impression it creates. The suffering, death, and resurrection of Jesus the Messiah were so profound in meaning that each Evangelist was able to capture only a part of their total meaning. The Passions are like portraits rather than photographs, and each Evangelist contributes something to our appreciation of the story. What then is Matthew's special contribution? It lies in his presentation of Jesus' identity. For Matthew, Jesus in his Passion is the King, but the humble King. All the way through he is master of the situation. This is brought out particularly in the earlier part of the passion story, at the preparation for the Passover, at the arrest, and at the hearing before the Sanhedrin. Indeed, Jesus' answer to the high priest ("From now on you will see the Son of man seated at the right hand of Power") almost suggests, like John's Gospel, that the cross is the hour of glory. Almost—but not quite, for Matthew never loses sight of the fact that Jesus was the meek and humble King, as keynoted in the Palm Sunday entry (21:5). This is brought out most movingly in the mockery, where the crowd challenges him to come down from the cross and reminds him that he had said he was the Son of God. Being Son of God means, for Matthew, not triumphalist claims but the acceptance of the mission of the righteous sufferer of the Psalms, of Isaiah 53, and of Wisdom of Solomon 5. This is not a new feature in the story. It has characterized Matthew's portrait of Jesus all along, from the flight from Herod, through the baptism (with its mixed citation of Ps. 2:7 and the servant song of Isa. 42 in Matt. 3:17) and the miracle stories (note the fulfillment citation from Isa. 42 in Matt. 12:18–21). All this reaches its climax on the cross and especially in the crowd's word so impressively presented in J. S. Bach's St. Matthew Passion when, after the discordant turmoil of the mockery, the chorus sings in unison, "Truly this was the Son of God."

MARK

JOHN R. DONAHUE

INTRODUCTION

The Gospel According to Mark, the shortest of the Gospels, is generally thought to be the earliest and a source for Matthew and Luke, who incorporate it almost totally into their Gospels. It alone is called explicitly a "gospel" (Mark 1:1; 13:10; 14:9; cf. Matt. 1:1; Luke 1:1). This term is used in Second Isaiah (e.g., Isa. 40:9; 41:27; 52:7; 61:1) for the "good tidings" of God's saving action (Ps. 40:10). In secular Greek "gospel" means the good news of a significant event (e.g., the birth of the emperor) that is announced by a herald. It occurs frequently in Paul to describe the proclamation of the "Christ event," i.e., the significance that the person, life, ministry, Passion, death, resurrection, and exaltation of Jesus of Nazareth had and still has for human history and existence (1 Thess. 2:9; 1 Cor. 1:17–24; 15:1; Gal. 1:6–11; Rom. 1:16–17).

Though similar to other literary genres such as aretalogies (i.e., stories of the mighty deeds of heroic figures), lives of philosophers, martyrologies, and biblical writings such as the Elijah and Elisha cycles from 1 Kings 16 to 2 Kings 9 (→Elijah, Elisha), or the book of Daniel, the Gospel of Mark represents a wholly new genre. Its form is "kerygmatic narrative"—the presentation in story of the "good news" about and from Jesus (→Gospel, Gospels; Kerygma).

It is customary in NT studies to distinguish three stages in the composition of the Gospels. Stage 1 consists of recollections from the historical ministry of Jesus; stage 2, oral traditions about his ministry handed down under the influence of the proclamation of the risen Lord; stage 3, the incorporation of this material along with editorial additions into the literary and theological composition of a given Evangelist. This commentary will interpret Mark's form of stage 3, i.e., how Mark's kerygmatic narrative confronts its hearers with that same challenge and offer of grace that Jesus offered to his original hearers.

Author and Setting

Like the other Gospels, the text does not identify its author, but early church tradition (beginning with Papias, ca. A.D. 120; see Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 3.39.15) attributed it to "Mark," a companion of Peter in Rome (1 Pet.

5:13), who is then identified with the "John Mark" of Acts 12:12, 25; 15:37–39, and the "Mark" of Philem. 24; Col. 4:10; 2 Tim. 4:1. This attribution is called into question by the apologetic desire to associate a nonapostolic Gospel with the apostle Peter, by the frequency of "Mark" as a name in the Roman Empire, and by the ancient tendency to attribute works to important figures from the past.

For the bulk of church history, principally on the authority of patristic writers (esp. Irenaeus Against Heresies 3.1.2) and certain internal evidence (see below), the final composition of the Gospel was situated at Rome, sometime after the martyrdom of Peter during the persecution of Nero (A.D. 64). Recently, because of the stress in Mark on Galilee as the place of the first and expected revelation of Jesus, along with its strong Palestinian coloring, its audience has been located in Galilee or southern Syria (see Marxsen).

Internal evidence from the Gospel (esp. chap. 13) offers clues to its situation and community. Like similar apocalyptic literature, Mark 13 (called often the "apocalyptic discourse"), while in the form of predictions given in the past, cryptically depicts upheavals in the lives of the readers. The civil disturbances (13:7–8) and intensity of the persecution described in 13:9–13 may reflect both Nero's persecution (A.D. 64) and the Jewish war of A.D. 66–70 (see commentary below on chap. 13).

The large number of Latinisms (Gk. terms or phrases that reflect Lat., e.g., 5:9; 6:37; 7:4; 12:14, 42; 15:15–16, 19, 39) suggest a setting where both Latin and Greek were used. The teaching on divorce reflects Roman law (10:10–12) and the widow's offering is explained in terms of Roman coinage (12:42, lit. two coins [Gk. lepta] are made equivalent to the Roman quadrans, which equals 1/4 of a cent).

The community included large numbers of Jews. Familiarity with the Jewish Scriptures is presumed and explicit citations of and allusions to them are frequent. They are the authoritative revelation of God, and the core of Jesus' teaching is a summary from the OT (12:28–34). Yet, the OT is quoted from Greek versions, rather than translated from Hebrew; Jewish customs are explained (7:3–4); Aramaic phrases are translated (e.g., 5:41; 7:34; 14:36; 15:34), and details of Palestinian geography are vague (6:45–7:37). The Gospel contains strong attacks on Jewish laws and institutions (7:1–23; 11:15–19), and implies a mission to the Gentiles (11:17; 13:10). Most likely the community comprises Jews and gentile converts living outside of Palestine, who are breaking away from traditional Jewish observances.

The community is also most likely of lower socioeconomic status. The language of the Gospel is not elegant, literary Greek, but the spoken Greek of ordinary people with occasional Semitic influence. The rich are suspect, as are those holding positions of power (10:23–25, 42). Ordinary items such as the “pallet” (2:4, 11) and the “basket” (6:43; 8:19) are those used by the poor. Though the available evidence precludes certainty, a Jewish-Christian community at Rome shortly after A.D. 70 would be an excellent candidate for the audience of the Gospel.

Literary Characteristics

While there is no discernible written source, the Evangelist drew on early traditions (e.g., controversies of Jesus with Jewish leaders; collections of miracle stories, parables, and sayings of Jesus; and narratives of his final days in Jerusalem). Mark is, however, more than a simple collector. He leaves his distinct stamp on the Gospel, primarily by his manner of composition.

The Gospel manifests a theological conception superimposed over an original geographical framework (ministry in Galilee, beyond the confines of Galilee, journey to Jerusalem, and death in Jerusalem; cf. Acts 10:36–41). On the narrative level, events proceed to the climax in Jerusalem. The interpretive focus, however, comes in the middle. The units are structured like an arch where events on the side panels (Parts One and Two, 1:1–8:21; Parts Four and Five, 11:1–16:8) draw the onlooker to gaze to the main themes in the center (Part Three, 8:22–10:52). The structure is thus both architectonic and dramatic. As readers are drawn to the interpretive center, they are also caught up in the unfolding story of the journey of Jesus to the cross.

Mark begins with the ministry of Jesus in Galilee as the powerful Son of God who announces the kingdom, calls disciples, performs mighty works, and is acclaimed by the crowds (Parts One, Two, 1:1–8:21); he concludes with the entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem and his intensifying conflicts with Jewish leaders, leading to his crucifixion, death, and resurrection (Parts Four, Five, 11:1–16:8). In the center section (Part Three, 8:22–10:52), which is demarcated by references to “the way” (8:27; 9:33; 10:32), Jesus instructs his disciples on the meaning of his life and death (10:45), and on the cost of discipleship (carrying the cross and serving others as he did, 8:34–38; 10:42–45).

This section provides the bridge between the revelation of the powerful Son of God who in Galilee confronts the power of evil and heals the sick and the revelation of the Suffering Son of man in Jerusalem (11:1–16:8) whose blood is poured out for many (14:24; cf. 10:45).

Written in a lively, direct style, the Gospel reflects popular storytelling techniques. There is frequent use of “the historical present” (i.e., the Gk. present tense translated as past in English), which gives an “eyewitness” quality to the narrative. It is a Gospel of action where narrative (rather than the teaching of Jesus) occupies the most space, and where its different incidents (pericopes) follow in rapid succession, connected often by a simple “and.” Stories of Jesus’ exorcisms and healings are recounted vividly and with a detail that Matthew and Luke compress.

Frequent repetitions allow similar incidents to be presented in new guises and settings. For example, there are two narratives of calming the sea (4:35–41; 6:45–52), two feedings (6:31–44; 8:1–10), and two healings of blind beggars (8:22–26; 10:46–52). Mark also likes progressive threefold groupings, e.g., three “calls” of disciples (1:16–20; 3:13–19; 6:7–13), three passion predictions (8:31; 9:31; 10:33), and three prayers of Jesus in Gethsemane (14:32–42).

Theological Motifs

Christology. The theme of Mark’s Christology, that is, his understanding of Jesus, is stated immediately: “the good news of Jesus, Messiah, Son of God” (1:1). Mark’s purpose is not to prove this statement but to unfold its implications for faith and discipleship.

The titles of Jesus in Mark provide signposts along the narrative path of Mark’s presentation of Jesus. Three are most important. First, Jesus is “the Christ” (i.e., Messiah, 1:1, 34 [some manuscripts], 8:29; 14:61; 15:32), used in the Bible mainly for anointed royal figures and associated with Israel’s hope for a king who would restore Davidic rule (see 2 Sam. 7:12–14). It came to designate other figures (priestly or prophetic) sent to establish God’s reign (→ Messiah). Second, “Son of God” (Mark 1:1, 11; 3:11; 5:7; 9:7; 14:61; 15:39) does not imply, as in later theology, “divine nature,” but principally a special relationship to God. In the OT kings (Ps. 2:7), angelic beings (Job 38:7), and righteous people (Wisd. of Sol. 2:18) are “sons of God” (→ Sons of God, Children of God). Third and most importantly to Mark, Jesus is Son of man (→ Son of man). This enigmatic phrase, which in Aramaic means “human being,” derives from Dan. 7:13–27, where it describes the granting of power, honor, and glory in the heavenly sphere to one like a son of man who has suffered persecution and who is identified with the "saints of the most high" (Dan. 7:18). It suggests an individual who also is representative of a larger group. Jesus as Son of man possesses power on earth (Mark 2:10, 28) will suffer, die, and be raised up (8:31; 9:9, 12, 31; 10:33, 45; 14:21, 41), and at his return as Son of man (8:38; 13:24–26; 14:62), God will save the elect and punish the wicked.

Though taking over many of these titles from his tradition, Mark reinterprets them and uses them to shape his Christology. Jesus is Son of God not simply as a figure of power (3:11; 5:7) but as the obedient son (12:6; 14:36) who suffers, dies, and is vindicated by God. The title "Son of man" (used only by Jesus) underscores the vulnerability of Jesus as well as that humanity he shares with others. It establishes rapport with readers and gives a proper understanding to Son of God.

This same Jesus who is addressed as "beloved son" by a voice from heaven (1:11; 9:7) is also very human in Mark. He shows strong emotions such as pity (1:41), violent displeasure (1:43), anger (3:5), and is moved at the suffering of others who are like sheep without a shepherd (6:34). Like the OT prophets, Jesus proclaims the need for conversion and manifests God's will through symbolic activity. Like them, he embodies the compassion of God (6:34), especially for those who are suffering or on the margin of society—lepers (1:40–45), tax collectors (2:15), and Gentiles (7:24–30).

Mark uses the perplexing "Messianic Secret" to convey a proper understanding of Jesus' life. Demons acclaim him as Son of God, but he silences them (1:24–25; 3:11–12; cf. 5:7). At other times Jesus tells people who have experienced his power to remain silent (1:34, 43–45; 3:12; 5:43; 8:30; 9:9). Two things are communicated: first, knowledge of Jesus' identity comes from suprahuman power, either that of the heavens (1:11; 9:7) or of the demons; second, proper confession of Jesus should not be made on the basis of the miracles, but only after following him to the cross. The first human in Mark who correctly addresses Jesus as Son of God is the centurion who, at the moment of Jesus' death, says, "Truly this man was the Son of God" (15:39).

Discipleship. While the Gospel of Mark is the story of Jesus, it is also the story of response to the call of Jesus. The disciples in Mark combine negative and positive traits. When Jesus calls, they follow "immediately" and they are summoned to be with him and to do the things he does: teach, heal, and cast out demons (1:16–20; 3:13–19). Jesus teaches them privately (4:34; 7:17; 9:28), gives them the "mystery of the kingdom" (4:10–12), rescues them when they are threatened by the storm, and makes them privileged witnesses to his power (4:35–41; 5:37–40).

The picture of the disciples is also one of growing estrangement from Jesus. In the first parts of the Gospel they misunderstand his miracles and teaching (4:40; 7:18; 8:16–21). In the central section (8:22–10:52) each time Jesus states that it is God's will that he suffer and die, they misunderstand (8:32–33), twice bickering over rank and prestige (9:33–34; 10:32–45). During the passion narrative, though they share a final meal with him, one disciple betrays him (14:10), others sleep during his greatest agony (14:32–42), all flee when he is arrested (14:50), and Peter denies ever knowing him (14:66–72).

This double-sided portrait of the disciples has spawned heated debate. Some argue that they represent those in the community who, fascinated by a theology of power, pride themselves in their spiritual gifts. The failure of the disciples is seen as a warning that without a theology of the cross, a triumphalist theology of glory can only end in denial and betrayal. Less harshly, others suggest that the failure of the disciples encourages those in Mark's community who have failed in the face of persecution. Though Peter denied the Lord, the early church knew him as a recipient of a resurrection appearance and as a great missionary. Jesus, who conquers death and empowers Peter to become a witness and a martyr, can conquer the weakness and betrayal of his followers (see Best, Kelber, and Weeden).

Text and Canon

Though overshadowed by Matthew and Luke, Mark's place in the canon of Scripture was not contested, and the text of the Gospel is well established since it appears in the important fourth-century manuscripts (Vaticanus, Sinaiticus, and Alexandrinus) while portions of it appear in the third-century Chester Beatty papyrus (P<sup>45</sup>). The major textual problem concerns the so-called "longer ending" (Mark 16:9–20, also called the "traditional" and the "canonical" ending) that appears in a great number of ancient manuscripts and in the Greek text used for the KJV. However, earlier and more important manuscripts such as Vaticanus and Sinaiticus end at 16:8. Scholars among the patristic authors such as Eusebius and Jerome (fourth century A.D.) held that Mark ended at 16:8. Internal evidence supports this. The transition from 16:8 to the longer ending is awkward and these verses differ in language and style from the rest of the Gospel. The "longer ending" is best explained as a later attempt to soften the final words of the Gospel, "for they were afraid," and to provide it with a resurrection appearance.

COMMENTARY

PART ONE: 1:1-6:6a

Throughout Galilee Jesus Proclaims the Imminence of God's Reign in Powerful Words and Deeds

The first major phases of Jesus' activity take place mainly in Galilee and its environs. Though Mark collects here authentic recollections of the life and teaching of Jesus, he has edited and arranged them in service of his theology. In this section Jesus is very much a figure of power (1:22, 27; 2:10, 28), who summons disciples to follow him and confronts evil and sickness. His authority is established in word and deed and he is acclaimed by the crowds (e.g., 1:28, 45; 2:12). His rapid movement from place to place conveys the urgency of the gospel he proclaims.

The section is divided into a prologue (1:1-13) and two subsections (1:14-3:6; 3:7-6:6a). Each subsection begins with transitional summaries (1:14-15; 3:7-12) followed by discipleship stories (1:16-20; 3:13-20) and concludes with opposition or misunderstanding (3:6; 6:1-6a).

Prologue: The Beginning of the Good News

The prologue sets the stage for the public ministry of Jesus and introduces major themes of the Gospel. The superscription (1:1) announces "the beginning of the gospel" (cf. Gen. 1:1; Hos. 1:2 in LXX). "Beginning" implies not simply the start of the narrative, but that its total message is the "foundation" of that gospel that continues to be proclaimed in Mark's own time (13:10; 14:9). Mark 1:2-3, attributed to Isaiah but actually a conflation of Exod. 23:20; Mal. 3:1; and Isa. 40:3, establishes the continuity of saving history; the Gospel fulfills God's promises.

The actions and description of John (Mark 1:4-6) draw on contemporary Jewish eschatological expectations, i.e., beliefs about the "last days." John is dressed like Elijah (v. 6; see 2 Kings 1:8), who will return to prepare for the day of the Lord (Mal. 3:1; 4:5). Mark depicts John not simply as the fiery reformer preparing for the advent of this day, but as forerunner of the Messiah (Mark 9:11-13; cf. 6:15; 8:28). After a quick summary of the preaching of John (cf. Matt. 3:7-10; Luke 3:7-9) and his baptism of repentance (also practiced "in the wilderness" by the Qumran community, 1QS 3.4-5), John's ministry culminates (Mark 1:7-8) in proclaiming the advent of "the stronger one" who will baptize in the Holy Spirit. Though Jesus does not baptize in the Gospels, an outpouring of the "spirit of holiness" was to characterize the eschatological age (Isa. 32:15-20; 1QS 4:18-21). The words and deeds of Jesus constitute a "baptism in the spirit" (→ Baptism; John the Baptist).

The second part of the prologue (Mark 1:9-13) begins with solemn biblical language, "in those days," to herald the messianic preparation of Jesus. The baptism of Jesus by John (Mark 1:9-11; Matt. 3:13-17; Luke 3:21-22; cf. John 1:29-34) conveys both the solidarity of Jesus with others so baptized (Mark 1:9), and his unique status (vv. 10-11). The opening of the heavens (cf. Isa. 64:1) and the descent of the Spirit evoke the return of the longed for prophetic spirit and the advent of the messianic age. The descent "like a dove" may reflect the Jewish comparison of the hovering spirit of Gen. 1:2 to a dove.

The high point of the baptism is the proclamation by the "voice" (a personification of God), "you are my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased" (Mark 1:11), which echoes the adoption formula of Ps. 2:7 and the choice of the servant in Isa. 42:1; 44:1. The baptism is both Jesus' messianic adoption and his commissioning as servant. The subsequent narrative will unfold how he is the "beloved son," and how his followers are to confess him as such. Both the superscription ("Son of God") and the baptism point to the Son of God on the cross (Mark 10:38-39; 15:39).

With the "testing" (more accurate than "temptation") in the wilderness (1:12-13) the messianic preparation of Jesus is complete. Like the righteous Job, Jesus is tested by Satan (Job 2:1-8). Though he will warn of Satan's power in the Gospel (Mark 4:15; 8:33), Jesus will emerge stronger than Satan (3:22-27). The "wilderness" has a double nuance as the place of the covenant betrothal between God and the chosen people (Hos. 2:14-15) and where the fidelity of the people was "tested" and found failing (Pss. 78:17-18; 106:13-33). From the wilderness also salvation will dawn for the people (Isa. 40:3; 1QS 8:12-16). Jesus as "God's son" (representing the people; see Exod. 4:22, "Israel is [God's] first-born son"; cf. Hos. 11:1) relives the testing of Israel in the wilderness but remains faithful when tested.

1:14-3:6

Initial Ministry in Galilee, Opposition from Pharisees

1:14-15, Summary of the Proclamation of Jesus. After the "handing over" (RSV, "arrest") of John, which foreshadows the fate of Jesus (8:31; 9:31; 10:33; 14:21) and of the disciples

(13:9-13), the time of preparation is complete, and in place of John's "baptism of repentance" (1:4), Jesus arrives proclaiming "the gospel of God" (v. 14), which is both the good news from God and about God's intervention in history (1 Thess. 2:3, 8-9; Rom. 1:1; 15:16). The proclamation is fourfold. First, the time (Gk. kairos, in the sense of time for decision) is fulfilled, recalling the apocalyptic motif that God has predetermined the stages of history. The final age has begun. Second, "The kingdom of God is at hand." "Kingdom" designates not simply the realm or place where God reigns, but better the "active ruling of God." The teaching and actions of Jesus about to unfold in the Gospel are an enactment of God's reign. This reign is "at hand," that is, imminent but not yet definitively present (Mark 9:1). Third, "Repent." The Greek metanoia suggests a change of heart leading to a new way of life. It also evokes the prophetic summons to conversion from evil and a turning toward God (Hos. 6:1; Isa. 1:10-20; Joel 2:12-13). Fourth, "Believe in the gospel." Repentance leads to "belief," which involves obedience to the word of God as proclaimed by Jesus and a life of discipleship.

1:16-20, The Call of the First Four Disciples. This serves as a concrete illustration of 1:14-15. All the Gospels begin with Jesus gathering disciples (lit. "learners"), which inaugurates the new eschatological community of those who will hear Jesus' word and follow in his footsteps. These calls underscore the social dimension of God's activity in Jesus. Jesus is no solitary mystic, but one who forms a community to "believe in the Gospel."

The call and commissioning narratives (1:16-20; 3:13-20; 6:7-13; cf. 2:13-14) follow a similar pattern. Unlike similar stories of the disciples of Hellenistic philosophers or Jewish rabbis in which disciples search for a teacher, here the initiative comes from Jesus (1:17; 3:13, "whom he wished"; 6:7). Those called are engaged in everyday activities (1:16; 2:14). They respond immediately (1:20; 2:14), and the summons involves personal commitment (following or "being with" Jesus, 3:13) and activity similar to that of Jesus: teaching, healing, exorcising (3:13; 6:7, 13).

1:21-45, The Inauguration of the Ministry of Jesus. Mark creates a unity (beginning and ending in Capernaum, 1:21; 2:1) of paradigmatic narratives of the public ministry of Jesus. These comprise an exorcism (1:21-28), a healing of an individual (1:29-31), group healings and exorcisms (1:32-34), a preaching tour (1:35-39), and the healing of a leper (1:40-45). The stories stress the expanding religious awe that the teaching of Jesus evokes from the crowds (1:22, 28; 37; 45) and the confrontation with and victory over demons who recognize that Jesus is no ordinary human (1:24; 34). Here appear also the first instances of the Messianic Secret (1:34, 44), those places where Jesus enjoins silence about his identity and power.

The Miracles of Jesus in Mark

Miracle stories occupy roughly a third of the Gospel (more than the passion narrative). Mark describes the miracles of Jesus as "mighty works" (Gk. dynamis, 6:2; 9:39), not "signs" that authenticate the ministry of Jesus (see 8:11-13; cf. 15:29-32). From our perspective they are better called "symbols" of the power of God manifest in Jesus. This power is stronger than the forces of evil and illness and responds to the needs of suffering people. They comprise four groups: healings (1:29-31, 40-45; 2:1-12; 3:1-5; 5:25-34; 7:31-37; 8:22-26; 10:46-52); exorcisms (1:21-28; 5:1-20; 7:24-30; 9:14-27); nature miracles (4:35-41; 6:35-44; 6:45-52; 8:1-9; 11:12-14, 20-22); and one resurrection (5:21-24, 35-43). Mark also refers to them in summaries of Jesus' ministry (1:32-34; 1:39; 3:10-12; 6:5; 6:53-56). The different groups have similar formal characteristics, which argue for oral retelling prior to Mark (→ Miracles). Similar tales of extraordinary deeds of OT prophets, Jewish rabbis, and Hellenistic heroes were common.

Mark incorporates these stories for a variety of reasons: to show Jesus as a prophet mighty in word and deed (1:27; 2:12; 6:1-6), to exalt him above other claimants to divine power (cf. 13:21-22), and to evoke wonder and awe in God's power (4:41; 7:37). By placing most of them prior to the first passion prediction (8:31-32) and the beginning of Jesus' journey to Jerusalem, Mark subjects them to the narrative paradox of his Gospel. Jesus the powerful one submits to God's will in becoming the powerless victim who is raised up by God. The resurrection is the ultimate work of power in Mark.

2:1-3:6, The Power of Jesus in Controversy with Opponents. This section contains five controversy stories, i.e., narratives culminating in a normative pronouncement, which are arranged topically, rather than historically. Though they may preserve disputes from the life of Jesus (esp. over his acceptance of tax collectors), they reflect later debates between early Christians and fellow Jews. The Pharisees (from an Aramaic word meaning "the separated ones"), who are the principal opponents here (2:16, 18, 24), constituted a popular movement (in contrast to the aristocratic Sadducees), dedicated to strict observance of the law (→ Pharisees; Sadducees).

Mark arranges these five narratives in a chiasmic pattern of correspondence between the initial and final incidents to highlight the central narrative: A 2:1-12, healing of a paralytic; B 2:13-17, controversy over ritual law (i.e., not eating with unclean people); C 2:18-22, dispute over fasting, removal of bridegroom, contrast of old and new; B' 2:23-28, controversy over Sabbath law; A' 3:1-6, Sabbath healing of man with withered hand. This narrative unit also complements the picture of Jesus that emerged from 1:16-45. Jesus is powerful not only in the deeds of healing and exorcism, but in besting his opponents in debate. The contrast of the new and the old and the removal of the bridegroom, placed at the center, implies that Jesus' rejection of legalism and his willingness to violate the law to benefit suffering people evoked the opposition that led to his death (2:20; 3:6).

The first of these narratives (2:1-12) combines elements of two earlier narratives: the healing of a paralytic (2:1-5, 11-12) and a controversy over the power to forgive sin (2:6-10). By combining them Mark reinterprets the power of Jesus. The deeper "healing" accomplished by Jesus is release from the paralysis of sin. Since forgiveness of sin is a divine prerogative and since there are elaborate rituals of atonement, forgiveness by a word (v. 5) is tantamount to blasphemy (v. 7). The saying about the Son of man (v. 10) explains to readers that Jesus has this power as "Son of man," that is, as the one who will suffer, die, and be raised up. Mark creates a bridge between the earthly authority of Jesus and the forthcoming Passion.

The call by Jesus of a tax collector to be a disciple and Jesus' table fellowship with tax collectors (2:13-17) are based on solid historical recollection (cf. Matt. 11:19 = Luke 7:34; Luke 15:1). Jesus enacted God's offer of mercy (Mark 2:17), by associating with social and religious outcasts of his time. Tax collectors were considered dishonest and also ritually impure, because of frequent contact with Gentiles. Jesus' acceptance of them shattered fundamental religious convictions and social conventions of his contemporaries and fomented growing opposition to him (see 3:6).

The question of fasting (2:18-22) is evoked by the table setting of the previous narrative. The OT knows of both public and private fasting (Ezra 8:21-23; Zech. 7:5; Jon. 3:7-9) as a form of petitionary prayer, as a sign of mourning and repentance, and as preparation for the day of the Lord (Joel 2:14-16). The Pharisees fasted twice a week (Mark 2:18). The short parable of the bridegroom (v. 19) announces that the eschatological banquet when joy and feasting will replace fasting has begun in the ministry of Jesus. His new teaching and new practice shatters the wineskins of traditional observance. However, a time for fasting (as a sign of mourning; cf. 1 Sam. 31:13) will come when Jesus is taken away (Mark 2:20).

The final two controversies center around violations of the Sabbath law and are narrative illustrations of 2:27, "the sabbath was made for men and women, not men and women for the sabbath." Jesus first defends his disciples' violation (Exod. 34:21 prohibits "reaping" on the Sabbath) by appealing in rabbinic fashion to the precedent of David (1 Sam. 21:1-5) who violated another law by eating the consecrated "bread of the presence" (Lev. 24:5-9; Exod. 25:30) and giving it to his hungry followers. Jesus himself then violates the Sabbath rest by performing a cure. The controversies here culminate with a deepening fissure between Jesus and Jewish leaders. He is angry at their hardness of heart (cf. Mark 6:52; 8:17) and they conspire to destroy him (3:6, the first of four such references; see 11:18; 12:12; 14:1).

3:7-6:6a

Parables and Mighty Works of Jesus Cause Misunderstanding and Division

This section continues the theme of Jesus powerful in word and deed, but with escalating opposition. After a summary introduction (3:7-12) and a call narrative (3:13-19a), the first section (3:19b-4:34) comprises extensive teaching in parables (3:23; 4:2, 10, 33-34), while the second (4:35-5:43) presents four of the most dramatic "mighty works" in the Gospel. It concludes with a rejection of Jesus by his relatives (6:1-6a).

3:7-12, Summary of Activity of Jesus in Galilee. Jesus withdraws to the Sea of Galilee (from Capernaum), and crowds stream to him from a widening circle reaching beyond the confines of Palestine, anticipating his ministry there (3:7-8; cf. 7:31). He heals the sick and casts out demons who cry out, "You are the Son of God" (3:11). Mark here recapitulates the major themes of the preceding section of the Gospel: Jesus as the Messiah, powerful in word (3:8b) and deed (3:10) who, when recognized by superhuman beings (unclean spirits), enjoins secrecy. The proper meaning of Son of God (cf. 1:1, 11) remains an enigma for readers.

3:13-19, Second Call of Disciples. "He ascended the mountain" and called the disciples (3:13). This evokes Mount Sinai where Moses received the covenant that was to constitute the people of Israel (Exod. 19-34). Again the initiative is from Jesus (Mark 3:13, "he called those whom he wanted"). Lists of the Twelve appear four times in the NT (Mark 3:16-19; Matt. 10:2-4; Luke 6:14-16; Acts 1:13). The constancy of the number twelve, with variation in the names and in their order, reflects the symbolism of the twelve tribes of Israel, which Jesus now constitutes in new form. Jesus' disciples are not drawn from the educated or upper classes and include Simon "the Cananaean" (3:18, from a Semitic word meaning "zealot" [cf. Luke 6:15], i.e., a radical believer opposed to foreign rule in Palestine), as well as Judas Iscariot (mentioned last in all lists) who will betray Jesus.

3:20-35, Teaching in Parables Causes Division Among Those Who Hear Jesus.

With the constitution of the eschatological community, the next incident is a violent "clash of kingdoms" (3:20-31). It begins with Jesus at home, where some members of his family (3:21; cf. 6:1-6) think he is "out of his mind." By a literary technique used frequently (e.g., 5:21-24 [25-34] 35-43; 6:7-13 [14-29] 30-32; 14:54 [55-65] 66-72) Mark "sandwiches" (or "intercalates") one incident (the dispute on blasphemy, 3:23-34) within another (opposition from family and designation of true family of Jesus, 3:20-21, 31-34). This creates suspense (e.g., how will Jesus react to the charge of his family?) and links disparate incidents to make a unified theological statement (i.e., the divided house cannot stand, but Jesus is the stronger one who can constitute the new household of those who do God's will).

The presence of scribes "from Jerusalem" (3:22, where Jesus will ultimately suffer and die) and the serious charge of being in league with "Beelzebul," the prince of demons, heightens the opposition between Jesus and Jewish leaders. Jesus responds "in parables" (v. 23). "Parable" in Mark comprises enigmatic sayings (3:23; 4:11; 7:17) as well as longer narrative parables (4:3-9; 12:1-12). Jesus uses them both to proclaim and to defend his mission. They challenge the hearers to see themselves and God's action in a new light. The twin parables of the divided kingdom or house and the plundering of the house turn their charges back on the scribes. The exorcisms of Jesus are the plundering of Satan's house and the binding of the power of evil, by the one who emerged in the initial sections of the Gospel as the "stronger one" (1:7).

In 3:28-30, Jesus responds directly (not in parables) and harshly. Though he himself has been charged with blasphemy, his accusers commit the unforgivable sin of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, which, in context, is the attribution to evil of a power given by God. Though all sins can be forgiven by God, the inability to distinguish good from evil makes one impervious to the presence of God.

In 3:31 the mother and brothers (and in some manuscripts, "sisters"; cf. 3:35) of Jesus (the family of 3:21) reappear and "seek" Jesus ("seek" usually has negative overtones; cf. 8:11; 11:18; 14:1). Jesus' response relativizes natural familial bonds in relationship to the "new family" created by those who do God's will. Here is an important Marcan motif. Discipleship is enlarged; neither the natural family of Jesus, nor those called to be disciples have an advantage over those who do God's will (cf. 9:38-40). Later Jesus himself will emerge as the paradigm of one who does God's will (14:36).

4:1-34, The Mystery of the Kingdom of God Given in Parables.

Along with chap. 13, Mark 4 is the longest discourse of Jesus. It continues the teaching "in parables" (3:23) as well as the motif of the division caused by Jesus. Here the mystery of the kingdom proclaimed in parables causes division between outsiders and those to whom the mystery is given (4:10-12). It is a patchwork of different material: 4:1-2, an elaborate scenic introduction; vv. 3-9, the parable of the sower; vv. 10-12, sayings on the reason for speaking in parables; vv. 13-20, the allegory of the seeds; vv. 21-25, four enigmatic sayings; vv. 26-32, two seed parables; vv. 33-34, sayings on reason for speaking in parables. A pervasive motif is that the process of growth is metaphorical of the proclamation of and response to the kingdom (cf. 1 Cor. 3:6-8; 2 Esd. 4:26-31).

The first parable (Mark 4:3-9), though called "the sower" really deals with the contrast between three failed sowings and one extravagant yield. Its hearers are caught up in the rhythm of planting and failed growth, but their expectations are shattered by the final yield. A sevenfold harvest is bountiful; thirty, sixty, and a hundredfold are unheard of. The teaching and action of Jesus is like this: the apparent rejection in the immediately preceding narratives will not prevent the hoped-for yield.

The saying of Mark 4:10-12, especially v. 12 (= Isa. 6:9-10), is one of the most controverted in NT scholarship. It implies a harsh determinism where Jesus spoke in parables in order to prevent his hearers from perceiving or understanding "lest they convert and be forgiven." (Matt. 13:13 alters Mark's "in order that" to "because.") In a deterministic worldview (like that of apocalypticism), evil that happens must have been willed in advance by God. Early Christian apologetics found in the OT a response to the rejection of Jesus. God accomplished his purpose by blinding the people as he had earlier hardened Pharaoh's heart (Exod. 4:21; 7:2-4; see also the use of Isa. 6:9-10 in Acts 28:26; John 12:40). The saying thus summarizes the result of the proclamation of the kingdom by Jesus and of the crucified one by the early church rather than its purpose. It also reflects the theology of Mark who uses it to interpret also the "parables" of 3:23-27. What the disciples are meant to see, which blinds outsiders, is that Jesus is the stronger one who defeats Satan. Satan can still hinder the growth of the kingdom (4:15), but the final extravagant result is assured (4:1-9).

In the allegory of the seeds (4:13-20) and the following sayings (4:21-25), Jesus instructs the audience of 4:10 on the challenge of discipleship. The three failed sowings become warnings for the pitfalls of discipleship: destruction by Satan's power (v. 15; cf. 8:31-32); initial enthusiasm, quashed by subsequent scandal (vv. 16-17; the RSV translation "fall away" is too weak)—which summarizes the action of the disciples in Mark—worldly cares, the lure of wealth, and desires for other things that "strangle the word" (vv. 18-19; cf. 10:23-25, the rich young man). The fruitful harvest (v. 20) is virtual summary of the process of conversion: hearing the word, accepting it, and bearing fruit.

The following short enigmatic sayings (4:21-25), which are found in Matthew and Luke also outside the parable discourse, are adaptations of popular proverbs to illustrate fruitful hearing (4:20). The witness of the disciples will be like a lamp (4:21; cf. Matt. 5:16); the mystery of the kingdom, though now hidden (like the identity of Jesus), will be manifest (Mark 4:22 = Luke 8:17; cf. Matt. 10:26; Luke 11:33; 12:2); the care and zeal with which they receive the word, "the measure you give," will bring extravagant results, "the measure you get" (cf. Matt. 7:2; Luke 6:38). For those who accept the word, more will be given; for those who reject it, even what they have will be lost (Matt. 13:12; cf. 25:29 = Luke 19:26; cf. 2 Esd. 7:25).

The final parables (Mark 4:26-29, 30-32), addressed to the larger audience (4:26; cf. 4:1-9) return to the growth process as a metaphor of the kingdom. Like a seed it germinates in mysterious fashion (v. 27, "he knows not how"), and has power independent of human endeavor (v. 28, "produces of itself"). Proper response to the kingdom is to be ready when the harvest is announced (v. 29; cf. 1:14-15; cf. Joel 3:13). The contrast between insignificant beginnings (the small mustard seed) and the luxuriant shrub that shelters all the birds of the air (Mark 4:32) provides an image of the contrast between Jesus with his small band of disciples and the hoped-for eschatological community (cf. Ezek. 17:22-24; Dan. 4:10-12). The conclusion (Mark 4:33-34), continues the motif of insiders and outsiders begun in 3:20. The private instruction that Jesus gives to his disciples (4:34; often in a house, 7:17; 9:28, 33; cf. 10:42) may symbolize the continued instruction of disciples within the house-churches of Mark's community.

4:35-5:43, Culmination of Mighty Works in Galilee. This section contains dramatic exemplars of the extraordinary power of Jesus. The evils that are overcome have a cosmic and mythic power—the uncontrolled sea (4:35-41), a legion of demons who inhabit the realm of the dead (5:1-20), a woman whose twelve-year illness renders her "unclean" (5:25-34; cf. Lev. 15:25-30), and the death of a young woman (Mark 5:22-24, 35-43). While the initial ministry of Jesus took place in Galilee, mainly around Capernaum on the west side of the Sea of Galilee, in 4:35-41 Jesus crosses this sea to gentile territory (the Decapolis or ten cities east of the Sea). Crossing the barrier between Jew and Gentile, symbolized by the Sea, anticipates the mission to the Gentiles that will occupy the next phase of Jesus' ministry (6:6-8:21).

The narrative of the calming of the sea (4:35-41, often called inaccurately "the walking on the water") is rich in OT allusions, where raging waters are a symbol of chaos and ominous power (Isa. 51:9-10; Ps. 89:8-10). Divine power is manifest in confining the sea within its boundaries (Gen. 1:2, 6-9) and in quelling the wind and the waves (Pss. 74:12-14; 93:3-4). Storms and raging waters also represent threats to the believer who cries out to God for deliverance (Pss. 69:1-2, 14-15; 107:23-32; cf. Mark 4:38). The narrative continues to unfold the mystery of the identity of Jesus. Like God at creation his word controls unbridled power. Like God, he rescues a beleaguered people. Though the disciples are filled with awe (which is proper to a theophany, a story of God manifesting himself; cf. Exod. 3:1-6; Isa. 6:1-5), they continue to ask who Jesus is (Mark 4:41).

The exorcism of the Gerasene demoniac (5:1-20) is one of the longest and most vivid of the NT miracles. Mark has here adapted an early folkloric narrative to his theology. (Geographical details that puzzled even ancient commentators, such as the location of Gerasa some thirty miles from the Sea of Galilee, are not important to Mark.) Just as Jesus began his ministry on Jewish soil with an exorcism (1:21-28; 1:24 and 5:7 are almost identical in Gk.), his first arrival in gentile territory (where pigs could be raised; cf. Luke 15:15) involves even more violent conflict with the power of evil. The first half describes the exorcism (5:1-13), while the second describes its effect on various people (vv. 14-20). The demoniac comes to him from the realm of the dead (v. 2; cf. Isa. 65:5, where Gentiles are a people "who sit in tombs") and his destructive power is as uncontrolled as the raging sea (Mark 5:3-5).

The narrative violates the normal pattern of exorcisms: first, meeting of demoniac and exorcist; second, silencing and expulsion of demon by exorcist; and third, departure of demon, with reaction of onlookers. Instead, on first sight (vv. 6-7) he "worships" Jesus and recognizes him as "Son of the Most High God"—a way of speaking of God characteristic of pagans (Dan. 3:26; 4:2; cf. Isa. 14:14). The exorcism (Mark 5:8) has already occurred and is mentioned almost as an afterthought. By departing from the traditional arrangement, Mark highlights the Christology of the narrative.

The expulsion of the demons into the herd of swine and their drowning in the sea initiates the purification of gentile territory. Since the unbridled power of the water has already been subjected to Jesus' power (4:35-41), it now becomes the tomb of the demons. The subsequent meeting between Jesus and the freed demoniac is also unusual in miracle stories. Rather than commanding silence, Jesus now commissions the man to proclaim, "how much the Lord has done for you and how he has had mercy on you" (5:19). He is the prototype for Mark's community of a gentile convert, freed from the domination of evil, who becomes a missionary proclaiming God's mercy.

The following two miracles, performed in a Jewish environment (5:21-22) are another instance of "sandwiching": the raising of Jairus's daughter (5:21-24a, 35-43) and the healing of a woman with a hemorrhage (5:24b-34). Both narratives have women as central characters (cf. 7:24-30) and both stress the need for faith (5:34, 36). After the initial request of Jairus, Jesus is surrounded by a crowd, while the woman who found no human assistance (vv. 25-26) approaches Jesus with belief in his power. Though the story reflects popular belief in the physical power of holy people (cf. Acts 5:15; 19:11-12), the final words of Jesus shift the emphasis to the faith of the woman. Her faith leads to salvation (liberation from evil) and health and peace (in the biblical sense of wholeness; → Peace). Like the Gerasene demoniac, she is a prototype of those who experience the benefits of the new age inaugurated by Jesus.

In 5:35-43, the narrative of Jairus's daughter resumes. Like the raising of Lazarus in John 11:1-44, the death of a loved one brings a petitioner to Jesus and becomes the occasion for presentation of Jesus' power over death. The story contrasts the turmoil of the mourners (Mark 5:38-39) with the calm assurance of Jesus (v. 39). As in the calming of the sea (4:40), faith is opposed to fear (5:36). Faith features prominently in the miracle stories (2:5; 4:40; 5:34, 36; 10:52; cf. 9:23; 11:20) where, in contrast to Hellenistic miracle accounts, it is at the beginning of the miracle rather than at its end. Mark rejects any mechanistic view that miracles give birth to faith (cf. 8:11-13; 15:32). Faith, especially as exemplified by those who carry the paralytic, the two women of Mark 5, and blind Bartimaeus, is a courageous trust in Jesus in the face of opposition. The faith the gospel demands (1:14-15) brings life and salvation.

The resuscitation is accomplished only by a word and couched in the same language the early church uses of the resurrection of Jesus (v. 41, "rise up"; v. 42, "she arose"). Mark here reinterprets a traditional miracle in light of the resurrection faith of his church. Resurrection is victory over the power of death and the fear it injects in human life (cf. Heb. 2:14-15).

6:1-6a, The Rejection in His Own Country. Jesus' mighty works conclude with a rejection, not by opponents (cf. 3:6) but by his townspeople and relatives. The questions (vv. 2-3)—"from where do all these things come to him? What is the wisdom given him? What mighty works are wrought by his hand?"—summarize the preceding section (the words of wisdom are parables, the mighty works the three miracles) and continue the theme that those closest to Jesus are most in doubt as to his identity. Jesus responds with a proverb (confirming his reputation as one who possesses wisdom) about the frequent rejection of people by those who should know them best, which the narrator heightens by saying that Jesus "marveled at their unbelief." Unlike those in the two previous narratives whose faith brought healing and salvation, Jesus' relatives and townspeople do not allow their familiar expectations to be shattered and remain as outsiders (cf. 3:31-34).

PART TWO: 6:6b-8:21

Jesus Extends His Ministry to Jews and Gentiles Beyond Galilee

After initial narratives dealing with discipleship (6:6b-30), this section is characterized by teaching and mighty works within and beyond the confines of Galilee. It manifests a number of characteristics: sea crossings (6:45-51; 8:10, 13), movement beyond Galilee (7:31; 8:10), and doublets of significant narratives (two feedings, 6:31-44 and 8:1-9; two healings, 7:31-36 and 8:22-26; two dialogues about bread, 7:24-30 and 8:14-21). The repetitions are correlated with the geography and audience. What Jesus does for Jews in Jewish territory, he also does for Gentiles in their lands. He is a prototype for Mark's community in its mission of proclaiming the Gospel to the nations (13:10).

6:6b-13, 30

Summary of Jesus' Activity and Commission of the Twelve

This section begins with a short summary (6:6b) of Jesus' itinerant ministry and then moves to the third call and commissioning narrative (6:7-13), which intensifies the earlier calls (cf. 1:16-20; 3:7-12). Like Jesus who leaves family and home, disciples are to live a prophetic and itinerant life-style (v. 8) on the margin of society and, like him, they are to confront the power of evil and summon people to conversion.

Interlude: The Passion and Death of John the Baptist

This relatively long and somewhat independent narrative (the only one in Mark not about Jesus or the disciples) is interposed here by Mark (6:30 logically follows 6:13). It illustrates the risk of a prophetic life-style that confronts brutal power and prefigures the subsequent execution and arrest of Jesus. The questions of Herod in 6:14–16 reflect confusion in popular messianic expectations and anticipate similar questions in 8:27–30. The story of John the Baptist is at variance with the account of John's death by the first century Jewish historian Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 18.5.1–2, §116–119) who stresses Herod's fear of John as a popular leader. The attribution of the blame for John's death to Herodias, the dance of her daughter before assembled dignitaries, and Herod's remorse give the account the flavor of a folk tale. Herod's vacillation anticipates (6:20, 26) that of Pilate (15:6–15). Both John and Jesus die because of the misuse of power by brutal but weak secular rulers (cf. Mark 10:42).

Jesus the Shepherd of Israel

At their return the disciples recount all that they had done and taught—the same two things that characterize Jesus' ministry—and then Jesus retires with them to a “desert place” (6:30–31). Jesus is the compassionate shepherd who feeds a pilgrim people, comes to the aid of storm-tossed disciples, and extends his ministry to the masses.

6:31–44, The Feeding of the Five Thousand

The “desert place” or wilderness (cf. 1:12) is the setting for a miraculous feeding (6:31–44; cf. 8:1–10), the only Galilean miracle of Jesus narrated in all four Gospels (see Matt. 14:13–21; 15:32–39; Luke 9:10b–17; John 6:1–13). These accounts show a double influence, from the OT narratives of the miraculous feeding of the people in the wilderness (Exod. 16:14–35; Neh. 9:15; Ps. 78:17–29, explicit in John 6:31–32), and from the Last Supper accounts of the Gospels (e.g., Mark 6:41, he blessed, broke, and gave to the disciples; cf. 14:22). They reflect the expectation of the eschatological banquet (Isa. 25:6–8), when God will feast with the elect (2 Bar. 29:5–8). Jesus, as the shepherd of Israel who “has compassion” on the crowd because they are like sheep without a shepherd (Num. 27:17; Ezek. 34:15), evokes God's compassion and care in the OT (Exod. 3:7–12; Isa. 49:8–13; Ps. 23).

The narratives also draw on the double symbolism of food as teaching (Prov. 9:5; 1 Cor. 3:2; John 6:41–48) and as nourishment. Jesus first teaches the crowds many things (Mark 6:34) and then satisfies their hunger (vv. 35–44). Though the numbers (five loaves, two fish, twelve baskets, and five thousand people) are most probably symbolic, the referents are unclear. Seven, the combination of loaves and fish, frequently symbolizes adequacy or perfection; the baskets are enough for the eschatological banquet for the twelve tribes, and the five thousand people may simply be a way of exalting the miracle of Jesus over that of Elijah who feeds 100 people (2 Kings 4:42–44).

6:45–52, Sea Crossings and Healings

The following “sea miracle” (6:45–52; cf. 4:45–52) again stresses the power of Jesus over the waves and the fear of the disciples. Here added to the disciples' amazement (cf. 4:51) is the harsh view that their hearts were hardened (cf. 8:17) “because they did not understand about the loaves.” The feeding (like the other mighty works of Jesus) are not simply marvels, but symbols of the new age inaugurated by Jesus, the compassionate shepherd, who comes to the aid of suffering humanity. Their enduring fear and suspicion that Jesus is a “phantom” (6:49) manifests an unconverted heart. Jesus' use of the revelational formula, “I am” (6:50; cf. 13:6; Exod. 3:13–15) turns the pericope into a veiled theophany.

6:53–56, Summary

A “Marcan summary” (cf. 1:45; 3:7–13) of the expanding extent of Jesus' mighty works (villages, cities, country) occurs in 6:53–56, and provides a transition to the stories of disputes that follow in chap. 7.

7:1–23

Jesus' New Teaching with Authority Breaks Down the Barrier Between Jew and Gentile

There is a long dispute on “clean and unclean” in 7:1–23. As a recollection of the ministry of Jesus (stage 1) this section echoes attacks on Jesus and his followers as nonobservant outsiders, and Jesus' counterrejection of legalism. Since purity regulations are not simply ritual taboos, but a means of preserving religious and ethnic identity in a hostile world, the dispute deals also with whether the community is to be exclusivist or open to “unclean” elements, e.g., Gentiles.

The controversy is divided into a dispute over clean and unclean vessels (7:1–8) and on the institution of the corban (7:9–13; see below) followed by a parabolic saying on clean and unclean (7:14–17) with a private explanation to the disciples (7:18-23; cf. 4:1-20). This defense of the neglect by his disciples of ritual practice culminates, like earlier disputes, in a pronouncement contrasting human institutions and divine precepts (cf. 2:23-28). In citing Isa. 29:13 ("this people . . . precepts of men"), Jesus recalls not only the particular verse, but other prophetic attacks on misuse of religious practices (e.g., Isa. 1:10-20; 58:1-14; Amos 5:21-24).

The distorting power of legalism is then underscored by Jesus' harsh attack on corban (7:9-13), an Aramaic term for a practice whereby children were allowed to make a financial offering to the Temple that would then absolve them from using this money to care for their parents. As in the case with ritual uncleanness, Jesus invokes the OT (Exod. 20:12; 21:17; Deut. 5:16; Lev. 20:9) against later interpretations, which are equivalent to voiding the word of God. Like the prophets Jesus here defends the vulnerable members of the community and summons people to fidelity to the Decalogue.

The saying of Mark 7:15 and its subsequent explanation (vv. 16-21) are most likely additions by the Evangelist to an earlier tradition. The rejection of particular ritual practices is now escalated to a rejection of all ritual laws. The only purity that matters is moral (i.e., interior) integrity (v. 18), which is illustrated by a rather earthy image of digestion (v. 19). Interior impurity is illustrated by a traditional list of vices that flow from the human heart (vv. 21-22; cf. Gal. 5:19-21; 1 Tim. 1:9-10; Col. 3:5-8; 1 Cor. 5:10-11). Such spiritualization of ritual law by making interior attitudes and dispositions the criteria of morality is characteristic of Judaism in a Hellenistic environment (e.g., Philo of Alexandria) as well as of early Christianity.

Jesus' Mighty Works Among Gentiles

7:24-30, The Syrophenician Woman. As if to enforce the previous teaching, Jesus himself now enters unclean territory (Tyre, 7:24-30), where he performs his first mighty work on behalf of a gentile woman whose daughter is possessed by an unclean spirit. The brisk dialogue (vv. 26-29) contrasts with the formal confrontation with the Pharisees. Jesus seems to dismiss her initial request with a slur on the Gentiles (who were often called "dogs" by observant Jews). With rhetorical skill equal to that of Jesus in the previous pericopes, the woman turns the saying back on Jesus (v. 27), who then heals her daughter "because of what she said" (v. 29). The woman is a model of that lively and courageous faith that constitutes a proper response to Jesus.

7:31-37, The Deaf Mute. The following story, also in gentile territory, again pictures Jesus as the missionary giving hearing and speech (7:31-37). In contrast to his disciples and compatriots who hear but do not listen, the once deaf and mute Gentile becomes a herald of Jesus' mighty works (7:37).

8:1-10, The Feeding of the Four Thousand. This feeding, a virtual retelling of the earlier one, presents Jesus as one who gives sustenance to people in gentile territory. They too will be fed with the bread given to the children (see 7:27). Like the earlier story it takes place in the wilderness and reflects the language of the Lord's Supper. However, in place of the five loaves and two fish, we now have seven loaves and seven baskets, with "a few fish." As earlier, the numbers are symbolic but the referents equally uncertain. "Seven" may simply suggest a totality of gifts for the Gentiles equal to those given to the Jews. The number four thousand may be less than the earlier five thousand to indicate the precedence of Israel in salvation history (cf. Rom. 9:1-9).

Jesus' Actions Culminate in Opposition and Misunderstanding

Mark concludes the public manifestation of Jesus with two vignettes about two groups that have misunderstood the mighty works of Jesus throughout his ministry. In 8:11-12 the Pharisees ask for a sign from heaven (i.e., some convincing mark of divine approval). They are the opposite of those who approached Jesus simply with faith. Deeply affected by such a request (v. 12, "he sighed deeply in his spirit"), Jesus rejects their attitude, saying that no sign will be given to this generation (used in a negative sense; Matt. 16:4 reads here "an evil and adulterous" generation; cf. Mark 8:38).

The misunderstanding of the disciples is described in a particularly enigmatic narrative (8:14-21). Jesus first cautions them to beware of the "leaven" (i.e., bread as a metaphor of teaching, with the overtones of leaven as an agent of corruption) of the Pharisees and of Herod. The disciples who have only one loaf (8:14) then discuss their plight in having no bread (8:16). Jesus, strongly addressing them like the opponents in 2:8, "Why do you discuss?" (8:17), tells them that their hearts are hardened and, like the outsiders of 4:10-12, they have "eyes which do not see and ears which do not hear."

Jesus then refers back to the two multiplications of the loaves, eliciting from the disciples answers about his actions, and asks if they do not yet understand (Mark 8:19-21). The disciples never answer his question. Both the Pharisees and the disciples lack faith. The Pharisees seek for a sign; the disciples do not see beyond the actions of Jesus to the power of his person. They do not realize that the one loaf which they have with them (Jesus) is more adequate than demonstrations of power.

PART THREE: 8:22-10:52

Jesus Begins His Journey to Jerusalem Where as the Son of Man He Will Give His Life as a Ransom for Many

The centerpiece of the Gospel narrates the journey of Jesus and the disciples from the northernmost point of Palestine (Caesarea Philippi) southward to Jerusalem. References to being "on the way" (8:27; 9:33, 34; 10:17, 32, 46) punctuate the account, along with periodic geographical references (8:22, 27; 9:30, 33; 10:1, 32). Since the actual course of the journey is ill defined, "way" serves as metaphor for the way of discipleship (cf. Acts 9:2) that Jesus here teaches his disciples by word and example.

The whole section is framed by two giving-of-sight stories (8:22-26; 10:46-52) and structured around three passion predictions in the pattern: Jesus predicts his forthcoming suffering (8:31; 9:30-31; 10:32-34), followed by misunderstanding on the part of the disciples (8:32-33; 9:32; 10:35-41), which evokes further instruction by Jesus on the deeper demands of discipleship (8:34-91; 9:33-50; 10:42-45). Also, from now on there are very few miracles. Those recounted (9:14-29; 10:46-52; 11:12-14, 20) lack public acclamation and serve principally to instruct the disciples.

Transitional Giving-of-Sight Story

The healing of the blind man (8:22-26) at Bethsaida, a city in the north of Galilee, is important in the literary structure of the Gospel. It serves as a transition from the Galilean ministry to the journey southward to Jerusalem. More importantly, along with 10:46-52 (another healing of a blind man), it provides the frame for the important middle section where Jesus gives his disciples "insight" about his forthcoming Passion and death. After the description of the disciples themselves as blind in 8:18, the first healing, which takes place in progressive stages (8:23-25) symbolizes the progressive journey to understanding that the disciples must make. At the second healing the man given his sight becomes a disciple who "follows on the way" (10:52). Between these stories of two blind people given sight, Jesus initiates his disciples into the mystery of the cross.

8:27-9:29

The First Passion Prediction Unit

8:27-30, The Confession of Peter.

Throughout the first part of the Gospel Jesus' actions evoke questions about his identity, e.g., 1:27, "What is this . . .?"; 4:41, "Who then is this . . .?"; 6:2, "What is this wisdom . . .?"; 6:14-15, the questions of Herod. Here Jesus himself poses the question "Who do men think I am?" (i.e., human beings in contrast to those with supernatural power). The disciples recount the popular opinions, but then Jesus asks their opinion. Peter, the first called, responds simply, "You are the Christ [anointed one, Messiah]," at which Jesus commands silence. In the structure of the Gospel this dialogue sets the tone for the subsequent unfolding of the proper understanding of Jesus as the Christ and the consequences of confessing him as such. For Mark's readers (and subsequent generations) the challenge facing every future believer is how properly to confess Jesus as Messiah amid conflicting claims.

8:31-33, The First Passion Prediction.

The passion predictions, though in present form written from a postresurrection perspective (like the Gospel as a whole), contain a historical core. Jesus did evoke mortal opposition from segments of Jewish society and Roman leaders. The earlier fate of the prophets (2 Chron. 24:20-22; 36:15-16) and of John made him aware that he might suffer a similar fate. Like the prophets and the suffering just people of the OT (e.g., Wisd. of Sol. 2:10-20; 5:15), he hoped for vindication.

The first passion prediction plainly (Mark 8:31) indicates in what sense Jesus is the Messiah. He is such as Son of man (that human figure) who "must" suffer and be rejected by the leaders of his people. The term "must" or "it is necessary" (v. 31) offers no detailed theology of suffering, but is a concise reference to collections of OT texts cited to show that Jesus' suffering was willed by God. Coupled with the subsequent narrative of the transfiguration (9:1-8), this section (which is the approximate midpoint of the Gospel) presents a "Gospel in miniature," which reflects the pattern of rejection followed by vindication/exaltation found elsewhere in early Christian confessions (Phil. 2:5-11; cf. 1 Pet. 2:7-8) and preaching (Acts 2:22-24; 3:12-16; 4:10-12).

After his spontaneous confession (Mark 8:29), Peter's misunderstanding is surprising (8:32b). He "rebukes" Jesus—the same term used of Jesus' "rebuke" of demons (1:25). Like the relatives of 3:21, Peter may think Jesus "out of his senses." Jesus responds with an even stronger rebuke and calls Peter "Satan" (8:33). Like Satan (1:13) he attempts to turn Jesus away from God's will. Etymologically "Satan" means "adversary" and Peter is such because "he does not think the thoughts of God, but human thoughts" (v. 33).

8:34-9:1, Further Instruction on Discipleship. These sayings, often called "the cost of discipleship," are addressed to the crowd and not simply the disciples of 8:27. They unfold the most radical implications of proper confession of Jesus as Messiah. Would-be disciples must enter into that same mystery that characterized Jesus' life. Following of Jesus, denial of self-interest even to the point of losing one's life for Jesus and the Gospel (v. 35), paradoxically results in making life more secure (i.e., saving it). For a community recently exposed to the horrors of Nero's persecution, such sayings are both challenging and consoling.

The demands of discipleship are then supported by the threat of eschatological rejection of those who are ashamed of Jesus and his words (v. 38). This saying reflects current apocalyptic expectation that at the final judgment those who suffer unjustly will be vindicated and rewarded, while their persecutors will be punished (cf. Mark 13:24-27; 2 Thess. 1:4-5; Phil. 1:28; 1 Enoch 60:6; 100-101). The final saying (Mark 9:1) where Jesus says that some of his hearers will be alive when the kingdom comes in power reflects the expectation in early Christianity that the Parousia (or return) of the Lord was imminent (1 Thess. 4:15-18; 1 Cor. 7:29, 31).

9:2-13, The Transfiguration. After the prediction of the Passion and the sober demands of following Jesus, Mark presents a vision of the exaltation of the suffering Messiah (9:2-9). The term "transfigured" (v. 2) is used elsewhere of the transformation of the risen body (Phil. 3:21; 2 Cor. 3:18; cf. 1 Cor. 15:51). The account is rich in OT allusions: the appearance of the glory of the Lord to Moses on Mount Sinai after six days (Exod. 24:16-17, cf. Mark 9:2); glistening garments as a sign of the glorified state (Dan. 7:9; cf. Rev. 3:5, 4:4, 7:9; 1 Enoch 62:15-16; 2 Enoch 22:8); Elijah and Moses symbolizing the "law and the prophets" as well as two people who were taken up into God's presence (2 Kings 2:9-12; Deut. 34:6 was interpreted in postbiblical thought as the "assumption" of Moses); the cloud and the voice as symbols of God's presence (Exod. 16:10, 19:9, 16).

After the appearance of the exalted Jesus, in stylized misunderstanding, Peter (Mark 9:5) says, "It is well that we are here," and requests that they build "three booths" (a term for the dwelling of God with the people, Exod. 25:1-9; Ezek. 37:27, 43:7). The account culminates in the voice proclaiming again (Mark 9:7; cf. 1:11) that Jesus is God's beloved son, whose word is authoritative ("listen to him"). Just as at the baptism the voice from heaven sanctioned the first phase of the ministry of God's son, the more elaborate theophany of the transfiguration inaugurates the second phase (suffering and death). Jesus is God's son not only as one powerful in word and work, but in a deeper sense as the one who follows his Father's will even to the cross. Peter's unanswered request represents an attempt to rest in the glory without following the way of the cross. The narrative ends suddenly with the disappearance of the supernatural phenomenon. The disciples suddenly (9:8) see only Jesus with them. The vision and the hope it offers is no substitute for the path they must follow with Jesus, a perspective emphasized by the concluding sayings that caution secrecy until after the resurrection (9:9) and return to the theme of the deaths of John and Jesus (9:10-13).

9:14-29, The Possessed Boy. After the serene image of the transfiguration, Jesus then returns to find the disciples who earlier had cast out many demons (6:13) unable to exorcise a particularly destructive demon. Jesus attributes their inability to lack of faith (9:19, cf. 6:6) and the story becomes the occasion for instruction on faith. Jesus tells the father that "all things are possible to one who believes" (cf. 11:20-25), which evokes the prayer of the father, "Lord I believe, help my unbelief." The exorcism (9:25-27) is then recounted in more detail than normal with an overlay of resurrection language (vv. 26-27, "he is dead . . . he rose up"). Alone with the disciples Jesus tells them that such a demon can be driven out only by prayer. Whatever the original form of this vivid narrative, Mark has adapted it to his theology. The promise of glory and the coming exaltation of Jesus (the transfiguration) exist along with destructive power of evil. During Jesus' absence (which Mark's community experiences), prayer enables his followers to confront this power. The path from unbelief to belief begins with the cry, "help my unbelief." The first passion prediction unit thus concludes with a summons to faith and prayer.

9:30-50

The Second Passion Prediction Unit

9:30-32, Second Passion Prediction. The journey resumes in 9:30 followed quickly by a condensed passion prediction (the oldest form of the three), with a brief indication of the misunderstanding by the disciples (9:32). These will be followed by three collections of sayings (9:33-37, 38-41, 42-50) addressed to the disciples.

9:33-37, Dispute over the Greatest and Instruction on Service. In a pattern that will be expanded in 10:35-45, though having heard Jesus' prediction of his humiliation, the disciples argue about "who was the greatest" (9:34). Jesus' response in both word and symbol spells out the ethical implications of his example. The one who would be first must be last and servant of all (v. 35; cf. 10:45). He then takes a child, who in biblical thought is a symbol not of innocence but of powerlessness and vulnerability, and says that whoever receives the child receives him (9:36). In contrast to the disciples' concern for power, Jesus says that only those who accept the powerless and vulnerable will receive both him and God (v. 37, "the one who sent me"; cf. Matt. 25:31-46). Jesus will later say that one must actually become like the child to enter the kingdom of heaven (10:15).

9:38-50, The Unknown Exorcist and Teaching on Discipleship. The following pericope (vv. 38-41) undercuts any exclusive claim of the Twelve to divine power. Rather ironically since only a short time ago they could not exorcise (9:18), they forbid another exorcist "who was not following us" (v. 38). Jesus' reply repeats that universalistic thrust found earlier that those who are not explicitly disciples can do God's work (cf. 3:31-35).

The final section (9:42-50) collects originally independent sayings and unites them by catchwords, e.g., "scandal" (RSV, "cause to sin"; 9:42, 43, 45, 47); "salt" (9:49-50). They depict in radical images the risk of inauthentic discipleship and suggest that vying for positions of power can cause little ones (not only the powerless but those weak in faith) to "fall away" (lit. "be tripped"; the Gk. word is the root of the English "scandalize"; cf. 4:17). The seriousness of such "scandal" is supported by metaphors that suggest self-mutilation is better than losing the opportunity to enter the kingdom of God (9:47). The section concludes with a mixed metaphor of salt as accompanying Temple sacrifices ("salted with fire," Lev. 2:13; Ezek. 43:24; cf. Exod. 30:35) and as a seasoning and preservative for food. Disciples who bicker about power, rather than lead sacrificial lives, will lose their effectiveness (salt losing its saltiness). Rather they are to live in peace.

10:1-31

Interlude: Teaching to Crowds Across the Jordan

In 10:1 Jesus resumes the journey and, under the general theme of "discipleship on the way," Mark locates here the longest "ethical" section of his Gospel (addressed to the crowds as well as to disciples). Jesus offers instruction on marriage (10:1-12), children (10:13-16), riches (10:17-27), and the rewards of discipleship (10:28-31). Since this teaching treats "domestic" issues and is located in gentile territory ("beyond the Jordan"), it addresses concerns that are alive in the "house-churches" of Mark's community. (On house-churches, see Rom. 16:5; 1 Cor. 16:19; Col. 4:15.)

10:1-12, Teaching on Divorce. To "test" Jesus, the Pharisees question his attitude toward divorce (10:1-12), an issue that divided the Pharisees themselves at the time of Jesus. His response is not simply the prohibition of divorce but a denunciation of the "hardness of heart" that opened the door to abusive divorce (v. 5). According to OT law (Deut. 24:1-4) and its application at the time of Jesus, husbands could divorce their wives on very little cause. Such practice could lead to abuse and exploitation of women. By citing the creation narratives of Genesis (esp. 1:27; 2:24) in his response, Jesus counters that the purpose of marriage was lifelong mutuality and interdependence, not dominance of one party by the other. Spouses cannot treat each other as property to be discarded.

As the teaching of Jesus was handed on, it was also modified. Matthew allows divorce because of "unchastity" (5:32; 19:9; Gk. porneia, also interpreted as "adultery" or marriage within forbidden kinship boundaries). Paul (1 Cor. 7:12-16) allows divorce between a Christian and a pagan spouse when initiated by the latter. In Mark 10:10-11, this teaching is also adapted in two ways: first, to a Roman/Hellenistic setting where both the man (v. 11) and woman (v. 12) could initiate divorce—which a woman could not do in a Palestinian setting—and second, by explicitly prohibiting only "marrying another," it allows for divorce but without remarriage (i.e., some form of legal separation).

10:13-16, Receiving Children. The following sayings on children (10:13-16; cf. 9:33-37, 42) follow naturally after a discussion of marriage, and also may be located here because of a dispute in the early community about the baptism or admission of children. The "blessing" and "laying on of hands" (v. 16) suggest some rite of admission. Children are also without legal rights (like women under first-century divorce laws) so the two incidents reflect Jesus' concern for the powerless.

10:17-31, The Rich Young Man and Teaching on Wealth. This narrative (10:17-22) is the only instance in the Gospels where a person refuses a call to follow Jesus, and it occasions a longer discourse on wealth (10:23-31). The would-be disciple is an observant seeker after eternal life. For this Jesus "loved him," and invites him to join the circle of those first called by doing as they did (cf. 1:18; 10:28). He becomes sad since he cannot abandon his many possessions (cf. 8:36). Though there is biblical precedent for associating riches with God's blessings (e.g., Job 1:10; 42:10; Ps. 128:1-2; Isa. 3:10), the more dominant strain (taken over by Mark and expanded by Luke) is the pervasive concern for the danger of wealth. The rich are described as wise in their own eyes (Prov. 28:11) and are prone to apostasy and violence (Amos 5:4-13; Isa. 2:6-8; cf. James 5:1-6).

The subsequent sayings (Mark 10:23-25) make this clear. After the departure of the now-saddened rich young man, Jesus states, "How hard it is for the rich to enter the kingdom of God" (v. 23). They cannot make the radical sacrifice called for earlier (9:43-47). Yet even this seeming impossibility (underscored by the comparison of the camel and the eye of the needle) can yield to the power of God (cf. Gen. 18:14).

The tone of the conversation shifts with the unfinished exclamation of Peter, "We have left everything and followed you" (Mark 10:28; Matt. 19:27 completes the implicit question, by adding "What then shall we have?"). The context of Peter's exclamation is the concern of the disciples throughout this section for the rewards of discipleship, and its background is the often extravagant pictures of the future rewards of the just (1 Enoch 25:1-6, 92:3-5; 2 Esd. 7:88-99; Matt. 19:28). Jesus' response rather directs Peter to the rewards of this life. The community of disciples that will be formed by the call of Jesus will replace natural family and material possessions (Mark 10:30). Such sayings are not simply figures of speech. They here reflect the ethos of Mark's community. Early Christians, whose conversions often involved a break with their natural families, experienced new familial bonds (Acts 4:32; 1 Cor. 4:15; Rom. 16:13-17). Hospitality and mutual acceptance gave them new homes, mothers, brothers, and sisters.

Among the new family Mark omits "fathers," for in the ethos of this whole section service is to replace patriarchal power. The somewhat jarring comment that all this comes "with persecutions" mirrors actual persecutions (e.g., under Nero). Persecutions could arise also from their criticism of wealth and power, from their willingness to accept children into the community, which confronted the patria potestas (Lat.) or absolute power of the father in that culture, as well as from their rejection of the patriarchal structure of marriage.

10:32-45

The Third Passion Prediction Unit

The middle section of the Gospel concludes with Jesus and the disciples almost in solemn procession drawing near Jerusalem (10:32). The pattern of prediction (10:32-34) and misunderstanding (10:35-37) is elaborated by sayings of Jesus that are central to the theology of the whole Gospel (10:43-45). The misunderstandings after the prediction do not center on the problem of the suffering of Jesus as in 8:32-33, but on the implications of this for his followers. The misunderstandings are twofold: first, the request of James and John for vice-regency in the coming kingdom (10:35-40), and second, the indignation of the other disciples (10:40-42; cf. 9:34).

10:32-34, Third Passion Prediction. The third passion prediction is the most detailed of the three and a capsule summary of the passion narrative.

10:35-40, The Request of James and John. In response to the request of James and John to sit at the right and left "in glory" (i.e., when Jesus returns as judge, 8:38; 13:26), Jesus asks whether they can drink the cup he will drink and be baptized with the baptism he will be baptized with (10:38). On the narrative level this points to the forthcoming Passion, when Jesus will accept the cup that his Father offers (14:36). Since in the narrative the same disciples who protest their willingness to accept the fate of Jesus will flee at his arrest, Jesus' prediction of 10:39 ("you will drink") may be veiled allusion to the subsequent martyrdoms of James and John. In the reference to the baptism and cup, Mark's community also can reflect on their own baptisms and celebration of the Lord's Supper as a summons to follow Jesus on the way of discipleship.

10:41-45, The Indignation of the Other Disciples and Jesus' Example of True Discipleship. After the indignation of the other disciples at the request, the sayings of 10:42-45 constitute the high point of discipleship instruction of 8:22-10:52. In contrast to gentile rulers who "lord it over others," the disciples should strive to be "servants" (10:43, the Gk. term means "menial table server"), and those who wish to be "first" (like James and John) must be slaves, that is, at the beck and call of others (v. 44). The basis is that "the Son of man came not to be served but to serve and to give his life as a ransom for many" (v. 45). This saying derives its force by contrast with the first part of the Gospel where Jesus is the powerful Son of God. Power is here radically redefined in terms of self-emptying service. Behind this saying stands the figure of the Suffering Servant of Isa. 52:13-53:12 whose death brings freedom to others. "Ransom" is a technical term for the money paid to purchase freedom for a slave. Here and in 14:24, Jesus' life itself is given as such a ransom for many (cf. Rom. 3:24).

Transitional Giving-of-Sight Story

The healing of blind Bartimaeus at Jericho (about twenty miles northeast of Jerusalem in the Jordan Valley; cf. 1:5), along with 8:22-26, not only provides the frame for the middle section, but provides the transition to the Jerusalem ministry. Bartimaeus' cry to Jesus, "Son of David, have mercy on me" (10:47), evokes the story of David returning to claim his kingdom in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 19:31-20:3). This confession also contains the first public and unrebutted recognition of Jesus as royal Messiah. Paradoxically, Jesus, who earlier announced the imminence of God's kingdom (Mark 1:14), will reign in Jerusalem, but from the cross (15:26). After the healing, the saying of Jesus, "Your faith has saved you" (10:52), and the action of the blind man have symbolic force. The blind man who asks simply for mercy is given sight. Unlike the disciples' desire for power, which blinds them to the necessity of suffering, the faith of the blind man leads to salvation. He follows on the way as a disciple.

PART FOUR: 11:1-13:37

The Messianic Actions and Teaching of Jesus in Jerusalem

With the goal of the journey attained, Jesus now enters Jerusalem with his disciples. Where Galilee was the place of revelation of Jesus as the powerful Son of God and of his acclamation by crowds (e.g., 1:28, 45; 2:13; 3:9; 5:21; 8:1), Jerusalem quickly becomes a center of opposition (11:18, 12:12). The only mighty work of Jesus performed here is a destructive miracle (11:12-14). He calls the Temple a "den of bandits" (11:17) and engages in controversy with Temple authorities (11:27-12:38). The Jerusalem leaders are equated with the unfaithful tenants who kill the son of the owner, and the vineyard will be given "to others" (12:1-12). After leaving the Temple in 13:1, Jesus will never again enter it and utters a series of ominous prophecies against the city and Temple (13:1-27). The passion narrative unfolds in Jerusalem where the Jerusalem aristocracy in collusion with the Roman authority effect the death of Jesus (14:1-15:47). Though the resurrection is recounted in Jerusalem (16:1-8), the promised meeting between Jesus and his first followers is to take place in Galilee (16:7). The place of the first revelation becomes the center of the hoped-for appearance.

The polemic against the Jewish leaders and Jewish institutions should be evaluated in its historical and literary context. The most bitter opposition to Jesus in Mark comes not from the bulk of the people and the Pharisees but from established Temple personnel who were in league with the Romans and themselves considered illegitimate by other Jewish groups (e.g., by the Essenes). The Gospel is also written for Christians a generation after the death of Jesus, and most likely after the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70. Different Jewish groups and early Christians are claiming to be authentic heirs of the traditions of Israel, and the Gospels reflect the bitterness of interreligious strife (esp. Matt. 23). Mark also reflects the apocalyptic or deterministic view of history that attributes the rejection of Jesus by his own people to God's foreordained plan.

Ministry of Jesus in Jerusalem, Conflict of Kingdoms

Though much of the material here is pre-Markan, such as the expulsion of the buyers and sellers from the Temple (see John 2:13-22) and a collection of five controversies (11:27-33; 12:13-17, 18-27, 28-34, 35-37; cf. 2:1-3:6), the Evangelist organizes the traditions in terms of his theology. He constructs a stylized chronology of six days in Jerusalem, three prior to the passion narrative (11:1, 12, 19) and three prior to the crucifixion and burial (14:1, 12, 17; 15:42). The events of the initial days are also carefully organized. After the entry into Jerusalem and the initial opposition (11:1-26), Mark places a controversy (11:27-33) and a parable (12:1-12) at the center of the Jerusalem ministry. In these first two sections the opposition so heightens that the vineyard (heritage of Israel) will be given to others (the Jewish Christian community of Mark). In the final controversies (12:13-37) Jesus teaches about issues that are at the center of the missionary proclamation of the Gospel to the nations (Mark 13:10). After a final attack on the scribes (12:38-40) and a transitional story about a widow (12:41-44), Jesus abandons the Temple (13:1).

11:1-26, Entry into Jerusalem, Cleansing of the Temple, and Cursing of the Fig Tree. The messianic arrival at Jerusalem (11:1-11) comprises two distinct phases: the obtaining of the colt (vv. 1-6) and the acclamation of the crowd (7-11). Though often called the "triumphal entry" into Jerusalem, the acclamation of Jesus takes place prior to the actual entry (11:10), which is simply a cursory visit by Jesus and the Twelve. The narrative, dense with OT allusions, presents and reinterprets contemporary messianic expectations. The Mount of Olives (11:1) was associated with the arrival of the Messiah (Zech. 14:4; cf. Josephus Jewish War

2.13.5, §261–63). In contrast, however, to the militant Davidic Messiah attested in texts such as Psalms of Solomon 17, Jesus arrives, “humble, riding on an ass” (Zech. 9:9). While military leaders rode on horses, messengers of peace rode on donkeys. Garments were thrown on the ground to welcome an anointed king (2 Kings 9:13); the colt on which no one has ridden may recall the as yet unyoked cows that pulled the Ark (1 Sam. 6:7). In appropriating the narrative Mark stresses three things: first, Jesus as the Lord of his destiny and reliable prophet whose word is verified (Mark 11:1–8; cf. 14:12–16); second, the true understanding of Jesus’ Davidic messiahship—Jesus is a peaceful Messiah who prepares for the coming of his father’s kingdom (11:10); and third, the contrast between the people who acclaim Jesus (11:7–10) and the leaders who plot to kill him (11:18; 12:12).

The cursing of the fig tree (11:12–14, 20–25) and the cleansing of the Temple (11:15–19) are “intercalated” and interpret each other. The cursing of the fig tree may have developed from a parable such as Luke 13:6–9, where the unfruitful tree symbolizes an unfaithful people (Isa. 5:1–7; Jer. 8:13; Mic. 7:1) and, along with the expulsion of the buyers and sellers from the Temple, constitutes a parabolic action (familiar in the prophets, e.g., Jer. 27:2; Ezek 4:1–5:17; also connected with destruction of Jerusalem).

The enigmatic comment in Mark 11:13 that the tree is cursed for not having fruit even though “it was not the season for figs” reflects apocalyptic determinism. Paraphrased it means, “it was determined that this would not be the proper time for the Jewish leaders to bear fruit,” i.e., receive Jesus. The barren tree and the mercantile Temple symbolize to Mark’s community that the older religious institutions and observances are not binding (cf. 7:1–23), and they are now to see their community as a fulfillment of Isaiah’s prophecy of a “house of prayer for all nations” (11:17; Isa. 56:7).

The instruction on prayer (Mark 11:21–25) evoked by Isaiah’s prophecy directs the disciples’ attention away from the fig tree and Temple to the challenge they face. More important than religious institution and practice is faith in God (11:22), which can accomplish the seemingly impossible (i.e., move mountains; cf. 10:27). Such faith is required in order to forgive “anyone” (v. 25) against whom you have anything. This exhortation puts into proper perspective the harsh actions and sayings of Jesus of the two previous incidents. Faith, prayer, and forgiveness are more important than complacency over the rejection of the Temple.

11:27–12:12, The Center of the Jerusalem Ministry: Jesus, the Rejected Son, Teachers with Messianic Authority. The “third entry” into Jerusalem (11:27; see 11:11, 15) is quickly followed by a “trial” of Jesus (11:28–33) over the source of his authority by the high priests, scribes, and elders (the same groups that conduct the formal trial in 15:53–65). In the Galilean controversies (2:1–3:6), the authority (2:10; 2:28) of Jesus as Son of man was established. The Jewish leaders remain blind to this authority. When challenged (11:28), Jesus responds in rabbinic fashion with a counterquestion, asking them to take a stand on the baptism of John. Caught on the horns of a dilemma (admitting John’s divine authority and disbelieving him, or criticizing a popular figure) they are reduced to silence. Since John prophesied that a stronger one would come after him (1:7) and since Jesus’ authority rests on divine confirmation (1:11; 9:7), Mark’s readers know that the officials are implicitly indicting themselves for their rejection of Jesus.

The parable of the wicked vineyard tenants (12:1–12) forms the centerpiece of the Jerusalem ministry. Gospel of Thomas 65 contains a less allegorical version of the parable, omitting the reference to Isaiah 5 (as does Luke 20:9) and the beloved son (Mark 12:6). As an original parable of Jesus it could express the constant reaching out by the long-suffering God for human response in the face of continued rejection (cf. Hos. 2:2, 14–20; Jer. 3:11–14; Ezek. 16:59–63). Jesus speaks parabolically of his ministry as embodying such an offer of God’s mercy to all who hear him.

Its present form manifests strong allegorical elements, such as the verbal similarity between 12:1 and Isa. 5:1–2 (where the vineyard equals the house of Israel; cf. Isa. 5:7); Mark 12:2–5, the repeated sending of servants (a term used in the OT for prophets, Jer. 7:25, 25:4; Amos 3:7; Zech. 1:6) and their violent rejection (also recalling the fate of OT prophets, 1 Kings 18:13; 22:26–27; 2 Chron. 24:20–22; 36:15–16); the final sending of the “beloved son” (Mark 12:6, a term used elsewhere for Jesus, 1:11; 9:7); and the destruction of the tenants and the transfer of the vineyard “to others” (12:9), reflecting the destruction of the Temple. The saying on the rejected stone (vv. 10–11) that becomes the cornerstone (or keystone) of a new building is added to the parable from a collection of OT “stone” texts used by early Christians as a defensive explanation for the rejection of Jesus, and to buttress their claim to be the new building (temple) of God (see Ps. 118:22; Isa. 8:14–15, 28:16; cf. Acts 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:6–8; Eph. 2:20–22).

With the aid of Isaiah 5 and the addition of “beloved son” Mark locates this allegory of the rejection of Jesus by Temple authorities at that point in the Gospel where Jesus, in conflict with Jewish authorities, is pointing to the emergence of the Christian community (the house that will be built on the cornerstone). It also answers the question of Mark 11:27, "By what authority?" The authority of Jesus is that of the "beloved son" (12:6), sent from the Father, but rejected by the tenants. At the end of the parable (v. 12) the questioners from 11:27 perceive that the parable is directed against them.

12:13-34, In Controversy with Jerusalem Leaders, Jesus Offers a Compendium of Belief. The three controversies following the parable form a subunit. While the first of the five controversies (11:27-33, on authority) and the last (12:35-37) take place in the Temple, the three in 12:13-34 are not localized and are initiated in stylized fashion by the three major groups of opponents in the Gospel: Pharisees and Herodians (12:13; cf. 3:6), Sadducees (12:18), and a scribe (12:28). They deal with three issues that were paramount to Mark's community (the "others" of 12:9) in its missionary preaching to Gentiles: relation to secular authority, the meaning of resurrection, and the core of their faith, love of God and neighbor.

In the first (12:13-18) the Pharisees try to trap Jesus into taking a dangerous stand on either side of a debated issue, paying taxes to Caesar. In a theocracy, as was the ideal of Jewish society, which the Zealots of A.D. 66-70 attempted to restore, a gentile ruler could be viewed as an usurper of divine prerogatives. Paying taxes was tantamount to diminishing God's sovereignty; refusal could imply political resistance, which the Romans brutally suppressed. Just as Jesus posed a dilemma on authority to his opponents (11:29), they now retaliate in kind. The narrative depicts Jesus as victor in this contest of dilemmas (12:17, "they were amazed").

The action of Jesus (pointing to the inscription on the coin) and the saying, "return to Caesar the things of Caesar and to God the things of God," is as controverted (and misused) as any in the Gospels. While this saying (and the Gospel as a whole) never spells out just what constitute the "things of God" and "of Caesar," it does not relegate religion to the "spiritual" realm nor sanction the moral autonomy of the secular sphere. In the third controversy of this subunit (12:28-34) the "greatest commandment" is whole-hearted love of God and neighbor that is to permeate all of life. No human ruler shares power or demands allegiance equal to God (cf. Acts. 5:29). In its first-century context the saying of 12:17 affirms the sovereignty of God without adopting the theocratic or sectarian implications of that sovereignty (cf. Rom. 13:1-7; 1 Pet. 2:11-17).

In the following controversy (Mark 12:18-27) the mode of argument is more rabbinic, consisting of text and countertext, all taken from the Pentateuch, since the Sadducees (v.

18) gave greatest authority to the five books of Moses and (unlike the Pharisees) rejected the binding force of oral interpretations. Also in contrast to the Pharisees, they did not believe the resurrection (cf. Acts 23:8). Their objection (12:19-23) involves a rather crass interpretation of Moses' command on preserving the family line through levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5-10). Jesus attacks their attitude as unfaithful to Scripture and ignorant of God's power. Those who rise from the dead will be like the angels, spiritual beings alive in God's presence (cf. 1 Cor. 15:42-49). Jesus then cites Exod. 3:6 (the revelation of God's name to Moses) against their "scriptural proof" to argue that if God was revealed "as a God of the living" to their ancestors, these same ancestors must be alive. Mark's readers are able to find in Jesus' spiritual view of the resurrection a way to adapt their own resurrection faith to a more spiritually minded Hellenistic audience, in a manner free of crude materialistic traits (cf. 1 Cor. 15:35-38; Acts 17:32).

Unlike the previous incidents the Great Commandment (12:28-34) does not begin with a hostile question, for the scribe turns to Jesus to solve a disputed issue. Scribes and rabbis had often attempted to codify the law and summarize its more than six hundred precepts under fundamental principles. The issue here is what principles Jesus will choose, not whether he can do so. Asked about which commandment is "first of all," Jesus begins by quoting Deut. 6:4-5, which forms the beginning of the Jewish daily prayer, the Shema (from the Heb. verb, "hear"; → Shema). This prayer is an epitome of biblical faith and affirms the absolute sovereignty of God in all areas of life. The second commandment, also a citation of the OT (Lev. 19:18), is simply to love your neighbor as yourself.

This answer is then ratified and repeated by the scribe (Mark 12:32-33), whom Jesus states is not far from the kingdom (v. 34). The scribe in citing Hos. 6:6 confirms that such behavior is "much more" than burnt offerings and sacrifices. As the Temple will be replaced by the house of prayer (Mark 11:17) its sacrifices will be replaced by love of God and neighbor. This pericope should not be used to oppose the Christian love command to Jewish legalism. Later Jewish writings contain the command to love the neighbor (Jub. 7:20, 20:2), and urge forgiveness of enemies (Sir. 28:2; Philo On The Virtues 106-109). The praise of the scribe is Mark's way of acknowledging Christianity's debt to Judaism. Its most basic commands are the same. As with the teaching on the taxes to Caesar and the resurrection, the dual command of love offers Mark's community a way of presenting the core of their faith and heritage to outsiders.

12:35-44, The Temple Teaching of Jesus.

The explicit mention of the Temple (12:35) recalls the setting of 11:27. In three brief incidents the Marcan Jesus defines his correct messianic status and again attacks Temple authorities.

The question about David's son (12:35-37), though often listed as the final Jerusalem controversy, lacks the formal characteristics of such narratives—no question is posed by opponents and there is no counterquestion by Jesus. Rather, Jesus cites a scribal opinion that the Messiah is a Son of David, only to reject it. In view of the earlier acceptance of Son of David (10:48) as a title of Jesus, this incident is puzzling. In quoting Ps. 110:1 to show that the Messiah is David's "Lord" rather than son, the Marcan Jesus cites a psalm frequently used as a proof-text for the exaltation/resurrection of Jesus (cf. Mark 14:62; Acts. 2:34-35; 1 Cor. 15:25; Heb. 1:13). This incident reflects the theology of the Marcan church that, while affirming Jesus' Davidic origin and messianic mission, rejects popular messianic expectations and redefines them in terms of the exaltation of Jesus above his enemies.

The Temple teaching of Jesus concludes with a warning against the scribes (12:38-40), primarily for ostentatious religious practices as a pretext for injustice, "they devour the houses of widows using as a pretext lengthy prayers" (v. 39). Similar warnings are frequent in the prophetic writings (Isa. 10:1-2; Zech. 7:10; Mal. 3:5) and underscore the growing estrangement in this section between Jesus and the Jerusalem leaders.

The following incident of the widow's offering (Mark 12:41-44) continues the motif of the exploitation of widows. This destitute widow ("poor" is too weak a translation) who gives only two small coins (roughly equal to one sixty-fourth of the contemporary daily wage) does more than the rich who contribute "out of their surplus" to the Temple. She has given her whole livelihood (lit., her life). Her action has been invoked as a symbol of wholehearted discipleship, generosity, and unquestioning surrender.

The text, however, contains no explicit praise of her action—an action that seems to accomplish the very thing the scribes were accused of fostering (12:40; cf. also the criticism of corban in 7:11). Recently Jesus' statement has been interpreted as a "lament" where Jesus points to the woman as an example of the exploitation of widows (see Wright, pp. 256-65). Paraphrased it would read, "What I say is true about the scribes]. This poor widow with nothing to spare gave everything."

Mark however adapts this "lament" to his context. The incident provides the bridge between Jesus' attacks on the Temple and its authorities, Mark 11-12, and the predictions of the destruction of the Temple in Mark 13. It also prepares for the woman who anoints Jesus in Jerusalem who, like the widow, gave "what she had" (14:8; cf. 12:44) and for the discipleship of other women during the passion narrative (15:40-41, 47; 16:1-8).

13:1-37*The Apocalyptic Testament of Jesus

All four Gospels conclude the public ministry with a private address of Jesus to his disciples (Mark 13; Luke 21; Matt. 24-25; John 13-17). In Mark (followed by Matthew and Luke) the discourse contains predictions of political unrest, natural disasters, and persecution of the community—all of which culminate in cosmic upheavals that usher in the return of the Son of man. It is often called "the synoptic apocalypse" since it employs motifs and images from Jewish apocalyptic writings; like these it is "persecution literature" with a deterministic view of history (13:7, 10) that assures persecuted communities of their vindication and of God's judgment of their oppressors. Unlike much apocalyptic literature, the discourse is not in the form of a supernatural vision given a prophetic figure (e.g., Rev. 1:1, 9-10), but more akin to the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs in which, prior to his death, each of the patriarchs warns his heirs of future dangers and exhorts them to fidelity to the covenant. As a mixture of prediction and parenesis (warnings and admonitions), Mark 13 forms an "apocalyptic testament." One of the characteristics of such testaments is that, in the form of predictions from the past, the sayings address the present concerns of the community for which a document is written. Mark 13 thus becomes a key for understanding the struggles of the Marcan community.

The apocalyptic testament and the subsequent passion narrative (Mark 14-16) in effect form a dual conclusion to the public ministry of Jesus. In one, the historical Jesus is betrayed, executed, and raised up; in the other, the risen Jesus returns as glorified Son of man to gather the elect (13:24-27). Prior to the concealing of the power of Jesus in the Passion, the disciples are given a rationale for their suffering and images of hope of their vindication.

The discourse manifests a definite literary and theological structure. After an introduction in which the destruction of the Temple is predicted (13:1-4), the sufferings preceding the end time are predicted in two stages (13:5-13, 14-23). The discourse then shifts to images of their future vindication (13:24-27) and concludes with parables and exhortations to vigilance (13:28-37) addressed to the actual situation of the community. The warnings in 13:5-6, 21-23 against "deceivers," who claim to come in the name of Jesus and who work signs and wonders, suggest that the community was beset with false messiahs who interpreted the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70 as a definite sign that the end time had arrived. By his organization of material, Mark says that all these things are simply the beginning of the woes and that the Son of man will return only "after the tribulation" (13:24). The structure undercuts any attempt to identify a particular historical event as signaling the return of Jesus.

13:1-4, The Introduction. On leaving the Temple (the setting of 12:35-44), in response to a disciple's exclamation of its beauty Jesus predicts its total destruction (13:1-2). In a change of scene (on the Mount of Olives, opposite the Temple, see Ezek. 10:18-19, 11:23; Zech. 14) the disciples then ask Jesus "when" these things will be and what "sign" will indicate they are about to unfold (Mark 13:3-4). Speculation about the signs and the temporal sequence of eschatological events is frequent in apocalyptic literature.

13:5-13, The Beginning of the Tribulation. Rather than answering the disciples' question, Jesus (vv. 5-6) warns them that deceivers claiming divine power (13:6, "I Am") will come who will lead many astray (cf. 2 Thess. 2:1-11). Wars and natural disasters are not signs, only the beginning of the "birth pangs" (Mark 13:8) of the end time.

While wars and natural disasters are familiar apocalyptic motifs as well as frequent historical occurrences in the first century, the persecutions of 13:9-13 seem to reflect real experiences of the community. A probable backdrop to these verses is the persecution under Nero (A.D. 64) as well as the civil chaos that surrounded the later years of Nero's reign and followed his death in A.D. 68. In addition to the physical horrors of Nero's persecution, the Roman historian Tacitus (ca. A.D. 56-116) records that Christians, when arrested, indicted a "vast number" of fellow Christians (Tacitus Annals 15.44). Writing from Rome at the end of the first century to warn the community at Corinth of the dangers of disharmony, Clement of Rome remarks that it was through "jealousy and envy" that the "righteous pillars" of the church were persecuted at Rome (1 Clem. 5:1-2). Clement provides evidence that discord within the Christian community contributed to the persecution. He and Tacitus support the picture of familial division and betrayal that will affect the community according to Mark 13:12-13, and that was one of the worst consequences of Nero's persecution.

These verses do not simply foretell persecution—they link together the fate of Jesus and his followers. Each is "betrayed" by those close to them (13:12; 14:10, 45) and unjustly executed by brutal civil power; in each case suffering is God's will and each is vindicated. Mark 13:9-13 does not urge passive acquiescence to persecution. Rather persecution provides the occasion when, through faithful witness, the Gospel will be proclaimed to all peoples (13:10).

13:14-23, The Desolating Sacrilege and the Great Tribulation. After the instruction on fidelity amid persecution, these verses turn again to events preceding the end, in particular the enigmatic "desolating sacrilege" (or "abomination of desolation") standing where "he" should not. More than the previous civil and natural threats, this causes tribulation such as has never occurred since the foundation of the world (13:19). Though Mark's readers seem to know the identity of the desolating sacrilege (13:14, "let the reader take note"), subsequent generations are unsure. The term derives from Dan. 9:27; 11:31; and 12:11 (cf. 1 Macc. 1:54) in reference to the desecration of the Temple by Antiochus IV who offered pagan sacrifices there (167-164 B.C.). One clue to the identity of the horror in Mark is that the neuter "sacrilege" is modified by a masculine participle, (lit.) "standing where he should not." This could well describe the entrance of the Roman general Titus into the Holy of Holies on August 9 of A.D. 70 during the final days of the Jewish war (Josephus Jewish War 6.4.7, §260; 6.6.1, §316).

For Jews and Jewish Christians the destruction of the Temple was a world-shaking event that could signal the imminent end of history (13:19-20). At this stage in the discourse (13:21-23) Mark returns to the warnings against deception that initiated the discourse. Persecution and the destruction of the Temple has spawned false messiahs and false prophets who perform "signs" and wonders (cf. Matt. 7:21-23), possibly to deceive even the elect (Mark 13:22).

13:24-37, The Return of the Son of Man

In both prediction (vv. 24-27) and parable (vv. 28-37) the Marcan Jesus offers a true eschatological scenario and describes the proper posture toward the end time. The return of the Son of man will not be concurrent with the tribulation but "after those days" (v. 24)—thereby invalidating the claims of the false Christs. It will be accompanied by massive cosmic disturbances (vv. 24-25; cf. Isa. 13:10; 34:4; Ezek. 32:7-8; Joel 2:10, 31; 3:15) and the appearance of the Son of man on the clouds with power and glory (Mark 13:26-27; cf. 8:38-9:1; 14:62). Here is a clear allusion to the vindication and granting of power and glory to "one like a son of man" in Dan. 7:13-14, who is later equated with the "saints of the most high" who suffer persecution under Antiochus IV. Jesus as Son of man is rejected, suffers, dies, and is exalted. So too his faithful followers will be vindicated by his return—and not by the arrival of false messiahs during the tribulation.

The two concluding parables (Mark 13:28-29, 34-37) with the intervening sayings are complementary. The community is told to discern the signs of the times. Just as the budding fig tree shows that summer is near, the events predicted thus far (13:3-23) show the end is assured and near, but not here. The solemn prediction of v. 30 reflects the eschatological hope of Mark's community that Jesus' return will take place in their lifetimes (cf. 9:1).

The second parable with its introductory sayings (13:32-36) counters both undue speculation about the end and passivity. Not even Jesus knows the exact day or hour, so that his words and deeds cannot be invoked to identify any particular event with the end (vv. 32-33). The little parable of the absent master (vv. 34-36) is really an allegory of life in Mark's house-churches. Jesus is absent; each of his "servants" receives his "power" (v. 34; cf. 6:7) and each has a task (cf. 1 Cor. 12:1-12). Vigilance and fidelity (active waiting), not idle speculation, are to characterize the community (Mark 13:35-36). Jesus' final testimony gives a theology of history to his persecuted and missionary community and a promise that he is never far from them.

PART FIVE: 14:1-16:8

The Suffering, Death, and Resurrection of the Son of Man in Jerusalem

All four Gospels conclude with a connected account of the final days of Jesus' life, his execution by Roman authorities, and the proclamation of his resurrection. No two accounts agree on all points, with the greatest discrepancy between John and the Synoptics (e.g., for John the Last Supper takes place on the "eve" of Passover; for the Synoptics, it is a Passover meal; John omits the institution of the Eucharist from his account of the Last Supper). Similarly all four accounts reflect the distinctive literary style and theological concerns of each Evangelist. Nonetheless on substantive details there is enough similarity to suggest that there were common accounts and traditions on which all the Evangelists drew.

A suggested development of the accounts is first, an early, brief kerygmatic narrative such as 1 Cor. 11:23-26 (cf. 15:3b-5) used in a liturgical setting; second, a longer account with details from the arrest, trial, and crucifixion of Jesus (here is the greatest agreement between John and the Synoptics); third, the accounts as we now have them with addition of material such as the anointing and the prayer in Gethsemane.

The passion accounts were never narrated purely for historical purposes and from their earliest stages show such strong influence of the OT that in certain places (such as the details of the crucifixion) they comprise a virtual narrative commentary (midrash) on select OT texts (e.g., Ps. 22, cited in Mark 15:24, 29, 34). Especially influential is the motif of the righteous sufferer found in the Psalms (e.g., Pss. 31:4, 11; 35:4, 11, 19-24; 38:12, 14-16) and in the Wisdom of Solomon (2:10-20; 5:1-15). Jesus, like this figure, is persecuted unjustly, suffers in silence, but is vindicated by God. Also very influential is the "servant" of the fourth servant song of Isa. 52:13-53:12 who is exalted after brutal mistreatment.

Theological concerns also shape the accounts: first, apologetic—Jesus was innocent of the charges against him and it was willed by God and predicted in Scripture that Jesus should suffer; second, soteriological—his death as ransom for many brings salvation to those who through faith accept it as an offer of God's mercy; and third, Christological—Jesus' true nature is revealed during the Passion. There is no docetic circumvention of the realism of Jesus' sufferings. Yet, the one who suffers as Son of man is also proclaimed as God's son at the very moment of his death.

From the Plot to Kill Jesus to the Arrest

The passion narrative comprises two major phases. In the first (14:1-52), though aware of his imminent death, Jesus is active, the teacher and leader of the disciples; in the second (14:53-15:47), Jesus is passive, moved from place to place by hostile forces, and rarely speaks.

14:1-11, The Plots Against Jesus, and the Anointing.

The earlier plots against Jesus (3:6; 11:18; 12:12) now culminate in the plan of the high priests and scribes to arrest Jesus and put him to death (14:1) and in the agreement of Judas to betray him to the priests (14:10-11). According to Mark's somewhat obscure chronology (14:1, 10, 12; 15:1, 42; 16:1), the trial before Pilate (15:1-20) and the crucifixion took place on the feast of the Passover (celebrated from the evening of the 14th of Nisan to the evening of the 15th [Friday]), which was also the eve of a Sabbath (15:42; 16:1). The last meal with the disciples, followed by the betrayal, arrest, and night trial (14:12-72), took place on the evening of the 14th of Nisan (Thursday). The anointing and contract of Judas with the priests (14:1-11) should be located on the day preceding (Wednesday).

The likely independent story of a woman who anoints Jesus (14:3-9), recounted at different places in the ministry of Jesus (cf. Luke 7:36-50; John 12:1-7), is inserted between the two plots (14:1, 10) to contrast two attitudes toward the suffering Jesus, betrayal or devotion. The narrative stresses two things, the action of the woman and its interpretation (14:3, 8) and the defense by Jesus against her detractors (14:4-7).

The woman's action, "anointing" (cf. 1 Sam. 10:1; 2 Kings 9:6), constitutes an acclamation that Jesus is a royal Messiah—hence Jesus' explanation in Mark 14:8 conveys the ironic reinterpretation of messiahship characteristic of Mark (cf. 8:29-31). Her action creates an arch to the ending of the passion narrative where women accompany Jesus to the cross (15:40-41) and again propose to anoint him (16:1). The woman's action is praised by Jesus in solemn language (14:9, "Amen I say to you"). Wherever the gospel is proclaimed she does will be spoken of "in memory of her." She confesses her faith by symbolic action and embodies those qualities of devotion, generosity, and courage that the liberating message of the gospel is to proclaim to the whole world. She and the women at the crucifixion "who followed and ministered to Jesus in Galilee" (15:41) manifest faithful discipleship when confronted by the cross, much as the chosen disciples (who flee or deny Jesus) symbolize human fragility.

Jesus' defense of her action continues the earlier attack on "religious" attitudes (14:5, giving alms to the poor) as a cloak for false religion (cf. 7:9-13; 12:38-44). When Jesus says "the poor you always have with you," he is not predicting the inevitability of poverty, but reminding his followers of the duty of Deut. 15:11, to support the poor after his death (14:7, "whenever you will, you can do good to them"). By contrast, the time when they can still serve Jesus is limited.

14:12-31, The Passover with the Disciples. Jesus' final meal with his disciples occupies an important place in the passion narrative and interprets his death. Different elements are interwoven to create a rich tapestry: the commands of Jesus regarding the arrangements for the meal (14:12-16; cf. 11:1-6); the prediction of Judas's betrayal (14:17-21); the institution of the Lord's Supper (14:22-26); and the prediction of Peter's denial (14:27-31). The actions and deeds of Jesus here tell readers the deeper meaning of the tragic events that follow. What appears simply as betrayal and execution of an innocent man is really Jesus' self-offering for many (14:24).

The narrative of the Lord's Supper is handed down in different traditions and has been influenced by the liturgical practice of the early community. Matt. 26:26-29 follows Mark, but Luke (22:14-23) and Paul (1 Cor. 11:23-25) may have independent traditions (e.g., both include the command to continue the supper, "in remembrance of me"—which Mark does not include). Common to all traditions are actions and words over bread and a cup of wine (→ Lord's Supper, The).

Though Mark portrays it as a Passover meal, essential details (such as the eating of the lamb and the account of the deliverance from Egypt) are not mentioned. His account centers on the actions and sayings of Jesus over the bread (14:22) and over the cup (14:23-25). The actions, couched in language similar to 6:41 and 8:6, are a culmination of the feeding and bread incidents in the Gospels. Jesus—who had compassion on the hungry, fed them, and offered bread to the Gentiles—is now himself the bread declared to be body that is an offering for others. The cup of blessing that Jesus gives to them and that they drink is then interpreted as "my blood" of the covenant (in some manuscripts, "new covenant"; cf. Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25; Jer. 31:31) that will be poured out "for many." The phrase recalls that the Mosaic covenant was ratified by the shedding of blood (Exod. 24:8).

The Son of man who came to serve (as Jesus does here when he gives food and drink to his followers) and to give his life as a ransom (Mark 10:45) now offers himself as a sacrificial victim. His death, like the first Passover, will effect liberation. After the "institution" the final words of Jesus (14:25) underscore that the meal is an anticipation of the eschatological banquet (that day when he will drink "the new wine in the kingdom of heaven"). He must first drink the cup of suffering (14:36) before he can celebrate the banquet hoped for by Israel when wine would flow freely and death would be conquered. Mark offers images of hope amid symbols of death and suffering.

Bracketing the supper are renewed predictions of failure by disciples, of the scattering of the sheep, and of the denial of Peter (14:27-31). Permeating these failures is a sense that all this has been willed by God (vv. 21, 27, "it is written"), which then supports the message of hope of 14:28. Jesus, who "went before" his disciples as they wandered through Galilee, will be raised up and again lead them. The prediction of denial (14:30) that is later fulfilled (14:66-72) again stresses that Jesus is a "true prophet" whose promises and predictions come to pass.

14:32-42, The Prayer in Gethsemane Jesus, who had earlier been in control and had predicted his suffering and vindication, now begins "to become severely distressed and troubled" (v. 33), and is afflicted with a grief leading to death (v. 34). Like every human who has lived, Jesus experiences imminent death as an alien force imposed from outside, not to be loved or accepted in itself, but only in terms of some higher vision. As he spoke earlier with assurance of the power of prayer (11:24–25; cf. 14:36, "all things are possible"), he prays now that God will remove the cup of suffering (with overtones of the cup of God's wrath, Isa. 51:17, 22; Jer. 25:15; Ps. 75:7–8).

Three times (Mark 14:40, 41) he turns to those who had been his companions at a moment of God's revelation (9:2; cf. 5:37), only to find them not watching, but sleeping. He warns them to watch and pray that they may not enter into the trial (cf. Matt. 6:13; = Luke 11:4, "the Lord's Prayer"), for "the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak" (v. 40). "Flesh" in biblical thought describes the whole person as blind to God and driven by selfish concerns (Rom. 7:5; Gal. 5:17–21); "spirit" is the person as alive to God (Rom. 8:1–17; Gal. 5:22–26). Those who through prayer do not remain open to God's presence will fail at the time of trial. Jesus who was led by the Spirit to his first trial in the wilderness (Mark 1:12–13), after prayer at Gethsemane, will remain faithful in the ultimate trial of his passion and death.

This realistic narrative conveys a message of hope to a community like Mark's that experienced suffering and persecution. This narrative neither glorifies martyrdom nor mitigates the scandal of suffering. It does present the paradox of one who, when faced by the apparent victory of sin and violence, and whose prayer was not answered, could yet address God with an affirmation of familial trust and love as Abba (Aramaic, "father"; cf. Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:15). In contrast to Peter, who did not see suffering as consonant with the divine plan, Jesus accepts God's will. Like those earlier whom he called mother, sister, and brother because they did the will of God (Mark 3:31–35), he is God's son because of his obedience (cf. Heb. 5:8–9).

14:43–52, The Betrayal and Arrest. With the conclusion of his prayer, the hour has arrived (14:41); the betrayer is at hand and the arrest ensues. The designation of Judas as the betrayer (14:44) and the arrest as a whole fulfills the earlier prophecies (14:18). Betrayal by a kiss, the normal sign of respect and affection (Luke 7:38, 45; 15:20; cf. 1 Cor. 16:20) highlights the evil of Judas (Mark 14:21; cf. Prov. 27:6). After Jesus is seized, his disciples all flee (Mark 14:50).

This flight is followed by the enigmatic incident of the "youth" who is clad only in a robe and flees naked when the arresting officers try to seize him (14:51–52). Since a "youth" (same Greek term) appears at the empty tomb clad in a white robe (16:5), the two youths may symbolize the Christian initiate who strips off the old self in baptism (which in Rom. 6:1–5 is entry into the mystery of Christ's death and resurrection) and puts on a new Christian identity. "Being clothed" is a metaphor for a new mode of existence elsewhere in the NT (see Gal. 3:27; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10).

The "Handing Over" of Jesus to Death and to God's Power

The second half of the passion narrative completes the earlier predictions (8:31; 9:31; 10:33). Here the passive Jesus is led from accuser to accuser, abused, and finally executed. On the narrative level readers are drawn into the mystery of the suffering Messiah. However, there is another "handing over" that transpires. Dying in submission to God's will, Jesus is also handed over to God's power. The narrative does not end with the cry of agony of a dying person (15:39), but with the proclamation, "he is risen" (16:6).

The "Trials" of Jesus and the Responsibility for His Execution

Both the Jewish and Roman trials of Jesus are the subject of considerable debate, with implications for anti-Semitism throughout history. As historical sources, the Gospels themselves present problems. Only Mark (14:53–65; followed by Matt. 26:59–68) records a formal, Jewish, "night" trial with accusations, witnesses, and a sentence. Luke records a morning hearing before the Sanhedrin (Luke 22:66–71) without formal sentencing, and John has separate appearances before Annas (at night) and Caiaphas (in the morning) who conducts an interrogation (18:12–24). All the Gospels agree that the Roman prefect, Pontius Pilate (A.D. 26–36), ordered the execution (also attested by the Roman historian Tacitus, Annals 15.44).

Clarity about the legal situation is lacking. Jewish laws on capital trials are found in texts almost two centuries after the death of Jesus (M. Sanh. 4–11), so it is not known whether they reflect first-century practice. By these norms the trial in Mark is not legal, since according to the Mishnah capital trials could not be held at night or on the eve of a Sabbath or feast day (M. Sanh. 4:1). The sentence of death could not be pronounced on the same day as the trial (M. Sanh. 4:1); prior examination of witnesses, as well as independent agreement of their testimony, was required (M. Sanh. 4:5; cf. Deut. 19:15–18); the charge of blasphemy required the explicit pronouncing of the divine name (M. Sanh. 7:5); and trials were to be held in the official chamber, not in the house of the high priest (M. Sanh. 11:2; cf. Mark 14:54). Also uncertain is whether the Sanhedrin had the power to execute for capital offenses during Roman occupation (see John 18:31). If so, Jesus should have been stoned, which was the Jewish penalty for blasphemy.

Though reconstruction of the events would involve study of all the Gospels, Mark offers some clues to the historical situation. The public reason given in the placard on the cross (Mark 15:26), recorded in all four Gospels, was that Jesus claimed to be a king, which for the Romans was tantamount to sedition. Those crucified with Jesus are called "revolutionary bandits" (Gk. lēstai, 15:27; cf. 14:48). Jesus' teaching on the kingdom, his association with marginal groups in his society, and his attacks on abuses associated with the Temple made him suspect to both Romans and the Jerusalem aristocracy. Though some interrogation may have taken place before Jewish authorities, the Romans bear the responsibility for any formal trial. None of the Gospels mentions extensive participation by the Pharisees in the death of Jesus, so not all Jewish leaders, and certainly not the mass of Jewish people at the time of Jesus, rejected Jesus or were responsible for his death (→ Trial of Jesus, The).

Jesus is the messianic temple builder who after his resurrection will form his new community, a "temple not made with hands," i.e., a "spiritual temple" (see 1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19; 1 Pet. 2:4-6).

The other major motif centers on the identity of Jesus, which has dominated the whole Gospel and now culminates in the question and answer of the high priest (Mark 14:61-62). There is a joining of titles of Jesus—"Messiah," "Son of the Blessed," "Son of man"—not found in any previous narrative. In 14:61 the high priest solemnly asks Jesus "Are you the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One [i.e., God]?" Jesus responds (14:62) in agreement by using a formula of divine predication, "I am" (cf. 6:51; 13:6), and then redefines Son of the Blessed by reference to the Danielic Son of man (Dan. 7:13-14) and the exalted Lord of Ps. 110:1 ("seated at the right hand of power") whose glorious return will be seen by all (cf. Mark 8:38; 13:26). This response of Jesus occurs at the exact midpoint of the passion narrative and gives a proper interpretation to the following events. Jesus is Messiah and Son of God but he fulfills those roles precisely as the Son of man who has power on earth to forgive sin and heal on the Sabbath, who was yet rejected by those very authorities who question him. Yet he will return to judge his accusers (cf. 8:38-9:1; 13:26). His human vulnerability is paradoxically the path to understanding in what sense he is Son of the Blessed. Only when Jesus is understood on those terms set by God in the Gospel can proper confession of his identity take place.

Though Jesus has not technically committed blasphemy, the reaction of the Sanhedrin reveals to readers that they have paradoxically understood the true meaning of Jesus' messiahship. The trial concludes with another irony. At the very moment the Sanhedrin mocks Jesus as a false prophet (14:65), his prophecy about Peter is being fulfilled.

With the denial of Peter (14:66-72) the narrative of Peter's "following" suspended at 14:54 is now tragically resumed. Three times with an escalating intensity, Peter is charged with being a follower of Jesus (14:66, one slave girl; 14:69, the girl repeats the charge to bystanders; 14:70, all the bystanders charge him). Three times with parallel ascending vehemence Peter denies the charge (14:68, "I do not know or understand what you are saying"; 14:70, "he again denied"; 14:71, "he began to curse and swear"). The final words of him who was first called (1:16-20) and who first confessed Jesus as Messiah (8:29) are a poignant, "I do not know the person of whom you are speaking" (14:71). With the crow of the cock the prophecy is fulfilled, and Peter, recalling the words of Jesus, "breaks down and weeps."

14:53-72, The Trial Before the Sanhedrin and the Denial of Peter. Whatever historical data can be culled from Mark's version of the trial, its primary setting is within the theology of the passion narrative and of the Gospel as a whole. Mark interweaves the trial narrative (14:53, 55-65) with the story of Peter's denial (14:54, 66-72), contrasting true and false confession. In the trial itself two major theological motifs converge.

The first motif emerges from the charge that Jesus would destroy the Temple and rebuild it in three days (14:57-59; cf. 15:29-30). Criticism of a corrupt Temple was current among other Jewish groups (e.g., Essenes), and from the time of Solomon on, "temple building" was a messianic prerogative (2 Sam. 7:4-17). From 11:1 forward Mark has shown a consistent anti-Temple motif: Jesus calls the Temple a den of robbers (11:17), like the fig tree it is unfruitful, and it will be demolished so that not a stone will remain on another (13:1-4). Though "false witnesses" (14:56, 57) stem from the tradition of the trial of the righteous sufferer (Pss. 27:12; 35:11), Mark twice interprets "false" as "they did not agree" (Mark 14:56, 59). Like many actions and sayings of Jesus throughout the Gospel his Temple words are misinterpreted. However, the content of the charge brought by "false witnesses" is ironically true for Mark.

Since "weeping" can be both a sign of repentance (2 Kings 20:4-5) and a form of prayer (Ps. 102:9; Job 16:20), the narrative points to forgiveness for Peter (see Mark 16:7).

15:1-20, The Roman Trial of Jesus. With the trial of Jesus before Pontius Pilate, the "handing over" (15:1; cf. 8:31; 9:31; 10:33) of Jesus is complete. The final day of Jesus' life (corresponding and contrasting to the initial day of his ministry in Galilee) is carefully measured by three-hour intervals according to the Roman custom (15:1, "early"; 15:25, "third hour"; 15:33, "sixth to ninth hour"; 15:42, "evening"). After the rapid pace of the Gospel where Jesus was in constant motion, the measured pace of these scenes rivets the attention of readers on the silent and suffering Jesus.

The trial before Pilate involves: accusations (15:3), an interrogation of the accused by Pilate (15:2, 4), the choice of Barabbas or Jesus (15:6-14), and the sentence (15:15) followed by the mocking (15:16-20). Before Pilate the charge is "Are you the King of the Jews?" rather than "Are you Son of the Blessed?" and the saying about the Temple is dropped. Unlike the Jewish trial (14:62), where Jesus agrees with the charge ("I am") and effectively reinterprets it ("and you will see . . ."), his response to Pilate is simply, "You have claimed this" (15:2), followed by silence when the charge is repeated. There is strong irony here. Like the demons, who earlier in Mark address Jesus as Son of God (3:11; 5:7), Pilate, who also exemplifies evil power, names Jesus as king (cf. Mark 10:42, where rulers dominate and tyrannize their subjects. Pilate was recalled to Rome in A.D. 36 for abuse of his power). Just as Jesus was Son of God, but not in the sense proclaimed by the demons, he is also king, but not in Pilate's sense. Jesus, who proclaimed the imminence of God's kingdom, is a royal Messiah who enters Jerusalem for his enthronement on the cross (15:26).

After the initial interrogation Mark recounts the choice between Barabbas and Jesus (15:6-15). Since such a custom of releasing a prisoner at Passover is not attested elsewhere, the historical foundation of this incident is uncertain. In Mark's narrative it serves to contrast the innocent Jesus with the guilty Barabbas (who committed murder in the midst of an uprising, 15:7). It also highlights the evil of the high priests (because of "envy" they handed Jesus over) who sway the crowd to choose Barabbas. There may be a subtle irony in the choice of Barabbas whose name means "Son of the Father" (Aramaic, Abba). Jesus, the true son of the Father, is rejected in favor of the pseudo-son. While not excusing Pilate, the narrative portrays him as capitulating to the cries of the crowd, "crucify him"—reflecting perhaps the desire of Mark's community to mitigate the involvement of the Romans.

The mocking (15:16-20), while reflecting the Roman custom of degradation of prisoners, is also influenced by the OT (esp. Mic. 5:1, "with a rod they strike the cheek of the ruler of Israel"; cf. Isa. 50:6; 53:5). It heightens the irony of this whole section since the soldiers in hailing Jesus as king and in "worshipping him" (Mark 15:19) are paradoxically giving him that honor he will receive when God raises him up (cf. Phil. 2:5-11).

15:21-47, The Crucifixion, Death, and Burial of Jesus. The sober narrative of the crucifixion (15:21-41) masks the horror of this mode of execution. With the aid of OT allusions and quotations, the focus is shifted to its theological meaning. Like the sin offerings that are carried "out of the camp" (Lev. 16:27), Jesus is executed outside the city (cf. Heb. 13:12, "Jesus suffered outside the gate in order to sanctify the people through his own blood"). A third set of mockings occurs by the bystanders who challenge him to destroy and rebuild the Temple and come down from the cross so that they may believe (Mark 15:29-32a) and even by the "bandits" crucified with him (v. 32b). By calling their mocking "blasphemy" Mark ironically says that Jesus, who was condemned for "blasphemy," is now unwittingly hailed as the crucified God by his accusers.

The high priests similarly taunt Jesus for saving others and not himself, and say they too will believe if he comes down from the cross. In the dramatic scene of the crucified king on the cross, Mark offers a vignette of lack of belief. The bystanders and Temple officials will believe only if some dramatic miracle occurs. Jesus who earlier did no mighty work in Nazareth because of unbelief and who said earlier that one must lose a life in order to save it, is challenged at the moment of death to deny the meaning of his own life. The final paradox of this powerful scene is that, by remaining on the cross, he is both "saving himself" and "saving others" (cf. 10:45; 14:24).

The final three hours of Jesus' life are marked by apocalyptic imagery of the precreational darkness (15:33; cf. Gen. 1:2). At the ninth hour Jesus' final words, recorded by Mark in Aramaic, are an exclamation of the first verse of Psalm 22, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me," which is then misinterpreted by the crowd as a call for Elijah. Though commentators often speak of Jesus' cry of abandonment on the cross, Psalm 22 as a whole moves from apparent despair of God's presence to a hope of vindication. Since Mark when quoting the OT normally refers to the larger context of a particular verse, readers of the Gospel are to hear Jesus' words as those of the suffering just one who dies with the hope of vindication.

With the cry and the death of Jesus two major themes of the Gospel reach their high point. The "anti-Temple" motif culminates in the splitting of the veil of the Temple (Mark 15:38). This may be the veil separating the Holy of Holies from the outer Temple or the curtain before the main entrance. Its splitting "in two from top to bottom" symbolizes that God's presence is no longer hidden. Through the death of Jesus all people now have access to God (cf. Heb. 10:19-20).

The confession of the gentile centurion, "this human being [Gk. anthrōpos] was truly the Son of God" (Mark 15:39), is the culmination of the Christology of the Gospel and confirms the access that the Gentiles now have to God. In contrast to the mockers who embodied false faith, the centurion symbolizes future believers who must stand before the cross and confess a crucified one to be Son of God (cf. 1 Cor. 1:18-25). Also present at Jesus' final moments are those women who had "followed" Jesus and "ministered" to him in Galilee, as well as "many others" who had come up with him to Jerusalem (Mark 15:41). Having been abandoned by his disciples, Jesus at death is accompanied by Gentiles and women—both outsiders in the eyes of the religious leaders, both to be the nucleus of the new community to be gathered by the risen Jesus.

The short narrative of the burial (15:42-47) contrasts the righteous Joseph, a respected counselor who was waiting for the kingdom of God, with the other members of the Sanhedrin. He "dares" to approach Pilate and, like the faithful disciples of John (6:29), oversees the burial of Jesus. Mark anticipates here a church composed of Jews who believed in Jesus as well as Gentiles who confess his divine sonship. The details of the burial confirm that Jesus really died (in opposition to any docetic misunderstanding) and prepare for the resurrection. After the noise and tumult of the previous hours, the day wanes with the quiet presence of the faithful women who keep watch at the tomb of Jesus (15:47).

16:1-8, The Resurrection of Jesus. The earliest tradition of the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:3b-7) affirms that Jesus died according to the Scriptures, that he was buried, and raised up on the third day. The term "raised up" is a "theological passive," meaning the same as "God raised Jesus up." In this tradition, taken over by Paul, the fact of the resurrection is followed by the appearances of Jesus to select witnesses. It contains no explicit mention of the discovery of an "empty tomb." No Gospel attempts any description of the resurrection itself

(as does the later apocryphal Gos. Pet. 9:35-13:57). All the Gospels, however, mention some discovery of the empty tomb and all allude to appearances (implicit in Mark, explicit in the others).

The brief Marcan resurrection narrative begins "very early" on the first day of the week (the day after the Jewish Sabbath) with the journey of three women to anoint the body of Jesus. They muse among themselves about how the stone can be removed (16:4; cf. 15:46). The stress on the large stone may be an answer to the charge that the disciples stole Jesus' body (cf. Matt. 28:11-14, where the charge is made explicit). In Mark 16:4 the women notice that the stone has been rolled away and enter the tomb. They immediately see a "young man" (cf. 14:51) clad in white and seated on the right side of the tomb. They are "amazed"—the term used often throughout the Gospel in reaction to Jesus' miracles. The core of the narrative is in the message of the young man: "You seek Jesus of Nazareth, the crucified one; he has been raised up; he is not here" (16:6). The young man then charges the women to tell "the disciples and Peter" that Jesus "is going before them" (cf. 14:28) into Galilee and there they will see him. The narrative ends with the flight of the women from the tomb, their trembling and astonishment, and their silence, "for they were afraid" (16:7-8).

The narrative of the empty tomb does not provide for Mark (or for any Gospel) a "proof" of the resurrection. Mark rejects any sign that would facilitate belief (8:12; 15:32). In the biblical world a tomb is the anteroom to the realm of the dead. The empty tomb is a symbol that by the resurrection of Jesus death has been emptied of its power (cf. Heb. 2:14). The message of the young man actually directs the attention away from the empty tomb—"he is not here"—to the proclamation "he is risen." Christian faith rests on this proclamation, not on the empty tomb.

The reaction of the women, their failure to deliver the message to the disciples, and the absence of a resurrection appearance pose many problems. Some interpret it as a final rejection of those disciples who fled and argue that even the faithful women disciples ultimately fail. This interpretation does not do justice to the force of Jesus' promise in 14:28 and to Mark's view that Jesus is the true prophet whose words will achieve their effect. The fear, wonder, and silence of the women are rather reactions that elsewhere in biblical narratives accompany theophanies and commissions given to prophets (Exod. 3:3; Isa. 6:1-5; Jer. 1:6-8; Ezek. 1:28; Luke 1:29-30). By the abrupt ending Mark also leaves his readers with a radical challenge to their faith. Belief, conversion, and discipleship do not really rest on resurrection appearances (which Mark's community of ca. A.D. 70 would not have experienced), but on the word of promise, the victory over death at that very moment when death seemed sovereign.

The Longer Ending of Mark

As mentioned (see above, "Introduction: Text and Canon") these verses did not constitute the earliest ending of Mark. They are a pastiche of language and motifs drawn mostly from the other Gospels or the traditions used by these Gospels. The appearance to Mary Magdalene (16:9–10, who is described here in terms found only in Luke 8:2 as "the one from whom he had cast seven demons") reflects Matt. 28:9–10 and John 20:11–18. For the subsequent appearance to two disciples "walking in the country," see Luke 24:13–35. The appearance to the Eleven at table and their commissioning (16:14–18) draws on the Gospels and Acts (Luke 24:36–49; Matt. 28:16–20; John 20:19–23; Acts 1:6–8) but elaborates the postresurrectional ministry of the disciples (not found elsewhere in the Gospels) to include speaking in tongues, handling deadly serpents and drinking any deadly thing without injury, and healing the sick.

Two of these "signs" (Mark 16:17, a term used in Mark 8:12 in a negative sense), speaking in tongues and healing, occur at Corinth (1 Cor. 12:1–11). This longer ending of Mark may stem from groups within early Christianity who prized such enthusiastic phenomena. This ending also interprets Mark in a direction in tension with the understanding of faith in the Gospel. It shows how difficult it was to accept the radical challenge to faith posed by the Gospel itself.

LUKE

FRED B. CRADDOCK

INTRODUCTION

Among the Gospels, the Gospel According to Luke is unique in that it has a sequel, the Acts of the Apostles. Even though the Gospel and Acts have their own separate aims, characters, geographies, histories, and stories, the companion prologues (Luke 1:1-4; Acts 1:1-2), the common literary style, the same governing themes, and the overarching theological perspectives argue persuasively that the two works are in reality one. Luke-Acts is the largest contribution by a single writer in the NT.

Quite early in the life of the church Luke and Acts were separated by the location of John's Gospel between them. Reasons are not difficult to find: Luke belongs with Matthew and Mark in the cluster called the synoptic Gospels; Acts offers a natural introduction to the Letters of Paul. However, careful readers of either Luke or Acts will want to reunite the two volumes regardless of whether Gospel or Acts is being studied. The writer has made one continuous story of the life and mission of Jesus and the life and mission of the church. The definition of the gospel as repentance and forgiveness runs throughout (Luke 24:47; Acts 2:38; 3:19; 17:30-31). The Temple, Jerusalem, Mary, and the Holy Spirit figure prominently in both volumes; Jesus' and Paul's journeys to Jerusalem and Jesus' and Stephen's deaths are companion narratives. Luke and Acts are further related as promise and fulfillment, prophecies of Jesus having their completion in the life of the church (Luke 9:22; cf. Acts 3:21; Luke 21:12-15; cf. Acts 4:3-5, 14; Luke 9:5; cf. Acts 13:51). The Gospel anticipates Acts and Acts reflects upon the Gospel. Undoubtedly, some stories Luke tells in the Gospel are framed with a story yet to come in Acts clearly in mind (See also the Introduction to the Gospels and Acts; Acts, "Introduction").

Composition of the Gospel

Authorship. The Third Gospel, like all the canonical Gospels, is anonymous. The text yields no name; neither does it provide sufficient information from which the author's name may be inferred. Still, on the basis of the text we can sketch a general portrait of the writer. We can know from the Gospel that the writer was not an eyewitness of the ministry of Jesus but records those things "delivered to us by those who from the beginning were eyewitnesses" (Luke 1:2). Perhaps the tradition is already into its second or third generation. The writer is a student of previous accounts of Jesus' life (1:1) and assumes readers are already informed in these matters. The style of the writing indicates it is the work of a person of education and taste, familiar with the methods of narrative current in that culture. The content of the Gospel also reveals a thorough knowledge of the Septuagint (LXX), a Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible widely used in synagogues in the Hellenistic world. Whether this means the author was a convert from Hellenistic Judaism or a gentile Christian is not clear. Also unclear is whether the diarylike "we" sections of Acts (16:10-17; 20:5-21:18; 27:1-28:16) are to be regarded as evidence that the writer was a traveling companion of Paul or simply making use of such a record by one who was in Paul's company. Arguments popular in the nineteenth century that medical terminology in the Gospel established the author as "Luke the beloved physician" (Col. 4:14) have since been laid to rest. The tradition that the Third Gospel was written by Luke a companion of Paul (Col. 4:14; Philem. 24; 2 Tim. 4:11) is at least as old as Irenaeus, a theologian living in Gaul about A.D. 185. At approximately the same time, confirmation of the tradition is found in Tertullian (North Africa), Clement of Alexandria (Egypt), and in a document from Italy called the "Muratorian Canon" that lists and comments on early Christian writings. In recent times, however, students of both Acts and Paul have seriously questioned whether Luke-Acts could be the work of a companion of Paul, given the differences in the presentations of Paul and his message in Paul's own writings and in Acts. Arguments over authorship have been far less heated in the last half-century, not because new evidence has appeared but because the question of authorship has been regarded as less weighty in understanding the content and accepting the authority of a biblical text.

Date and Place of Writing. The prologue to Luke speaks of dependence on eyewitnesses (1:2), so the date can be no earlier than the second generation of Christians. The author also says that many narratives about Jesus had been written previously (1:1), the Gospel of Mark most likely being among them, so this Gospel can be no earlier than Mark. Those who have argued that Luke must be dated before A.D. 64 because Luke concludes Acts with Paul still under house arrest in Rome (Acts 28:30–31) with no account of his death have mistaken the literary form for a historical record. The account of Paul's death is, in effect, implied in the farewell speech in Acts 20. Acts 28 can, therefore, close on a note of life not death, open toward the future and not closed on the past. Many have reasonably argued that Luke's record of the fall of Jerusalem (Luke 19:41–44; 21:20–24), more precisely than that of Matthew and Mark, seems to accord with the known facts of the Roman siege, and therefore Luke must be dated after A.D. 70. But how much later? That Luke knew the writings of the first-century historian Josephus and therefore must have written after A.D. 93 has never been satisfactorily established. Luke was included in Marcion's canon of Christian writings about A.D. 140. Luke seems not to have known the collected letters of Paul, which perhaps were circulating as early as the end of the first Christian century. Hence most scholars settle for a time between A.D. 80 and 90. The question of the place of writing is even more open than that of the date. Sentiment has selected Rome with Luke there with Paul, serving the apostle during his two years of house arrest. Other guesses abound, but the tradition from the time of Irenaeus (A.D. 185) is that Luke was composed in Achaea (southern Greece).

Destination and Purpose. The prologue makes it clear that the Third Gospel is addressed to a person (Theophilus) or persons already informed about the subject matter to be discussed (1:3–4). Presumably, then, the audience is Christian, and very likely gentile Christian, or at least predominantly so. The name "Theophilus" is Greek, not Hebrew. The prologue itself follows a literary tradition of the Hellenistic world. The genealogy of Jesus is traced back not to Abraham (Matt. 1:1–16), but to Adam (Luke 3:23–38). Citations from the OT are from the LXX. When following one of his sources, Mark, the author omits sections dealing with issues totally internal to Judaism—for example, the issue of ritual cleansing in Mark 7:1–23. That Luke wrote to Gentiles would also account for the substitution of Greek for Hebrew (or Aramaic) terms and names: "skull" for Golgotha, "Lord" or "teacher" for rabbi, "zealot" for Cananaean, among others. Some scholars have added to the arguments for a gentile Christian audience the fact that both Jesus' ministry and the mission of the church move favorably toward Gentiles (Luke 4:16–30; Acts 1:8; 2:39; 28:28). However, that same evidence has been used to posit the readers as Greek-speaking Jews converted to Christianity who need to understand how a movement begun in Palestine among Jews has moved into the gentile world and is becoming increasingly gentile in its membership. But even if the background of the readers is uncertain, it is clear that Luke assumes the readers respect the authority of the OT (Luke 2:22–40; 4:16–21; 16:29–31; 24:27, 44–47), and have a knowledge of it.

This Gospel, especially when joined to Acts, has provided students of it a range of defensible views as to the author's purpose, and perhaps it is an error to try to find a single intention for the book. One could conclude from the prologue that the production of many narratives (1:1) about Jesus and his followers had proven to be confusing and therefore an orderly, well-researched account would assure the readers (1:3–4). Or, perhaps the assurance Theophilus (whether the name of a person or a literary device) needed was certainty that the Christianity of his day was truly rooted in the career and teaching of Jesus. Of long standing is the view that Luke was writing an apology or defense of the Christian religion, showing the Roman world that this was no insurrectionist movement but one that deserved the respect and protection of the civil authorities. After all, Pilate had declared Jesus innocent (23:13–16) and Paul, a Roman citizen (Acts 16:37; 22:25–29), had enjoyed more the protection than the wrath of the government (Acts 23:12–35). Other scholars, taking note of the continuity Luke draws between Jesus and the law and institutions of Judaism, identify Luke's purpose as primarily that of answering such questions as: if the promises of God were to Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3), why do Jesus and his church embrace Gentiles? Has God had a change of mind? Is Israel abandoned? Did Jesus break with his heritage? Certainly Luke gives major attention to the relationship of Jesus and his followers to the law, Jerusalem, the synagogue, and the Temple. Finally, a case could be made that in Luke's time, the church was becoming established in the Roman world and aware that it now had a history. The Parousia (the return of Christ), expected by many in the first generation, had not occurred and the followers of Jesus needed a clear sense of their past in order to move into the future. Luke, say the proponents of this view, responded to that need.

Sources. When Luke speaks of having received information from "those who from the beginning were eyewitnesses and ministers of the word" (1:2; whether he is referring to one group or two is not clear), the possibility of oral sources is introduced. That Luke's research included interviews and other contacts with oral traditions is highly likely, but such sources are most difficult for readers to identify. The usual tendency has been to attribute to oral sources those portions of Luke for which no other known source exists. This material, unique to Luke, amounts to about 25 percent of the Gospel, and consists primarily of the birth stories, parables, and the resurrection narratives. Whether oral or written, this body of material is often referred to as L. From among the many narratives compiled prior to Luke (1:1), two written sources are generally recognized by students of this Gospel. One is the Gospel of Mark, whose record constitutes well over one-third of Luke. While Luke omits some sections of Mark (Mark 6:45–8:26) and inserts into the story blocks of non-Markan material (Luke 6:20–8:3; 9:51–18:14), still it remains the case that Mark provides the basic structure for Luke. The other source has been called Q from the German word Quelle meaning “source,” and refers to material common to Matthew and Luke but not in Mark. Examples of Q are Luke 3:7–9 and Matt. 3:7–10; Luke 4:3–12 and Matt. 4:3–10. About 25 percent of Luke is attributed to Q. In a very real sense another source for Luke was the LXX, which functioned as a literary guide and model. This is true in a general sense; for example, Luke 1:5–2:52 has the style and flavor of the LXX. But it is also true of specific stories Luke tells. For example, Mary sings (Luke 1:46–55) as Hannah sang (1 Sam. 2:1–10); Jesus in the Temple as a boy (Luke 2:41–52) is an episode inspired by the story of the boy Samuel in the Temple (1 Sam. 2–3); Jesus’ raising the son of a widow at Nain (Luke 7:11–17) even draws exact phrasing from the story of Elijah and the widow’s son (1 Kings 17:17–24). It remains unclear to what extent, if at all, Luke assumed his readers’ knowledge of those and other such stories from the OT.

Structure and Literary Features

As stated above, Mark’s Gospel provided the basic structure for Luke’s. However, additions by Luke at the beginning and the ending of the story, along with noticeable modifications at the center of the Gospel, make it important for readers, even if well-acquainted with Mark, to get an overview of the structure of Luke’s Gospel before beginning a detailed study of its parts. Following the prologue (1:1–4) Luke has an extended infancy and childhood narrative that includes accounts of the births of both John the Baptist and Jesus (1:5–2:52). This material is unique to Luke. Chap. 3 opens so much like the beginning of a Gospel that some scholars have theorized that this may, indeed, have been the original starting point of Luke’s narrative. From 3:1 through 9:50 the setting is Galilee and the story extends from the appearance of John the Baptist to Jesus’ arrival at a Samaritan village on his way to Jerusalem. A major unit of material in the section is the Sermon on the Plain (6:20–49), Luke’s version of Jesus’ teachings found in Matthew’s Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:1–7:29). In 9:51–18:14 Luke offers a special section of material often called the journey narrative because the events and teaching of this lengthy portion are hung on the image of Jesus on his way to Jerusalem. Granted, it is difficult to follow the geographical references and reconstruct the trip from Galilee to Jerusalem. However, that Jesus has “set his face to go to Jerusalem” (9:51) surfaces often in phrases such as “and as he went on his way,” indicating that Luke wants all this material (some of it can be found scattered through Matthew and Mark) interpreted as falling under the shadow of Jesus’ approaching death in Jerusalem. At 18:15 Luke rejoins the narratives of Matthew and Mark, approaching the city of Jerusalem in 19:11. The last major section has a Judean setting (19:28–23:56) and includes the entry into the city (19:28–44), Jesus’ ministry—primarily that of teaching—within Jerusalem (19:45–21:38), and the passion story (22:1–23:56) beginning with the Last Supper and concluding with the burial. Luke concludes with the empty tomb story (24:1–12) followed by accounts of appearances of the risen Christ (24:13–53), records unlike those of Matthew and John, the other two Evangelists who relate resurrection appearances.

It is not, however, the structure of Luke’s Gospel that most impresses readers, even though his infancy and resurrection narratives are certainly memorable. Rather, readers, even of a translation, know that this Gospel is the work of a consummate literary artist. Jerome recognized this fact quite early, referring to Luke as the most skilled writer among the Evangelists. Careful students will observe the points at which Luke improves upon Mark, removing redundancies, smoothing awkward lines, broadening the range of verbs to reduce monotony, and rounding off stories that seemed unfinished. But one does not have to be a careful student to appreciate the artistry of the parable of the prodigal son (15:11–32) or of the story of Jesus’ appearance to two downcast disciples on the road to Emmaus (24:13–35). And reference has already been made to the unusual way Luke makes allusive use of the OT, weaving its stories and character almost unnoticed into the rich tapestry of his own telling about Jesus.

But this is not to say that Luke’s primary effort is to produce an aesthetically pleasing story. After a prologue in the manner of Greek historians and an infancy narrative half-told, half-sung in the rhythm and language of the Greek OT, Luke launches what seems to be a history of Jesus and his followers. “In the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea” (3:1) is Luke’s way of setting Jesus’ career in the context of world as well as local political and religious history. This interweaving of historical figures, places and events, and the stories of Jesus and his followers continues through Acts. Luke does write as a historian. He had sources written and oral; he researched carefully; and he offers "an orderly account." Readers have a sense of chronological movement and thoroughness.

But Luke is not simply a historian. He is continuing the narrative of God's people Israel, bringing it to fulfillment in his own day in Jesus and the Christian movement. He is not just a describer; he is an advocate. He is not simply recording what happened but what really happened, introducing God as the central actor in the events that occurred. Luke is a theological historian, and a biographer as well. After all, the focus of his attention is the one character, Jesus of Nazareth. But more than a historian, more than a biographer, Luke is an Evangelist, a proclaimer of the Gospel.

The Significance of Luke for the New Testament and the Church

It is difficult to overestimate the importance of Luke's witness both for the NT of which it is a major component and for the church. However, space here permits mention of only the major contributions Luke makes to the shape and nature of the Christian tradition.

Luke is a major contributor to the church's understanding of its relation to Judaism. The issue of continuity/discontinuity was a critical one for the followers of Jesus. Paul, Matthew, John, and the author of the Letter to the Hebrews all are preoccupied with the question in different ways. Luke's accent is more on continuity than discontinuity. The story of salvation history is one narrative, not two. The Hebrew Scriptures, Jerusalem, the Temple, and the synagogue figure prominently and positively in the life of Jesus and in the Acts account of the church. This even includes Paul, the missionary to Gentiles. Many Jews reject Jesus and his message, to be sure, but God was keeping and fulfilling promises made to Abraham and his descendants.

To speak of God keeping promises is to be reminded that the central character in Luke-Acts is God. Some Christian writings are so Christocentric that in reading them one tends to forget what Luke does not forget: the story of salvation is God's story. God led Israel; God inspired prophets; God sent John the Baptist; God sent Jesus; God raised up Jesus; and God sends the Holy Spirit. God is at work through persons, nations, political leaders, laws, and institutions. Since God continues to lead and to work the divine purpose, Luke neither longs for nor calls the church back to a golden age, of Jesus or of the early church, but shows that each time and place has its own appropriateness in the plan of God.

God, who has never been without witness in the world (Acts 14:17), is not the God only of Israel and the church but also of Adam, of all creation, and of all nations. Luke, therefore, writes not only of Jesus and the Twelve, but also of Augustus, Tiberius, and Gallio, not only of Bethlehem and Jerusalem, but also of Athens and Rome. Luke sets the Gospel in the larger history of his generation, specifying times and places. After all, as Paul says to King Agrippa, "This was not done in a corner" (Acts 26:26).

Luke alone in the NT joins historically rather than simply theologically the ministry of Jesus and the birth and spread of the church. Of the Gospels only Matthew uses the word "church" (Matt. 16:18; 18:17), but it is Luke who concludes one volume with Jesus pointing his disciples toward the church (Luke 24:49-53) and opens a second with the church being born and sent into the world (Acts 1-2). Luke's historicizing of Jesus' resurrection and ascension as two separate events has been embraced in the church's calendar with separate celebrations of Easter, Ascension Sunday, and Pentecost.

Luke offers one of the NT's definitions of the Gospel. "Repentance and forgiveness of sins should be preached in his name to all nations" (Luke 24:47). The call to repentance and the offer of forgiveness occurs more frequently in Luke than in any other NT writer. This is the message to Israel; this is the message to the nations. The cross is not a prominent feature of that proclamation. Luke's preferred way to speak of Jesus' Passion is capsuled in the expression, "Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer and on the third day rise from the dead" (24:46). What is important to Luke is that what happened to Christ was exactly what had been prophesied in the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms (24:44; also 24:27). In other words, God's will was and is being realized, even in Jesus' Passion. Understanding this is the removal of ignorance by repentance and the acceptance of forgiveness. Were one to use one word to describe Jesus' death in Luke's theology it would be "martyr," an example for Stephen and for all who follow in a world where the Gospel has enemies.

Luke is one of the three major witnesses in the NT to the presence and activity of the Holy Spirit, Paul and John being the other two. The commentary that follows will note how frequently and with what significance Jesus' life is characterized by the empowering presence of the Spirit and by prayer. And Jesus' last act, according to Luke, was to instruct his disciples to wait for the gift of the Spirit before they attempt to continue his work (24:49), and this they did, says Luke, waiting in Jerusalem in prayer (Acts 1).

Perhaps the characteristic of Luke's Gospel most commonly known and remarked upon is his attention to and evident concern for the oppressed and marginalized persons in society. This attention to the poor and rejected appears early in Mary's song prior to Jesus' birth (Luke 1:46-55), reappears in the favor shown to the shepherds (2:8-14), surfaces again in the social message of John the Baptist (3:10-14), is publicly announced by Jesus in his sermon in his home synagogue (4:16-21), and then becomes a refrain in his teaching (14:12-14, 21). This is not to say Jesus turned his back on the strong and prosperous. He offered his good news to religious leaders (7:36) and to the wealthy (19:1-10). In fact, some women of means helped finance Jesus' preaching missions (8:1-3). Even so, Luke's Jesus pronounces God's beatitude on the poor, the hungry, the mourners, and the excluded (6:20-23), and it is Luke's Jesus who offers to the poor, the maimed, the blind, and the lame places at the great banquet table (14:21-23).

The Prologue

The prologue to Luke's Gospel is without parallel in the NT, having its only similarity elsewhere in Luke at 3:1-2 and Acts 1:1-2. The Gospel of John contains a prologue, but it is a theological summary and not at all a statement of the author about sources, research, method, purpose, and addressee. Luke has employed the style of historians and technical writers of the time. This literary style is all the more noticeable since Luke shifts immediately at v. 5 to the more Semitic form, writing in the manner of the Greek OT for the entirety of the infancy narrative. For approximate parallels to Luke 1:1-4, readers are referred to the prologues to Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) and Josephus' Jewish War and Antiquities of the Jews. Even in English translation the careful construction of the prologue is evident. It consists of a single sentence, balanced between an introductory clause (protasis), "Inasmuch as many" (v. 1) and a concluding clause (apodosis), "it seemed good to me also" (v. 3, RSV). Such formal writing was a show of respect for a cultured reader, in this case Theophilus (v. 3). The expression "most excellent" is used later by Luke to refer to the Roman governor of Judea (Acts 23:26). Scholars are divided in their attempts to identify Theophilus, some taking the name as a symbol (the word means "friend of God"), others regarding it as a real person, perhaps a Roman official who is informed about if not a convert to the Christian faith. Whether the name is a literary device or a real person, the quality of the writing is hardly of the type to have either its source or its destination in a Christian community fitting the popular image of a deprived and unlettered lot.

Since many narratives about Jesus had already been written (we know of many but we can identify only one of those known to Luke, the Gospel of Mark), it is not clear why Luke wished to add another. Perhaps the many narratives had created confusion. There is no criticism of the former accounts, but the thoroughness of Luke's research, his recording the events "in order," and his desire to give the reader certainty in matters about which the reader was already informed may combine to argue that Luke found in the earlier narratives something confusing, erroneous, or incomplete. If the reader is a Roman official who may soon make decisions affecting Christians, then getting the story straight is vitally important. Again, it is unclear whether "you have been informed" (v. 4, RSV) means having gotten information or having been instructed as a Christian. What is clear is that some time has passed since the ministry of Jesus. What Jesus said and did had already prior to Luke become a written story passed along as a tradition ("delivered" translates the special term for transmitting tradition). Now after careful research Luke joins in that transmission but prefers not to call his work a Gospel as does Mark (1:1). Rather Luke chooses a term more historical than theological: an "account." As will be seen later, he sets this account into the larger record of world history. And not only has some time passed since Jesus' ministry, but Luke assumes much more time will pass before Christ returns. One does not research and write an orderly account if one is convinced that the Day of the Lord is at hand.

The Infancy and Childhood Narrative

Both Luke and Matthew have infancy narratives but they represent quite different traditions. Some scholars have been persuaded that 3:1 was the original beginning of Luke's Gospel, the infancy stories being added later. While 3:1 is clearly a second beginning, and while interest in the circumstances of Jesus' birth probably arose some time after the resurrection (the NT records of apostolic preaching do not include references to the virgin birth), the content of 1:5-2:52 is fully consonant with the remainder of the Gospel. These early stories introduce many Lucan themes: continuity with Judaism, the line of David, God's favor on the poor and oppressed, and the importance of Jerusalem and the Temple. In fact, one could call 1:5-2:52 the Gospel in brief and not an account to satisfy questions about Jesus' origin. The style of the infancy and childhood narrative is very much that of the LXX. Not only does Luke use many allusions to the OT (Exod. 30:7; Dan. 10:7, 12; Num. 6:3; Mal. 3:1, 4-5; 2 Sam. 7:12-16; and Judg. 5:24 are but a few in chap. 1 alone), but he brings his readers into the religious world of the OT. There is no single literary genre: story, homily, poetry, song, prayer, history, and doctrine blend to welcome readers into a world where they are relaxed, oriented, at home. This literary achievement is due, in part, to Luke's allusive use of the OT, weaving the sacred past into the present story rather than quoting the OT to argue for the truth of the Christian story, as does Matthew. The readers' comfort and pleasure in 1:5-2:52 are also related to Luke's abundant use of poetry and song. Many scholars believe Luke draws upon early Christian liturgies for the songs and prayers of Mary, the angel, Zechariah, and Simeon. Luke's infancy and childhood narrative consists of two panels of material: the annunciation of the births of John the Baptist and Jesus (1:5-38), followed by a transition story, the visitation (1:39-56); and the accounts of the births of John and Jesus (1:57-2:40), followed by a transition story, the boy Jesus in the Temple (2:41-52).

1:5-56

The Annunciation of the Births of John the Baptist and Jesus

1:5-25, The Annunciation of the Birth of John the Baptist. Luke begins his narrative by setting the event in the context of contemporary history, a pattern followed through the Gospel and Acts. Herod the Great was made king by the Roman senate in 40 B.C., but his actual control began in 37 B.C. and ended with his death in 4 B.C. Luke customarily uses Judea to represent the whole of Palestine (4:44). Both Zechariah and Elizabeth were of the priestly family of Aaron, Zechariah serving at the Temple in one of the twenty-four divisions named for Aaron's twenty-four sons (1 Chron. 24:1-19). Even though they are the picture of Jewish piety, they are still childless. Elizabeth, barren in her old age, belongs to a rich tradition: Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, wife of Manoaah, and Hannah. Zechariah is on duty at the Temple for the services of morning and evening prayers when he is chosen by lot (a method for discerning God's will, Acts 1:26) to burn the incense in the holy place where only priests could enter. There at the altar he is visited by Gabriel, one of the seven archangels of Judaism. Luke's description follows the account of Gabriel's visit to Daniel (Dan. 10): fear, the message, being stricken speechless. The angel's message is fourfold: Elizabeth will have a child to be named John (Luke 1:13); the child will give to them and to many joy and gladness (v. 14); the child will be reared in the tradition of Nazirites (v. 15; Num. 6:3; Judg. 13:2-5); and the child will minister in the spirit of Elijah who was to herald the end time and prepare Israel for it (Luke 1:16-17; Mal. 4:5). Early Christians believed Elijah would appear as forerunner of the Messiah. Unlike Matthew (Matt. 17:10-13), Luke never specifically identifies John as Elijah. Understandably, Zechariah has doubts, but for his unbelief he is stricken speechless. The worshippers outside, awaiting the overdue priest, get from him only signs and gestures but sense he has experienced God. His duty ended, Zechariah goes home and Elizabeth conceives, for which she praises God, since barrenness was not only blamed on the woman but was also viewed as a reproach from God. Zechariah is silent and Elizabeth is in hiding, creating a mood of waiting and expectation.

1:26-38, The Annunciation of the Birth of Jesus. Readers are struck by the close parallel this account bears to the preceding one: introduction of the characters, the appearance of the angel, fear, the good news, doubt, the sign, response, the angel departs. As usual, Luke dates (in the sixth month of Elizabeth's pregnancy) and locates (Nazareth was a small town of small regard, John 1:46, in south Galilee) the event to be presented. The angel's announcement of the birth comes not to the man, as in the preceding story and in Matthew's account of Jesus' birth (Matt. 1:18-25), but to the woman. Mary is a virgin, betrothed but not yet married (Luke 1:34). Betrothals, legal and binding, were usually arranged when women were quite young, still only girls. Joseph's importance is that he is of David's house and thus provides Jesus' legal connection to the throne of David (1:32; 2:4). To the angel's greeting, later scribes added "Blessed are you among women!" (RSV footnote to 1:28), perhaps a borrowing from v. 42. Throughout the annunciation and infancy stories Mary is portrayed as favored of God (v. 30), deeply thoughtful (v. 29; 2:19, 51), obedient (v. 38), believing (v. 45), worshipful (v. 46), and devoted to Jewish law and piety (2:22-51). It is little wonder that Luke names her in the company of believers when the church began (Acts 1:14). Gabriel's message to Mary is fourfold: she will have a son to be named Jesus (v. 31); the child will be the Son of God (Ps. 2:7) and will occupy forever the throne of David (2 Sam. 7:13-16; Luke 1:32-33); the conception of the child will be effected by the overshadowing descent of God's Spirit (v. 35; Exod. 40:35; 1 Kings 8:10); as a sign of the truth of the message; and the angel informs Mary of the pregnancy of her kinswoman Elizabeth (Luke 1:36-37). Gabriel's word concludes with the message to Abraham and Sarah when they doubted the news of the birth of a child: "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" (Gen. 18:14). Mary accepts in humble obedience the word from God.

1:39-56, The Visitation. This story consists of four parts: the visit itself (vv. 39-41a); the inspired speech of Elizabeth (vv. 41b-45); the song of Mary (vv. 46-55); and Mary's return home after the visit of three months (v. 56). Since Mary accepted Gabriel's word, there is no reason to think Mary's visit was to check the truth of that word. Two women, not only kin but now drawn by a common experience, meet in an unnamed village in the hills of Judea. The one woman is old and her son will end an old era; the other is young and virgin and her son will usher in the new. Even the unborn John knows the difference and leaps in the womb when Mary enters, recalling the struggle in Rebekah's womb (Gen. 25:22). In words inspired by the Holy Spirit, Elizabeth blesses Mary as "the mother of my Lord" and as one who accepted in faith God's promise spoken by the angel. Mary's song, in response to Elizabeth and to the events that have transpired, is sometimes called the Magnificat from the opening word in the Latin translation. The song itself draws upon the song of Hannah (1 Sam. 2:1-10) with other OT allusions and phrases interspersed. Since Hannah was promised and given a child in her old age, some scholars have understood the song as having originally belonged to Elizabeth rather than Mary. In fact, some Old Latin manuscripts read "and Elizabeth said" but the earlier Greek attributes the song to Mary. Only briefly does the canticle focus upon Mary's favored place (Luke 1:48-49); the major burden of it is praise to God who has acted always in justice and mercy and will continue to do so in memory of the promise to Abraham and to his descendants forever.

Two unusual features of the song deserve attention. First, God is portrayed in terms of what God has done, because what God has done is what God will do. The past tense is commonly used in Scripture to express hope for the future. Secondly, God's justice and mercy are presented in terms of reversed fortunes for the proud and the humble, the mighty and the lowly, the rich and the poor. This pattern will reappear often in Luke; for example, recall Luke's beatitudes and woes (6:20-26) and the story of the rich man and Lazarus (16:19-31).

The Births of John and Jesus, with a Childhood Story of Jesus

1:57-80, The Birth of John the Baptist. This account consists of three parts: the birth, circumcision, and naming of the child (vv. 57-66); the inspired prophecy of Zechariah (vv. 67-79); and a summary statement about John (v. 80). As was customary, relatives and neighbors not only joined in the joy of the birth but also in the naming (Ruth 4:17). Apparently in Second-Temple Judaism the naming was linked to the circumcision, the act by which a male child was made a member of the people of God. The expectation that the boy would be named for his father was according to custom in some quarters (Tobit 1:9). That Elizabeth knew the child was to be called John may be understood as a revelation to her. That Zechariah's tongue was loosed is to be taken as miraculous, prompting him to praise God and the neighbors to be filled with fear. Throughout the hill country of Judea there is much pondering on these events, with great expectation.

Zechariah's inspired prophecy, often called the Benedictus after the first word in the Latin translation, falls into two parts: vv. 68-75 and 76-79. Resounding with OT allusions, vv. 68-75 are distinctly Jewish, similar to hymns of praise to God as deliverer (Pss. 34, 67, 103, 113) and to the thanksgiving psalms of the Dead Sea Scrolls. Jewish eschatological hopes (hopes for the end days) will be fulfilled: prophetic predictions will come to pass, the covenant with Abraham will be remembered, and all enemies will be overthrown by the "horn of salvation" (power of God, 1 Sam. 2:10; Pss. 18:2; 132:17) whom God has raised up. Luke 1:76-79, regarded by some as a Christian addition to a hymn that may have circulated among the followers of John the Baptist, specify John as the forerunner of the Messiah, drawing on Mal. 3:1-2 and 4:5-6. Malachi identifies this figure as Elijah returned. The one who will follow, bringing salvation, is characterized with lines from Isa. 9:1-2 and 42:7. Luke rounds off this story with a summary statement about John's growth, recalling Samson the Nazirite (Judg. 13:24) and Samuel (1 Sam. 2:26). When the story resumes, when John is manifest to Israel, he will come demanding the cleansing of repentance (Luke 3:3).

2:1-40, The Birth of Jesus. Again, one is struck by the close parallels in the two birth stories: joy at birth, circumcision and naming, songs of great expectation, concluding statement about the child's growth. Here, however, the style of writing is noticeably different, less like that of the OT and more like that of the remainder of the Gospel. Luke's birth story consists of five parts: the birth itself (vv. 1-7); the announcement to the shepherds (vv. 8-20); the circumcision and naming (v. 21); the purification and dedication in Jerusalem (vv. 21-38); the return to Nazareth and the summary of the child's growth (vv. 39-40).

While Matthew and Luke agree Jesus was born in Bethlehem (Matt. 2:1), their accounts of the relation of the holy family to Nazareth and to Bethlehem differ (Matt. 2:19-23). Luke says Mary and Joseph were in Bethlehem to be registered for an imperial census and taxation. Historians have been unable to confirm a universal census in the reign of Augustus (Octavius) who ruled from 27 B.C. to A.D. 14. There was a census in Palestine when Quirinius was governor of Syria (perhaps the one referred to in Acts 5:37) but that was later, about A.D. 6. Since Quirinius was a viceroy in this region earlier and since some time elapsed between enrollment and tax assessment, some scholars have argued that Luke could be generally but not exactly correct in his historical references. Luke's primary aim is to place the birth in the city of David because Jesus' continuity with the royal house of David was important for Luke's Christology, his depiction of Jesus' identity. Luke does not, however, quote the messianic prophecy about Bethlehem (Mic. 5:2) as does Matthew (2:5-6).

During this stay in Bethlehem Jesus is born and, like all newborns, is wrapped with strips of cloth to keep the body straight and assure proper growth. The guestroom was apparently occupied and hence offered no privacy, so Mary and Joseph withdrew to the stable underneath or in back of the house, perhaps in a cave. A feeding trough served as a crib. In vv. 8-20 Luke provides a scene sharply different from Matthew who sets the birth of Jesus among the wealthy and powerful (Matt. 2:1-23). The first to hear the news are the poor and lowly. The prophecy of Isa. 61:1 is being fulfilled: the poor have good news proclaimed to them. As elsewhere in these narratives, the word of God comes through an angel, a divine messenger. Luke speaks of angels as easily as he speaks of human beings. In fact, when a sign is offered as proof of the good news, it is not what moderns might regard as a sign; that is, something as extraordinary as a heavenly host. Rather the sign is as common as a baby to be found in poor circumstances, lying in a feeding trough.

Luke provides through the angel a summation of his Christology: Jesus is of the house of David (royalty), he is Savior (neither Matthew nor Mark use this title), he is Christ (Messiah), and he is Lord. This is the message about Jesus preached by the apostles (Acts 2:14-36). The content of the song by the host of heaven is not fully clear. The oldest manuscripts have as the third clause, "among people of [God's] good pleasure," i.e., "with whom he is pleased" (RSV). Some of these were later "corrected" (by changing a single letter) to read, "among humans, good will," and that reading prevailed for centuries. The shepherds go to the city of David the shepherd, and the scene is filled with some of Luke's favorite words: wonder, pondering, making known the revelation, praising and glorifying God. The presence (glory) of God floods the story.

In the two stories that follow, the circumcision (Luke 2:21) and the purification of Mary, together with the presentation of the child (vv. 22-38), Luke offers readers several major themes important to his theology. First, Jesus is reared according to the laws of Judaism. Neither his parents nor Jesus rebelled against or rejected the law of Moses. The best of Jewish piety and obedience to Moses were observed. Five times in this section Luke speaks of actions according to the law of Moses. As for Mary's purification and the child's presentation to God, Luke interweaves the two rituals in a confusing way. According to Lev. 12:2-8, forty days after the birth of a male child the mother went through a ritual of purification, offering a lamb as a sacrifice in the Temple, or if poor, a pair of doves or pigeons. According to Exod. 13:2, 12-13, the firstborn male child belonged to God and could be redeemed (taken home) by means of an offering by the father.

A second Lucan theme lies in the setting: Jerusalem and the Temple. For Luke, the ministry of Jesus moves toward Jerusalem and the mission of the church moves out from Jerusalem. As for the Temple, Luke is alone among NT writers in his favorable view. His Gospel begins with Zechariah in the Temple and it will close with Jesus' disciples in the Temple.

A third Lucan theme is offered by old Simeon in his inspired benediction, the Nunc Dimittis (the first two words of its Latin version). Simeon, a pious man longing for "the consolation of Israel" (the messianic age), is assured by the Holy Spirit that he will live to see it. The Holy Spirit leads him to the Temple at the time of Jesus' presentation and inspires him to know the child is God's Messiah. In his inspired song, he declares Jesus to be the means of salvation for all people, Jew and Gentile. On that conviction rests Jesus' ministry and the mission of the church.

A fourth and final theme is expressed in Simeon's word to Mary (apparently this occurs in the outer court where women were allowed). Jesus will bring truth to light and will effect decision and judgment. However, in so doing he will face opposition and death. When Jesus comes to Jerusalem as an adult, the journey will be his "exodus" (Luke 9:31).

The truth of Simeon's words are confirmed by Anna, a devout woman of advanced age (2:37 may mean she is eighty-four or has been a widow eighty-four years). The two aged saints are Israel in miniature, poised in anticipation of the new. God is leading Israel to the Messiah, but the Messiah will weep over this city because it did not know the time of the messianic visitation (19:41-44). Luke rounds out the story of the Jerusalem visit: Mary and Joseph have fully kept the law, they return with Jesus to Nazareth, and the child grows in strength, wisdom, and divine favor (cf. 1:80; 1 Sam. 2:26).

2:41-52, A Childhood Story of Jesus. Any one familiar with apocryphal stories of Jesus' childhood filled with exhibitions of the supernatural (→ Apocryphal New Testament) appreciates the quiet reserve of Luke's account, the sole episode between the forty-day-old infant and the man of thirty years (3:23). The setting is again the Temple in Jerusalem. The law required pilgrimages for Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles (Exod. 23:14), but for those at a great distance, only Passover. Jesus is twelve and if he has already passed through the ceremony of bar mitzvah then he is a "son of the law" and obeying the command to attend Passover. When the seven-day festival ended, the pilgrims from Galilee, including Mary and Joseph, returned home. It is not surprising that a boy among friends and relatives would not be missed for a day. The reactions of the parents are natural, both in the search and in the reprimand. Jesus assumed they would know he would be in God's house (about God's business). They do not understand; Mary has even more to ponder. And what is Luke saying about Jesus? He is precocious; he knows the Scriptures and seeks deeper understanding; he is at home in the Temple; he regards God as his Father; and he obeys his parents. There is no hint of any break with Judaism. Again, Luke adds the statement of Jesus' growth, an allusion from 1 Sam. 2:26 that summarizes the development of the boy Samuel who grew up in the house of God.

3:1-4:13

Preparation for the Public Ministry of Jesus

Although 3:1 reads like the opening of a book—especially an OT prophet (e.g., Jer. 1:1; Hos. 1:1; Amos 1:1)—we found reasons above to regard the infancy narrative as an integral part of the Gospel. It is quite natural for 3:1 to have the form of a beginning since it does begin the adult and public life of Jesus. In this section Luke will present John the Baptist (3:1-20), the baptism of Jesus (3:21-22), the genealogy (3:23-38), and the temptation in the desert (4:1-13).

3:1-20, John the Baptist. Luke first identifies John by time (vv. 1-2a), place (vv. 2b-3a), and function (vv. 3b-6). Luke provides the best clear date for the ministry of John and therefore of Jesus; the fifteenth year of Tiberius would be A.D. 28-29. Pontius Pilate was prefect (technically not "governor") of Judea from 26 to 36. In addition Luke mentions three tetrarchs (a tetrarch ruled one fourth of a region): Herod Antipas and Philip were sons of Herod the Great and ruled Galilee, Perea, and the northeast areas of Ituraea and Trachonitis. Lysanias was one of several by that name who ruled Abilene, still farther to the north of Galilee. Principal religious authorities were high priests. The office was for life but the Romans appointed them as they willed. Annas served between A.D. 6 and 15. He was replaced but apparently the Jews still regarded him as high priest. His son-in-law held the office between A.D. 18 and 36. According to the Fourth Gospel, Jesus appeared before each of them at his trial (John 18:12-28). But all these rulers are but background to the coming of the word of the Lord (cf. Jer. 1:2) to John in the wilderness (desert).

The desert is not only a geographical reference; it also recalls the place of Israel's formation as God's covenant people and hence implies a return to God. John's ministry centered in the Jordan Valley where he preached a baptism of repentance for forgiveness of sins (cf. Mark 1:4). This baptism differs from proselyte baptism that was for non-Jews and Qumran baptism that was a repeated act of cleansing. Repentance and forgiveness of sins constitute the gospel for Luke (24:47).

Luke modifies his source Mark in several ways: he omits the quotation of Mal. 3:1; he extends the quotation from Isaiah 40 to include vv. 4-5 so as to present the universal reach of the gospel; and he omits the description of John's appearance as like Elijah (2 Kings 1:8) because for Luke it is Jesus who is Elijahlike.

In Luke 3:7-20 John is identified by his message. Unlike Matthew John addresses his eschatological message to the crowds. The judgment of God is not deterred by claims of privilege; lives that do not bear evidence of repentance share the fate of fruitless trees. Those who wish to avoid such a fate ask for instructions. Three groups present themselves: the crowds, tax collectors, and soldiers. The message framed for each group not only addresses the temptations peculiar to each, but provides occasion for an early glimpse of the social message of Luke and especially his attention to economic oppression and inequity.

The last portion of John's message is in response to those who would identify him as the Christ. This was a question all Gospel writers had to address because John had his disciples as did Jesus. Luke first addressed it with the leaping of John in Elizabeth's womb when Mary entered the room. John here distinguishes himself from the Christ in three ways: John is not even worthy to be a slave of the mightier One; the Christ will baptize not with water but with the Spirit and fire (anticipating Pentecost, Acts 2); and the Christ will bring judgment. Drawing on the image of spirit (wind) and fire, John likens the judgment to winnowing wheat in the wind and burning the chaff. But even judgment is good news (Luke 3:18) when repentance and forgiveness are available. For Herod Antipas, however, the clear and bold preaching of John was too indicting. Rather than responding to the message he silences the messenger. John will reappear in chap. 7, but with his imprisonment he is removed from the scene, making way for the entrance of Jesus.

3:21-22, The Baptism of Jesus. In several respects Luke's account of Jesus' baptism differs from those of Matthew and Mark. First, there is no mention of who baptized Jesus; in the preceding verse John is shut up in prison. Second, the baptism itself is subordinated in a dependent clause in which Jesus is part of a crowd who have been baptized. Finally, Luke joins baptism to prayer. Throughout this Gospel the prayer life of Jesus receives attention. Divine participation in the event is threefold: first, heaven opens, recalling Isaiah's prayer for heaven to open and for God to come again as in the Exodus (Isa. 64:1-3). The Holy Spirit comes on Jesus and will mark all his ministry (Luke 4:14) as well as be the gift that Jesus bestows on the church (24:49; Acts 1:4-5). Second, that the Spirit assumed bodily form as a dove must be a symbolic expression asserting the clear reality of the experience, not to be confused with mere thought or feeling. And finally, divine attestation comes as a voice from heaven. The message joins Ps. 2:7, which speaks of the coronation of a king, and Isa. 42:1, which expresses God's embrace of the Suffering Servant. Here sovereignty and service are joined. The reading in some manuscripts "today I have begotten you," also drawn from Ps. 2:7, was used in the ancient church by those who argued that Jesus was adopted as Son of God at his baptism.

3:23-38, The Genealogy of Jesus. The genealogy makes several statements important to Luke and his readers. It provides one of the two NT references to Jesus' age as an adult (John 8:57). It affirms Jesus' relation to the entire human race by tracing his line to Adam. The genealogy also establishes a point already repeatedly made by Luke, that Jesus is the son of David. It is quite clear that the family line is traced through Joseph who was legally Jesus' father though not biologically "as was supposed" (Luke 3:23).

Anyone comparing this genealogy with Matthew's will notice Luke begins with Jesus and moves back to Adam and to God while Matthew begins with Abraham and moves forward to Jesus. Luke has more names and there are some differences. However, genealogies tended to become stylized and even symbolic. For example, Luke has eleven series of seven names, a total of seventy-seven. Many readers wonder what is achieved by tracing Jesus' family line. Does it offer an alternative way of affirming Jesus as son of God? Luke's intention is not clear. One can at least be sure of his desire to reaffirm Jesus' continuity with his Jewish heritage. What has been demonstrated by the family's piety and obedience to the law of Moses is here asserted by the genealogy.

4:1-13, The Temptation of Jesus. Luke separates Jesus' baptism and temptation with the genealogy, but if the genealogy affirmed Jesus' continuity with his heritage, the temptation does so even more dramatically. Israel's Exodus experience of trial in the desert (Deut. 8:2) is here recapitulated in Jesus' life. The similarity between Luke's and Matthew's accounts (Matt. 4:1-11) argues conclusively for a common tradition, but readers of Luke will want to notice this version carefully so that what Luke wishes to say comes through. For example, the devil does not take Jesus up on a high mountain to show him the kingdoms of the world. Apparently Luke reserves mountains for experiences of prayer and revelation. Here the tempter provides a sudden vision. Or again, Luke has Jerusalem and the Temple the site of the final temptation. This is quite understandable since for Luke Jesus' ministry leads toward Jerusalem and the Temple, the scene of his final struggle and trial. The experience of temptation is between one full of the Holy Spirit and led by the Holy Spirit and the devil, the "slanderer," the one attempting to thwart the purposes of God. The forty days recall Israel's forty-year and forty-day experiences.

Since Jesus has yet to begin his ministry, we may surmise he is struggling with the nature and shape of his messianic role. Weakened by hunger, the first temptation is personal but also social: will this be the ministry Jesus will have? The second is political: will Jesus submit to the ruler of this world to achieve good for people in this world? The final temptation is religious: will Jesus win Jerusalem and all it symbolizes and will Jesus avoid death there by the exhibition of supernatural power? For this story to be real it must not only be assumed that what Jesus was tempted to do he could do, but also that each temptation had strong appeal. Note that one of them was even supported by Scripture (Ps. 91:11-12). But in every case Jesus responds with Scripture (Deut. 8:3; 6:13; 6:16). The way of the Messiah is to be none of these. Luke concludes the temptations not with relief but with foreboding: "until an opportune time" (4:13). Luke anticipates the Passion, for the tempter will reenter Luke's narrative through Judas (22:3).

4:14-9:50

The Ministry of Jesus in Galilee

4:14-15

Opening Summary

Unlike Mark and Matthew, Luke does not relate Jesus' Galilean ministry to the imprisonment of John. Rather Jesus comes "in the power of the Spirit" that came upon him following baptism. Neither does Luke report Jesus preaching an eschatological message of the approaching kingdom. Instead, Luke offers the briefest sketch: Jesus teaches in the Galilean synagogues, the report of him spreads, and he is everywhere praised. Clearly Luke wants nothing substantive to be reported prior to the account of Jesus' visit in Nazareth. Although Luke 4:14-9:50 follows in general the text of Mark 1:14-9:39, some events are rearranged and, quite noticeably, Jesus' ministry according to Luke remains in Galilee. Therefore, Mark's stories of trips to peripheral regions and north to Tyre and Sidon are omitted.

4:16-30

In the Synagogue at Nazareth

Luke departs from Mark's order (this incident is much later, Mark 6:1-6), but not to say that Jesus began his ministry in Nazareth. Verses 14-15 and 23 make it clear he has already ministered elsewhere. Rather, this story is placed here programmatically, offering in miniature both the nature of Jesus' entire ministry and the fact of his rejection by his own people in view of his acceptance of and being accepted by outsiders. As Luke has repeatedly made clear, Jesus is no rebel; he lives and works within his tradition. He regularly attends the synagogue and participates as all male members were permitted to do, by reading Scripture and commenting. He follows the regular practice: stand to read, sit to comment. The passage read, Isa. 61:1-2, is his choice (Luke's quotation is in fact composite, including a line from Isa. 58:6). The closing line alludes to the joyful restoration of persons and property in the year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:8-55). Jesus offers one comment but it summarizes who he is and what he is doing. He understands himself as having received God's Spirit and fulfilling the prophecy. The response is mixed: admiration, wondering, doubt. At this point (Luke 4:23) the encounter takes a surprisingly negative turn. Jesus quotes two proverbs: the one expressing their criticism of his not performing miracles as he did (or would do: 4:31-41) in Capernaum and the other being his response—a prophet is not acceptable at home. The tension obviously present increases sharply when Jesus defends ministry to outsiders by offering two OT stories. Both Elijah (1 Kings 17:8-14) and Elisha (2 Kings 5:1-27), prophets in Israel, took God's favor to non-Jews. To be indicted by their own Scripture was too much. In anger the Nazarenes expelled and sought to kill Jesus. Tossing a person against stones apparently was an admissible form of stoning, but this is mob, not official, action. But the trial and death are here foreshadowed. For the present, Jesus moves away from them safely. Similar incidents are common in the Fourth Gospel (John 7:30, 43-44; 8:59; 10:39). One also recalls the free movement of Elijah in the midst of enemies.

4:31-5:16

Early Popularity in Galilee

In this section Luke offers six vignettes from Jesus' ministry that indicate the range of his work—teaching, preaching, exorcising demons, healing, calling disciples—and that account for his growing popularity with the people.

4:31-37, An Exorcism in the Capernaum Synagogue.

Mark 1:21-28 is followed here but with changes, such as the omission of the contrast between Jesus' teaching and that of the scribes. Capernaum lay on the north shore of the Sea of Galilee and was the center of much of Jesus' activity. The foundation of an ancient synagogue has been excavated, perhaps on the site of the one visited by Jesus (→ Capernaum). The NT assumes the active presence of evil forces in the world, and the presence of Jesus effects raging confrontations. Demons recognize Jesus as the power of God, and here a demon seeks to gain power over Jesus or at least to neutralize Jesus' advantage by the ancient practice of pronouncing an opponent's name. The battle lines are drawn, the man convulses, and the demon is exorcised. All the witnesses are amazed at the power of Jesus' word, and the news spreads rapidly. Note the focus on Jesus' word and not on the miraculous or on a ritual of exorcism (cf. v. 32; also 5:1; 8:11).

4:38-39, Healing Simon's Mother-in-Law.

Luke abbreviates Mark's account (Mark 1:29-31) and alters the nature of the healing. "And he stood over her and rebuked the fever" (v. 39) is a description of an exorcism, based on the common assumption that physical illnesses were the work of evil spirits.

4:40-41, Healing the Sick at Evening.

Readers can assume that this unit describes events in the same city and after sunset on the same day as the two units above. Now that the Sabbath is over, crowds gather and the sick are brought. The diseased are healed (every one of them) by laying on hands and the demon-possessed are exorcised by the strong word of rebuke. Jesus was named by a demon earlier as the Holy One of God (4:34); here he is named Christ. They recognize him who can destroy them. Jesus silences them, perhaps because he will not tolerate the confession from evil spirits, perhaps because the use of such titles would prompt misunderstandings of the nature of his mission.

4:42-44, Jesus Leaves Capernaum. Jesus moves away from the danger of popularity based on the miraculous and seeks privacy. Mark says he was praying and his disciples sought him (Mark 1:35-39). Here the crowds want him to stay. However, Jesus feels the urgency of his mission, to preach the gospel widely. Luke uses "the kingdom of God" (v. 43) for the first time here. The summary statement to the effect that Jesus was preaching in the synagogues of Judea does not mean he went to the region to the south. "Judea" in Luke can be a synonym for Palestine as a whole (1:5; Acts 10:37).

5:1-11, The Call of Disciples. Instead of Mark's early call of the first disciples (Mark 1:16-20), Luke places the call a bit later, during a preaching mission and following a miraculous catch of fish. The closest parallel is in John 21:1-8, a postresurrection story. Some scholars believe Luke's story would fit better in such a context because Peter's behavior (v. 8) would more appropriately follow his sin of denying Jesus. Understandably, the account assumes readers already know Simon, who is also called Simon Peter at v. 8. Luke's name for the Sea of Galilee is the lake of Gennesaret. Jesus presses Simon's boat into service to get away from the crowding multitude. The extraordinary catch of fish prompts in Simon fear, astonishment, and a sense of his own unworthiness to be in the presence of one of such power and knowledge. In the episode Jesus is called Master and Lord, one whose very word commanded obedience (v. 5). Although the word, "henceforth you will be catching men" (v. 10) is addressed to Simon, his partners, James and John (no mention is made of Andrew) join him in abandoning everything to become disciples of Jesus.

5:12-16, Healing a Leper. Other than altering the introduction and conclusion, Luke follows the account in Mark 1:40-45. Leprosy, a name given to a range of maladies from mildew in houses and clothes to skin diseases in humans (Lev. 13; → Leprosy), was regarded as a social disease, removing the victim from social discourse and participation in religious exercises. This man apparently violated the rules in approaching Jesus, evidence of both desperation and faith. That Jesus touched him was most unusual for he thereby entered into the man's isolation. But again, Jesus supports the law and will not be accessory to its violation. This and other acts of compassion generated great popularity and acclaim for Jesus. But Jesus is not swept away from the source of his power; he retreats to the desert for prayer. Luke's portrayal of Jesus carries this refrain.

5:17-6:11*Controversies with Pharisees

Against the backdrop of great popularity, Luke turns now to the darker side of Jesus' ministry: the stirrings of opposition and controversy. Again Luke follows Mark (2:1-3:6) but with modifications appropriate to Luke's theology and context. The issues—forgiving sin, socializing with publicans and sinners, fasting, and Sabbath observance—are offered in six stories that likely were used by the church in its debates with the synagogue.

5:17-26, The Cure of a Paralytic. Jesus' ministry has attracted not only the sick but Pharisees and teachers of the law from all parts of the country. To appreciate their presence, one must discard popular negative images of Pharisees and understand their views of law, worship, and morality (→ Pharisees). Jesus and they had much in common. The story is dramatic and complex; a man lowered through a roof (Luke says "tiles," reflecting his own urban background) is both healed and forgiven. Does this imply a relation between his illness and his spiritual state? Some scholars hold that the episode is really the joining of a healing story with a forgiveness story set within it. The awkward point lies in vv. 23-24. How can one say whether healing or forgiveness is easier and how can healing prove the authority to forgive? Forgiving sin was certainly the graver issue, for to assume a power only God possessed was blasphemy, a capital offense. The church certainly claimed that the exalted Christ, the Son of man, could forgive sin and in his name offered forgiveness. It is unclear what amazed the crowds, the healing, the pronouncement of forgiveness, or both. The conclusion is of the type that followed healings and exorcisms; forgiveness was a pronouncement and usually included in debate and opposition. No doubt the tradition carried in vv. 17-26 is a literary mix.

5:27-32, Eating with Tax Collectors and Sinners. This unit opens with the call of the man in whose home Jesus will eat with those regarded as social and religious outcasts. The man is Levi (called Matthew in the parallel Matt. 9:9; the name of Matthew occurs in the list of apostles, Luke 6:14-16 but Levi does not). His acceptance of discipleship is as complete as that of Peter, James, and John, and it is followed by a banquet at which Levi's old associates are at table with Jesus. Implied is his joy over his new life and the desire to share it (→Publicans). Eating together, an important theme in Luke-Acts, indicated total acceptance of one another. The objection of the Pharisees is directed at Jesus' disciples, showing that at issue is not a historical question about Jesus but the behavior of Christians in Luke's own day. Jesus defends himself and his church: he gives himself to those who need him. A favorite word of Luke is added to his version of the story: repentance. Repentance is both a gift and a demand of the kingdom life.

5:33-39, Concerning Fasting. Apparently this issue is also raised at Levi's house. The question is not whether fasting is right or wrong. Matthew says Jesus fasted (Matt. 4:2) and the church fasted (Matt. 6:16-18). Luke will later describe the church as fasting (Acts 13:2-3; 14:23). At issue is a matter of appropriateness. Routine fasting as the Pharisees did on Mondays and Thursdays was not an adequate reflection of God's grace and generosity toward the world. To Jesus' way of kingdom living there is an aspect of joy and thanksgiving. Weddings and banquets are proper analogies of the kingdom. Of course the Passion of Jesus evoked fasting among his followers, and until the end of days the church recalls the cross as well as Easter. Jesus tells his critics that his disciples can no more join their newfound joy to old rituals than one can tear up a new garment to patch an old, or put new wine in old skins. Christian rituals must be appropriate to the new life. Luke's concluding v. 39 is unique and unusual. Is it humor or irony? Perhaps it is a recognition that even among the new, the followers of Jesus, there remains a clinging to the old ways of Judaism.

6:1-11, Concerning the Sabbath. That there are two stories focusing on Sabbath observance may indicate the frequency with which this issue arose between church and synagogue. The first (vv. 1-5) involves a defense of Jesus' disciples, concluding with a pronouncement: "The Son of man is lord of the sabbath" (a much more Christological ending than in Mark 2:23-28). In the second (Luke 6:6-11) Jesus defends his own ministry of healing on the Sabbath. In the first the disciples are not accused of stealing; one was allowed to eat from a field while traveling (Deut. 23:25). The charge is harvesting and threshing on the Sabbath. Jesus' defense is by OT precedent (1 Sam. 21:1-6). Apparently the point is that human need, hunger, makes a claim prior to ritual.

In the second incident, the issue is sharply set: Jesus is facing a case of need, he can do something about it, but it is the Sabbath. Mark says Jesus was angry (Mark 3:5); Luke says the Pharisees and scribes were. Jesus poses the issue so as to make inactivity before human need no option at all. The question is simply, What is one to do? Give life (good) or kill (evil)? Jesus' action is the answer: it is never the wrong day to heal and help. The angry discussion that followed anticipates the cross.

Choosing the Twelve Apostles

After reporting the conflicts with the Pharisees and the growing hostility toward Jesus, Luke returns to the content and spirit of 5:16: great public approval and Jesus withdrawing for times of prayer. Choosing the Twelve continues that narrative in that the apostles can help with an ever-increasing ministry and they can assure continuity when the rising fury of Jesus' opponents ends his life. Luke again reminds readers that the selection of twelve helpers was not an act to expedite matters but came after a night of prayer (cf. 3:21). And those chosen are not simply selected to be "sent out" (the verb from which the word "apostle" is derived, Mark 3:14), but they are in Luke given the name "apostles" (→Apostle). The other Gospels each use this word only once but it is more frequent in Luke (9:10; 17:5; 22:14; 24:10). One can see here an instance in which the anticipation of a second volume in which the apostles are principal figures noticeably influences Luke's Gospel narrative. As for the list of names (cf. also Mark 3:13-19; Matt. 10:1-4; Acts 1:13), Luke has Judas the son of James instead of Thaddaeus, and uses no "nicknames" such as "sons of thunder" (Mark 3:17) or "the Twin" (John 11:16). Judas Iscariot is identified by Luke alone with a rare noun for "traitor." The ancient manuscripts reflect some efforts by later scribes to standardize the list.

6:17-9:6

Ministry Between the Choosing and the Sending of the Twelve

Given the number of events and teachings between the selection of the Twelve and their being sent on a mission, we may regard this as a period of preparation for them.

6:17-49, The Sermon on the Plain. Luke has reversed the order of the call of the apostles and the healing of the crowds in Mark 3:7-19 and has shifted the setting from the sea (Mark

3:7) to a level place (Luke 6:17). Matthew places his version of this sermon after the call of four disciples and a general statement about Jesus' ministry (Matt. 4:18-25); Luke locates it after the call of twelve and a general statement about Jesus' ministry (Luke 6:12-19). In Matthew the sermon is from a mountain (Matt. 5:1); in Luke Jesus has prayed and chosen the Twelve on the mountain and now comes down to join a crowd made up of three groups: the apostles, the disciples, and the people (Luke 6:17). Luke may have in mind Jews and Gentiles by referring to both Judea and Tyre and Sidon to the north. Matthew's version is four times the length of Luke's, contains material scattered elsewhere in the Gospels, and offers interpretations within the sermon that lead many students to conclude Luke follows more closely their common source (Q). As in Matthew, Luke seems to address the sermon to Jesus' disciples (v. 20) while insisting the teachings were given in the hearing of all the people (7:1). Luke's larger audience contains those of special concern to this Evangelist: the sick and the distressed.

The sermon itself consists of five parts: blessings and woes (vv. 20-26); on love of enemies (vv. 27-36); on judging (vv. 37-42); on proof of goodness (vv. 43-46); and on hearing and doing (vv. 47-49).

6:20-26, Blessings and Woes. Unlike Matthew's nine blessings and no woes, Luke has four each, set in parallels: poor-rich, hungry-full, weeping-laughing, and rejected-accepted. By sharply contrasting life now and in the future, Luke sets the sermon in an eschatological frame of reference. This is not to say Jesus' disciples are to sit and wait for a blessed future; Christ's presence means "Today this scripture has been fulfilled" (4:21; my emphasis). A blessing is a pronouncement of God's favor, fortune, happiness, while a woe is a curse, a pronouncement of God's disfavor, disapproval, judgment (Deut. 11:26-28). As early as the Magnificat, Luke makes it clear who is recipient of God's gracious favor. Notice also the direct "you" in Luke (which does not begin in Matthew until after the Beatitudes) that implies the presence of both groups in Jesus' audience.

6:27-36, On Love of Enemies. The shifts in the Greek text from plural "you" (vv. 27-28), to singular (vv. 29-30), and back to plural (vv. 32-36), coupled with the fact that these sayings are found elsewhere in the Gospels, persuade readers that this "sermon" consists of a compilation of teachings. This unit contains two parts. The first (vv. 27-31) states the principles that Jesus' followers do not draw behavior patterns from those who victimize them (hating, cursing, abusing, striking, stealing, begging), but rather respond to others as they would wish to be treated (Luke's version of the Golden Rule; cf. Matt. 7:12). The second part (vv. 32-36) insists that neither should one's behavior be determined by one's friends. Rather, one is to imitate God, who does not reciprocate but loves even the ungrateful and selfish.

6:37-42, On Judging. Cf. Matt. 7:1-5; 15:14; 10:24-25. From what has been said above, it follows that Jesus' disciples will not judge or condemn, but give and forgive. Even the balanced justice of measure for measure is joyfully broken by the image of overflowing generosity. "Into your lap" (v. 38) refers to the large pocket formed by the fold in a robe above the belt. Verses 39-40 warn that if one learns from blind, hypocritical, and judgmental teachers, then one will become such a person. Example was a bigger factor in pedagogy then than now. Verses 41-42 use the tragicomical image of a person with a log in the eye trying to improve the condition of another with a speck in the eye.

6:43-46, On Proof of Goodness. This subunit stresses the inseparable union of what one is, what one says, and what one does. Words and deeds announce character as surely as fruit reveals the nature of a tree.

6:47-49, On Hearing and Doing. Matthew (7:24-27) and Luke draw the parable of the two builders from a common source, but Luke has adapted it for a non-Palestinian setting. The meaning is unchanged: the difference between interested auditors and obedient disciples will sooner or later become evident (James 1:22-25).

7:1-10, Healing the Centurion's Slave. Cf. Matt. 8:5-13; John 4:46-53. The centurion is a Gentile, perhaps serving under Herod Antipas or under Pilate at Caesarea. That he loved the Jewish nation and built a synagogue indicate he was a "God-fearer," one who was "at the gate" but not a convert to Judaism (cf. Cornelius, Acts 10:1-2). Unlike Matthew's account, Luke's story is of a man who never came in contact with Jesus. Two delegations, one of Jews and the other of friends, perhaps Gentiles, served as intermediaries. The image is not only of a humble, believing man, but of one who foreshadows the ingathering of Gentiles. The church later will directly take the good news to the Gentiles, but that mission has its authorization in the ministry of Jesus. Matthew uses this occasion to prophesy the time when many will come from east and west (Matt. 8:11-12), but Luke will state that later (Luke 13:28-30).

7:11-17, Raising the Widow's Son at Nain. This story is without parallel in the other Gospels but has antecedents in 1 Kings 17:17-24 and 2 Kings 4:32-37. As in 4:16-30, Luke again looks to the ministries of Elijah and Elisha to present Jesus, not only in what Jesus did but in the way the story is told. "He gave him to his mother" is verbatim from 1 Kings 17:23 in the LXX. A town southeast of Nazareth is believed by some to be the ancient Nain. Luke's "bier" or casket is likely his Greek equivalent of the Jewish stretcher on which the dead were carried outside the town for burial. The story conveys the picture of Jesus not only as compassionate, especially to women, but also as a prophet through whom the people are experiencing a divine visitation (Luke 19:44). This event also prepares readers for the witness to John about Jesus: "the dead are raised up" (7:22).

7:18–35, John the Baptist and Jesus. Cf. Matt. 11:2–19. This unit consists of two parts: the interchange between John's disciples and Jesus (vv. 18–23) and Jesus' words concerning John (vv. 24–35). In the first part, readers have to recall 3:19–20 to know John is in prison. John had disciples; in fact, according to Acts, John's movement had extended as far as Ephesus as early as Paul (18:24–19:4). Even today a small sect in Iraq called Mandeans traces its history to John. All four Gospel writers have to deal with John, affirming his role in God's purpose while keeping him subordinate to Jesus.

John's question is essentially about Jesus' messiahship. But why the question? Is John wavering, unclear about the nature of Jesus' ministry or Jesus' failure to make claims about himself? It must be kept in mind that while John announced the coming of a stronger One, only in the Fourth Gospel does John have the revelation that the person is Jesus (John 1:24–34), though it may be implied in Matt. 3:13–14. Jesus may not fit John's image, or John may wish to prod Jesus to a public declaration. Jesus' answer, recalling Isa. 61:1–2 which Jesus read in the synagogue at Nazareth, is a description of what he is at that time doing. John, like everyone else, must draw his own conclusion, and he is blessed if he is not offended by such a Messiah.

In the second part, Jesus identifies John as a prophet fulfilling Mal. 3:1, but unlike Matthew (11:14) Luke does not say John is Elijah to come (Mal. 4:5). But for all John's greatness, this child of old parents belongs to the old age; in Jesus, child of the young virgin, God does a new thing. Luke 7:29–30 offers a parenthetical comment (so indicated in the RSV) that is perhaps the highest praise of John; that is, receiving or rejecting John's baptism was receiving or rejecting the purpose of God. Verses 31–35 are framed on two proverbs, apparently familiar in the culture, about children, some of whom are fickle and impossible to please. John's and Jesus' eating habits reflect two different life-styles and ministries but the fickle children are pleased by neither. The other children reflect their wisdom by their acceptance of John and Jesus. Those who justified God (v. 29) are justified as wise (v. 35). The focus here on eating, so important in stating who does and who does not belong to the people of God, serves well to introduce the next story.

7:36–50, Jesus Anointed by a Sinful Woman. For Luke's story to be heard it must be separated from similar but different anointing stories in Mark 14:3–9; Matt. 26:6–13; and John 12:1–8. Luke's account involves an unnamed woman (there is no reason to assume it was Mary Magdalene, 8:2) and occurred in Galilee in the house of Simon a Pharisee. Jesus had enough in common with Pharisees for this to be no surprise, nor to be understood as a plot to trap Jesus. Since eating occurred while reclining, the woman's approach and activity were not awkward. For Simon, the act proves Jesus is no prophet since a prophet would have known her to be a sinner and would have repulsed her. But Jesus proves himself a prophet not only by his acceptance of her penitence and love but also by knowing Simon's thoughts.

The parable of the two debtors who owed, one five hundred, the other fifty denarii (a denarius was a day's wages, Matt. 20:2) points up the differences between the woman and Simon, their behaviors registering responses to forgiveness. It is somewhat surprising that Simon had not extended to Jesus the customary courtesies; this and other meals in the homes of Pharisees (Luke 11:37; 14:1) reflect tensions but not alienation and condescension.

Luke 7:47 is difficult in that Jesus seems to say the woman was forgiven much because she loved much, rather than the reverse. Surely the meaning is that she must have been forgiven much since it is evident she loves much. The conclusion of the story (vv. 49–50) could possibly have been originally in another context. After all, the issue has not been Jesus' authority to forgive sins; nor has the praiseworthy quality in the woman been her faith. It was her love that had been abundantly demonstrated.

8:1–3, Women Share in Jesus' Ministry. Luke alone carries this note about these women, and perhaps it is placed here as a contrast to the woman in the preceding story. Joanna is mentioned here and in 24:10; Susanna, nowhere else. Mary of Magdala, prominent in the resurrection narrative, had been relieved of seven demons. Only popular legend has made her a prostitute by assimilation to the previous story. The women are said to have been healed, to have been with Jesus and the Twelve, and to have provided financial assistance. Luke's favorable reports about women began with Elizabeth and Mary and will continue through Acts.

8:4–18, The Parable of the Sower. Cf. Mark 4:1–9; Matt. 13:10–15. Since 6:19 Luke has not followed Mark, but here he returns to that source. However, Luke leaves the setting in Jesus' ministry quite vague and in general abbreviates the parable. The action of the sower is normal for that land in which planting preceded plowing. The parable can have the effect of instructing Jesus' followers that not all their teaching and preaching will be fruitful. It can also serve to encourage those who have looked at their failures and who have forgotten that some seed will yield abundantly. What is important is to realize this is a parable, and therefore is not a simple illustration of a point being made otherwise. Rather a parable is the message, and the message offered in such a way as to elicit listener involvement in its meaning. With parables listeners bear heavy responsibility for what is heard and understood; quite often the message is not obvious nor available to casual, unengaged listeners (→Parables). In stating the reason for speaking in parables (vv. 9-10), Luke very noticeably softens Mark 4:10-12. Luke has in mind two generally described groups: "his disciples" and "others." Since it is his disciples who ask for an explanation and yet who are the ones to whom kingdom secrets are given, we can assume an explanation will follow.

Luke omits Mark's "Lest they should turn again and be forgiven," which was Mark's way of saying that in the purposes of God lay the reasons for some not understanding Jesus' message. Matthew quotes Isa. 6:9-10 in support of this view. All the Evangelists are dealing with the fact that in the audience of Jesus (and of the church) some hear and some do not.

In the interpretation (Luke 8:11-15) the parable is made into an allegory, that is, a story in which each item in the narration is made to represent something else. Most scholars agree this interpretation represents the situation of the early church in its missionary preaching to a variety of conditions. As an "explanation" of the parable, however, the interpretation is less than clear. For example, the seed is identified as "the word of God" (an early Christian term for the gospel message) and also as the various kinds of hearers. One would have expected the hearers to be identified as different kinds of soil.

The concluding verses (16-18) consist of three separate sayings, sometimes called "floating sayings" because they are found in other contexts (Matt. 5:15; 10:26; 25:29; Luke 12:2; 19:26). The sense of the three sayings, however, is appropriate to the revealing quality of parables, in contrast to their concealing or secretive quality. Jesus came to reveal, to give light, and those who attend diligently to his words will experience increasing understanding. Others, with no more investment than spectators, will walk away empty and confused.

8:19-21, Jesus' True Family. Both Mark (3:31-35) and Matthew (12:46-50) place this episode prior to the parable of the sower, and in Mark it occurs in a context of very tense controversy. By abbreviating the account and locating it after the parable of the sower, Luke achieves two things: any tension between Jesus and his immediate family is minimized, and the story serves to illustrate the parable: hearing and doing the word of God is the path into the fellowship created by Jesus.

8:22-25, Jesus Calms the Storm. Cf. Mark 4:35-41; Matt. 8:23-27. This story begins a series of wonders Jesus performs: stilling a storm, healing a demoniac, raising a dead girl, and healing a sick woman. If they are offered as examples of the mysteries of the kingdom, they are but loosely joined to what precedes. Luke simply says, "on one of the days" (translation mine). As usual, Luke calls Galilee a "lake"; for a non-Palestinian, "sea" meant the Mediterranean. Jesus is addressed as Master, appropriate to his action in calming the storm. The miracle is really an exorcism; the water was believed to be an abode of evil forces and a sudden storm was viewed by many as the work of demons. Jesus rebukes them as he did in other exorcisms. It is rare in the Gospels for the Twelve to be the beneficiaries of an act of Jesus' power; usually they join him in ministering to others. In their amazement they ask the question the unfolding story is answering: who is this?

8:26-39, Healing the Gerasene Demoniac. Cf. Mark 5:1-20; Matt. 8:28-34. Luke does not tell this story as lengthily and dramatically as Mark. It is Luke's one story of Jesus ministering outside Jewish territory. The manuscripts differ on the spelling of the name of the place. The account itself is of an exorcism, and though an extreme case of demon possession, the exorcism follows the usual pattern (Luke 4:31-37). The abyss was the netherworld, the abode of the dead (Rom. 10:7), of imprisoned spirits (1 Pet. 3:19), and Satan's prison (Rev. 20:3). The man who is healed (Luke's word can also mean "saved") becomes a disciple and is sent to proclaim what God has done. The story prefigures the gentile mission and gives warrant for it in Jesus' own ministry.

8:40-56, Raising Jairus's Daughter and Healing a Woman with a Hemorrhage. Cf. Mark 5:21-43; Matt. 9:18-26. Luke found these two stories already joined in Mark, who often set a story within a story. The two events have natural connections in that both involve women, both are cases of ritual uncleanness, and, in Luke, both involve "twelve years." This is the second raising of an only child in Luke (7:11-17), and the woman's touch fulfills 6:19. Jesus' word to the woman: "your faith has made you well [saved you]; go in peace" repeats his word to the sinful woman who anointed him (7:50). Whatever the condition, Jesus makes people whole again. In the account of raising Jairus's daughter, Luke introduces the inner circle (Peter, James, and John) and the desire for secrecy on the part of Jesus. Soon now Jesus will turn toward Jerusalem and death; this act of raising the dead must not confuse the public over the uses of Jesus' power in the hour of his own death. In summary, Jesus saves (8:43-48) and gives life to the dead (8:49-56).

9:1-6, Jesus Sends Out the Twelve. Cf. Mark 6:7-13; Matt. 10:1, 9-11, 14. Since the time they were chosen to be apostles (6:12-16), the Twelve have listened to and observed Jesus. Now they are in fact apostles ("those sent out"), commissioned to exorcise demons, to heal, and to preach. Like that of Jesus, their ministry will testify to the inbreaking of the kingdom and an attack on the forces of evil. For this mission Jesus gives not only authority (Mark 6:7) but also power. They do not go two by two; Luke reserves that for the seventy (10:1-12). For the journey they are to be totally dependent on God. Like the Levites they could expect hospitality and support (Num. 18:31; 1 Cor. 9:3-14). Inhospitability was not to be met with retaliation but with the simple ritual of judgment (Luke 9:5; Acts 13:51). Luke clearly has in mind the subsequent mission of the church led by the apostles, especially in the added note of universality: "preaching the gospel and healing everywhere" (my emphasis).

9:7-50

Forebodings and Predictions of the Passion

Even though it is not until 9:51 that Jesus turns toward Jerusalem, every unit of 9:7-50 anticipates directly or indirectly the coming Passion.

9:7-9, Herod Perplexed About Jesus. Cf. Mark 6:14-16; Matt. 14:1-2. This Herod is Antipas, son of Herod the Great and tetrarch of Galilee. The various public opinions of Jesus (repeated at 9:18-22) disturb Herod. The ministry of Jesus has now reached a center of political power, a clear prophecy of death, especially since Herod had already killed John, a fact to which Luke makes only this one reference (for the full story, see Mark 6:17-29). Herod's curiosity about Jesus will turn to desire to kill him (Luke 13:31), a desire satisfied in Jerusalem (23:6-12).

9:10-17, Jesus Feeds the Multitude. Cf. Mark 6:30-44; Matt. 14:13-21; John 6:1-13. The apostles return; the report of their mission is brief, for the central event in which they have a part is now to be related. Only Luke identifies the place as Bethsaida (John 1:44). The feeding of the crowd is set in the context of a full ministry in Lucan terms; Jesus receives the people, he preaches, he heals, and he is concerned about lodging (only in Luke) and provisions for them. The meal itself prefigures the Lord's Supper (Luke 22:19, 24:30), both in the eucharistic language used (9:16) and in the use of the word translated "broken pieces" that came to be a term for the broken bread (Did. 9:3-4) of the Eucharist.

9:18-22, Peter's Confession and the First Prediction of the Passion. Cf. Mark 8:27-33; Matt. 16:13-23. Luke, like John 6:1-69, joins the feeding and Peter's confession, omitting Mark 6:45-8:26. The last geographical reference in Luke was Bethsaida and, typical of this Evangelist, Jesus is described as being in prayer. Setting the event in prayer alerts readers to its critical importance for Jesus and to the operation of God's will. The confession differs somewhat in the three Synoptics, and Luke omits the stern exchange between Jesus and Peter. Some scholars hold that Luke is thereby preserving a loftier image of Peter, but actually in Luke the entire occasion is briefer, more subdued, and wrapped in prayer. Also in Luke the charge to silence is directly tied to the prediction of the Passion, such is the force of the linkage of vv. 21 and 22 by a participle. The "must" here and elsewhere (13:33; 17:25; 22:37; 24:7, 26, 44) points to divine will.

9:23-27, The Demands of Discipleship. Cf. Mark 8:34-9:1; Matt. 16:24-28. Although the passion prediction is to the Twelve alone, the call for cross bearing is to all. Since the cross was a rather familiar instrument of death (Roman), Jesus could have spoken meaningfully of a cross prior to his own death, but Luke's readers understand their crosses after the fact of his. "Daily" alters the emphasis from martyrdom to sacrificial living. Jesus is identified as the Jewish figure "Son of man," both in suffering (v. 22), and in his return in glory from God. In v. 27, by removing "with power" (Mark 9:1), Luke could be referring to some of the disciples seeing the transfiguration or the resurrection.

9:28-36, The Transfiguration. Cf. Mark 9:2-8; Matt. 17:1-8. Luke replaces Mark's six days (Exod. 24:15-16) with eight, perhaps meaning a week later but not necessarily Sunday (sometimes called the eighth day). Again Luke says the journey was for a time of prayer, and the transfiguration occurred during prayer (recall Luke 3:21). The phrase "behold, two men" joins this story to the resurrection (24:4) and the ascension (Acts 1:10). Moses and Elijah talk with Jesus about his approaching death, or more literally, "exodus," a powerfully symbolic term. The disciples do not hear because they are asleep (cf. Luke 22:45). They wake in time to see the three glorified figures. It is the cloud, associated with the awesome presence of God (Exod. 24:15-16; Acts 1:9) that frightens the disciples. Moses and Elijah have vanished; it is Jesus, God's Chosen Son (recalling again the baptismal scene) now moving to his exodus, who is to be heard and obeyed. The silence of the disciples is appropriate.

9:37-50, Portraits of the Not-Yet-Ready Disciples. Cf. Mark 9:14-41; Matt. 17:14-23; 18:1-5. In four vignettes Luke shows the disciples unprepared for the events soon to transpire in Jerusalem. In the first (vv. 37-43a), on the day following the transfiguration, the disciples lack the power to exorcise a demon from a child. Jesus heals the boy and laments the disciples' lack of faith. How long will it take to prepare them to continue his work? In vv. 43b-45, Luke joins to these events the second prediction of the Passion. It is sharply stated, the omission of reference to the resurrection serving to emphasize his death. In v. 45 there is the mixture, not uncommon in Scripture but strange to us, of human unbelief and providential concealing of a truth. Seeing and not seeing, perceiving and not perceiving, are alike attributed to God (cf. 24:16, 31). The third vignette (9:46-48) clarifies why the disciples do not understand talk of suffering: they are concerned about greatness, with a competitive spirit. Lowliness of spirit is taught not by the example of a child but in the reception of a child, that is, in welcoming the lowliest. And finally (vv. 49-50), Jesus addresses the problem of exclusivism among his followers. Very likely Luke is addressing through words of Jesus problems that beset the church: lack of power, misunderstanding, arrogance, and exclusivism. Luke marks at 9:50 the end of the Galilean ministry; Jesus now turns with his not-yet-ready disciples toward Jerusalem.

9:51-19:28

The Journey to Jerusalem

Of this section, 9:51-18:14 is often called Luke's travel narrative, which in 18:15 rejoins Mark and Matthew. Actually, much in this section has with Matthew a common source (Q), a small portion is also in Mark, with a substantial amount peculiar to Luke. The material is arranged as a journey, with Luke on occasion reminding readers of that perspective (9:51; 13:22; 17:11) since the stories in themselves do not usually imply a journey. Some scholars hold that Luke follows the narrative of Deuteronomy, and much does fit that pattern, though not all. For example, some Elijah and Elisha echoes from 1 and 2 Kings are here also. Geographical references do not really help one reconstruct the journey, since Luke's travel narrative is more theological than geographical. Jesus moves now toward suffering; to follow him is to face the same.

9:51-62

Jesus Establishes the Nature of the Journey

The two units that open this section make clear to the disciples the nature of the way and its destination.

9:51-56, Passing Through Samaria. The journey begins with a rejection and prophesies rejection. "To be received up" refers to crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension (Acts 1:2, 11; cf. 2 Kings 2:9-11; Isa. 42:1). "Set his face" echoes Isa. 50:7, which speaks of determination in the face of opposition. Messengers are sent ahead to make preparations (anticipating Luke 22:7-13), but they meet rejection, not because Jesus is a Galilean but because he is moving on to Jerusalem. Jesus forbids any violent reaction in the manner of Elijah (2 Kings 1:9-10). Some scribes added an explanation to Luke 9:55 (see footnote on this passage in RSV). Later the Samaritans will welcome the Gospel (Acts 8:5-25).

9:57-62, Underscoring the Cost of Discipleship. Cf. Matt. 8:19-22. The three cases of would-be disciples serve to accent the demands of following Jesus whose face is set toward the cross. The call to discipleship is not set against weak and flimsy excuses but against primary personal and family obligations: attending to creature needs, filial duty, and family love. Loyalty to Jesus demands more than Elijah asked of Elisha (1 Kings 19:19-21), taking precedence over the best, not the worst, of human priorities.

10:1-24

The Mission of the Seventy

This unit consists of six subunits: the instruction of the seventy; woes upon those who reject the messengers; the return of the seventy; a thanksgiving; and a blessing.

10:1-12, The Instruction of the Seventy.

This material recalls the mission of the Twelve (9:1-5; Matt. 9:37-38; 10:7-16). Traditionally, Judaism spoke of seventy (some manuscripts say seventy-two) nations (Gen. 10) and Luke's sending out seventy in teams of two anticipates the mission to the nations described in Acts. The time for the mission is ripe but the resistance will be strong. However, the messengers are to be equipped only with trust in God, giving themselves to healing and preaching. They are neither to shop around for the best hospitality nor delay with conversation on the road. Whether received or rejected, their message is the same: the kingdom of God has come near. That truth is not contingent on the response. The judgment pronounced in Luke 10:12 is Jesus' comment to the messengers and not a part of their message.

10:13-16, Woes on the Impenitent. Cf. Matt. 11:21-23. Apparently Jesus had ministered in all three towns, although there is no record of his being in Chorazin (north of Capernaum). Theirs had been a privilege not shared by gentile cities and therefore, greater would be their judgment. The principle applies: to whom much is given, of them much is expected. Luke 10:16 underscores the seriousness of accepting or rejecting the disciples: treatment of them is treatment of Jesus, is treatment of God.

10:17-20, The Return of the Seventy. The report of the seventy is cast entirely in terms of exorcisms, indicating that the ministry of Jesus is gaining power over the forces of evil. The two OT allusions, the fall of Satan (Isa. 14:12) and treading on serpents and scorpions (Ps. 91:13) convey this note of victory. However, triumphalism is an inappropriate spirit among disciples; to be inscribed in God's book (Exod. 32:32-33) is the proper ground for joy.

10:21-24, A Prayer and a Blessing. Cf. Matt. 11:25-27; 13:16-17. Jesus' prayer of thanks (only Luke says Jesus rejoiced in the Holy Spirit) may have been a hymn of praise in the early church. It delights in the reversal common to much of the NT: concealed from the wise, revealed to babes. In addition, it portrays Jesus as the divine revealer, much like the figure of Wisdom in Judaism, a portrait more Johannine than Lucan. Jesus' blessing is on his disciples who are among the babes who see, a privilege the early leaders could only anticipate.

Two Stories About Seeing and Not Seeing

Having blessed his disciples for seeing, Jesus now has two encounters with persons who did not see, a lawyer and a woman named Martha. The causes of their inability to see are different and so are Jesus' remedies: in the one case, "go and do likewise"; in the other, sit still and listen. By placing these stories back to back, Luke reminds readers that the responses to Jesus' call are not the same in every case.

10:25-37, Jesus and the Lawyer. Cf. Mark 12:28-31; Matt. 22:34-40. Both Mark and Matthew have this story later, with variations in details. For Luke the story illustrates how the wise and prudent miss what babes know. The lawyer's question is about eternal life, not the greatest commandment, and he is led to answer it himself. But he cannot accept his own answer because he must press for some advantage over Jesus. To his second question Jesus offers a parable, or perhaps an example story. The story begins as a common occurrence on a dangerous road. The behavior of the priest and the Levite (a Temple assistant) is not admirable but could be explained on several grounds. The ugliness of their neglect appears sharply when, surprisingly, a Samaritan is introduced as the one unselfish, concerned, attentive, and caring to the point of delaying his own journey, expending much energy, and spending two days' wages, with the assurance of more. Ceremonially unclean, socially outcast, and religiously a heretic, the Samaritan (from the Jewish point of view) is the opposite of the lawyer as well as the priest and Levite. Jesus alters the question, Who is my neighbor? to Who proved to be a neighbor? Again the lawyer answers the question and the implications of his own answer are inescapable.

10:38-42, Jesus, Martha, and Mary. Martha and Mary appear in John's Gospel (John 11:1-12:8) and live in Bethany near Jerusalem. However, in Luke Jesus is not yet near the city. Martha's busyness indicates many guests and her work was not only hospitable but supported by laws of hospitality. Her complaint is reasonable. Jesus' response to her anxiety is not totally clear. An alternate reading to "one thing is needful" is "few things are needful, or only one." Does this mean only a few dishes, or only one dish is enough? If so, it still carries symbolic force: the greater need is spiritual food and that is the portion or "dish" that Mary had chosen.

Teachings on Prayer

Luke has gathered sayings of Jesus on prayer, only the parable of the friend at midnight being peculiar to Luke. Matthew has the remainder, but locates it in two places in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6:9-13; 7:7-11). Luke set all these sayings in the context of Jesus' own prayer life, which prompts his disciples to ask for instruction in prayer. John had disciples who prayed and fasted (John 5:33). Luke's form of the Lord's Prayer lacks the liturgical elaborations of Matthew's and may be earlier. The shorter phrases in Luke, such as "Thy kingdom come," underline the urgent tone of the prayer. "Daily bread" is here "bread day after day" and "sins" interpretends "debts." The final petition is probably eschatological: do not lead us into trial, that is, the final agony of evil before the end. The parable of the friend at midnight (Luke 11:5-8 is a bit awkward at first because it seems to focus on the one asking for bread. "Which of you" as an introduction to parables always anticipates a "No one" in response. It is soon clear that attention is on the one asleep on a mat on the floor with his children, having barred the heavy door for the night. The meaning does not lie in comparing God to a reluctant friend who helps only in response to importunity (persistence, shamelessness) but in thinking from lesser to greater. If friends respond, how much more will God. The closing verses (9-13) continue the teaching that God responds to prayer, but prayer is continual (present imperatives) asking, seeking, knocking. Even so, this persistence is in the context of a parent-child relationship that assures not only good gifts, but in this case, the highest gift: the Holy Spirit.

Conflicts and Controversies

The spirit of this section is that of controversy even though the particular issues vary: by what power Jesus exorcises demons; by what sign his power can be shown to be of God; and the hypocrisy of Jesus' critics.

11:14-28, Concerning Exorcisms. Cf. Mark 3:22-27; Matt. 12:22-30. Luke enjoys putting contrasting materials together: Holy Spirit (v. 13) and evil spirits (vv. 14-26). Following an exorcism, some marveled, some sought a sign as proof, while others charged Jesus with using the power of Beelzebul ("Baal the prince"; the Gk. text does not say Beelzebub, "Lord of the flies," 2 Kings 1:2). Jesus answers the charge with logic (Satan would not work against himself), with a comparison (How do exorcists among you cast out demons?), and a challenge (If I work by the finger of God [Exod. 8:19], then the kingdom has come). The fact is, says Jesus, Satan is being overthrown by a stronger one. But even after an evil spirit is cast out, there must be diligence or evil will return and the final condition will be even worse (cf. also Matt. 12:43-45). Luke's location of the saying about Jesus' mother (Luke 11:27-28) seems to have been influenced by Mark who locates the coming of Jesus' mother and brothers after the Beelzebul controversy (Mark 3:20-35). For Mary and for all, hearing and doing bring blessedness.

11:29-36, Concerning Signs. Cf. Matt. 12:38-42; 5:15; 6:22-23. Unlike Matthew, Luke does not address Jesus' words about this evil generation to scribes and Pharisees. Also unlike Matthew, Luke's use of Jonah is not to offer a sign of the resurrection. And unlike Mark (8:12) who offers no sign, Luke offers the sign of Jonah's preaching that produced repentance. The Ninevites received from Jonah; the queen of the South received from Solomon; therefore, both will judge Jesus' audience for they refuse to receive a greater prophet than Jonah, a wiser man than Solomon. The concluding sayings on light are apparently placed here to say that to the person of integrity and openness to light, Jesus' message is clear enough and able to give the light of God to one's life.

11:37-12:1, Woes to Pharisees and Lawyers. Cf. Matt. 23:1-36, but in a different order. Luke sets these woes in the context of a meal in the home of a Pharisee, not uncommon in Luke (7:36; 14:1). Jesus had much in common with them; in fact, it was Pharisees who warned Jesus about Herod (13:31). But they differed as to what constituted the will of God. True devotion and true almsgiving are with integrity and not outward only. The three woes against these (certainly not all) Pharisees have to do with care for legal details and neglect of God's justice and love; with pride of place and attention; and with being hidden contaminators of Israel's life, like buried graves. The three woes against the lawyers (experts in Mosaic law) have to do with burdening others while claiming personal exemption; with honoring dead prophets while consenting and participating in the causes of their death; and with confusing the people both by example and teaching. Luke is thinking of the church when he adds apostles to the list of the persecuted (v. 49). "Wisdom of God" in v. 49 is in Matthew Jesus himself (Matt. 23:34; also 1 Cor. 1:24). "Required of this generation" (Luke 11:50) may refer to the fall of the nation and of Jerusalem. Luke concludes the section with two comments: one to the effect that efforts to trap Jesus continued (vv. 53-54), and the other as a word of warning to the increasing crowds concerning the harmful influence of Pharisaic hypocrisy.

12:2-13:9

Exhortations and Warnings

Luke sets these teachings in his favorite context: his disciples surrounded by a large crowd (the Gk. literally means ten thousand). His words are for his followers, but for all to hear, ponder, and if so minded, accept.

12:2-12, Call for Open Confession. Cf. Matt. 10:26-33; 12:32; 10:19. Luke draws together from Q what is scattered in Matthew. These verses participate in both present and future, both command and promise. At the end all secrets and mysteries will be revealed, and that fact necessitates full and open confession and proclamation now by those who belong to the new age. Disciples are not to be intimidated into silence, for only God is to be feared. God who cares for sparrows surely cares for those who trust. In the courts of heaven (Job 1:6-12; Isa. 40; Zech. 3) acknowledgment or denial will already have been determined on earth. Awkwardly inserted here at v. 10 is Luke's version of the sin that will not be forgiven (Mark 3:28-29; Matt. 12:32). Some early Christians took blasphemy against the Spirit to mean rejecting the inspired speech of a prophet. Here the saying seems to mean that not believing in Jesus as the Son of man on earth could be forgiven. After all, there was yet Pentecost and the call to repentance. However, if the Spirit's call to repentance and faith is dismissed as nothing, forgiveness becomes unavailable. Verses 11-12 continue the message of 2-9: under pressures religious and political, disciples are to have courage, listening to the Spirit that leads and confirms in the time of trial.

12:13-21, The Parable of the Rich Fool.

This parable, found only in Luke, is prompted by a dispute between brothers over an inheritance. Apparently the regulations for such cases (Num. 27:1-11; Deut. 21:15-17) were not being followed, in the opinion of the younger brother who must wait on the older. Rather than act as judge, Jesus states a proverbial truth (Luke 12:15b) and elaborates with a parable (vv. 16-20), v. 21 being commentary on it. The parable is clear: a man is blessed with abundance and he responds with self-congratulations and conversations with himself. Family, neighbors, God: all are absent from his plans.

12:22-34, Concerning Anxiety About Things.

Cf. Matt. 6:25-33; 6:19-21. The injunction against anxiety is not a general one; some anxiety may be a form of care, as Paul's for the churches (2 Cor. 11:28). Here the issue is preoccupation with material things that reflects a lack of trust in God, a lack of interest in the kingdom, and a lack of generosity toward those in need. Such anxiety is not productive: can anxiety add a cubit (18 in.) to life (stature?; see footnote on this passage in RSV)? This expression may echo Ps. 39:5, a cubit meaning one more step to life's walk. Birds and flowers offer lessons in dependence on God. Anxious grasping is the pursuit of pagans who do not know that God is aware of their needs. Those who put kingdom matters first not only have their needs met but God's gifts include the kingdom as well. After all, one can even become anxious about the kingdom and forget that it is God's to give. The opposite of anxiety is that generosity that both expresses freedom and grants freedom in care for others (Luke 12:33-34).

12:35-48, Concerning Preparedness and Fidelity.

Cf. Matt. 24:43-51. Having loins girded (the loose outer garment gathered up for work or travel) and lamps burning says it in two images: prepared and awake, even if the master comes in the third watch (the Jewish night had three watches). The image of the return from a marriage feast recalls Matt. 25:1-13. Luke 12:37-38 pronounces a blessing on servants who are ready for the coming of the kingdom, or in Luke's day, for the coming of Christ. Verses 39-40 offer a brief parable of the uncertain time, the night thief being a common motif (1 Thess. 5:2-11; 2 Pet. 3:10; Rev. 3:3). However, in response to Peter's question, Jesus pronounces a blessing on that steward whose behavior is faithful apart from any calculations of the early or late arrival of the master. Ascertaining the time of the Lord's return is inadequate and inappropriate motivation for behavior. And as for leaders (those who know the master's will, Luke 12:47-48), their privileges and responsibilities are greater, but so will be their punishment for unfaithfulness.

12:49-59, Concerning the Approaching Crisis.

Cf. Matt. 10:34-36; 16:2-3; 5:25-26; Mark 10:38. Probably Luke 12:49-53, 54-56, and 57-59 were not originally joined but they have enough in common to be associated here. In vv. 49-53 there are two governing images: fire, which signifies both judgment and purification, and baptism, a reference to the Passion into which Jesus soon will be plunged (Mark 10:38). Until all is accomplished Jesus is constrained, distressed, pushing against restraints. Jesus' presence is critical for the world, causing the rising and falling of many (Luke 2:34), separating doubt from faith and hence dividing households. Peace in the sense of status quo is disrupted. This has proven true historically and will be so at the end.

In 12:54-56 Jesus chastises the crowds for being clever in reading weather signs but blind to the sign from God: the presence of Jesus heralds the coming of the kingdom. In view of the nature of the present time, one should be as wise before God as before a magistrate, that is, make peace now before the judgment (vv. 57-59). In Matt. 5:25-26 this saying refers to making peace with an offending brother, but Luke sets it in the context of impending divine judgment.

13:1-9, The Call to Repentance.

The material in 13:1-9 has no parallel in Mark or Matthew. It consists of two parts: vv. 1-5 and 6-9. The call for repentance, more common in Luke than other NT writers, is especially fitting here in view of the preceding teaching. Verses 1-5 contain two parallel sayings that preface calls to repentance. One has to do with Galileans, the other Jerusalemites; one deals with human evil, the other natural evil. In other words, Jesus is inclusive when he says that the desire to find direct correlations between suffering and sin are fruitless and miss the point, which is that all are sinners in need of repentance. The final blow to the idea that any person suffering must have sinned is dealt at Golgotha. As to the two tragedies mentioned, there is no other record available.

The parable of the fig tree is the closest Luke comes to the story of the cursing of the fig tree (Mark 11:12-14; Matt. 21:18-19), which he omits. Cultivating and fertilizing the tree is a symbol of God's mercy (Hos. 9:10; Isa. 5:1-7; Ezek. 17:22-24). There is still time to repent and bear fruit.

13:10-35

Tensions and Forebodings of the Passion

This section is governed by references to Jerusalem and the suffering soon to occur. Even when not named, Jerusalem casts a shadow over this material.

13:10-17, Controversy over a Sabbath Healing. This story, peculiar to Luke, recalls a similar incident in 6:6-11 at which time Jesus' opponents discussed what to do to Jesus. Here, in Luke's last reference to Jesus' appearance in a synagogue, the tension is no less great, but the dynamic is different. The synagogue ruler addresses the crowd in an indirect attack on Jesus, but it backfires: the people rejoice over what Jesus does. The controversy plays on the word "to loose" or "release." Jesus looses the woman from her infirmity (v. 12); Jesus reminds them that they loose an ox or ass on the Sabbath for watering; then why not loose this woman from Satan's bond? It is an argument from the lesser to the greater. At the end the house is divided: all those set against Jesus are shamed; all the people rejoice. Those shamed will not forget.

13:18-21, Parables of the Kingdom. Cf. Mark 4:30-32; Matt. 13:31-33. Mark has the first parable, Matthew has both, and both writers place them in a collection of parables. Luke places these two in the tension-filled journey to Jerusalem. They address the problem of discouragement and despair over apparent lack of success. The measure of kingdom work is in the result not in the small and obscure beginnings. Luke's placing the 8-10-foot mustard plant in a garden would have been rare in Palestine, most likely not his native land.

13:22-30, Strict Requirements for the Kingdom. Matthew has parallels in six different places in his Gospel. Luke reminds readers that Jesus is on his way to Jerusalem, a fact that makes the sober question appropriate. Luke often launches teachings from a problem posed to Jesus (Luke 11:1; 12:13; 13:1, 41). The question really is the readers', who have listened to Jesus since 9:51. The teachings are obviously composite. For example, the door of 13:24 and the door of 13:25 are very different. The door into the kingdom is not only narrow but it also will close, not to be reopened for those who have no more claim than that they know Jesus socially or recall his visit to their town. Added to the pain of refusal will be the sight of a large ingathering of those who believed, including their forebears, prophets, and, surprisingly to some, Gentiles.

13:31-35, A Warning About Herod and a Lament. Verses 31-33 are only in Luke. We cannot assume the Pharisees who often had Jesus to dinner are here part of a death plot. Earlier Herod Antipas was perplexed about Jesus and wanted to see him (9:7-9). In what sense did Jesus mean Herod was a fox? In the OT a fox is destructive; among the Greeks, clever. But Herod must wait; Jesus' course is brief now but must be finished (cf. John 5:36; 17:4; 19:28; Heb. 2:10). The three days are, of course, symbolic of death and resurrection which, in God's purpose, are to be accomplished at Jerusalem. The lament over Jerusalem is in Matthew (23:37-39) at the close of Jesus' Jerusalem ministry, and by the addition "you will not see me again" (my emphasis) clearly refers to the Parousia. In Luke the location is awkward because Jesus has not yet gone to the city, making "how often would I have gathered you" premature. "Blessed is he who comes" (Ps. 118:26) will be shouted when he arrives in Jerusalem (Luke 19:39-44). By this early placement perhaps Luke is saying that though Israel's house is forsaken, there is yet time for repentance and for joining in the expectation of redemption. It is late but not too late.

Table Talk

Luke unites four disparate pieces by setting them in the context of a meal; in fact three of the four units deal with banquets. It was common in the Hellenistic world for banquets to be the setting for philosophers and teachers to offer their wisdom. But for Luke the image of Jesus at table was that of one who accepted and received all kinds of people, the proof of which was in the breaking of bread.

14:1-6, A Sabbath Healing. As already noted, it is not uncommon in Luke to see Jesus dining with Pharisees. (Concerning healings on the Sabbath and Jesus' defense of them, see commentary above on 6:6-11 and 13:10-17.) The frequency of such stories reflects the critical role of Sabbath observance in Judaism and the tension between synagogue and church over the matter. In v. 5, "a son or an ox" is more awkward than "an ass or an ox" but has the stronger manuscript support.

14:7-11, A Lesson for Guests. Jesus advises choosing the lowest place, which would avoid public embarrassment and, on occasion, provide a moment of public admiration. Such a teaching would be no more than good advice on social behavior had not Luke said Jesus spoke it as a parable (v. 7). Not etiquette but kingdom behavior is the point, as the pronouncement in v. 11 makes clear. (This pronouncement is frequent in the Gospels, Luke 18:14; Matt. 18:4; 23:12). But the ego is clever and may prompt the choice of low seats as a way to move up.

14:12-14, A Lesson for Hosts. Like the clamoring guests above, the host is caught in a cycle of self-seeking. Hosting can be a way of putting others in your debt, but why put in your debt those who cannot repay? However, in the kingdom God is host and who can repay God? Luke's list of the fringe people: the poor, maimed, lame, and blind, repeated in the next story, is his list of kingdom people. That has been clear since Mary's song (1:46-55).

14:15-24, The Parable of the Supper. Perhaps the mention of resurrection (v. 14) prompts the remark of a guest (v. 15) that in turn occasions the parable. Different versions of this parable are found in Matt. 22:1-10 and in the Gospel of Thomas 64 (→ Gospel of Thomas). The parable assumes the custom of an invitation in advance and an invitation at the time of the meal to those who accepted the first. The excuses offered were not thin; marriage even exempted one from military duty (Deut. 20:7; 24:5), but this is no ordinary banquet competing with social and economic engagements. It is clear the parable is about the messianic banquet in the kingdom. The new invitation goes first to Luke's marginal people whom God remembers (contrast Matthew's "both bad and good"). Next the invitation widens to the outskirts of the city (Luke 14:23), probably a reference to Gentiles. In v. 24 the speaker is not the host but Jesus, speaking not to the servant (the "you" is plural) but to all.

14:25-35 Concerning Discipleship

Teachings here are paralleled in Mark and Matthew and even elsewhere in Luke. They are here gathered and addressed to the crowds; v. 25 makes clear the shift from the semiprivate material of vv. 1-24. These crowds are following Jesus but do not know he is going to his death. What he says, therefore, does not address the reluctant, as in 9:59-62, but the enthusiastic, as in 9:57. The sayings are held together by a refrain "whoever does not . . . cannot be my disciple" (14:26, 27, 33). The words are stern, using the Semitic expression "hate", that is, "turn away from," "detach oneself from." Even among primary relationships Jesus demands first loyalty. The two parables, one about a farmer (a tower for watching a vineyard) and the other about a king, say to high and low, rich and poor, "Is the price of discipleship more than you are willing or able to pay?" Verses 34-35 are rather detached, paralleled at Matt. 5:13 and Mark 9:50. In this context the saying may be insisting that even an initial sincere commitment can fade if one is not careful, just as salt can lose its taste.

Three Parables of Joy

15:1-3, Narrative Setting. The three parables are Jesus' response to a criticism by Pharisees and scribes that he "receives sinners and eats with them." The word translated "receives" (RSV) or "welcomes" (NEB) can mean that Jesus is host to them. The issue is table fellowship and Jesus' full acceptance of sinners, as breaking bread together implied. The critics feel justified in the charge, "Behold, a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners!" (7:34). Having three parables together is not unusual since offering material in triplets is common in Luke (9:57-62; 11:42-52; 14:18-20; 20:10-12). Matthew has a parallel (Matt. 18:12-14) to the first; the second and third are peculiar to Luke.

15:4-10, Finding the Sheep and Finding the Coin. The two parables say essentially the same thing, repetition serving to emphasize (cf. Luke 5:36-39; 14:28-32). They have the same form, "What man," "What woman," questions that always evoke the response, "No one." In Matthew a sheep "goes astray" and church leaders are instructed to find and restore such a one. In Luke the sheep is lost, as are the sinners in Jesus' presence. Ezek. 34:12 and Isa. 49:22 lie behind Luke's image of the tender shepherd. Love for the lost sheep is so strong that the ninety-nine are left in the wilderness while the search is on. Such seeking love takes great risks. The woman's ten silver coins (drachmas) represented about ten days' wages and many months of saving. She, like the shepherd, seeks diligently "until she finds it"; there is no giving up in either story. The joy of finding cannot be contained; a party is appropriate. Even Jesus' critics are invited to celebrate for such must be heaven's joy over the sinners who have come to Jesus.

15:11-32, The Loving Father. The theme of penitence in the first two parables anticipates the third, and the theme of joy (vv. 7, 10, 24, 32) binds the three together. A few points of information: according to Jewish custom, a younger son received one-third of the inheritance. Usually received at the father's death, the inheritance could be divided earlier. To feed swine was to become as a Gentile, a nobody (Lev. 11:7; Isa. 65:4; 66:17). The pods eaten were the long pods from the carob tree, eaten by animals and at times by the extremely poor. The few scholars who think Luke 15:11-32 contains what once was two parables (vv. 11-24; 25-32) miss the structure and the focus. The structure does not have two conclusions (vv. 24, 32) but one conclusion repeated, not uncommon in parables (note Matt. 25:14-30). And the focus is not the sons but the father. The father had two sons, loved two sons, went out to two sons (Luke 15:20, 28). God is a both/and, not an either/or God; to embrace sinners is not to reject Pharisees. The offense in 15:1-2, repeated at vv. 7 and 10 and voiced by the older brother is the joy, the party, the singing and dancing. Of course, let the penitent come home, but to bread and water, not grain-fed veal; to sackcloth not a new robe; to ashes not jewelry; to kneeling not dancing. Forgiveness appears to critics very much like condoning.

Teachings Concerning Wealth

Except for vv. 16-18, the entirety of Luke 16 is devoted to teachings about possessions, a subject of primary concern to Luke (3:10-14; 12:13-21, 32-34; Acts 2:43-6:7). The discussion is in two parts, vv. 1-15 and 19-31, each part controlled by a parable and each parable beginning "There was a rich man" (vv. 1, 19). Only v. 13 has a parallel elsewhere (Matt. 6:24).

16:1-15, Parable of the Shrewd Steward.

This parable is directed to the disciples. To understand the parable it is important to separate the parable proper from comments on it. Although not unanimous, the view is widely held that the parable ends at 8a, and hence the commendation of the steward was for his prudence. What the steward had done is not clear: either he reduced the bills by subtracting his own commission (in which case he would not have been dishonest) or he permitted falsification of the amounts owed his master. The latter seems more likely. If v. 8b is commentary, then the lesson is that people of the world demonstrate an astuteness (NEB) from which children of light (1 Thess. 5:4-5) can learn. And wherein is the astuteness? Verse 9 says it lies in using possessions so as to gain rather than lose one's future. Verses 10-13 provide further commentary on wealth but not necessarily related to the parable. Each of these verses states a proverbial truth, vv. 10-12 framed on a lesser-to-greater argument, and v. 13 an either/or statement, but none of them depend on the parable for the truth being stated. The Pharisees, here called lovers of money, were, unlike the Sadducees, generally urban and business people. Their making fun of Jesus may imply that they regarded prosperity as God's reward for righteousness (Deut. 27-28). Their self-justification may have been in the form of alms and other works of merit, but God's assessments are usually a reversal of our own.

16:16-18, Concerning the Law. Cf. Matt. 11:12-13; 5:18, 32. These sayings, differently located in Matthew, create a problem for the interpreter because they seem unrelated to the preceding or succeeding parables. Perhaps the introduction of Pharisees in vv. 14-15 prompted sayings about the law. John, whose life Luke joined to that of Jesus from birth (chaps. 1-2), was the beginning of something new (3:1-2, 18). The phrase "everyone enters it violently" (RSV) or "everyone forces his way in" (NEB) is most difficult. Luke uses the word elsewhere, with a prefix, to mean "urgently or strongly invite" (Luke 24:29; Acts 16:15). Perhaps that is the sense here, similar to compelling guests to come to the banquet (Luke 14:23). It could also refer to the large enthusiastic crowds pressing around Jesus. But even though John marks a new era there is abiding authority in the old law (16:17). However, the old must be interpreted properly, as, for example, in the case of divorce (Deut. 24:1-4). It is difficult to see any other reason for placing this teaching (Luke 16:18) here. This saying is here without context, but both Matthew (19:3-12) and Mark (10:2-12) as well as Paul (1 Cor. 7:10-16) present sayings on marriage and divorce with contexts. Luke's form of the teaching is very strict, but the other forms of this saying indicate how the church struggled with its application.

16:19-31, The Rich Man and Lazarus.

The story (is it a parable, containing as it does a proper name?) of the rich man (in the Vulgate called "Dives," meaning wealthy) and Lazarus seems to bear some relationship to the story in John 11 of the raising of Lazarus from the dead. But that association concerns only the second part of this story (Luke 16:27-31) and not its first part (vv. 19-26). Some have suggested that the story's two parts are responses to two themes introduced at vv. 14-17: love of money and disregard for the law. The story itself is well traveled—versions of it are found in rabbinic as well as Egyptian literature. It reflects popular beliefs about the hereafter. Details are rich and sharp. For the rich man, dressed in robes of royalty and fine Egyptian undergarments, life is a daily feast. The poor man, clothed in running sores/squats (lies) among the dogs, famished. Both die but only the rich man is buried. Now their roles reverse (reversal of fortunes is frequent in Luke and the change is unalterable. Up to this point all that Luke has said in warning and in instruction about material things comes vividly to mind. "Poor" is almost a synonym for "saint" as Lazarus enjoys the bliss of Abraham's bosom while the rich man lies in Hades. But in vv. 27-31 a second point vital to Luke is made. The Scriptures are sufficient for faith and when they are rejected, as the rich man has done (Mic. 2:9; Isa. 58:7), not even an event as extraordinary as a resurrection will generate belief. That proved true in the case of Jesus.

On Sin, Forgiveness, Faith, and Duty

These four brief teachings have no thematic unity but are joined only by a common audience: the disciples (v. 1). Some sayings attributed to Jesus are like proverbs, which have their meaning intrinsically rather than contextually. The first teaching (vv. 1-2) warns against causing any of Christ's "little ones"—that is, followers, especially new and not yet mature ones—to stumble. "Being the cause of stumbling" more accurately translates the term here than does "temptation to sin" and "cause to sin." (Cf. Mark 9:42 and Matt. 18:6-7.) This does not mean, however, that one is to avoid a brother or sister for fear of being a stumbling block. On the contrary, the second teaching (vv. 3-4) enjoins responsibility to rebuke in order to correct and to forgive, even seven times a day. A different form of vv. 3-4 is found in Matt. 18:15, 18-22. The context of the third teaching (vv. 5-6) implies that the apostles request more faith, having heard the rigorous demands of vv. 1-4. It is unclear whether Jesus' response ("Lord" is for Luke a favorite way of referring to him) is a rebuke (their faith is smaller than a mustard seed) or a word of encouragement (your own small faith will perform wonders). (Cf. Mark 11:22-23; Matt. 17:20; 21:21.) The final teaching is a parable found in Luke alone. It begins in a fashion familiar in Luke: "Will any one of you," the answer to which is "No." The servant is, in fact, a slave, serving both in the field and in the house. Even after faithful service the slave has no claim nor does he reach a point of completed duty. There is no ground for assuming reward or for boasting (Rom. 3:27); such calculations are foreign to the life of dedication. There is no joy, no laughter in the parable, but the reason may lie in the next verse: "on the way to Jerusalem."

17:11-18:30

Teachings Leading to the Final Prediction of the Passion

This section consists of events and teachings between the reminder, "on the way to Jerusalem" (17:11), and the final prediction of his Passion, "Behold, we are going up to Jerusalem" (18:31). At 18:14 Luke's special section will close and at 18:15 he will rejoin the narrative of Mark.

17:11-19, The Grateful Leper. This story is only in Luke, the account in Mark 1:40-45 not being parallel here but to Luke 5:12-16. The location between Galilee and Samaria is unusual for a journey to Jerusalem that began at 9:51 passing through Samaria. Perhaps the location is used to introduce a story involving Jews and a Samaritan (17:16). Otherwise details are realistic. Lepers tended to live in groups (2 Kings 7:3), they avoided contact with nonlepers (Luke 17:12; Lev. 13:45-46; Num. 5:2), but they stayed near populated areas to beg alms. A priest had to certify healings (Lev. 14:2-32). But did the command to go to the priest include the Samaritan whose own ritual center was Mount Gerizim? And why rebuke them for not returning when they were commanded to go and in that obedience were healed (Luke 17:14)? Clearly this story follows 2 Kings 5:1-14, which is in two parts: Naaman a foreigner was healed of leprosy and then he was converted to Israel's faith. The two parts here are in vv. 11-14, the healing, and vv. 15-19, the salvation of a foreigner. The expression "Your faith has made you well" (v. 19) refers to some blessing other than healing since that was already true for all. Literally the expression is, "has saved you." The story foreshadows Acts 28:26-27 in showing the faith of foreigners and the blindness of Israel. The nine, presumably Jews, are blessed and the Mosaic law is enjoined, but their response falls short of that of the Samaritan.

17:20-37, Concerning the Kingdom and the Coming Son of Man. Mark 13 and Matthew 24 combine the Parousia discourse with the prediction of the fall of Jerusalem but Luke separates them. The material here has two audiences: Pharisees ask when the kingdom will come (vv. 20-21) and Jesus speaks to his disciples about the coming of the Son of man (vv. 22-37). To understand Jesus' word to the Pharisees it is necessary to note also 19:11. There is a future coming of the kingdom, but it is also "in the midst of you." This phrase can be translated "within you" but the "you" is plural, best translated "among you," a much less subjective perspective. Jesus among them is the presence of the kingdom, but his presence is not heralded by a display of wonders.

The phrases "Lo, here it is!" or "There!" are repeated in teaching the disciples about the coming of the Son of man (v. 23; → Son of man). Jesus is identified as the Son of man who first must suffer and be rejected (v. 25). Because the church after him will suffer, the disciples will long for his coming in final deliverance. However, in their anxious expectation they are not to be fooled by the calculators of time and place. Rather that day will come with the suddenness of lightning, and at times when life seems to be proceeding normally, as in the days of Noah and Lot, when it comes, one is to give oneself to it and not try to save one's property or to escape it. Such attempts are self-defeating. After all, that event will be so decisive and final as to separate two in bed or two at work. (Notice the absence of v. 36 that some later manuscripts insert, borrowed from Matt. 24:40.) Jesus' answer to the question, Where? is as vague as his answer to the question, When? The proverb about the eagle (vulture) echoes Job 39:30. Both the where and the when of judgment will be known after it occurs, not before, as a gathering of vultures signifies a dead prey.

18:1-14, Two Parables on Prayer. These parables are in Luke alone. Both are typically Lucan in structure: an introductory statement of purpose (vv. 1, 9), with interpretive comments following the parables (vv. 6-8, 14). The first parable stresses constancy in prayer and argues from the lesser (judge) to the greater (God). Verse 1 picks up on the context (17:22-37) in which Jesus offers teachings on the coming of the Son of man. Luke's comments in vv. 6-8 assume a condition in which the faithful are persecuted, are praying for vindication, and are raising the question Israel had often asked, How long will the Lord tarry (cf. 2 Pet. 3:9)? The more pressing question is not, Will vindication come? but, Will God's people still be faithful in that day? Luke follows the parable about the prayers of the elect with one about the prayer of a sinner. Both parables are about vindication, but the word is translated "justified" (v. 14) in the second. Luke's closing comments are two: the declaration of the publican's justification (note Luke's familiar role reversal) and the pronouncement to the same effect, used in a variety of contexts (Luke 14:11; Matt. 18:4; 23:12). To regard the Pharisee as a villain and the publican as a hero is to have each get what he deserves, which misses the point: God justifies the ungodly. Equally defeating is to leave the parable thankful that one is not as the Pharisee.

18:15-17, Children and the Kingdom. Luke now returns to his Marcan source, which he left at 9:50. Unlike Mark 10:13-16 and Matt. 19:13-15, Luke calls the children "infants" and says Jesus "called them to him" (v. 16). The focus is on the children as images of discipleship and, therefore, Luke omits Jesus blessing the children as he does also Jesus' indignation with the disciples.

18:18-30, The Rich and the Kingdom. Cf. Mark 10:17-31; Matt. 19:16-30. All three Evangelists agree the man was rich; Matthew says he was young (Matt. 19:20); and Luke says he was a ruler (Luke 18:18, perhaps of a synagogue), providing the composite "rich young ruler." Some details in Luke vary from Mark, but as in Mark, Jesus here rejects the designation "good." In Luke the man does not go away, and it is persons who overhear the conversation who ask, "Then who can be saved?" (v. 26). As the Pharisee in a preceding story could not trust his good deeds, this ruler cannot trust the securities of wealth. He must trust God alone. Giving his goods to the poor is not only congenial with Jesus' teachings about wealth elsewhere in Luke (and practiced in Acts) but also with the context: the next episode speaks of Jesus' death. A camel going through a needle's eye is a proverbial statement of the humanly impossible and not a description of unburdened camel crawling through a small gate. Only God can effect salvation. But to relinquish all for the sake of the kingdom is to be amply rewarded (Luke does not specify with what) both now and in the age to come.

18:31-19:28

From the Final Prediction of the Passion Until the Entry into Jerusalem

Luke continues to follow Mark, but he omits Mark's account of the request by the sons of Zebedee (Mark 10:35-45), adds the story about Zacchaeus, and offers from Q the parable of the pounds (talents, Matt. 25:14-30).

18:31-34, The Final Prediction of the Passion. Cf. Mark 10:32-34; Matt. 20:17-19. This is the third prediction of his Passion and the declaration that the journey signaled at 9:51 and discussed with Moses and Elijah on the mountain (9:31) is near completion. The Lucan theme of Jesus' Passion being the fulfillment of prophecy is stated here as elsewhere (Luke 24:25, 27, 44; Acts 3:18; 8:32-35; 13:27; 26:23). Omitted is Mark's "delivered to the chief priests and scribes" (Mark 10:33); added is the observation that the disciples did not understand (Luke 18:34). Luke's mixture of human failure and divine purpose in the expression, "This saying was hid from them" (v. 34) recalls 9:45 and anticipates 24:16. The risen Christ will open their minds to understand (24:32, 45).

18:35-43, Healing the Blind Man near Jericho. Cf. Mark 10:46-52; Matt. 20:29-34. Luke follows "this saying was hid from them" with a story that demonstrates Jesus' power to enable the blind to see. This account is, therefore, promise and prophecy of what he will do for his disciples. Luke abbreviates the story in Mark, who identifies the blind man as Barti-maeus. The blind man recognizes Jesus as Son of David, the Messiah, even though he is being rebuked by a crowd that does not see (v. 39). As announced at the outset of his ministry (4:18), Jesus opens the eyes of the blind (Isa. 35:5). The location, Jericho, and the people praising God anticipate the entry into Jerusalem.

19:1–10, Salvation Brought to Zacchaeus.

In all three synoptic Gospels Jesus approaches Jerusalem through Jericho, but only Luke has the story of Zacchaeus. It is typically Lucan in its narrative artistry and attention to detail. The structure of the story, including the criticism of Jesus, is much like that of Jesus in the home of Levi (5:27–32). As a chief tax collector (the expression occurs nowhere else in Greek literature), Zacchaeus is part of a corrupt system of economic oppression, but in response to Jesus he goes beyond the law's requirement for restitution (Exod. 22:1; Num. 5:5–7). Jesus has entered the house (Luke 19:7), but the closing remarks of Jesus are addressed to the crowd, not Zacchaeus. "This house" (v. 9) is household, the salvation of households being a common theme in Acts (10:2; 11:14; 16:15, 31; 18:8). "Son of Abraham" (Luke 19:9) is probably true genealogically and is certainly true by faith (Rom. 4:11–12; Gal. 3:9, 29). The closing pronouncement recalls the parables of Luke 15 and also the missed opportunity of the rich man in 18:18–30.

19:11–28, Parable of the Pounds. Typically Luke prefaces the parable with an interpretive introduction (v. 11). The parable is given to correct false notions of the nature and purpose of Jesus' Jerusalem trip. The historical backdrop is that Palestinian rulers such as Archelaus did go to Rome to receive power as king but Jewish leaders protested, in that case successfully. Some scholars think Luke has combined two parables: the pounds (vv. 12–13, 15b–26), and gaining a kingdom (vv. 12, 14–15a, 27). The pounds (a mina in the Greco-Syrian monetary system was worth 100 drachmas, between 20 and 35 dollars) portion is related to Matthew's parable of the talents (Matt. 25:14–30). More likely Luke offers one story with allegorizing that fits the circumstances: Jesus went away but will return in power; some disciples are good stewards, some are not because of fearfulness; Jerusalem, which rejected his reign, was destroyed. During the prince's absence (between first and second coming) the servants were to multiply his holdings (spread the word). Of the ten, only three report: the first, second and "another," because interest can be sustained only so long. Even the fearful one should have made some gain through bankers. The exaggerated rewards highlight the point: following Jesus, especially on his way to Jerusalem, is a risk calling for courage but it will be amply rewarded. The fearful lose out and the opponents suffer death. The closing verse (Luke 19:28) vividly portrays the one who told the parable as out in front of the crowd, going to Jerusalem and to suffering. Jerusalem is named, with all that it implied, at the beginning and ending of this parable (vv. 11, 28) and this entire section (9:51; 19:28).

19:29–21:38

The Ministry in Jerusalem

In general Luke follows Mark 11:1–13:37 here, with such changes as will be noted. Although the traditional church year compacts the Jerusalem ministry, including the Passion, into one week, Luke seems to imply a longer period (19:47; 22:53). Both Jerusalem and the Temple figure prominently in the completion of Jesus' ministry and its continuation in the mission of the church (24:44–53; Acts 1:1–14).

19:29–48

The Entry into Jerusalem

In Luke the entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem consists of three units: the entry itself, Jesus' lament over the city, and the cleansing of the Temple.

19:29–40, The Entry. Cf. Mark 11:1–10; Matt. 21:1–9; John 12:12–16. Sending disciples ahead to make preparation recalls the beginning of the journey to Jerusalem (9:51–52). Bethany and Bethphage were villages on the eastern side of the Mount of Olives, within two miles of the city. Securing the colt is by divine knowledge and not prearrangement. The owners were probably disciples of Jesus. A king or ruler riding an ass recalls 1 Kings 1:38 and Zech. 9:9, which Matthew cites (Matt. 21:5). Putting garments along the way showed honor to a leader (2 Kings 9:13); Luke omits the use of branches. Luke alone pictures the descent from Olivet. Luke identifies the crowds as disciples, many if not all having come with him from Galilee. Jesus is praised as King but not as son of David (Luke 18:39). The Aramaic "Hosanna" is omitted from the praise that joins Ps. 118:26 and an echo of the choir's song at Luke 2:14. Verses 39–40 are in Luke alone. It is not clear why some Pharisees wanted Jesus to silence his disciples: are they registering their own unbelief or are they afraid a parade for a king could bring political retaliation? But the cosmos concurs in their praise; it cannot be stopped for truth will not remain silent (Hab. 2:11).

19:41–44, Lament over the City. Found in Luke alone, this scene draws heavily on Jeremiah 6. The crowds have sung of peace but in Jerusalem there will be destruction because the city is blind to its own need for repentance and forgiveness of sin, and to the fact that in Jesus God has visited the city. In vv. 43-44, Luke casts Jesus' prophecy of Jerusalem's fall in terms that describe how the Romans took the city in A.D. 70.

19:45-48, Jesus in the Temple. Cf. Mark 11:11, 15-19; Matt. 21:10-17; John 2:13-22. Luke noticeably abbreviates the account in Mark. Mal. 3:1-2 is vividly in the background. For Luke, Jesus going to the Temple is the real purpose of the journey. The Temple is cleansed for his ministry of teaching the people (v. 47), and it will be in the Temple that Jesus' disciples continue in prayer and praise following the ascension (24:53). Here in the Temple the people align themselves with Jesus but the priests, scribes, and principal men (elders who belonged to the Sanhedrin?) are offended to the point of plotting Jesus' death. Jesus' actions in the Temple, according to the synoptic Gospels, precipitated the death plots against Jesus. But for the present, his popularity protects him.

Controversies in Jerusalem

Luke follows Mark 11:27-12:44 very closely. Since the units in this section are not chronologically nor intrinsically joined, the Evangelists perhaps placed them together here to give content to the hostility against Jesus.

20:1-8, The Question of Authority. Cf. Mark 11:27-33; Matt. 21:23-27. Luke follows Mark closely but adds to Jesus' activity, "and preaching the gospel," which for Luke was repentance and forgiveness of sins. "These things" in v. 2 probably includes his message as well as cleansing the Temple and teaching there (Temple meaning the Temple precinct and not the sanctuary). "The people" are the ones favorable to Jesus, the opposite of chief priests, scribes, and elders (cf. also 19:47-48). Jesus' question about John's baptism was probably not a clever move but a repetition of an earlier affirmation: both John and Jesus were authorized of God and yet both were rejected (7:29-35). The critics say, "We do not know"; Jesus says, "Neither will I tell you."

20:9-19, The Parable of the Tenants. Cf. Mark 12:1-12; Matt. 21:33-46. Again Luke follows Mark but with modifications. The vineyard owner is gone a long time (v. 9), perhaps referring to the period prior to John. Also in Luke, only the son is killed, and that is done outside (Heb. 13:12-13), an adjustment in the story to fit the son to Jesus. The people are stunned at the word of final punishment on the tenants (Jewish leaders), sensing that they too will fall with the nation as God gives the vineyard over to Gentiles. The vineyard was a familiar image of God's investment and expectation of return on earth (Isa. 5:1-7; Ezek. 15:1-6; 19:10-14). Luke 20:17-18, a quotation of Ps. 118:22 and an allusion to Isa. 8:14-15, join two references to the stone: in the one Jesus is the rejected but exalted one; in the other he is the key factor in God's judgment of Jerusalem. One can see that the church and Luke have modified a parable (which may have originally ended at v. 15) to include what in fact did happen both to Jesus and then to Jerusalem. Verse 19 essentially repeats the standoff between the leaders and the people reported at 19:47-48.

20:20-26, The Question of Tribute. Cf. Mark 12:13-17; Matt. 22:15-22. This is the second of three questions put to Jesus (Mark has four, including the one about the greatest commandment, 12:28-34, which Luke had earlier at 10:25-28): authority, tribute, and resurrection. Unlike Mark and Matthew who present this scene as a temptation or test of Jesus, Luke tells the story so as to stress three points. First, the questioners are spies from the priests, scribes, and elders (v. 19) who pretend to be "sincere" (RSV; NEB: "honest men"; lit., "righteous") so that they may find grounds for charging Jesus before the Roman governor (v. 20). Second, their craftiness fails in that Jesus' answer is no basis for charging him with rebellion. The answer Jesus gave left and still leaves the church with the task of discerning the lines of loyalty to God and to the state (Rom. 13:1-7; 1 Pet. 2:13-17; 1 Tim. 2:2; Tit. 3:1; Rev. 13:1-18; 18:1-24). Third, the ever-present "people" (v. 26) apparently support Jesus' answer and thus continue to be a buffer between Jesus and plotting opponents.

20:27-40, The Question Concerning the Resurrection. Cf. Mark 12:18-27; Matt. 22:23-33. The Sadducees (→ Sadducees) found authority for religion primarily in the five books of Moses in which there is no doctrine of the resurrection. Their question presupposes the levirate law of marriage (Deut. 25:5-10). Luke adds to Mark's account in vv. 35-36: the worthy are raised; they cannot die anymore; they are equal to (not "like") angels; they are children of God. Jesus' argument that the resurrection is implied even in the Mosaic books meets with the approval of overhearing scribes. The phrase "all live to him" (v. 38) infers that the resurrected life is both here and hereafter (John 11:25-26). Since Luke does not follow this with the question about the greatest commandment, the conclusion to the questioning is marked here (v. 40; Mark 12:34).

20:41-44, Jesus' Question About the Son of David. Cf. Mark 12:35-37a; Matt. 22:41-46. The question-answer period ends with Jesus asking the question. The “them” and “they” are left undefined by Luke (v. 41). The question presupposes a messianic interpretation of Ps. 110, and on the basis of it, raises the issue of the adequacy of calling the Messiah the son of David. Luke has, of course, affirmed Jesus as son of David (Luke 1:32; 3:31), but that term alone is not enough. The Christ is also like Elijah and Jonah and the Suffering Servant, but no single image says enough. And certainly “son of David” in any political sense does not.

20:45–21:4, A Warning and an Example.

Cf. Mark 12:37b–44; Matt. 23:1–36. Luke has already pronounced woes on scribes and Pharisees (11:37–54); here the warning about scribes is addressed to the disciples in the presence of the larger favorable group Luke refers to as “the people.” The disciples (the church) needed the warnings about ambition and greed, especially in the matter of taking over the property of widows as administrators in the faith community. Abuses due to greed sometimes plagued the church (Acts 4:32–5:11). Such love of money stood in sharp contrast to the lavish generosity of a poor widow whose only property was two lepta, coins of the least value. She trusts totally in God.

Jesus’ Apocalyptic Discourse

Cf. Mark 13:1–37; Matt. 24:1–44. Apparently Luke has Mark 13 before him, but some modifications should be noted at the outset. The discourse is prompted by the remarks of “some” (v. 5) and not specifically by disciples. Jesus speaks in the Temple (vv. 5–7, 37–38) and not from the Mount of Olives (Mark 13:3). In fact, the Temple and “all the people” provide the favorable context of place and audience for this and all Jesus’ teaching in Jerusalem. Luke’s view of the Temple is a positive one in both the Gospel and Acts. The Mount of Olives was the place for lodging at night (v. 37). It should also be noted that Luke has already discussed the Parousia at 17:20–37 and therefore extracts that from present comments on the fall of Jerusalem. The discourse proper (vv. 8–36) is prompted by the prediction of the destruction of the Temple (vv. 5–7), a prediction that evokes two questions: When? What will be the sign? As to signs of the end, Luke describes three phenomena (vv. 8–11): the appearance of imposters claiming the time (Gk. kairos, opportune time, not chronos, calendar time) is here; wars, tumults, and international conflicts; and natural disasters with cosmic terror. However, it is repeatedly said that one is not to be deceived by all this; the end will not be at once. And why? There must first be a time of witnessing (vv. 12–19). This is the period of the church Luke addresses. Faithful witnesses will be brought before synagogues (fulfilled in Acts

4–5) and before governors and kings (fulfilled in Acts 24–26). In those crises they will be given a mouth and wisdom (Luke 21:15; Semitism for an appropriate message; cf. 12:11–12) that cannot be withstood (fulfilled in Acts 4:8–13; 6:10). Hatred, betrayal by friends and relatives, and death await them (Luke 21:16–17). Verse 16 makes v. 18 difficult: either v. 18 is misplaced (Luke 12:7; Matt. 10:30) or v. 16 means some will die while v. 18 promises “but not you.” In any case, faithfulness is the path to life. In vv. 20–24 Luke describes the destruction of Jerusalem. Unlike Mark 13:14–20, in which the fall of the city is given an eschatological setting, Luke’s account is historical and distinct from the end of the age. What Luke describes is what happened in A.D. 66–72 when Roman armies destroyed Jerusalem. “Until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled” (v. 24) may refer to the period of the gentile mission, which went out from Jerusalem (Acts 1:8; 8:1–4). The remainder of the discourse (Luke 21:25–36) sketches what is yet to be after the time of the nations has been fulfilled. The entire cosmos will be disturbed, radically affecting human life everywhere (vv. 25–27). However, the faithful are not to be distressed but rather look up, for redemption is near. Redemption here is in the sense of rescue and not in its usual meaning of salvation by repentance and forgiveness. These verses are kin to Paul’s statement on redemption in a cosmic context (Rom. 8:18–25). And as surely as one can discern the approach of summer by the leafing of a fig tree, so these signs announce the nearness of the kingdom (Luke 21:29–31). When, then, will this be? Within this generation (vv. 32–33), that is, between the period of God’s punishment of Jerusalem by the Gentiles and God’s judgment by the Gentiles by the appearance of the Son of man whose coming will sign the redemption of the faithful.

Luke provides his own ending to the discourse (vv. 34–36) addressing those for whom a delay in the Parousia has produced indulgence, secularism, and neglect of life before God. The end will affect everyone without exemption. However, prayerful watchfulness can have a sanctifying influence, setting one free from anxiety and the dulling influence of things. With the summary of vv. 37–38, Luke concludes the record of Jesus’ public ministry.

22:1–23:56

The Passion Narrative

The passion and resurrection narratives together constitute the largest body of material in all the Gospels. These accounts may also have been the earliest to be framed into a tradition to be circulated among the churches. The central importance of this material for the church's self-understanding as well as its proclamation, liturgy, and instruction of new members is evident. The passion narrative proper begins with the Passover meal and closes with the burial of Jesus.

Jesus' Last Meal with His Disciples

22:1-6, The Conspiracy Against Jesus. Cf. Mark 14:1-2, 10-11; Matt. 26:1-5, 14-16. Luke fails to distinguish between Passover and the seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread that followed (Exod. 12:6, 15; Lev. 23:5-8). The people are so favorable to Jesus they continue to be a barrier to plots to kill him. However, the initiative of one of the disciples (Luke places him among the Twelve but phrases it as though reluctantly acknowledged) provides an opportunity. But primary attention is on Satan, last seen in 4:13 leaving Jesus in the desert, to reappear at "an opportune time." That opportunity (v. 6) is now here and more trials (temptations) are to come (vv. 28, 40). Satan will work through Judas, the chief priests, and the captains (leaders among Levites, Acts 4:1; 5:24) for the betrayal (handing over, delivery) of Jesus.

22:7-13, Preparation for the Passover.

Cf. Mark 14:12-16; Matt. 26:17-19. Again Luke says day of Unleavened Bread when he means Passover, as is evident in vv. 8 and 15. Luke also identifies the two disciples sent to make preparations. The event recalls preparation for the entry at 19:28-34. Not intriguing prearrangements but Jesus' prophetic knowledge is involved here. Preparation involved purchase of a slain lamb, herbs, wine, and unleavened bread.

22:14-20, Institution of the Lord's Supper.

Cf. Mark 14:22-25; Matt. 26:26-29. Luke frames this scene as a classical farewell by a leader to his followers: first the meal (vv. 14-20), and then the discourse on what will soon happen and how the disciples are to conduct themselves (vv. 21-38). Unlike Mark and Matthew, the indication of the betrayer follows the institution of the Lord's Supper. Luke's account of the meal consists of two parts: vv. 15-18 and 19-20, if, indeed, vv. 19b-20 are in the original text. Most manuscripts have these verses but they are a problem because shorter readings are regarded as more original than expanded ones; vv. 19b-20 are remarkably like 1 Cor. 11:24-25; and including vv. 19b-20 gives the ritual the cup, the bread, and again the cup. (Both 1 Cor. 10:16 and the Didache have cup and then bread.) Quite possibly Luke has joined two traditions: vv. 15-18 tie the meal to Passover and stress its eschatological orientation; vv. 19-20 stress sacrificial and covenant meanings. Participation meant sharing in Jesus' death as well as the future messianic meal.

22:21-38, Farewell Instruction. Luke has expanded Jesus' words at table, placing here the dispute about greatness that Mark (10:42-45) and Matthew (20:25-28) relate earlier, adding the special attention to Peter (Luke 22:31-34) and the words about two swords (vv. 35-38). Luke's location of the prophecy of betrayal underscores the possibility of falling away even among those at the covenant table. Immediately following (vv. 24-30) are Jesus' words about greatness, implying, at least, that self-exaltation is related to falling away. True exaltation is a gift of God to those who have endured Jesus' hardship, have entered into the "covenanted" (v. 29, "assigned," RSV; NEB: "vested") relation with Jesus that he had with God, and who not only share the messianic banquet, but who reign with Christ. "Judging" should be taken in the sense of leading or ruling and not of deciding the fate of others.

In v. 31, Jesus addresses all the group by the use of the plural "you," but in vv. 32-34 the conversation is between Peter and Jesus. All will be tested ("sifted," Amos 9:9), but Jesus looks to Peter to turn about, become strong, and be a source of strength for the others. The prophecy here records what, in fact, occurred: denial, abandonment, experience of the risen Christ (Luke 24:34; 1 Cor. 15:5), leadership (Acts 1:15; 2:14), prison (Acts 4:3; 12:3-5), and death (John 21:18-19). To stress the critical nature of what lies before them and Jesus (whose trial and death will fulfill Isa. 53:12), the disciples are told that present conditions demand the opposite of the days of early mission journeys when nothing was needed, all was provided (Luke 22:35). This crisis calls for full equipment for it is a time of conflict and death. Jesus uses the word "sword" symbolically, but they hear him literally. Jesus drops the subject. That they have two swords reflects the degree of their misunderstanding of Jesus' messianic role (cf. Acts 1:6).

The Arrest

22:39-46, At the Mount of Olives. Cf. Mark 14:26-42; Matt. 26:30-46. On this hill east of Jerusalem Jesus had been lodging at night (Luke 21:37). Luke does not call the place Gethsemane, has Jesus come to the disciples once not three times, and does not have three disciples join Jesus. All are asked to pray lest they enter into temptation. Jesus withdraws a short distance, kneels (rather than falls to the ground), and prays with anguish, struggling with the will of God (22:42). Verses 43-44 (included in NEB; excluded in RSV, 1971 ed.) are absent from many manuscripts and are disputed. They have no parallel in Mark and Matthew, although the ministering angel (Dan. 3:25) recalls Jesus' temptation (Mark 1:13). Verse 44 pictures Jesus' anguish as being of such intensity his sweat rolled down like blood from a wound. Luke softens Mark's rebuke of the disciples and explains their sleep as due to sorrow (vv. 45-46).

22:47-53, Jesus Taken Captive. Cf. Mark 14:43-52; Matt. 26:47-56. Judas is pictured as leading the crowd and approaching Jesus to kiss him but is interrupted by Jesus (he does kiss him in Mark and Matthew). A sword (recall v. 38) is used by a disciple (Peter, John 18:10) to defend Jesus, but Jesus restores the slave's right ear (Luke 22:50) and calls a halt to the altercation. Jesus censures the leaders who have now caught him away from "the people." He taught in the daylight and they did nothing; they take him at night for they work in the power of darkness. The symbolism is quite evident.

22:54-23:25

The Trials and Sentencing

22:54-71, The Jewish Trial. Cf. Mark 14:53-72; Matt. 26:57-75. Since Jesus was taken captive by priests, Temple guards, and elders, it was natural that disposition of him begin with the Jewish authorities. However, Luke has no trial before the Sanhedrin (→ Sanhedrin) the night of the arrest, as does Mark (14:54-64), but rather, Jesus is held in custody at the high priest's house until morning (Luke 22:54, 66). Jesus does endure indignities and beating prior to his trial (vv. 63-65), the victim of insulting sport by the guards. Prior to the trial, Luke inserts Peter's denial (vv. 55-62). Peter and Jesus are at the high priest's house and the three denials occur in the courtyard, prompted by comments by a maid and two others. Peter does not invoke a curse or swear (Mark 14:71). Rather the scene carries more pathos in Luke: "And the Lord turned and looked at Peter" (v. 61). The questioning by the council (Sanhedrin) is briefer in Luke, is not led by the high priest, omits Mark's account of false witnesses and the charge that Jesus would destroy the Temple, and does not state the charge of blasphemy, though that is implied in the council's interpretation of Jesus' response to "Are you the Son of God?" Son of man and Son of God are here interchangeable (vv. 69-71). "You say that I am" is an answer that makes the council fully responsible for its interpretation and hence its actions.

23:1-25, The Roman Trial and Sentencing. Cf. Mark 15:1-15; Matt. 27:1-26. Notice that Luke does not focus on the high priest or any specific group in the Jewish trial and delivery of Jesus to Pilate; he speaks of "they" and "the whole company" (23:1, 5), stressing the guilt of Israel's leaders, in contrast to Pilate's threefold declaration of Jesus' innocence (vv. 4, 14, 22). The charge against Jesus is that he is a revolutionary, forbids taxes to Caesar (readers recall 20:25), and claims to be king (kingship is a theme Luke holds in common with John 18:29-19:22). Jesus' answer to Pilate is taken by the governor as denial (Luke 23:3-4); the same answer to the Sanhedrin was taken as admission. The summary of Jesus' activity (v. 5) introduces the word "Galilee" and gives Pilate, governor of Judea, excuse to send Jesus to Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee. Earlier Luke said Herod wanted to see Jesus (9:9) and reportedly wanted to kill him (13:31-33), but here he toys with Jesus, tries to get a sign from him, makes fun of him, and returns him to Pilate (23:9-11). Their agreement that Jesus was not deserving of death (v. 15) and their cooperation in this unusual trial cemented a new relation between Pilate and Herod. Ps. 2:2 is fulfilled (Acts 4:25-28).

Luke's position on the trial of Jesus is summarized in 23:13-16: all Israel is assembled, including "the people"; Pilate tells them an examination of Jesus proves their charges wrong; Rome (Pilate and Herod) is unanimous in its judgment of Jesus' innocence; Pilate is willing to chastise Jesus and release him. But Satan had entered Judas, who led the leaders of Israel (22:47), who in turn now lead the people. Pilate repeats ■ third time his position and his offer. The irony of it is that the crowd asks for the release of Barabbas, a man guilty of sedition and murder, and calls for the crucifixion of one declared innocent. Some ancient manuscripts insert v. 17, a borrowing from Mark 15:6, to explain about prisoner release. Luke concludes by placing the responsibility on the Jewish crowd: Pilate granted their demand (v. 24); Pilate delivered Jesus to their will (v. 25).

The Crucifixion

23:26-32, The Way to the Crucifixion. Cf. Mark 15:21; Matt. 27:32. Luke alone describes the way to the place of execution. Simon of Cyrene in North Africa can be forced to carry the burden (Matt. 5:41), but here he is the symbol of the true disciple, carrying the cross "behind Jesus" (Luke 23:26). Again Luke gives favorable attention to women who alone weep over what is happening. The background is Zech. 12:10. Jesus tells them that the greater cause for tears is unbelieving Jerusalem. So terrible will be its fate that the woman without children will be fortunate, and desperate cries for shelter will go unheeded (Hos. 10:8). Jesus recites a proverb to the effect that if such crime as his death can occur now, what will be the horrors of the city's crisis? In a brief note (Luke 23:32) Luke says two others were to be crucified.

23:33-43, The Crucifixion. Cf. Mark 15:22-32; Matt. 27:33-44. Luke does not use the Aramaic "Golgotha." Jesus is crucified between the two criminals. Some manuscripts omit v. 34a but it is Lucan in that acts of ignorance can be forgiven upon repentance (Acts 3:17; 13:27; 17:30). Casting lots for his garments fulfills Ps. 22:18. At this point Luke relates the various responses to Jesus by those present. "The people" watch (v. 35); the rulers scoff, calling on Jesus for a miracle if he is indeed the Christ (v. 35); the soldiers mock him with the title "King of the Jews," offering him vinegar (vv. 36-38; cf. Ps. 69:21); and one criminal being executed rails at Jesus to save them while the other affirms Jesus' innocence (vv. 39-41). The latter shows his faith by asking to be remembered when Jesus comes in kingly power. Jesus assures him a place in Paradise (abode of the righteous, 2 Cor. 12:3; Rev. 2:7) "today"; that is, not within a twenty-four-hour period, but in the "today" of the kingdom (Luke 4:21).

23:44-49, The Death of Jesus. Cf. Mark 15:33-41; Matt. 27:45-56. Prior to Jesus' death Luke includes only two phenomena: darkness from noon until 3 p.m.; the Temple curtain between the holy place and Holy of Holies was split. This latter could mean God left the Temple, or access to God was now open, or Jesus was entering God's presence. Luke does not have the cry of dereliction or the discussion about Elijah. At the time of death, Luke says Jesus' cry was "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit!" (v. 46, RSV). Following the death, Luke records three responses: in the person of the centurion Rome again declares Jesus innocent; the crowds go home deeply penitent; acquaintances and the women from Galilee (8:1-3) witness his death. The women will return in Luke's narrative of the burial and resurrection.

23:50-56, The Burial of Jesus. Cf. Mark 15:42-47; Matt. 27:57-61. Joseph is identified by address, character, position, and general attitude toward Jesus and his message. His caring for the body, apparently in haste since it was late and the Sabbath was beginning (lit., "dawning"; that is, the evening star was appearing, marking the beginning of the Sabbath), has given him a favorable place in the church's memory. The women from Galilee observed the burial, prepared burial spices ahead of time, but waited in observance of the Sabbath. At death as at birth (2:21-39), Luke is careful to point out the keeping of the law.

The Resurrection Narrative

Although Luke's account of the empty tomb is similar to Mark's (Mark 16:1-8), this resurrection narrative as a whole is unique to Luke. All the appearances of the risen Christ are in or near Jerusalem, and they are told as occurrences of one day. Perhaps they had been so framed for the church's observance of Easter.

24:1-12, The Empty Tomb. Cf. Mark 16:1-8; Matt. 28:1-10; John 20:1-10. Luke's "they" clearly carries over from 23:56, their further identities being reserved until 24:10. Inside the tomb the perplexed women encounter two men. The reference to two men joins this text with the transfiguration (9:30) and the ascension (Acts 1:10), perhaps indicating how Luke wants the story to be understood. Since Luke repeats this empty tomb story at 24:22-24, it apparently is important to his resurrection narrative even though it is absent from the earliest account (1 Cor. 15:1-8).

Key points in Luke's story are: first, Galilee was the place of Jesus' teaching (v. 6) but is not to be, as in Mark 16:7, the site of resurrection appearances. Jerusalem will now be the center both for Christ's appearances (vv. 13-43) and for the mission of the church (vv. 44-53). Second, the women are reminded by a creedal formula of the gospel, essentially repeated at vv. 26 and 46. Third, the women are treated as disciples and not as messengers to the disciples (vv. 6-8). Fourth, the women do tell the Eleven (v. 9; "apostles," v. 10), but also "all the rest." Later Luke will say Galilean believers numbered about 120 (Acts 1:15). That the apostles did not believe the women reminds the reader what a burden a resurrection puts on faith, especially since there had not yet been an appearance. Luke 24:12, omitted in many translations, has strong manuscript support but most likely is a borrowing from John 20:3-10, and is in some tension with v. 34.

24:13-35, Appearance on the Road to Emmaus. This story, unique to Luke and comparable to the parable of the prodigal son in skill and artistry, does not appear in the early resurrection text in 1 Cor. 15:1-8, although Luke 24:34 confirms 1 Cor. 15:5. Perhaps this account was shaped with Christian worship in mind since it involves Sunday, Scripture or word, and sacrament. In the background lies Gen. 18:1-15. Emmaus has never been identified with certainty, one of the two disciples is totally unknown, and Cleopas is encountered nowhere else. In a sense, this is the church's story of encountering the living Christ. The two disciples are kept from recognizing Christ (v. 16) until their eyes are opened by witnessing to the real meaning of the Scriptures. Their recitation of what had happened concerning Jesus is basically a summary of Luke's Gospel. The disciples' recognition of Jesus, however, depends on two events: first, Jesus' interpretation of the OT Scriptures (vv. 25-27), which they were able to grasp only later (v. 32). The role of Scripture in the removal of ignorance and the generation of faith is a strong theme in Luke (16:31; 24:44-47; Acts 2:14-36). Second, Jesus reveals himself in the breaking of bread (vv. 31, 35). The language is reminiscent of that of the feeding of the multitude (9:16) and of the Last Supper (22:19). The return of the two to Jerusalem joins this story to Jesus' appearances to Peter (v. 34) and to the Eleven in the company of other disciples (vv. 36-43).

24:36-49, Appearance in Jerusalem. This narrative contains few surprises since it is framed on the same pattern as vv. 13-35: the risen Christ appears, the disciples do not recognize him, they are scolded for doubting, food is shared, Jesus opens their minds to understand Scripture, they respond in amazed joy. However in vv. 36-43 a new theme emerges: the corporeality of the risen Christ. Eating fish and offering his body for proof is an early insistence that neither is resurrection a vague Greek notion of immortality of the soul nor is the risen Christ to be separated from the historical Jesus. "See my hands and my feet" (v. 39) means the one raised is the one crucified. Verse 40, found in some manuscripts, is obviously a borrowing from John 20:20. In fact, vv. 36-43 have close affinities to John 20-21. Throughout Luke's Gospel continuity between Jesus and Judaism has been stressed. This occurs here in two ways: first, in pointing out that Jesus' Passion and resurrection are according to Jewish Scriptures (vv. 44-46); and second, in naming Jerusalem as the center from which the mission to the nations is to spread (Isa. 2:3; Acts 1:1-8). The message to be preached is that which is stated repeatedly in Luke and Acts: repentance and forgiveness of sins (Luke 24:47; Acts 2:38; 3:19; 5:31; 11:18; 17:30). To enable them for this mission they will receive power from God, the Holy Spirit, but for that power, they must wait in Jerusalem (Luke 24:49; Acts 1:4-8). In Luke's chronology, the disciples are now between Easter and Pentecost.

24:50-53, The Blessing and Departure.

Luke says it was from a village near the Mount of Olives that Jesus parted from his disciples while in the act of blessing them. If v. 51b is in the original text (the evidence is divided) then his parting was his ascension. This creates a chronological problem between this account and Acts 1. Here the events are compacted into one day; Acts 1 says he appeared for forty days. Of course, parting into heaven at 24:51b does not forbid other appearances. More likely, Luke 24 compresses what is retold more extensively in Acts. The disciples return to Jerusalem as instructed and make the Temple their place of worship while awaiting the promise of power from on high.

INTRODUCTION

The Gospel According to John is significantly different from the synoptic Gospels, Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Indeed, in language and theological conceptions it is much closer to the Letters of John, and this similarity is visible even in the discourses of Jesus. Yet John is also a Gospel, a narrative of the ministry and message of Jesus, and as such shares certain content and characteristics with the Synoptics.

John and the Synoptics: The Distinctive Character of the Fourth Gospel

The course of Jesus' ministry is significantly different in John in that it spans a two- or three-year period; three annual Passover festivals are mentioned (2:13; 6:4; 11:55), whereas the Synoptics speak only of the one at which Jesus met his death. Most of Jesus' ministry takes place in Judea or Jerusalem, while according to the Synoptics his public activity prior to the fateful journey to Jerusalem is in Galilee or its environs. Places and people unknown in the Synoptics play roles in John. Nicodemus, the woman of Samaria, and Lazarus are prominent figures in the Gospel of John but do not appear at all in the others. Disciples such as Thomas and Philip, who are only names in the other Gospels, ask questions or make comments in John (e.g., 14:5, 8; 20:24–29). The sheer content of John is considerably different from the Synoptics; most of what is found in John is missing from the others, and vice versa. The most notable exception to this overall difference is the narrative of Jesus' death, which runs parallel in all four Gospels. There are also similarities between John's resurrection appearance narratives and those of Matthew and Luke, which, however, differ from each other.

Jesus' miracles are narrated impressively in all the Gospels, but only in John are they called signs (e.g., 2:11), and only there are they explicitly set forth as demonstrations of Jesus' divine origin or mission (3:2). Their function is clearly to elicit faith in Jesus, although to believe that Jesus performed them is not tantamount to attaining genuine faith and understanding (3:1–12). Jesus' signs often lead to extensive discussions and debates about his identity and significance (→ Sign). In the Synoptics, on the other hand, there are, at most, brief expressions of amazement at Jesus' power on the part of the crowds.

In the synoptic Gospels, Jesus gives ethical and religious instructions that fall within the framework of Judaism. Although they contain debates over whether Jesus has violated the law, it is clear that Jesus does not think his mission and message is to abrogate the law given to Israel. In John, however, Jesus speaks of "your law" (e.g., 8:17), implying that the law belongs to an alien community, namely, the Jews, while he identifies himself with a group of disciples who have broken away to follow him. If a fundamental question in the synoptic tradition is how one should understand and respond to God's will as expressed in the law, the fundamental question of the Fourth Gospel is whether one will understand and respond to Jesus as the definitive expression of God's will or revelation.

Thus the mission and message of Jesus revolve around his self-manifestation and self-proclamation. The Kingdom of God, so prominent in the Synoptics, falls into the background as Jesus expounds and debates his own role and status. Jesus' "I am" sayings (e.g., 6:35; 8:12) are typical and distinctive of John. Although he is presented as the fulfillment of OT expectations, his messianic role goes beyond anything anticipated or adumbrated in the OT as it was read by ancient Jews. Not surprisingly, his claims evoke the sharpest dissent and dispute. The sheer content of Jesus' teaching is quite different; there is no Sermon on the Mount (or Plain), no sharp questions and injunctions, and no true parables. Even at the Last Supper and in the farewell discourses, where Jesus instructs his own disciples, his teaching has little concreteness or specificity. Rather, in a general, if moving, way he commands his disciples to love one another (13:34–35; 15:12).

The Setting and Composition of the Gospel

The dominant Christological themes of the Gospel, and particularly its controversial tone, already afford a clue to the original setting and purpose of the Gospel. In the first half (chaps. 2–12) Jesus is portrayed as constantly debating with "the Jews" about who he is and whether they should believe in him. Obviously these Jews, and particularly the Pharisees, strongly reject and resist Jesus' claims (→ Pharisees). Yet Jesus and his disciples are acknowledged to be Jews, and throughout the Gospel many Jews are said to believe in Jesus. Apparently, the subject matter and the participants in the discussion reflect the circumstances under which the traditions behind this Gospel developed and the Gospel itself was composed.

The several references to Jews being put out of the synagogue (9:22; 12:42; 16:2) and the prominence of the Pharisees help us define more accurately the setting and the period from which John's Gospel originates (→ Synagogue). After the defeat of the Jewish revolt by the Romans in A.D. 70, Judaism underwent an internal self-assessment and retrenchment in which the party of the Pharisees played an increasingly important role. During this period measures were apparently taken to eliminate what were regarded as harmful sectarian divisions. The Twelfth Benediction of the Eighteen Benedictions used in the synagogue service pronounced a malediction upon sectarians, perhaps including Jewish Christians. The date of this benediction (perhaps ca. 80–90) is disputed, but its character is indicative of the trends of the time. Possibly some such liturgical device was used to smoke out and expel Christ-confessors from the synagogue. In any event, the fear of expulsion from the synagogue, the claims of Jesus for himself, and the sharp distinction of Jesus and his followers from the Jews bespeak a time and situation for John different from Jesus' own ministry and closer to the end of the first century. At least a part of John's purpose was to persuade followers of Jesus to leave the synagogue and join distinctively Christian communities. Quite possibly the Gospel was composed in stages or went through successive editions as the controversy developed.

On other grounds John has long been thought to be a later Gospel, and early church tradition places its writing after the other three. In the ancient church, as well as in much modern critical scholarship, it has been assumed that John wrote with knowledge of the other Gospels, although quite obviously he did not write to transmit the same material or content. John's considerable divergences from the others have recently caused this assumption to be questioned, although relatively few scholars are inclined to argue for an early date even on the basis of John's independence. Aside from the probability that it reflects a Jewish-Christian situation that developed only after A.D. 70, its retrospective and reflective character seem to bespeak a later date.

The same may be said of its religious or philosophical vocabulary or conceptuality (e.g., the role of the logos or Word), which has led to its being described as the most Hellenistic, and least Jewish, of the Gospels. However, such hellenization—assimilation to the high culture of the Greek-speaking world—had already occurred among contemporary Jews (e.g., Philo), particularly outside Palestine. On the other hand, the discovery of the Qumran scrolls along the shores of the Dead Sea showed that the religious vocabulary and thought-world of John was not alien to some sectarian Jews in the Holy Land itself (→ Scrolls, The Dead Sea). John's kinship with Jewish thought both in Palestine and beyond fits quite well the situation of controversy within Jewish circles that has been suggested above.

The scrolls not only opened up the possibility that John was written in Palestine or nearby but revived support for the tradition that the Fourth Gospel was, after all, the work of John, the disciple of Jesus and the son of Zebedee known from the Synoptics. That tradition was firmly established by the end of the second century, having been set forth as much as twenty-five years earlier by Bishop Irenaeus. It cannot be traced back further with any certainty, however, and several considerations militate against it, not least the slowness of the Gospel's acceptance in orthodox circles (see "The Gospel of John in the Early Church" below).

Although John the son of Zebedee, with his brother James, has a certain prominence in the other Gospels and is mentioned with Peter in Acts, he does not appear until the end of the Fourth Gospel (21:2) and then is not mentioned by name. This omission is sometimes regarded as reflecting John's personal modesty, and he is said to present himself under the guise of the Beloved Disciple, who appears only in the Fourth Gospel. Yet the Beloved Disciple is never identified as John, despite the later church tradition, although in 21:24 he is said to be responsible for the Gospel. The silence about incidents in which, according to the Synoptics, John was present (e.g., the raising of Jairus's daughter and the transfiguration) is only with difficulty explained by the modesty of a man who could refer to himself as the Beloved Disciple. The identity of the author of the Fourth Gospel remains a mystery, perhaps deliberately concealed (→ Beloved Disciple, The).

The tradition of Johannine authorship, shared by the Letters of John and Revelation, was in antiquity related to Ephesus as the place of origin of these writings (nearby Patmos for Revelation). A Church of St. John and his reputed tomb, as well as other relics, tie the Johannine literature to this ancient city of early Christian fame, where the apostle Paul also worked. Yet Ignatius, writing to the church at Ephesus before A.D. 120, fails to mention John, although he emphasizes the Ephesians' relationship with Paul. On the other hand, Acts' description of Christians in Ephesus (Acts 18:24-20:38) comports well enough with what can be inferred about Johannine origins from the Gospel, for we read of disciples of John the Baptist, disputes with Jews, the descent of the Spirit, miracles of healing, and the threat of false teaching (the theme of the Johannine Letters). Ephesus perhaps remains as good a possibility as can be proposed for the place of origin, or publication, of the Johannine writings. That the Johannine tradition originated in Palestine or Syria need not be denied (→ Ephesus).

The Gospel of John in the Early Church

If there were doubts about John's authenticity in antiquity, they quite likely had something to do with the Gospel's obvious differences from the three that had already gained wide acceptance. We hear of Christians opposed to the Fourth Gospel (e.g., Gaius of Rome), and Clement of Alexandria maintained that John was a spiritual Gospel, perhaps thereby thinking to explain its differences from the others.

Meanwhile, some Gnostic Christians, later condemned as heretical, gladly made use of the Fourth Gospel. The first known commentator on John was such a Gnostic, Heracleon, who wrote his commentary about the middle of the second century. Later, orthodox exegetes such as Irenaeus felt compelled to prove that the Gnostics were misinterpreting John and thus to save the Gospel for the church, and Origen took issue with Heracleon specifically. Nevertheless, it is not difficult to see how the Gnostics found the Fourth Gospel compatible with their emphasis upon secret knowledge as salvation and their view of Christ as more, or other, than a human being. Quite possibly, the author of 1 John, who so emphatically insists upon the materiality and tangibility of Jesus (1 John 1:1-4), intended to make clear exactly what the Word's becoming flesh (John 1:14) entailed and thus to set the interpretation of the Fourth Gospel on the right track. In any event, by the beginning of the third century John was firmly established as an authoritative Gospel, to be read alongside the other three (→ Gnosticism).

Such a reading of the Fourth Gospel is encouraged by the NT canon and has a certain theological, even literary, justification. The Jesus of John becomes united with the Jesus we know also from the synoptic Gospels, as well as the rest of the NT. This is not contrary to the intention of the evangelists, who obviously meant to write about one Jesus. Still, if John is read in this traditional way, there is a danger his distinctive witness to Jesus will fall from view. It is therefore important to ask about the contours, structure, and emphases that make this Gospel distinctive and in some ways unique. These will be our primary focus of attention.

1:1-51

Introduction

1:1-18

The Prologue

The prologue creates an aura of the cosmic and the philosophical at the outset that is resolved into the historical and the revelatory at the end, as Jesus Christ is named (1:17). Its climactic point occurs in v. 14, as the incarnation of the Word (Gk. logos) is announced in a passage that has become the scriptural locus classicus of the Christian doctrine.

The prologue also exemplifies a major problem in understanding the Fourth Gospel historically, namely, locating it within its contemporary religious and cultural context. Much of the vocabulary and piety of ancient Mediterranean religion is suggested in these few lines. At the same time, the prologue is evocative of themes from both the NT and the OT, as well as the history of ancient Judaism and Christianity.

The prologue falls into three parts, divided by the statements about John (the Baptist) in 1:6-8 and 15. The first part (vv. 1-5) deals with the cosmic, creative work of the Word and the relationship of the Word to God and creation. The second part (vv. 9-14) narrates the advent of the Word and the response evoked by it; v. 14 summarizes this advent and begins to set forth the incarnate Word's nature. For the first time the author speaks confessionally, in the first-person plural. In the third and final part (vv. 15-18) the community of disciples confesses briefly and succinctly who the Word is and what his advent means.

1:1-5, The Word in Creation. The brief opening clause, "in the beginning," immediately suggests the creation narrative of Genesis at the beginning of the Hebrew Bible. Here the Word's close association with, and participation in, God's being is clearly stated. (Yet theos, "God," does not have the definite article; this implies that the Word is not to be equated with the totality of God.) In Genesis, God speaks and the creation takes shape. In John, it is as if God's speaking has become reified, objectified, in the Word. This difference is significant. The word of God or the prophetic word in the OT is almost always qualified as "the word of the LORD"; it does not have such an independent existence (→ Logos; Word).

In contemporary writers such as Philo of Alexandria (ca. 25 B.C.–A.D. 50), the great Jewish philosopher of religion, the Word had also become a semi-independent entity, mediating between God and the world. John's insistence upon the Word's role in all aspects of creation (v. 3) also parallels the creative role of Wisdom in OT and later Jewish writings (Prov. 8, Wisd. of Sol. 7). Such usage stands behind this text. By assigning the Word an indispensable role in creation, John makes clear not only that creation is good but also that in this Word creation and redemption are linked together. Salvation fulfills, rather than negates, creation.

The Word is the source of light and life for humanity (John 1:4). The latter are themes of the whole Gospel in a way the Word is not; there are subsequent references to the words of Jesus but not to Jesus as the Word. With the mention of light comes the contrast with darkness (v. 5) that is typical in the Fourth Gospel. Light and darkness are found also in the Genesis creation narrative, where they are equated with day and night (Gen. 1:3–5). In John, they have metaphorical and ethical overtones: human life is lived either in light or darkness. Or, more accurately, life means to be in the light, while to walk in darkness is death. Thus the light struggles against the darkness but is not overcome by it. The Greek verb usually translated "overcome" can also mean "comprehend," a suggestive double meaning.

1:6–8, John the Baptist. At 1:6 the focus shifts abruptly to the plane of historical events, and the style becomes more prosaic. If we already knew about John (never called "the Baptist" in the Fourth Gospel) from the Synoptics, we would envision him in the wilderness of Judea at some place near the Jordan River. Yet in this Gospel we have not yet been told where John is. Readers learn only that he was sent from God, that his name is John, and that he came (and hence was sent) to bear witness to the light (→ John the Baptist).

1:9–13, The Appearance of the Word. A further step is taken in identifying the light (v. 9). On the basis of v. 5 one would not necessarily think of the appearance of a historical personage. That the advent of a historical personage is in view, however, is clear from vv. 10–11. The Greek is not ambiguous, for the pronouns in vv. 10–11 are masculine, not neuter, as would be required if the antecedent were "light," a neuter noun in Greek. Moreover, knowledge of the Gospel, or of the Christian tradition, would render the reference in vv. 10–11 to Jesus clear enough.

The rejection referred to in v. 11 is not complete, as vv. 12–13 make plain. Although rejected by the officials of his people, Jesus is believed in by many. To receive (or accept) him is to believe in him (or "in his name"). Believers can also be described in terms of their origin or birth—with God rather than through any human or natural causation (v. 13). Nevertheless, believing is usually construed as an act of the will or a genuine decision, apart from which one's origin remains unclear.

1:14–18, Incarnation and Confession.

That the Word has entered the realm of the flesh as a historical person is now made quite explicit, even though Jesus is not yet named (→ Incarnation). "Dwelt" (RSV) translates a Greek verb that implies tenting or tabernacling, evoking the motif of God's dwelling with his people, in the wilderness tabernacle and in the Temple on Mount Zion. The "we" who have seen Jesus' glory may be the whole Christian community, the circle of Jesus' disciples, or some other and smaller group. An exact identification eludes us. Near the end of the Gospel, however, those who see are clearly differentiated from all who may believe (20:29); John apparently distinguishes seeing from believing. Presumably, a group exercising authority speaks of the revelation of God, because they have actually seen the glory of Jesus the only Son and can bear witness that he is full of grace and truth.

A reference to John the Baptist (v. 15) follows the explicit mention of the incarnation (v. 14), and the content of John's witness is now given (cf. v. 30). The Evangelist's belief in the preexistence of Jesus is here voiced by the Baptist, who says nothing like this in other Gospel accounts. Significantly, the Baptist makes Jesus' superiority clear at the outset; no one should make any mistake about that.

Verse 16 continues the thought of v. 14 as if it had not been interrupted by the Baptist. The meaning of "fullness" is not obvious. Probably it signifies the saving gift of God (cf. Col. 1:19); "grace upon grace" would then expand upon this fullness (→ Grace). Verse 17 makes an important differentiation in that for the first time Jesus Christ is explicitly named. Conceivably, the giving of the law through Moses (v. 17a) is to be construed as grace (v. 16b) to which the grace (and truth) of Christ is now added (v. 17b). In the light of the treatment of Moses in the entire Gospel, however, v. 17 is best understood antithetically, putting Moses over against Jesus. Still the law of Moses is regarded as valid (7:51) if rightly understood (5:39), but the Jews neither understand it (5:46–47) nor obey it (7:19).

The conclusion of the prologue (1:18) rounds out its message as it refers to v. 1. That no one has seen God is a commonplace of OT theology (but cf. Exod. 24:9-11; 33:20-23; 34:6). The RSV reads "the only Son," which makes good (Johannine) sense but is not found in the oldest and best Greek manuscripts, where "only (begotten) God" is read. The latter reading is also supported by the fact that it echoes John 1:1b, where the Word is called theos ("God," but, as here, without the Greek article). Jesus Christ's having been in the bosom of the Father signifies his close intimacy with him. The Word Incarnate has not only seen God, he himself is theos and thus able to make him fully known.

At the end of the prologue one sees that it is an overture to or summation of the Gospel. Of course, the Gospel must be read, or Christian tradition known, in order to perceive this. Jesus Christ as the Word is the light who shines in darkness, who comes into the world he was instrumental in making. Rejected by his own people as a group, he was nevertheless received by individuals who believed in him, who gained the right to be children of God. As soon as the incarnation of the Word is announced, more traditionally Christian terms are employed, e.g., "grace," "glory," "truth," "only (begotten) Son," and "fullness." Finally, at the end of the prologue (v. 18), the historical revelation of God in Jesus is succinctly summed up: "He has made him known."

Encounter with John the Baptist and Call of the Disciples

The prologue is followed by episodes that are paralleled in the synoptic accounts; first, the witness of John (the Baptist) to Jesus (1:19-28), followed by an encounter between them (vv. 29-34). Then in a narrative comparable to but different from the call narratives of the Synoptics, Jesus gathers disciples and makes ready to begin his public activity (vv. 35-51). Unlike the Synoptics, John's Gospel has no mention of Jesus' being tempted by Satan; nor is Jesus said to open his ministry by coming forward in Galilee with a formal announcement of the approach of the Kingdom of God.

1:19-28, John the Baptist's Witness Concerning Himself. John the Baptist bears witness to Jesus before Jewish authorities, at the same time sharply delimiting his own role and thus expanding on the statement of the prologue that "he was not the light" (v. 8). He is not one of the anticipated figures of the end-time (vv. 20-21). That the "priests and Levites" are sent from Jerusalem by the Jews is significant, for the Jews, centered in Jerusalem, are the chief opponents of Jesus in John. The senders seem also to be identified as Pharisees (v. 24), and the apparent identification of Jews and Pharisees is typical of this Gospel for which the Pharisees are representative of the Jews, particularly Jewish leadership. Perhaps the titles that John the Baptist refuses are being reserved for Jesus. When pressed, he will only claim to be a voice crying in the wilderness (v. 23; cf. Mark 1:3). Thus John the Baptist describes himself with the same Isaiah passage (Isa. 40:3) that is applied to him by Mark. He is a forerunner and witness to Jesus but claims nothing more for himself.

Having failed to elicit any useful information from John about his person, the questioners take another line (John 1:25). Using language familiar to us from the Synoptics, John exploits the question about baptism to bear witness to his role as subordinate and forerunner of Jesus (vv. 26-27). Probably to establish Jesus' superiority, the actual baptism of Jesus by John is suppressed. The scene ends abruptly with a statement locating these events as well as John's activity (v. 28). The whereabouts of Bethany beyond the Jordan, however, remains a mystery.

1:29-34, John the Baptist's Witness to Jesus. The next day (cf. vv. 35, 43) finds Jesus himself on the scene for the first time, approaching John, who identifies him in terms of his saving work (cf. v. 36). In all probability John's use of lamb imagery is to be seen against the background of the Temple sacrifice. In the Fourth Gospel, Jesus is crucified on the afternoon before Passover, as the paschal lambs are being slain (cf. 1 Cor. 5:7). The Lamb title appears only here and in 1:36 in John. The sacrificial understanding of Jesus' death is not, however, typical of the Gospel (but cf. 1 John 1:7 and Rev. 5:6-14). In referring to his earlier witness about Jesus (John 1:30; cf. v. 15), John the Baptist typifies the Gospel's retrospective stance. He now looks back on it as an event that has already transpired (vv. 31-35); only in this Gospel is John the Baptist the narrator.

The Baptist, presumably like others (v. 26), did not know Jesus, and his baptizing activity is solely a means of revealing him to Israel (v. 31). Nothing is said about repentance and forgiveness as in the Synoptics (Mark 1:4). Significantly, John the Baptist is the first to bear witness to Jesus, and he himself sees and describes the Spirit's descending and abiding upon Jesus. The Baptist thus concludes this episode by summarizing and underscoring what he has done (John 1:34); he attests that Jesus is the Son of God, rendering the definitive statement about Jesus that is attributed by the Synoptics to the voice from heaven (→ Son of God). The unique, God-directed role of the Baptist has now been heavily underscored. In the very act of bearing witness so decisively to Jesus, John sharply defines and limits his own role.

1:35-51, The Call of Disciples. As another day's activity begins, the Baptist bears witness to two disciples (v. 36; cf. v. 29), his brief testimony evoking what was said the previous day (vv. 29-34). They follow Jesus (v. 37). Quite possibly the first of Jesus' disciples had been followers of the Baptist, as only this Gospel suggests. Although synoptic call stories occur on or near the Sea of Galilee, there is little indication of where this episode has taken place (cf. v. 28). The two disciples' brief conversation with Jesus (vv. 38-39) suggests more than it reveals. Significantly, the Evangelist translates "rabbi" (v. 38), suggesting that a non-Jewish audience is in view (cf. vv. 41, 42). There is an obvious play on seeking Jesus and staying with him (v. 39) that suggests a symbolic meaning that goes beyond location to conduct.

Subsequently, one of the disciples is identified (v. 40). That Andrew "first" found his brother Simon (Peter, v. 41) has been taken to imply that the other, unnamed disciple also found his brother. Since in the Marcan account (Mark 1:16-20) the brothers Andrew and Peter figure together with the brothers James and John, the sons of Zebedee, it has been inferred that the unnamed disciple was one of the sons of Zebedee and that he too found his brother. But such harmonization with the synoptic account hangs by the slenderest of threads. Peter, who first confesses Jesus to be the Christ in Mark (8:29; cf. Matt. 16:16) is now introduced to Jesus the Messiah (only John gives the Heb. form "Messiah"). John here stands in contrast to the Synoptics, where Jesus' identity is withheld throughout most of his public ministry. Jesus in turn calls Simon "Cephas" (in Aramaic, "Rock") or (in Gk.) "Peter" (John 1:42), just as he does in Matt. 16:18, when Peter confesses him to be the Christ (→ Peter).

Jesus' call to Philip, presumably in Galilee (John 1:43), is couched in language familiar from the Synoptics (Mark 2:14). Nathanael (John 1:45) is not named outside the Fourth Gospel (cf. 21:2). Philip's description of Jesus (1:45) is striking, for he identifies him as the Messiah announced in Scripture, indicates that he is a Galilean (Nazareth of Galilee), and calls Joseph his father. Nathanael's question about Nazareth reflects the obscurity of that small village (v. 46), and Philip's answer repeats Jesus' invitation of v. 39.

The exchange between Philip and Nathanael mirrors a characteristic theme of the Gospel: Jesus' origins are thought to explain him. But Jesus has another origin the world cannot know. Only being with Jesus provides sufficient basis to understand who he is. Nathanael's experience is immediate and decisive (vv. 47-51), as again a characteristic motif of John's appears, namely, Jesus' omniscience or foreknowledge (vv. 47-48), which leaves Nathanael astounded (v. 48) and hardly prepared for Jesus' answer. Nathanael's confession (v. 49) is entirely appropriate, but that he stands only at the beginning of an experience of divine revelation is made clear by Jesus' rejoinder (v. 50).

Jesus' final statement details what Nathanael can expect to see (v. 51). The Greek verb and subject here suddenly become plural; more people than Nathanael will view this strange sight. Oddly, Jesus' prediction or promise is not literally fulfilled in the Gospel. Its obscurity is, however, illumined by the recognition that there is a direct reference to Jacob's dream (Gen. 28), particularly to the ascending and descending of the angels of God upon the ladder (28:12). In John 1:51, of course, they ascend and descend upon the Son of man (i.e., Jesus). (John seems to play upon an ambiguity caused by the masculine gender of the Heb. pronoun that stands for "ladder.") As Jesus evokes the imagery of the entire Genesis scene, he himself becomes the place of God's revelation and dwelling (cf. John 1:14) as ancient Bethel had been.

In these opening stories the principal traditional titles of Jesus are introduced. He is first called only "Rabbi" (teacher), then "Messiah" (Christ), "Son of God," "King of Israel," and finally "Son of man." The last is the most common appellation of Jesus in the Gospels. So, at the beginning of Jesus' public ministry in John we already gain a clear idea of who he is, as do his disciples.

2:1-12:50

Jesus' Manifestation of God's Glory Before the World

2:1-12 The Wine Miracle

Jesus' public ministry begins at a wedding feast in Cana of Galilee, a locality mentioned only in John (cf. 4:46-54), with Jesus' mother (never in John called Mary) as well as his disciples also present (cf. Mark 3:31-35; John 19:25-27). Although the imagery of a wedding (bride, bridegroom, etc.) appears in Jesus' teaching (3:29; Mark 2:19-20), only here does he attend a wedding. His participation is, moreover, extraordinary. Perhaps we are put on notice by the placing of the event on the third day (John 2:1). This seemingly odd enumeration, which does not fit the context (cf. 1:29, 35, 43), could be a way of alluding to Jesus' resurrection, a hint that the story is to be interpreted symbolically. Yet

"the third day" might simply mean "three days hence."

Jesus' mother helpfully informs him that the wine has run out (v. 3), but his response seems brusque (v. 4). That Jesus' hour has not yet come is a characteristically Johannine touch (cf. 12:23). As the narrative develops, it becomes clear that "the hour" is the hour of Jesus' glorification and death. Salvation flows from the crucified, exalted Jesus. The "hour" then alludes to this saving event and suggests that Jesus' supplying wine should be understood symbolically. Moreover, in the Christian sacrament of the Lord's Supper, wine represents Jesus' blood, i.e., his death.

Although rebuffed, Jesus' mother gives instructions (1:5). The presence of six stone jars (v. 6), presumably in a home, is not explained, although their symbolic value will later become evident. As the servants obey Jesus' instructions (vv. 7-8), no miracle at all is recounted; Jesus speaks no word over the water. But such good wine is brought the steward (v. 9) that he exclaims to the bridegroom about what seems to him the reversal of ordinary practice (v. 10). The steward does not know where the wine came from (v. 9): again the motif of ignorance of Jesus' true origin. (That the servants know may suggest that they represent ministers of Jesus or the church.) The steward's words mean more than he intends. If Jesus himself is the good wine, his appearance at the culmination of salvation history is symbolized by its emergence out of the waters of Jewish purification: the last, not the first, is best.

Such a symbolic interpretation seems confirmed by the closing statement (v. 11). Jesus has performed the first of his signs, whose purpose, to indicate who he is (to manifest his glory), is now fulfilled in the disciples' response of faith. Jesus is then the new wine, perhaps embodied in the wine of the Eucharist, and his coming is an event that drastically alters the prevailing circumstances, as did the miracle of his changing water into wine.

Jesus' mother and disciples have been with him at Cana; now suddenly and inexplicably at Capernaum his brothers appear also (v. 12). They all remain there ■ short while, but nothing happens. Not surprisingly, modern interpreters have wondered whether we find here the remnant of a narrative framework that has been lost in later editing (see commentary below on 4:46-54).

The Cleansing of the Temple

Somewhat abruptly we are told that Jesus went up to Jerusalem for Passover (v. 13), the first of at least three Passovers in the Johannine narrative (cf. 6:4; 11:55). The only Passover mentioned in the other Gospels is the one at which he died (→ Passover, The).

The description of Jesus' driving the moneychangers and vendors from the Temple begins in a manner similar to the other Gospels, although there are differences in detail (e.g., Jesus' use of a whip, his direct address to those who sold pigeons). The words of Jesus and the quotation from the OT also differ. Only in John does Jesus speak of not making the Temple ("my Father's house") a house of trade (Gk. emporion; Lat. emporium; cf. Zech. 14:21) and quote Ps. 69:9. This Psalms quotation has a double sense; it not only refers to the zeal that motivated Jesus' deed but alludes to his own death (→ Temple, The).

The demand for a sign (John 2:18) is unique and typical of John (but cf. Mark 11:28). Jesus' word about destroying the temple and raising it up in three days (John 2:19) has numerous parallels (Mark 14:58 and parallels; Mark 15:29 and parallels; Acts 6:14) but not in the setting of this episode. Indeed, in other sources it is attributed to Jesus by his opponents. The question of the Jews (John 2:20) allows the narrator to inform readers of the real meaning of the saying (v. 21) and to point ahead to the disciples' future belief (v. 22). This retrospective stance, in which the author assumes the vantage point of future, postresurrection belief is typical of John (cf. 12:16). If Herod's reconstruction of the Temple (v. 20) began in 19 or 20 B.C., this event would have occurred in the year 27 or 28.

Harmonizers of the Gospels, ancient and modern, have proposed that Jesus cleansed the Temple in a similar way twice. This is possible but not likely. In all probability John has moved an event from the passion week to the beginning of the narrative. Such a move would fit his tendency to set out at the beginning matters or events that in the other Gospels take place later (e.g., the confession of Jesus as Messiah). Jesus comes to the Temple of Jerusalem, the very heart of the Israelite nation and religion, at the outset of his ministry and there confronts its authorities. Their forthcoming hostility is adumbrated, and his own death and resurrection are revealed by the testimony of Scripture and Jesus' own pronouncement.

2:23-3:21

The Discussion with Nicodemus on Birth from Above

2:23-25, Jesus' Reception at Passover.

This general, summary statement about Jesus' signs prepares us for the way in which Nicodemus will approach Jesus (3:2), as well as Jesus' cool response. Jesus' own attitude is described tersely (vv. 24-25) and grounded in the omniscience that he frequently manifests in John (1:48; 4:39).

3:1-21, The Discussion with Nicodemus.

Nicodemus is a Pharisee and a "ruler" of the Jews, probably a member of the Sanhedrin (→ Sanhedrin). Like many figures in the Fourth Gospel, he is representative of an attitude toward Jesus, probably one known to the Evangelist (cf. 12:42). That Nicodemus says "we" suggests that he speaks for a Judaism that is open to Jesus, that is, accepts him as one (among others) sent from God. Jesus is indeed a teacher (1:38) from God, whose signs accredit his origin.

The proof of divine accreditation through signs has a venerable biblical origin and history, particularly in the Exodus narratives (Exod. 4:1-9, 17, 30). Jesus himself was perceived as a miracle worker, exorcist, and faith healer (Matt. 11:2-6; 12:28). Miracles apparently came to be expected of the promised prophet like Moses (Deut. 18:15-22), even as Moses himself had performed signs. Nicodemus' evaluation of Jesus thus seems to imply that he is such a prophetic figure.

One might have assumed that Nicodemus' acceptance of Jesus (John 3:2) would have elicited a positive response rather than what amounts to a sharp rebuke and challenge (v. 3). For the first time in John "kingdom of God" is mentioned. Whether Jesus is calling for rebirth or birth from above depends on how the Greek term anōthen (RSV: "anew") is rendered. It means either "again" or "from above." Nicodemus understands Jesus to say "again" (v. 4), although he grossly misinterprets him as meaning physical rebirth. Jesus immediately makes clear that he speaks on a different level. Birth by water and spirit (v. 5) looks like an allusion to baptism, performed in water and, in early Christian expectation, accompanied by the gift of the Spirit. The realms of flesh and spirit (v. 6) are not to be understood generally but with reference to Christ and belief or participation in him. The flesh is the realm of unbelief, of separation from knowledge of God. That Jesus should speak as he has to one living in that realm is no marvel (v. 7). Nicodemus is called upon not to acknowledge Jesus by his old standards, but to break away from them into a new realm. Jesus' enigmatic statement about the wind or Spirit (v. 8) is bound to confound Nicodemus (v. 9). The Greek word pneuma can mean either, and an outsider like Nicodemus may only wonder what the blowing of the wind has to do with the working of the Spirit. The latter is not, however, erratic and arbitrary; to the believer its unaccountability signals God's grace.

Despite his initial positive reception of Jesus, Nicodemus is still in darkness (v. 10). That he is more than an individual is suggested by the following statement (v. 11) in which suddenly the verbs all become plural in Greek; heretofore they were singular. Apparently the confessing community of Jesus' disciples speaks with him to those with whom Nicodemus is aligned, the synagogue (perhaps a synagogue including members well disposed toward Jesus). Jesus' question to Nicodemus (v. 12) is proverbial and highlights the latter's ignorance. The key to the heavenly things, which Nicodemus and company do not know, is knowledge of Jesus, particularly where he is from and where he is going. Thus, in v. 13 Jesus speaks enigmatically of the ascent and descent of the Son of man, to and from heaven. Ascents to God were claimed for other personages of Judaism (e.g., Enoch, Elijah, Moses). This statement denies all such ascents to God except Jesus', and Jesus can uniquely claim to have descended from God (heaven). While Judaism could easily speak of men sent from God (1:6; 3:2) and knew of ascents to God, the claim to have descended from him was another matter. Precisely that, however, is said of Jesus.

Mention of the Son of man (v. 13) sets the stage for the further exposition of Jesus' work. Although the reference to Moses' act (vv. 14-15; cf. Num. 21:8-9) is entirely appropriate in a discussion with a teacher of Israel, from this point on Nicodemus is actually no longer in the picture; nor does Jesus seem to be the speaker. John 3:11-13 forms a bridge from their conversation into a confessional statement of the Johannine Christian community. The unmistakable reference to the crucifixion of Jesus is still, however, veiled behind the reference to Moses, whose deed is taken to be a type of Jesus'. As Moses' act saved the people from death by serpent bite, so Jesus' crucifixion saves his people from death and opens the door to eternal life.

John speaks less enigmatically in 3:16, a statement in which the gospel message is encapsulated. Here, as in v. 15, life is made contingent on faith and believing. The giving or sending of the Son is the expression of God's saving purpose; he does not intend to judge or condemn (v. 17; the same Greek verb, krinein, could have either meaning). The statement about the one who believes (v. 18) is straightforward and presents no problem. The one who does not believe, however, is curiously described in the Greek perfect tense as judged already (→ Judgment, Day of). The Evangelist here contemplates the fact of unbelief, rejection. Such rejection is judgment for the unbeliever (v. 19) and is explained in terms of a light-darkness dualism reminiscent of the prologue (esp. vv. 5, 9). An explanation of why some avoid the light while others come to it is then given (vv. 20-21); it could mean that Jesus as light only confirms a preference for light or darkness, depending on people's previous disposition and conduct.

Faith in Jesus would then be morally predetermined. John seeks, however, to find terms adequate to explain the phenomenon of rejection and the consequent alienation of communities (church and synagogue) in which he lives or has lived. Only in such a confrontation and decision for or against Jesus may the true character of one's past, as well as the direction for the future, be seen.

The Second Appearance of the Baptist

3:22–24, Jesus and John Baptizing. Since Jesus is already in Jerusalem, v. 22 must mean he went into the Judean countryside. Only in John is Jesus said to have baptized (cf. 3:26; 4:1–2). Aenon (3:23) may be a derivative from a Semitic word meaning “spring.” There were at least a couple of localities known as Salim, one about three miles east of biblical Shechem, the other farther north, a few miles south of Scythopolis (biblical Beth-shan). We learn also that John had not yet been arrested (v. 24; cf. Mark 1:14). This statement seems to reflect some knowledge of the synoptic account of Jesus’ ministry, whether on the part of the author or a very early editor.

3:25–30, John the Baptist’s Witness to Jesus. The introduction (v. 25) does not lead smoothly into the question of v. 26 but seems superfluous. One would have anticipated a dispute with disciples of Jesus if not with Jesus himself. Obviously, v. 26 refers to the opening scene (1:28). John himself is unperturbed that Jesus’ baptism is attracting multitudes (3:27) and continues to bear witness to Jesus, referring to his own previous witness (v. 28; cf. 1:20, 23). The friend of the bridegroom (cf. our “best man”) is obviously John the Baptist, who knows his own role in relation to Jesus’ (3:29–30). He remains a faithful witness even in the face of a challenge from his own disciples. The fulfillment of joy is a mark of Jesus’ eternal fellowship with his followers (15:11; 16:24; 17:13). The significance of this short episode now becomes clear: John testifies again to Jesus.

3:31–36, The Superiority of the Son. This paragraph in 3:31–36 follows logically but there is again a question about who is speaking (cf. 3:16–21). John here apparently refers to himself in the third person (v. 31b). Although there is no explicit indication of a change of speakers, vv. 31–36 (like vv. 16–21) may be understood as a kind of comment of the Evangelist upon the episode that has preceded.

The contrast (v. 31) is apparently between the Baptist and Jesus (cf. Matt. 11:11). That the witness and word of Jesus (John 3:32–34) are grounded in the Father’s love (v. 35) is a way of expressing God’s closeness (1:18) and unity (10:30) with Jesus. The Spirit is given by God to Jesus without measure, i.e., without limit or restriction (3:34). His giving him “all things” (v. 35) means that the Father’s revelation of himself is accomplished wholly in Jesus the Son. That John the Baptist speaks of no one receiving Jesus’ testimony (v. 32) and a moment later of those who do receive it (v. 36) is typical (cf. 1:10–11; 1:12–13). “God” and “Father” can be used interchangeably. Because Jesus is so frequently referred to as “Son,” God is often called “Father.” The Father-Son relationship symbolizes and expresses the Johannine concept of revelation. That God’s revelation and salvation are now vested wholly in the Son is confirmed by the either-or alternative set out in 3:36. Belief in the Son means eternal life already. Disobedience (i.e., refusing to believe) cuts one off from life and, instead, incurs God’s wrath (v. 36).

Jesus and the Woman of Samaria

4:1–6, Jesus at Jacob’s Well. The opening sentence clearly refers to the situation described in 3:22–30 and notes Jesus’ return to Galilee, a journey accomplished by going through Samaria (v. 4; → Samaria, District of). John agrees with Luke (9:52; 10:29–37; 17:11–19) in showing Jesus having contact with Samaria and the Samaritans. In neither Gospel do Samaritans fare badly. Probably Sychar (John 4:5) was at or near biblical Shechem, directly north of Jerusalem in Samaria. By Hebrew time reckoning, the sixth hour would be noon; at midday Jesus would be weary from walking. This is one of the relatively few places in John’s Gospel where Jesus is allowed to show normal human frailty (cf. 11:35).

4:7–15, The Conversation. Jesus’ request of the woman of Samaria is not surprising by modern standards, given the setting (v. 6), but the woman’s surprise is understandable (v. 9; → Samaritans). There is, of course, no way the woman could have known the particular identity of Jesus as the bringer of salvation (v. 10). The “living water” is also running water; John typically plays upon a double meaning in Greek that cannot be duplicated in English. Jesus means salvific “living water”; the woman thinks he is speaking of ordinary “running water” in the well (cf. 3:3–4). That Jesus may be a special personage, however, is suggested by her question (4:12), which in Greek expects a negative answer: Jesus could not be greater than Jacob. Of course, Jesus is greater. Jesus now gives a more straightforward answer (vv. 13–14), revealing that the water he gives is of a radically different sort. The woman begins to understand but is apparently still thinking of the quenching of this-worldly thirst (v. 15).

The conversation embodies the typical Johannine misunderstanding in which Jesus speaks with full and authoritative knowledge (fundamentally, knowledge of who he is), while the interlocutor responds in a natural, normal but uninformed way. Even Jesus' disciples, although they are said to believe, do not fully comprehend him during his lifetime (cf. 4:32-34).

4:16-26, Jesus Reveals Himself. Jesus suddenly turns the conversation in an unexpected direction (4:16-18). His command, the woman's answer, and Jesus' rejoinder culminate in a startling revelation about herself, which she can only acknowledge as true (v. 19). Understandably, she takes Jesus to be a prophet. Her question reflects the ancient dispute and tension between Jews and Samaritans (v. 20). "This mountain" is Mount Gerizim, where the Samaritan temple had been located until its destruction by John Hyrcanus (128 B.C.). Samaritan worship, however, continued there. The question allows Jesus to contrast the old false worship, whether Jewish or Samaritan, with the new (vv. 21, 23). Worship in spirit and truth (vv. 23, 24) means, in effect, Christian worship of the God who reveals himself in Jesus, who is the truth and sends the Spirit upon his disciples after his death. Thus Jesus alludes to the hour of his death and exaltation (cf. 12:23). (There may also be a contrast with sacrificial worship.) That "the hour is coming and now is" probably means that the hour is future from the standpoint of Jesus' ministry and present to the Johannine church and readers of the Gospel.

The statement of 4:22 seems to endorse Jewish worship over Samaritan just at the point at which both are being declared no longer relevant. That salvation is from (or "of") the Jews is, at the least, an unexpected assertion in the Fourth Gospel. Because in this Gospel Samaritans are viewed more favorably than Jews, it is all the more difficult to understand why such a statement is made. Nevertheless, from the perspective of the Gospel it is correct in that Jesus is a Jew (v. 9) and represents the Jewish messianic hope (1:45) rather than the Samaritan.

The woman's response to Jesus (4:25) seems to reflect Jewish messianic expectations. But perhaps she refers not to the Davidic Messiah but to a prophet like Moses (cf. Deut. 18:15-22). The Samaritans viewed themselves as the heirs of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, in which the royal line was not descended from David. Jesus replies to her by identifying and revealing himself, using the formula ego eimi (Gk., "It is I" or "I am"), which is characteristic of the Gospel of John (cf. 8:12). This self-revelation brings the scene with the woman to an end, but the episode continues (→ Messiah).

4:27-30, The Woman Witnesses to the Samaritans. The disciples now return and are amazed because by conventional standards conversation between a man, much less a rabbi, and a woman was unusual. The woman, leaving her water jar (v. 28), bears witness to her people, making clear her grounds for thinking Jesus may be the Christ (v. 29). Because of her testimony, the people of the city (cf. v. 5) now come to see Jesus, but while they are on the way his disciples return to the center of the stage.

4:31-38, Jesus' Conversation with His Disciples. Jesus' disciples' entreaty (v. 31), his response, and their puzzlement (vv. 32-33) form what has become a familiar pattern (cf. 4:7-15); now Jesus' own disciples find his words a riddle and misunderstand in terms of everyday possibilities or circumstances. Jesus solves the riddle by revealing the secret of his symbolic language (v. 34): the God-given mission that is his source and sustenance. There follows a series of sayings that have as their theme, or common denominator, the harvest (vv. 35-38). Although their precise relation to the preceding conversation is not obvious, two factors help explain them. First, Jesus' own mission is, in John's thought, closely linked to his disciples' (cf. 20:21). Second, this connection now finds expression through apparently traditional sayings whose referents are no longer clear (4:35 may echo Matt. 9:37; Luke 10:2). That the harvest is not in the future, but now, is typical of John, for whom God's salvation is present in Jesus. The identification of the sower and reaper (John 4:36-37) is a problem. If they represent Jesus and the disciples, as might seem obvious, the "others" (v. 38; plural) is difficult to understand.

The passage can be fruitfully read in light of Acts 8:4-25, where Philip, who was not one of the Twelve, first preaches the gospel in Samaria. Only later do the apostles Peter and John confirm his work. If in John 4:35-38 Jesus is addressing his disciples and speaks of others who labored before them (v. 38), he may envision a similar situation.

4:39-42, The Samaritans' Belief. The Samaritans now return to the center of the narrative. Although the testimony of the woman brought many to faith (v. 39), the presence and word of Jesus himself causes more to believe and makes her testimony superfluous. That Jesus preached and made large numbers of converts in Samaria is attested by no other Gospel and is unlikely. Probably this brief narrative also reflects the mission of the early, Johannine Christians, who preached the gospel in Samaria. In John's view, firsthand experience of Jesus (vv.

40-42) is not limited to his earthly or historical presence (see 14:23; 20:29) but is fully available only after his death and exaltation. Such experiential knowledge enables one to hail him as "Savior of the world," a title used of Roman emperors.

4:43-54

The Healing of an Official's Son

4:43-46, Jesus' Return to Galilee. Jesus is still headed for Galilee (cf. 4:3) and now resumes his journey. "Two days" (v. 43) is stereotypical for a short period (cf. 4:40; 2:1). The famous saying of 4:44 is found also in the synoptic Gospels (Matt. 13:57; Mark 6:4; Luke 4:24), where it applies to Galilee or Nazareth itself (Luke 4:24); here it seems to apply to Judea. In Galilee, Jesus is welcomed according to John, although for this Gospel not Galilee but Jerusalem is the center of his activity.

4:46-54, The Healing. The reference to the earlier wine miracle of Cana (v. 46) is typical of John. The official and his mortally ill son are in Capernaum, some miles away, so that to see Jesus he must leave his son and go to Cana. In Matt. 8:5-13 and Luke 7:1-10 (Q source?) there is a story, set in Capernaum, of a Roman centurion whose servant or slave is ill. The Johannine story seems to be a variant of it, although in addition to the other differences the Q version takes place entirely in Capernaum (→ Q).

When the official approaches Jesus, he responds with what seems a negative statement (John 4:48; Mark 8:11-12), although in John's Gospel belief frequently follows upon the seeing of signs. Nevertheless the official continues to urge Jesus (John 4:49), who responds with a command that promises healing, and the official believes what Jesus has said (v. 50). The healing of the son, as it turns out, occurred just when Jesus spoke (vv. 51-53). Upon discovering this, the man (with his household) again believes, by which is now clearly meant he comes to faith in Jesus. Thus, perhaps ironically, Jesus' statement of v. 48 is fulfilled. (In the Q version, however, faith precedes the healing of the sick servant.)

Healing at Bethzatha and Discussion

5:1-9, The Healing. Jesus now goes up to Jerusalem to an unspecified feast. "Of the Jews" (v. 1) is superfluous except that it once again sets Jesus over against Judaism. Since Passover is anticipated in 6:4, this is presumably not a Passover feast (→ Feasts, Festivals, and Fasts).

The pool described here is probably the one unearthed by archaeologists near the Church of St. Anne north of the Temple area. The name Bethzatha (RSV) may be derived from the northern suburb of the city in which the pool was located. (Other, less likely names such as Bethesda and Bethsaida appear in some manuscripts.) The pool was, in ancient times, a kind of spa where healings were thought to take place (v. 3). Descriptions of the duration of illness are often found in healing stories (v. 5; cf. Mark 5:25); there is perhaps no symbolic significance in the number thirty-eight (but cf. Deut. 2:14). That the Johannine Jesus knows the man's condition without asking (John 5:6) is typical (cf. 1:48; 4:17-18), as is his taking or maintaining the initiative (2:4-5; 9:5-7). The man's problem in getting into the pool in time (5:7) was explained by the addition of v. 4 in early manuscripts. Typically, Jesus does not deal with that problem at all but gives a sharp command (v. 8; cf. Mark 2:9, 11). The man's healing is obviously the result of Jesus' word (cf. John 4:46-54), not of the healed person's faith (cf. Mark 5:34). Almost as an afterthought, we are told (John 5:9b) that the healing took place on a Sabbath, a common feature of Gospel healing stories (cf. 9:14; Mark 3:2) and a crucial fact in the following discussion.

5:10-18, The Persecution of Jesus. Significantly, the Jews do not question Jesus but the man healed (cf. chap. 9). When the man is accused of violating the Sabbath (v. 10), he points to the one who has healed him. But when questioned, he proves to be ignorant of Jesus, who has now withdrawn (v. 13; cf. the healed man in chap. 9). Jesus, once more taking the initiative, accosts him with a warning (5:14). The man's illness is not said to have resulted from his sin, and such a viewpoint seems to be explicitly denied in 9:2-3 (cf. Luke 13:2-3), but his destiny is still undecided (cf. John 9:38). If he then turns informer against Jesus (5:15), the latter's warning has apparently been rejected. He does, and Jesus himself is now persecuted for breaking the Sabbath (v. 16). Jesus gives his reason for working on the Sabbath in a somewhat veiled statement that seems to liken his own working to God's (v. 17). The response of the Jews is immediate and life threatening, for they take his statement to imply his equality with God. Such an offense goes far beyond Sabbath breaking, itself a capital crime (Exod. 31:14; 35:2), whether or not the Jews at this period could execute lawbreakers (cf. John 18:31). Obviously the crime of which Jesus is accused (5:18) impugns the Deity and flies in the face of Jewish monotheism; it is blasphemy (cf. Mark 14:63-64). The narrative has moved quickly from the healing of an ill man to this extreme antinomy and conflict between Jesus and the Jews, and this mortal threat to Jesus is related directly to claims made by, or for, him. The portrayal is doubtless influenced by the situation of the Johannine community (see "Introduction: The Setting and Composition of the Gospel" above).

5:19–24, The Father and Son. The basic theme of this section is the relationship of the Father and the Son as expressed in their life-giving work. Although John describes Jesus and his mission in the most exalted terms—the Father withholds nothing from the Son (vv. 19–20)—he emphasizes that the Son's authority derives wholly from the Father. The love that begins with God's revelation to and through the Son ends with the disciples' love for one another (13:34–35). The distinctive life-giving work of the Father is also accomplished by the Son, to whom judgment is wholly delegated (5:21–22). Resurrection and judgment, the hallmarks of the end of the age (i.e., eschatology), are thus the work of the Son. Those who (truly) hear the Son and believe God avoid judgment completely (cf. 3:18) and come immediately into eternal life (5:24). To reject the Son, Jesus, is to reject God (v. 23).

5:25–29, The Raising of the Dead. The thought of the preceding section moved quite naturally from the Son's relationship to the Father to eschatological salvation, resurrection and life, for the Son carries through on earth the Father's life-giving and eschatological work. Now this theme receives further treatment. Verses 26–27 reiterate vv. 21 and 22, but in v. 25 a new idea has been introduced. Clearly in v. 24 eternal life is a present possibility and possession, not something one can obtain only after death. If in v. 25 "the dead" means the spiritually dead (as in 9:39 "blind" means spiritually blind), the idea is the same as in 5:24. The phrase "is coming and now is" refers to the perspective of Jesus and that of the postresurrection church (cf. 4:23), which are here juxtaposed. In 5:28–29, however, the dead can hardly be other than the physically dead. The fact that their resurrection is anticipated ("is coming") but not present would seem to confirm this. The description of resurrection of life and judgment (v. 29) is reminiscent of Dan. 12:2. But such a distinction between those raised stands in tension with John 5:21–25, where resurrection is equated with eternal life and a resurrection of judgment would be a contradiction in terms. Verses 28–29 apparently embody a more primitive eschatology, whether the result of the evangelist's use of traditional material or of later editorial work. John brings together traditions and perspectives that are not consistent with one another (→ Eschatology; Resurrection).

5:30–47, The Testimony to Jesus. At v. 30 Jesus reiterates his relation to the Father (cf.

5:19, 26–27), for the first time introducing the category of will. The move to the theme of witness or testimony (5:31–40) follows logically. Jesus makes no claim for himself and does not testify to himself. Of course, the one who bears witness to Jesus is ultimately God (v. 32; cf. v. 37). But first Jesus mentions another witness, John the Baptist. The "you sent to John" (v. 33) equates the hearers with the Jews mentioned in 1:19, who evoke John's earlier witness. Jesus, while acknowledging John's positive importance, nevertheless puts distance between himself and his predecessor (5:34–36; cf. 3:30, 31–36). The testimony or witness of Jesus' works (5:36) naturally includes his signs but also his words and other actions. They are given Jesus by the Father as a mission to accomplish, and their accomplishment is a witness, even if his opponents do not recognize their origin.

How the Father bears witness (v. 37) is not said explicitly, but, as we have noted, Jesus' works are given him by the Father and are an aspect of his witness. The same could be said of John, a man sent from God (1:6). That Jesus' Jewish opponents had not seen God's form is perhaps a commonplace (cf. 1:18), although the claim that they had not heard his voice or had his word abiding in them (5:38) would have evoked their strong resistance. That such failure should result from their not believing Jesus adds insult to injury. Even the witness of Scripture cannot be heard unless these writings are acknowledged to bear witness to Jesus (v. 39), but the fact that they bear witness to Jesus can only be perceived in the moment one comes to Jesus (v. 40). Thus everything depends on believing or believing in Jesus.

Jesus' not receiving glory from men (v. 41) is typical of the Fourth Gospel. The succeeding statement (v. 42), while also characteristic of John's polemic, does not quite follow. Apparently it states the grounds for the opponents' rejection of Jesus and their receiving glory from one another (v. 44), although this is not made explicit here. The opponents' obduracy is then summed up (v. 43). Who is meant by "another" is unimportant. In fact, there is probably no specific referent, for Jesus here characterizes his opponents. The polemic continues in v. 44 (cf. vv. 41–42).

Finally Jesus returns to Moses, who witnesses through Scripture (cf. v. 39; 1:45) and becomes the accuser of his opponents, the Jews who think of themselves as his disciples (cf. 9:28). Belief in Jesus would follow from really believing Moses (5:46), as v. 47 reiterates. John is doubtless convinced of this; of course, the statement of vv. 46–47 reflect the beliefs of Christians. A Jew would scarcely find such clear testimony to Jesus in Scripture. There is little in the other Gospels or in early Christian literature or tradition to indicate that such issues characterized Jesus' historical ministry. The text reflects later controversies about Jesus' identity and role. In John's view, there is no neutral ground from which one may decide about Jesus, but decide one must. Such a crisis of decision is the counterpart of the Johannine dualism in which important issues are cast in terms of extreme alternatives.

The Feeding of Five Thousand and the Bread Discourse

Chap. 6 is a distinct literary unit, beginning with a new setting and ending with the climactic confession of Peter. Obviously, a new episode begins in chap. 7. While identifiable traditional units underlie the various narratives (e.g., the feeding of the multitude, Jesus' walking on the sea), the chapter centers on the theme of the bread that Jesus gives his disciples to eat.

6:1-15, The Feeding. Verse 1 presupposes that Jesus is in Galilee, whereas he has just previously been in Jerusalem with no indication that he was leaving. Consequently, it has been suggested that chap. 6 once stood before chap. 5, since at the end of chap. 4 Jesus is in Galilee, but no extant manuscript of the Gospel attests this order. We treat the chapters as they now stand.

The feeding of a multitude is recounted in all the synoptic Gospels (Matt. 14:13-21; Mark 6:32-44; Luke 9:10-17; cf. Mark 8:1-10; Matt. 15:32-39). It is the first in a series of events in John that has synoptic, especially Marcan, parallels in the same sequence: the feeding; Jesus' walking on the water (Mark 6:45-51; Matt. 14:22-27); a question about signs (John 6:30; Mark 8:11); a discourse on bread (John 6:31-58; cf. Mark 8:14-21; Matt. 16:5-12); Peter's confession of who Jesus is (John 6:66-71; Mark 8:27-30 and parallels). If John is not following Mark or Matthew (significant portions are missing in Luke), he knows common traditions already arranged in the same order.

As in Mark, the feeding narrative begins with Jesus' crossing the sea and the gathering of a throng (John 6:1-2). In John, only Jesus initially withdraws to a mountain (v. 3) to which he later returns (v. 15). Presumably, the feeding took place near the shore, as in the Synoptics (cf. John 6:23). John's account, although similar to the other Gospels', has distinctive features, e.g., the crowd has seen Jesus' signs (v. 2); the Passover is at hand (v. 4); Philip intercedes for the people (vv. 5-7); a young boy is the source of the loaves and fish (vv. 8-9). The account of the distribution and eating of the bread comes closest to the other Gospels, perhaps because early Christian eucharistic practice has shaped the narratives.

Accordingly, only pieces of bread are gathered after the meal (v. 13). Remarkably, all the other Gospels agree on the numbers: five thousand men, two hundred denarii worth of bread, five loaves, two fish, twelve baskets of fragments.

The reaction of the people (v. 14) is unique to John and is based on Jesus' sign (2:11, 23; 3:2; 4:19, 29, 45, 48, 53-54). He is hailed as the prophet, a typical reaction to his God-given signs (cf. 3:2). The prophet in question is in all probability the prophet like Moses predicted in Deut. 18:15-22. (Moses worked signs and wonders before Pharaoh, and through his leadership God exercised miraculous care for Israel during the Exodus from Egypt.) The perception attributed to Jesus that they were about to come and make him king (John 6:15) bespeaks a linkage between prophet and king in John's thought. The concept of messiahship in John has significant connections with prophetic, Mosaic traditions. That Jesus takes up and surpasses the work of Moses becomes a theme of the great discourse of 6:31-58.

6:16-24, Jesus' Walking on the Sea. In Matthew and Mark, as in John, Jesus' feeding of five thousand men is followed immediately by a tale of his coming to his disciples, walking across the water. But John has the disciples going from Transjordan back toward Capernaum (v. 17; cf. v. 1), the opposite direction from the Synoptics. In all of the accounts, the disciples' boat encounters strong winds, the sudden appearance of Jesus walking across the water frightens the disciples, and Jesus calms their fears, saying, "It is I" (Gk. ego eimi, which can also be translated "I am"; cf. vv. 41, 48, 51). In Mark and Matthew, the wind ceases when Jesus gets into the boat. In John, nothing more is said of it, but instead the immediate arrival of the boat at its destination is noted.

The awkward transitional episode (vv. 22-24) has no synoptic parallel. The people note the absence of Jesus, the one boat, and the disciples (vv. 22, 24) and correctly infer that Jesus has gone to Capernaum (vv. 24-25), although he did not embark with the disciples (v. 22). (Thus the miraculous character of Jesus' crossing is attested.) Readers are also informed of the arrival of the people who had been fed (v. 26) on the other side of the sea (v. 25). Evidently, according to the tradition John knew, the feeding took place on the eastern side of the Sea of Galilee (contrary to the Synoptics) but the discourse in Capernaum (v. 59), the center of so much of Jesus' activity according to the synoptic Gospels.

6:25-34, Bread from Heaven. With Jesus, the disciples, and the people back on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, a long dialogue between Jesus and several groups of interlocutors now begins (6:25–59). This section sets the scene and poses the terms of the ensuing discussion and debate. Jesus typically ignores the people's question (vv. 25–26) and speaks rather to their seeking him in the first place (v. 24), revealing their deeper motivation. Jesus' injunction (v. 27) seems to presuppose that seeing signs, not eating and being filled, is a proper grounds for seeking him. The loaves they have eaten are apparently the food that perishes. Even their seeing the sign and response (vv. 14–15) must not represent the level of acceptance that Jesus requires. But Jesus holds out the possibility of their attaining a more appropriate access (v. 27). The Son of man is of course Jesus, whom God endorses as his messenger. Jesus has enjoined his hearers to labor or work (v. 27), and so their question (v. 28) is appropriate. His answer is direct and to the point (v. 29). John here adopts the terms of the great debate between Paul and his Jewish Christian opponents, faith and works, but, instead of replacing works by faith, interprets true work as faith. The people then show that they are prepared to understand that the one whom God has sent is Jesus himself, if he meets their expectations (v. 30). Their question seems to ignore the sign they have just witnessed, but it serves to indicate that what Jesus has done is not enough and to open up the necessity for further explanation of his feeding work. As a literary device it is typical of the Gospel of John.

Without waiting for Jesus' answer, the people refer to their fathers' eating the miraculous manna (Exod. 16) and quote Scripture (John 6:31). The citation is an inexact reflection of several OT passages: Exod. 16:4, 15; Num. 11:8; Neh. 9:15; Ps. 78:24; and Ps. 105:40. Nevertheless, it conveys a biblical authority that all parties to the discussion will honor. Jesus, however, offers an interpretation that differs from what he attributes to them, although they have not yet voiced it: not Moses gave, but my Father gives the bread (John 6:32). All would have agreed that it came ultimately from God, but by calling God "my Father" Jesus suggests a special role for himself in conveying that bread, while seeming to differentiate the true bread from heaven from the wilderness manna. Then Jesus subtly identifies himself with that true bread from heaven (v. 33). Thus the hearers ingenuously ask for this bread (v. 34) as the Samaritan woman asked for an unending supply of water (4:15). (The descent of the bread from heaven of course reflects the Exodus tradition that is clearly cited but may also be related to the biblical concept of the descent of wisdom, whose relationship to the Christology of the prologue has already been noted.)

himself openly as the bread of life (v. 35) but anticipates their rejection of him (v. 36). He is obviously casting his hearers in the role of unbelieving Jews. Not surprisingly, the people who next speak are called "the Jews" (v. 41). There follows now a series of statements by Jesus (vv. 37–40) concerning his relationship to the Father and his life-giving work (cf. 3:16–21, 31–36; 5:19–24). The sure salvation of the believer is grounded in the will and gift of God, as effected in the work of Jesus, the Son.

The "murmuring" of the Jews (6:41) echoes the murmuring motif of the Exodus tradition (cf. Exod. 16:2, 8), which is the background of this entire discussion. The statement attributed to Jesus by the Jews is not an exact quotation but takes up the themes of John 6:33 and 35. Their identification of Jesus' parentage (v. 42) recalls Philip's statement to Nathanael in 1:45 (cf. Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3). The Jews typically betray their failure to understand by attempting to explain Jesus by reference to his earthly origins (cf. John 7:40–44). Jesus' coming from God is itself the miracle. Jesus admonishes the Jews not to murmur (6:43) and explains the grounds of their unbelief (v. 44). His statements about resurrection at the last day (a familiar motif of Jewish and early Christian eschatology) recur throughout this section (vv. 39, 44, 54), reminding readers of the eschatological warrant of the truth of his words. Isaiah (54:13) is invoked as testimony that those who have actually heard the Father come to Jesus—another appeal to biblical authority (John 6:45). That no one has seen God (v. 46) is a recurring emphasis of John (cf. 1:18).

Eternal life as the consequence of belief or faith in Jesus is the central and recurring theme of the Gospel (6:47). In v. 48 we again encounter a typical Johannine "I am" (Gk. ego eimi) saying. Jesus' subsequent statements (vv. 49–51) reiterate the message of the Gospel with specific reference to the OT "text" (v. 31) and draw further implications (on v. 48, see v. 35; on v. 49, see vv. 33, 35–40). The contrast between eating the manna and eating the living and true bread is one of death and life. Finally, the life-giving bread from heaven is said to be the flesh of Jesus (v. 51). Thus the bread is now given a specific, historical, and individual identity, and this identity sets the conversation on a new track (vv. 52–58).

6:52–59, Bread and Flesh. Most of the previous discussion has dealt with the theme "bread from heaven," which is the first part of the Scripture quotation of v. 31. The latter part ("to eat") already came into view in vv. 50–51, but now the theme of eating is emphasized and explained. The question of the Jews (v. 52) leads to unequivocal assertions about the importance of eating the flesh and drinking the blood of the Son of man (vv. 53–54).

Already in 6:51 the giving of Jesus' flesh alludes to his death; in 6:52-58 that death is presupposed. Otherwise, the eating of his flesh and the drinking of his blood is unthinkable. Such a thought would in any event be abhorrent to the Jew. It becomes intelligible, however, on the basis of certain theological premises. From the death of Jesus, salvation flows (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3), and the bloodiness of his death by crucifixion suggests the inauguration of a new covenant through his sacrifice. Many interpreters see in this entire section a clear reference to the Eucharist, the sacramental meal (cf. 1 Cor. 11:23-26; Mark 14:22-25 and parallels). That John speaks of "flesh" rather than "body" sets him apart from the Synoptics and Paul; significantly he thereby takes up OT imagery ("flesh" and "blood"). Because of the richness of the sacramental allusions it is perhaps all the more puzzling that John nowhere recounts, but seems to presuppose, Jesus' institution of the Eucharist. Assuming the Eucharist is in view, participation in it, like baptism, would constitute a clear confession of faith in Jesus, a break with the synagogue, and adherence to the new community of Jesus' disciples. The rituals of worship become the dividing line between Jewish and Christian communities, as it has continued to be ever since. The notation of the geographical setting (John 6:59) brings the discourse to an end, although the following scenes obviously constitute its aftermath.

6:60-71, Further Discussion and Peter's Confession. The reaction of many disciples is understandable (v. 60), as is the subsequent withdrawal of some (v. 66). Jesus' knowledge of their thoughts is characteristic (v. 61). The apparent grounds for greater offense, the ascent of Jesus to the Father (v. 62), has, by the writing of this Gospel, already occurred (20:17).

Jesus' statement about the life-giving role of Spirit as contrasted with the flesh (6:63) constitutes a puzzle. In discounting the importance of the flesh, Jesus seems in effect to be taking back what he said in vv. 52-58 about the necessity of eating and drinking his flesh and blood. Given the conviction of the Evangelist and his community that the ascended Jesus had sent the Spirit (20:22; cf. 14:16-17), he could hardly have Jesus omit the cruciality of the Spirit's role. As it stands, however, there is a tension, perhaps best resolved by understanding that "flesh" in 6:63 has the OT sense of mortality (in contrast to the Spirit of God) and not the specific sense it acquired in vv. 53-58 in combination with "blood" (→ Flesh and Spirit). Perhaps not surprisingly, Jesus' word leads to the defection of some, which he fully foresaw (vv. 64, 65).

The withdrawal of "many" disciples (v. 66) may reflect the fact that the Gospel of John is the product of a severe conflict situation. The Twelve, however, remain faithful. In response to Jesus' question (v. 67), Peter speaks (v. 68). His role is reminiscent of, but his words unaccountably unlike, the confession in Mark 8:29 and parallels. Jesus here asks a different question, and Peter's response is initially a counterquestion. Eternal life, belief, and knowledge all missing from the synoptic version, are concepts typical of John, but the title "Holy One of God" is strange (cf. Mark 1:24). John's version is scarcely intelligible as a rewriting of the Synoptics. The concluding reference to Judas (John 6:70-71; cf. 64) refutes any hint that Jesus has been deceived by one of his own disciples. Any such disparagement is countered by his own revelation of the satanic character of the one who was to betray him (cf. 13:2, 21-30).

Jesus at the Feast of Tabernacles

Chap. 7 is another discrete literary unit, with a clear beginning point at 7:1 where the locus of Jesus' activity is discussed. The episode reaches a culmination with the reappearance of Nicodemus and the official rejection of Jesus in Jerusalem. Unlike chap. 6, chap. 7 has few points of contact with the Synoptics. There is an obvious break between 7:52 and 8:12 into which the story of an adulterous woman has been inserted in later manuscripts. Chap. 7 is a carefully constructed narrative containing dialogue, but there is only a minimum of narrative framework in chap. 8.

7:1-13, Jesus' Journey to Jerusalem. The deadly intent of the Jews, first mentioned in 5:18, leads Jesus to avoid Judea, presumably because his hour has not yet arrived (cf. 2:4). Tabernacles (v. 2) is the third of the great canonical feasts, the harvest feast in early autumn (cf. 6:4; Passover falls in spring). Jesus' brothers now appear (cf. 2:12; Mark 3:31) to urge him on to Jerusalem. That Jesus had disciples there is a Johannine idea (cf. John 18:15); in the Synoptics Jesus' disciples are all Galileans. The works the brothers have in mind (7:3-4) presumably include signs. The brothers, by implying that open demonstration or proof is needed (v. 4), acknowledge they do not believe in him (v. 5). Jesus' response to them is very much like his response to his mother (2:4), for he does not move in reaction to any human initiative but only at God's command (7:8-9). As if to underscore the point, no sooner are his brothers out of the way than Jesus goes up to Jerusalem (v. 10).

The Jews who are there seeking Jesus (v. 11) are apparently hostile and to be distinguished from the crowds of people who are divided but for fear of the Jews keep quiet (vv. 12-13; on the motif of the fear of the Jews see 9:22; 12:42; cf. 20:19). The accusation that Jesus is a deceiver, leading the people astray, represents the official view of the Jewish leaders.

7:14-31, Jesus' Discourses at the Feast and Crowd Reaction. The marveling of the Jews (v. 15) at Jesus' teaching in the Temple (cf. Mark 14:49) is based on what they know of his background; here again is the characteristic attempt to explain Jesus on the basis of inadequate knowledge of his origin (cf. John 1:46; 6:42). Jesus immediately sets matters straight (7:16). That Jesus' will is in complete harmony with God's has already been stated (6:38); now the very recognition of this fact is said to depend upon the intention to do God's will. As Jesus' unity with God is a unity of will, unity with Jesus depends on a similar unity with God's will. Jesus implicitly contrasts himself with the (unidentified) charlatan who seeks his own glory (7:18; cf. 5:43), claiming nothing for himself except that he seeks the glory of the one true God, i.e., to do his will and work.

The mention of the law of Moses (7:19) states an issue for the remainder of the chapter: who is obedient to the law? The response of the people (lit., "crowd") to Jesus' ominous question (cf. 5:18; 7:1) seems on the surface quite normal (v. 20), but as John never tires of reiterating, superficial understanding misses the point. Jesus' rejoinder (vv. 21-24) refers to the healing of 5:1-9. He then demonstrates his knowledge of the law (7:22), arguing that if circumcision is permitted on the Sabbath, making a man's whole body well ought to be permissible also (v. 23). (The fathers in v. 22 are Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; Jesus corrects himself by indicating that circumcision is antecedent to Moses.) Thus his injunction of v. 24 does not presuppose or ask more than that the prevailing standards should be correctly applied. Jesus submits his case to the law of Moses in order that he may be proven innocent by its best standards of interpretation (cf. 7:50-51). Of course, John does not believe that Jesus is finally subordinate to Moses (cf. 5:39-47).

The Jerusalemites (7:25; cf. v. 12) are distinguishable from the Jews; their questions initially express only wonderment (v. 25) and openness to Jesus (v. 26). But finally their conclusion is negative; their statement (v. 27) corresponds to one strain of expectation according to which the Messiah would emerge out of obscurity. Again, consideration of Jesus' origins leads to erroneously negative conclusions about his role. Typically, Jesus responds with an assertion of his true origin and authority (vv. 28-29). The response to Jesus is an attempt to seize him (v. 30), which is untimely and therefore fails: Jesus' hour has not yet come. Still, many of the crowd (RSV, "people") believe because of Jesus' signs (v. 31).

7:32-52, The Official Response. The crowd's apparent division is not shared by the officials (v. 32), however, who send out a search party to arrest Jesus. The chief priests, probably Sadducees, are allied with the Pharisees, an unlikely combination for Jesus' day (→Sadducees). The chief priests were Temple authorities then, but not the Pharisees, who came to dominance only after the Roman war (A.D. 70) when the Temple was gone. Jesus' enigmatic statement (vv. 33-34) refers to his coming death and exaltation to God. The Jews typically misunderstand (vv. 35-36) but in their misunderstanding nevertheless utter a profound truth (cf. 11:49-52). The death of Jesus will mean that his gospel will be taken to the Greeks of the Dispersion (cf. 12:20-23), that is, to the Jewish people scattered throughout the Mediterranean world. "Greeks" might mean any Gentiles (cf. Rom. 1:16), although here Greek-speaking Jews living outside the Holy Land may also be in view.

At the Feast of Tabernacles, daily libations of water were brought from the pool of Siloam (John 9:7, 11) near the foot of the Temple Mount. Possibly, when Jesus utters his pronouncement (7:37-38) on the last (seventh) day these water ceremonies are in view. His statement may be punctuated as in the RSV text or as in the RSV note; the original Greek manuscripts were without punctuation. The marginal rendering is less difficult. If it is followed, the statement of v. 38 applies to Jesus: out of his heart (Gk., "belly") the rivers of living water flow (cf. 19:34), not from the believer, as is otherwise the case. The source of the Scripture reference is unclear. The Evangelist comments (7:39) that Jesus' statement refers to the time after his crucifixion (glorification) when the Spirit, and thus the salvation given through him, would be received (cf. 16:7).

Typically, Jesus' words cause a division (7:40-43). Probably John sees Jesus as both prophet and Christ (see commentary above on 6:14-15), but the latter is the more generally acknowledged title. Those who affirm him as either are on the right track. Others challenge him on the basis of his origin (7:41b-42), for Jesus is known to come from Galilee (cf. 1:46), a supposition never contradicted in the Fourth Gospel (cf. Matt. 2:1-6; Luke 2:1-7). Jesus' earthly origins can neither discredit him nor authenticate him. Once again an attempt to seize or arrest Jesus aborts (John 7:44), presumably because his hour had not yet come.

The officers sent out to arrest (v. 32) Jesus now return, cognizant of what he has said (v. 46), and their evaluation is entirely accurate. The chief priests and Pharisees represent Jewish officialdom, but theirs is an unlikely combination. Probably the presence of the Pharisees is anachronistic and reflects the situation of Judaism in John's time (see "Introduction" above). Tellingly, only the Pharisees pose the questions in vv. 47-49. Their annoyance at their subordinates' failure to arrest Jesus is patent (v. 45), as is their impatience with these officers' awed reaction to him. The question about being led astray takes up the earlier negative opinion of Jesus (v. 12). The contemptuous description of the crowd (v. 49) may reflect learned opinion of the so-called people of the land, folk who may have been God-fearing but did not have opportunity or wherewithal to be scrupulously observant. As if to answer the question of the Pharisees (v. 48), out of the ranks of the scholars Nicodemus stands up to speak for Jesus and for a right judgment (7:24) under the law (vv. 50-51). Despite Nicodemus' standing (cf. 3:1, 10), he is derided, and his knowledge of Scripture impugned (7:52). Jesus cannot be a prophet (cf. v. 40) because he is from the wrong place.

The division over Jesus among the Jewish people falls more or less along the line between officialdom and general populace. Some of the latter may reject Jesus, but many credit him as a prophet, if not the Christ, while the leaders, particularly the Pharisees, reject his claims out of hand (cf. 12:42). He does not meet their standards. Increasingly, "Pharisees" and "Jews" will come to be used interchangeably.

7:53-8:11

The Woman Taken in Adultery

This famous story was not originally a part of the Gospel of John. The oldest manuscripts do not contain it; a few have it in other places, e.g., at the end of John or after Luke 21:38. Probably most stories of Jesus once circulated independently; this one did not find a place in John until after the Gospel was published.

Jesus the Light of the World: Claim and Controversy

As Jesus resumes speaking (v. 12), he now addresses the Pharisees (v. 13) or Jews (v. 22) and so, apparently, the hostile group who wanted him arrested (7:45). Although the narrative connection is not smooth, the general context of official hostility at the end of chap. 7 continues in chap. 8. This hostility is now directed to Jesus himself, who engages in vigorous and acrimonious debate with his adversaries. The debate manifests the tension between church and synagogue near the end of the first century.

8:12-20, The Light of the World. That Jesus is the light of the world has already been suggested by the prologue (1:4-5, 9). The form of Jesus' saying is, however, notable; it is an "I am" saying, typical of John (cf., e.g., 6:35; 10:7, 11; 11:25). When Pharisees accuse Jesus of witnessing to himself (8:13; cf. 5:31), he insists on the truth of his testimony (v. 14), once more stating his role in terms of his origin and destiny, which his opponents repeatedly demonstrate they do not know. Jesus now stresses their ignorance, invoking their own law ("your law," 8:17) and maintaining that it vindicates his judgment, while theirs is purely human ("according to the flesh," v. 15). When Jesus calls upon the witness of his Father in accordance with the law's requirement of two witnesses, the Pharisees think that he means his earthly father. Of course, Jesus means God the Father, whom his opponents do not know.

8:21-30, Jesus' Departure. The next stage of the discussion begins with Jesus' assertion about his departure and concludes with the statement that many of his hearers believed in him (v. 30). Again the Jews misunderstand and, in asking whether he will kill himself unintentionally, inject a note of irony. Jesus will in fact die, but not as they will, in sin, that is, in unbelief (v. 24). Their unbelief is tantamount to their ignorance of Jesus' true origin, which is here contrasted with their own (v. 23). The contrast of above and below is characteristic of the dualism of John. Jesus' opponents do not know he speaks for God (v. 27). Jesus, however, points ahead to the possibility of their knowing his true identity when they have crucified him ("lifted up," v. 28), reiterating his own submission to the Father. Surprisingly, this series of exchanges seems to have a happy outcome, as many believe in him; but their belief will prove to be ephemeral.

8:31-38, The Jews Who Have Believed.

There follows a discussion with Jews who have believed in him (v. 31) that quickly becomes acrimonious, as these believers fall into sharp dispute with Jesus, who soon imputes to them the intention to kill him (v. 37). The dispute becomes intelligible as the expression of extreme tension between the Johannine community and a group of Jesus' followers who wish to incorporate him into their already existing (Jewish) perspective. They deny that Jesus can invest them with a truth and give them a freedom they did not already possess in Abraham (vv. 32-33). (Such Jewish Christians survived well into the second century and beyond.) The basic question is whether or not salvation (freedom) is already given in sonship to Abraham or is available only through Christ. A similar dispute is found in Galatians 2:11-21, there cast in terms of faith (in Christ) and works (of the law). The sharp divergence of views, expressed now in terms of the Johannine dualism, is summed up in John 8:38, and from this point onward the debate concerns fatherhood.

8:39-47, Abraham's Children. The Jews continue the discussion by claiming Abraham as their father, and Jesus rejects the claim on the basis of their intent to kill him (v. 40). The Jews do not actually say they mean to kill Jesus, but their actions reveal their intentions (7:44; 8:59), despite protestations (7:20), and Jesus knows what they will do (7:19; 8:40, 44). By now there is no longer any distinction between Jews who believe and those who do not; the latter have absorbed the former.

The Jews' assertion that, as children of Abraham, they were not born of fornication (v. 41) introduces a factor not otherwise mentioned in the narrative and may suggest they think Jesus was born of fornication and is therefore discredited. Jesus' response is an absolute denial that the God who is his Father is theirs also (vv. 42-44). In a sharp display of Johannine dualism (cf. 8:23), Jesus charges that not God but the devil is their father, hence their murderous intent and malicious falsehood. The devil is the "father of lies" and stands in sharpest contrast to Jesus, who speaks (and is) the truth (v. 45). The contrast is only underscored by their attempt to convict Jesus of sin (v. 46). Their rejection of the truth is grounded in their origin, their alienation from God (v. 47).

8:48-59, Jesus Accused of Demon Possession. Although readers are prepared for the accusation that Jesus is a Samaritan (v. 48; cf. chap. 4), nothing in the Gospel suggests that Jesus is demon-possessed, a charge he flatly rejects (v. 49; but cf. Mark 3:22). In John, Jesus performs no exorcisms, perhaps because the Evangelist wants to remove this cause of suspicion. In response to the new accusations, Jesus only reiterates his close relationship to God and his promise of life (John 8:49-51). The Jews now manifest the extreme dualism underlying this debate by repeating their charge. Their question to Jesus (v. 53) is so formulated in Greek as to anticipate a negative answer; Jesus cannot be greater than Abraham. Jesus responds in turn and in kind: his claims are grounded in God's will; his opponents have no claim upon God (vv. 54-55). But while Jesus seemingly sets himself in opposition to his Jewish contemporaries he nevertheless claims the approval of Abraham, the father of the Jewish people and of their tradition (v. 56). Either Abraham was granted a vision of the future, or he was conceived of as being alive with God all along. The heated dispute ends typically, with a misunderstanding on the part of the Jews (v. 57), an enigmatic "I am" saying of Jesus (v. 58), and a very brief narration in which the Jews demonstrate the correctness of Jesus' imputation to them of a lethal intent (v. 59).

9:1-41

The Man Born Blind

Chap. 9 is a self-contained unit, a complete episode. Typically, a miracle or sign performed by Jesus leads to a discussion and debate, which in this case reveals a good deal about the setting and purpose of the Gospel.

9:1-7, The Miracle. The initial scene (vv. 1-7) describes the miracle of Jesus' giving sight to the man blind from birth. The miracle itself is described with economy of style (vv. 1, 6-7). As much space (vv. 2-5) is devoted to the disciples' questioning the cause of the man's blindness (cf. v. 34; Luke 13:2-5), which provides the setting for God's work (cf. John 11:4). One does not wait for the Sabbath to pass to do it (9:4, 14). In view of Jesus' promise of his continued presence with the disciples after his death (chaps. 14-16), vv. 4-5 can hardly mean that the period of his saving or healing power is limited by his historical presence (cf. 14:12). In any event, Jesus indicates his intention to act without delay. His action and command (9:6-7) recall Elisha's cleansing of the leper Naaman (2 Kings 5:10; cf. also Mark 8:23). The pool of Siloam is at the foot of the hill of the old City of David, south of the Temple area. Its name, translated "sent" (RSV, 9:7), seemingly has symbolic significance (Jesus was sent from God), but that is not spelled out further.

9:8-12, The Initial Inquiry. The interchange between the man and his neighbors establishes that he is actually the one who was a blind beggar and how Jesus opened his eyes. Significantly, the once blind man knows the identity, but not the whereabouts, of Jesus (cf. 5:13).

9:13-17, A Hearing Before the Pharisees. When the man is brought before the Pharisees, the reality of the restoration of his sight is assumed (v. 13); their questioning concerns the manner of the healing and its legitimacy. Probably Jesus' making clay is regarded by some of the Pharisees as work and hence a violation of the Sabbath (v. 14). Therefore some think the miracle is illegitimate; others, impressed by his signs, do not accept this negative judgment (v. 16). The response of the blind man (v. 17) that Jesus is a prophet is entirely appropriate, since he can perform signs. The Sabbath healing is no disqualification.

9:18-23, The Parents Questioned. The Jews, not to be distinguished from the Pharisees, to make sure of the healed blind man's identity and previous condition now question the man's parents (vv. 18-19). Their response is minimally truthful but obviously evasive (vv. 20-21); they refer questions to their son.

The situation here envisioned, in which people fear disciplinary expulsion from the synagogue because of adherence to Jesus (vv. 22-23), is not unparalleled in this Gospel (12:42; 16:2; cf. Luke 6:22). Because such a situation scarcely existed in Jesus' time, efforts have been made to locate its genuine historical setting. If in the period following the Roman war (i.e., after A.D. 70) Judaism sought to retrench, excluding Christ-confessors (i.e., Christians), his parents' reaction reflects that setting. John then encourages those who believe in Jesus to confess, even at the risk of expulsion from the synagogue (John 12:42). Significantly, in the narrative, not Jesus, but his followers are threatened with such expulsion.

9:24-34, The Second Hearing. The once blind man is called in for a second, quasi-legal hearing before Jesus' accusers. It is characteristic of this man that he engages in no speculation but speaks only of his own experience (v. 25). When his adversaries begin to ask questions already addressed (v. 26; cf. v. 15), he becomes acerbic (v. 27). His obviously sarcastic question and their response (vv. 28-29) establish a stark dichotomy between Jesus' disciples and Moses', again a situation that did not arise in Jesus' day. The opponents' ignorance of Jesus' origin is typically ironic. They think it discredits Jesus; actually, they discredit themselves (v. 29). The man's rejoinder is initially biting and even humorous (v. 30). But when he utters a solemn statement in which he expresses his own (and the author's) assessment of what has transpired and who Jesus is (vv. 31-33), utter anger and rejection is then unleashed upon him (v. 34). Arrogance shines through the contemptuous question, and they cast him out of the synagogue (cf. vv. 22-23).

9:35-41, True Sight and Blindness. Now the man's knowledge of Jesus passes beyond his immediate experience of Jesus' power to an understanding of who Jesus is. He believes in Jesus the Son of man (v. 35) and worships him (v. 38); he becomes a disciple of Jesus. Jesus' statement (v. 39) has both the man and his opponents in view. The sight and blindness of which Jesus speaks are not just physical conditions. Although Jesus has restored physical sight, he obviously does not intend to blind people physically. The Pharisees' question (v. 40) also indicates the symbolic character of blindness. By claiming a sight they do not possess, they confirm their sinful status (v. 41). Their claim to sight ("we see") is implicit in their presumption in judging Jesus.

10:1-42

Jesus, the Good Shepherd

This chapter centers around the shepherd discourse (10:1-18), and the theme of shepherd and sheep continues through v. 30. Thereafter, the hostility of the Jews, who first attempt to stone Jesus (v. 31) and then to arrest him (v. 38), intensifies. The beginning has no transition or setting of the scene, but the connection with the preceding episode is also tenuous. Jesus abruptly introduces a new theme or a new set of images. The "thieves and robbers" (vv. 1, 8) may be the Pharisees of chap. 9, but the identification is not explicit.

10:1-6, The Shepherd and the Door. The "figure" (v. 6, Gk. paroimia) of the true shepherd contrasts him with the thief, robber, and stranger who enter the sheepfold illegitimately. The point of the passage seems clear enough, but if taken as an allegory, it is not obvious who is represented by the various figures or elements. Because Jesus later refers to himself as the good shepherd (v. 11), one identifies him also with the shepherd of v. 2. But that shepherd enters by the door, and Jesus says he is the door (v. 7). The imagery of 10:1-6 is related to the imagery of 10:7-18, but when the sections are combined, no clear picture emerges. Either the shepherd of v. 2 is not Jesus but a disciple of Jesus who leads his followers (i.e., a church), or we are dealing with two figures of speech (shepherd, door), both of which symbolize Jesus but which are not to be combined. In the former case there is a jarring effect because Jesus is the good shepherd in vv. 11 and 14.

10:7-18, Jesus as Door and Shepherd.

Probably, different images are used by Jesus to describe his role: he is both door and shepherd. As door, he is the way to salvation (v. 9). Thieves and robbers now appear again (vv. 8, 10; cf. v. 1). Their identity has long mystified interpreters. The preceding chapter (esp. 9:40) suggests they are Pharisees, but this is not stated, and Pharisees otherwise do not appear. But if the imagery refers to persons known to the followers of Jesus, particularly in the community for whom John writes, the Pharisees or Jewish leaders are prime candidates. The identities of the wolf and hireling (10:12) remain as mysterious as that of the thief. The hireling's selfish motivation (v. 13) contrasts him with Jesus, whose devotion to his "sheep" (followers; vv. 14-15) is matched only by his knowledge of the Father.

Jesus' purpose, giving life, is contrasted with that of the thief (v. 10); it is fulfilled only in the laying down of his own (vv. 11-18). The wolf symbolizes the death that overtakes Jesus and threatens his sheep. The thief or hireling evades it by abandoning the sheep, but Jesus is faithful. The passage is, in effect, a meditation on Jesus' death and resurrection. His death is something he wills, not something imposed upon him (v. 18). Jesus even attributes to himself the power of his own resurrection, although its source is finally God (v. 18b). The "other sheep" (v. 16) have a referent that would have been known to the original readers; probably they symbolize gentile believers. The one shepherd and the one flock emphasize the unity of the Christian community under its Lord (cf. 17:20, 23).

Although the specific referents of this imagery may be obscure, the basic message is not. The loyalty of Jesus to his followers is underscored by his willingness to sacrifice himself for them (cf. 15:12-13), which sets him apart from other would-be shepherds or messiahs; his true disciples recognize and appreciate who he is.

10:19-21, Reactions to Jesus. The Jews' reaction to Jesus is still not uniformly hostile. While some echo the sentiments of his opponents, others draw the proper conclusions (v. 21).

10:22-30, At the Feast of Dedication. The Feast of Dedication (Hanukkah) falls in December (vv. 22-23). Solomon's portico faced east, toward Gethsemane. Despite the division of opinion (vv. 19-21), the Jews will now appear in sharp opposition to Jesus. In effect, Jesus' own brusque response (vv. 25-30) seems to put them there, for their demand (v. 24) is not hostile. His response takes up the earlier pastoral imagery and unequivocally sets the Jews apart from his followers ("sheep"). Thus the Jews are cast in the role of unbelievers, aliens to the flock (vv. 26-27) which is secure in the unity of Jesus and his Father (vv. 28-30).

10:31-39, Hostility to Jesus. The Jews' reaction (cf. 5:18), Jesus' response (10:32), and the Jews' rejoinder (v. 33) are now entirely predictable. From the standpoint of Jesus and his disciples (the Christian church), his words and deeds are given him as a commission by God. He is one with the Father. From the side of the Jews, his claim is the supreme blasphemy, the arrogation of divine prerogatives to himself (v. 33). Jesus' response takes a new turn in that he now argues on the basis of Scripture, a common court of appeal (vv. 34-38), quoting Ps. 82:6 as "your law" and taking it to be addressed to the people of Israel (John 10:35). If the people may be called gods, it cannot be blasphemy for the one whom the Father has consecrated and sent into the world to be called "Son of God." Jesus then appeals to his works (vv. 37-38; cf. v. 25) as witnesses to him (cf. 5:36) and reasserts his unity with the Father (cf. 10:30). Again, the reaction of the Jews is predictable (v. 39).

10:40-42, Jesus' Withdrawal. This is the first of two withdrawals from public view that precede Jesus' Passion (cf. 11:54). The location of John's activity in Transjordan remains uncertain (cf. 1:28). The truth of John's witness is attested for the last time, while Jesus' own superiority is made clear (10:41). Even at this late point, people believe in Jesus (v. 42). As residents of the Transjordan they were not Judeans, perhaps not Jews.

11:1-44

The Raising of Lazarus

Chap. 11 contains two distinct, but related, incidents: the raising of Lazarus and the official Sanhedrin decision to put Jesus to death. The latter (vv. 47-53) derives from the former (vv. 45-46); because Jesus gives life, his opponents seek to deprive him of his own.

The first episode (11:1-44) is the climactic event of the public ministry of Jesus. Other Gospels narrate episodes in which Jesus restores a person to life (cf. Mark 5:35-43; Luke 7:11-17), but this story has no parallel. (A recently discovered "secret" Gospel of Mark tells a similar story in much briefer form, without naming Lazarus. It is possibly a more primitive form of John's account.)

11:1-16, The Decision to Go to Lazarus.

The participants and place are identified in a curious way (vv. 1-2). Bethany is said to be the village of Mary and Martha, who have not been mentioned previously (but cf. Luke 10:38, where they are named but not their village). Mary is identified by an incident that has not yet occurred (John 12:1-8; but cf. Luke 7:37-38). The sisters' summoning Jesus (John 11:3) sets in motion a series of questions and Jesus' explanation (vv. 3-16), culminating in a journey to Bethany. Jesus makes clear the purpose of Lazarus' illness and death (vv. 4, 14-15; cf. 9:3), but he does not immediately go to Lazarus (11:6), and his delay seemingly leads to Lazarus' death (cf. vv. 21, 32). Yet Jesus is resolved to go to Judea (v. 7), despite the hostility encountered there (vv. 8, 16; cf. 10:31, 39). In response to his disciples' dismay (11:8), Jesus utters enigmatic sayings (vv. 9-10) that seem to imply that he must now act promptly (cf. 9:4-5), and he decides to go to Lazarus (11:11). That the disciples should misunderstand and require further explanation (vv. 12-15) is no surprise to readers of this Gospel. Thomas' dogged commitment and courage (v. 16) finally proves to be empty (16:32). During Jesus' ministry his disciples' belief is provisional and incomplete.

11:17-37, Conversations with the Sisters. As Jesus approaches Bethany (just to the east of Jerusalem), first Martha (vv. 20-27), then Mary (vv. 28-37), approach him in the way. Jesus' discovery that Lazarus has been dead four days (v. 17) anticipates his actual arrival at the tomb (v. 38). Jesus waited two days before starting (v. 6), and the journey apparently took a couple of days. Throughout, movement waits upon the dialogue. The Jews (v. 19) in this episode form a kind of choral background and, although they lack understanding, are not initially hostile to Jesus. The Greek Ioudaioi, "Jews," can be translated "Judeans," which seems appropriate here. The proximity of Jerusalem perhaps implies that the Jews are understood to be residents of the city.

Martha's statement on meeting Jesus (vv. 21-22) elicits a rejoinder (v. 23) that she misunderstands (v. 24). Jesus' word (vv. 25-26) represents a radical correction of Martha's expectation, which conforms to Jewish and much early Christian belief. Jesus, on the other hand, equates the resurrection with the life that he offers as a present reality. This is the characteristic Johannine teaching. Martha's response (v. 27) is positive but does not indicate she understands the change in eschatology Jesus has proposed.

The next scene (vv. 28-37) is virtually a doublet of the preceding, except that Mary is accompanied by the Jews (v. 31). Mary repeats Martha's opening statement (v. 32; cf. v. 21), but here the parallel breaks off. Jesus appears deeply affected by his love for Lazarus (vv. 33-36). The scene ends as the Jews, like Martha and Mary, lament what might have been (v. 37). That they affirm Jesus' restoration of sight to the blind man and his life-giving power implies they are not enemies.

11:38-44, Lazarus Raised. When Jesus arrives at the tomb (v. 38), his conversation with Martha (vv. 39-40) confirms that Lazarus is dead and points forward to the life-restoring deed. Jesus' statement about her believing (v. 40) picks up the thread of their previous conversation (vv. 25-27), although he has not actually made the statement he attributes to himself. The raising of Lazarus will be the revelation of God's presence in Jesus and thus of his glory (cf. v. 4). The theme of the revelation of God can be stated in terms of Jesus' or God's glory (1:14). Jesus' glory or glorification is intimately associated with his death, the supreme moment of revelation (7:39; 12:23; 17:1-5). That Jesus' praying (11:41-42) is not of necessity but for others is a distinctively Johannine motif (cf. 12:30; cf. Mark 14:32-39). When Lazarus at length comes out of the tomb at Jesus' command (John 11:43), the graveclothes underscore the fact that he had died and Jesus' command to the bystanders (v.

44) that he has been made alive. Jesus' restoration of Lazarus to life is the ultimate revelation of his mission and purpose during the public ministry (cf. 5:28-29); he is the resurrection and the life.

11:45-54

The Condemnation of Jesus

Once again there is a division among the Jews (cf. 7:12-13, 43; 10:19); those who disbelieve act as informers against Jesus (11:46). The gathering of the council (Sanhedrin) against Jesus (vv. 47-53; cf. Mark 14:1-2) occurs only at this stage in John, whereas Matthew (26:59-68) and Mark (14:55-65) place it after his arrest, and it consists of a full-scale trial of Jesus. John's presentation of the dynamics of the situation may not be misleading in that Jesus was perceived by the Temple authorities as a threat to stability and therefore to their own status and privilege with the Romans (11:48). The high priest Caiaphas's (cf. Matt. 26:3) practical, self-interested advice (John 11:49-50) is at the same time a prophetic utterance of which he has no notion, foretelling the saving work of Jesus' universal mission (vv. 51-52; cf. 10:16; 17:20). The council heeds Caiaphas's advice (v. 53) and sets in motion the chain of events that will dispose of Jesus.

Jesus' withdrawal (v. 54; cf. 10:40-42) was probably for the purpose of awaiting the arrival of his hour (12:23).

11:55-12:50

Jesus' Final Jerusalem Visit and the End of His Public Ministry

11:55-57, The Expectations. The advent of the third Passover of the Gospel of John (2:13; 6:4) sets the stage for what follows, as the heightened expectancy and perplexity of the Passover pilgrims (11:56) and the hostility of Jewish officialdom (v. 57) are vividly portrayed. Only in John's Gospel are the crowds put on notice to turn Jesus in (cf. Mark 14:1-2 and parallels). From this point onward, however, there are remarkable similarities and parallels to the synoptic accounts.

12:1-8, The Anointing of Jesus. Both Matthew (26:6-13) and Mark (14:3-9) tell of a woman's anointing Jesus' head in the house of Simon the leper in Bethany within two days of Passover and after Jesus has already once entered Jerusalem. Luke (7:36-50) recounts a woman's anointing of Jesus' feet earlier in the ministry; Jesus pronounces her sins forgiven. John's placing of the incident makes the best narrative sense, for he has it occur as Jesus passes through Bethany on the way to Jerusalem at the home of Martha, Mary, and Lazarus (cf. 11:1-44). That Martha serves corresponds with Luke's characterization of her in 10:40. The words used to describe the ointment as well as its value (three hundred denarii) are virtually the same in John as in Matthew and Mark, as is Jesus' word about the poor (John 12:8). Strangely, however, John's statement about the purpose of the anointing is less clear than in the other Gospels, and there is no beautiful rounding off of the story in which Jesus says the deed will commemorate the woman (Mark 14:9). In every case (except Luke), the story portrays Jesus as being anointed for burial (John 12:7) and clearly prefigures his death.

12:9-11, The Plot Against Lazarus. The gathering of Jews around Jesus and Lazarus in Bethany gives the authorities cause to plot against Lazarus as well as Jesus. This brief scene underscores the role played by the raising of Lazarus in the authorities' decision to put Jesus to death. Possibly Lazarus here represents early Christian disciples who also came under threat because they attracted people to Jesus (16:2).

12:12-19, The Entry into Jerusalem. Like the other Gospels, John envisions a crowd coming into the city with Jesus (cf. v. 17), but there is also a crowd going out to meet him (v. 13). John's account is similar to the Synoptics, particularly in the crowd's greeting (Ps. 118:25-26; cf. Matt. 21:5 on the use of Zech. 9:9). Distinctively Johannine are the disciples' not understanding until after Jesus' glorification (John 12:16; cf. 2:17, 22), the witnessing of the crowd who had seen Lazarus raised from the dead (12:17), and the crowd's coming out to meet Jesus because of that spectacular sign (v. 18). The despair of the Pharisees (v. 19; cf. Luke 19:39) sums it up. In John's Gospel, Jesus will not leave the city again (cf. Mark 11:11). The Temple cleansing, which comes next in the Synoptics, occurred much earlier in John (2:13-22). The remainder of the chapter is distinctly Johannine, containing only a few echoes of synoptic sayings or events.

12:20-26, The Arrival of the Hour. The Greeks who approach Jesus through Philip are possibly Greek-speaking Jews. Their appearance signals the approach of Jesus' hour of glorification, i.e., his death (v. 23) and suggests the universal Christian mission that began only then. Thus this scene is, in an important sense, pivotal. The sayings of Jesus that follow (vv. 24-26) are traditional; they are found in somewhat different form in other NT writings (1 Cor. 15:36; Mark 8:34-35).

12:27-36a, The End of the Public Ministry. Jesus momentarily contemplates God's sparing him his coming death (v. 27), evoking the entire Gethsemane scene of the synoptic Gospels (Mark 14:32-42 and parallels), otherwise not mentioned in John (but cf. Heb. 5:7). But Jesus suppresses any uncertainty: God's name will be glorified in his death (John 12:28). Although Jesus says the voice from heaven came for the crowd's benefit (v. 30), they do not understand it (v. 29). Jesus continues speaking nevertheless (vv. 31-32), and we learn (v. 33) that he has alluded to his imminent death. Jesus' announcement of his death expresses in Johannine terms its function as saving event. It is at once judgment (v. 31) and the possibility of salvation (v. 32) for all.

The crowd apparently calls Jesus "Son of man" (v. 34), although he has not used that title in the immediately preceding statement to which they refer (v. 32; but cf. v. 23). Their next question, "Who is this Son of man?" can scarcely concern his identity, since they have just used the term where Jesus used "I." (The narrator knows that "Son of man" on Jesus' lips is a form of self-reference.) The question may be about his role. They cannot credit the statement about his being lifted up (which they seem to know means crucifixion!), because the law says the Christ will abide forever. The force of their statement and questions implies that Jesus' unusual fate is tied to his use of this perplexing title, and they understand neither. Jesus cuts off further discussion with an urgent challenge to the crowd (vv. 35-36), his enigmatic statements evoking what he has previously said in 9:4 and 11:9-10. Probably Jesus refers here to the urgency of any confrontation with him, whether during his historic ministry or afterward as the gospel (good news) about him is proclaimed.

12:36b-43, Explanations of Jesus' Rejection. Jesus now withdraws. What follows is an explanation and summation of his work. Disbelief has characterized the Jewish reaction to Jesus (v. 37), and two quotations, from Isaiah 53:1 (v. 38) and 6:10 (v. 40), explain it. Both appear in other NT writings with a similar purpose (cf. Rom. 10:16; Matt. 13:14-15). John lays another explanation alongside this one, without any apparent awareness of tension. The believing authorities among the Jews who refuse to confess Jesus (John 12:42) have their priorities inverted (v. 43). Their fear of expulsion from the synagogue betrays their too high regard for human opinion.

John believed Isaiah had seen Jesus' glory; v. 41 alludes to Isaiah 6:1-3 (where John understands "Lord" to refer to Jesus), and the same narrative episode of Isaiah contains John's second quotation (12:40; Isa. 6:10). But Isaiah was not the only OT worthy to have seen Jesus Christ; the same is said of Abraham (John 8:56, 58).

12:44-50, Jesus' Summation. Jesus' public ministry ends with his final proclamation, which sums up the Johannine understanding of the Christian message. The repeated emphasis upon Jesus' complete submission and transparency to God himself is characteristic (vv. 44, 49-50), as is the claim that to believe in Jesus is to believe in God (v. 44). Jesus is light in darkness (v. 46) and eternal life to all who believe in him. He judges no one (v. 48; cf. 3:17; 8:15), yet his coming effects judgment for those who do not believe in him and therefore refuse God. What Jesus says here is not directed to his contemporaries so much as to the church and to the mission field that the Gospel has in view.

13:1-21:25

Jesus' Manifestation of God's Glory to His Disciples

With chap. 13, the second major part of the Gospel begins as Jesus is at first alone with his disciples (chaps. 13-17). When he again emerges into public view he is arrested, tried, and crucified (chaps. 18-19). But at the end, the risen Jesus is once again alone with his disciples (chaps. 20-21). Through most of this final half of the Gospel of John he directs his attention to them.

The Last Supper

John's account of the Last Supper (cf. Mark 14:17-25 and parallels) has no story of the preparation for the Passover meal (Mark 14:12-16 and parallels), for the last meal in the Johannine version is not the Feast of Unleavened Bread but a supper given on the preceding evening (13:1).

13:1-11, Washing the Disciples' Feet. The beginning of the meal is integrally related to Jesus' washing of the disciples' feet, an act of humble service that reverses ordinary practice and expectations. The reversal is significant, however, for Jesus' act has a symbolic meaning, portending his death. It is reported in no other Gospel and, because John omits Jesus' institution of the Lord's Supper, appears to take its place (→ Lord's Supper, The).

The introduction (vv. 1-4) moves from a statement about Jesus' full knowledge of his origin and destiny and his love for his disciples (vv. 1, 3) to a description of his preparation for a seemingly menial task (v. 4). The act itself is described with utmost economy. The confrontation with Peter (vv. 6-10) conveys its significance and meaning. In effect, Peter expresses a classical Johannine misunder-

ing as he refuses to allow his master to cast himself in such a humble role (vv. 6, 8). Jesus' rejoinder reveals the basis for all misunderstandings in this Gospel and points to their resolution (v. 7). The "afterward" to which he refers is not after dinner but after his glorification. Like others, the disciples cannot, during Jesus' earthly ministry, understand him. When Peter is obdurate, Jesus' threatening response (v. 8) brings him to the point of genuine understanding (v. 9), but his reaction, typically excessive, shows he still fails to comprehend. Jesus' washing of his disciples' feet means more than Peter can know. If one does not accept that service he cannot belong to Jesus (v. 8).

In view of the allusions to Jesus' approaching death at the outset of this account (vv. 1-3), it now becomes clear that the washing of the disciples' feet signifies Jesus' death on their behalf (cf. 10:11, 15; 18:12-14). This interpretation is confirmed by 13:10, particularly if the phrase "except for his feet" is omitted, as in some very ancient manuscripts. When this shorter reading is followed, the bathing of which Jesus speaks (cf. RSV) is the washing of their feet (i.e., his saving death) and no further washing, such as Peter has proposed, is necessary. Otherwise, the foot washing becomes a matter secondary to the basic purification of bathing, which is not what is intended. The scene concludes with a by now familiar explanation of Jesus' foreknowledge of his betrayal (v. 11). Many interpreters believe that John deliberately replaced the Lord's Supper with his distinctive portrayal of Jesus' washing the disciples' feet, for the words of institution interpret Jesus' death, just as the foot washing does.

13:12-20, An Interpretation of the Washing. After the foot washing, Jesus gives yet another interpretation of it (vv. 12-17). The reversal of roles that Jesus has just demonstrated should be reflected in how the disciples treat each other. The two interpretations are intimately related in John's thought: Jesus' death is an expression of his limitless, self-giving love, and he calls upon his disciples to share that same love among themselves (15:12-13; 13:34-35). Finally, Jesus once more takes account of Judas (v. 18), explains why he does so (v. 19), and makes a general statement about the relation of the apostles (ones sent), God, and himself (v. 20) that is based on a tradition known also to Matthew (10:40) and Luke (10:16).

13:21-30, Identifying the Betrayer. In John, this scene is longer and more elaborate than in any of the Synoptics. In Mark (14:17-21) and Luke (22:21-23), Judas is not explicitly named: in Matthew (26:24-25) he more or less gives himself away; but in John Judas is unmistakably identified, at least to the Beloved Disciple and to readers. In all except Luke, Jesus' opening statement (John 13:21b) is almost identical. In John, the disciples look at each other uncertainly (v. 22); as in Luke (22:23), they begin to question one another. Then begins the interplay between the Beloved Disciple, Peter, Jesus, and Judas, ending with Jesus' identifying Judas by handing him the morsel (John 13:26)—whereupon Satan enters him (v. 27)—and, in effect, sending him into the night (vv. 27, 30). John confirms, as Judas receives the morsel and departs (v. 30), that Jesus knew from the beginning that he would betray him (cf. 6:70-71).

This scene marks the first appearance of the Beloved Disciple in the Gospel (19:26-27; 20:2; 21:7, 20). He appears only in John and his identity is never revealed, although tradition since the end of the second century has identified him with John the son of Zebedee. His position nearest Jesus indicates the favor in which he was held and presumably his central role in the Johannine circle. Only the Beloved Disciple seems to be told that Judas was to betray Jesus (13:28-29; cf. 12:6). In Mark, none of the disciples would have learned the identity of the betrayer, as Luke's description of their quandary (22:23) clearly indicates.

13:31-35, The New Commandment. Following the prediction of his betrayal, Jesus speaks of his glorification, that is, his death (vv. 31-33). Through his death Jesus attains the resurrection, and God's glory can finally be seen in light of both. Everything is now said from the standpoint of the cross and resurrection; the glorified Christ speaks. The meaning of the enigmatic saying of v. 33 is from that vantage point now clear: Jesus is going to his death (cf. 7:33). This saying prepares the way for others in which Jesus will reveal how after "a little while" the disciples will see him again (14:19-20; 16:16-24).

At the point of his departure, Jesus gives his disciples a new commandment (13:34). This love commandment finds close parallels elsewhere in the NT (1 Thess. 4:9; cf. Rom. 13:9; Gal. 5:14; Mark 12:31 and parallels), and with good reason it has been taken to be an apt summary of Jesus' teaching. But in contrast to the Synoptics and Paul, who quote the command to love the neighbor from Lev. 19:18, the Johannine Jesus commands his disciples to love one another, that is, other members of the inner circle, the church. This limitation agrees with John's emphasis on the unity of the church (17:21, 23) and with his dualism. One would expect love to be directed to the circle of true disciples and not to the world (→ Love).

13:36-38, Peter's Denial Predicted. All the Gospels relate Peter's denial of Jesus (18:15-18, 25-27) and Jesus' prediction of it. In the Synoptics, the prediction occurs just prior to his agony in Gethsemane and his arrest. In John, a long discussion and discourse (chaps. 14-17) intervene, but the next distinct event thereafter is Jesus' arrest (there being no Gethsemane story in John).

14:1-17:26

The Farewell Discourses and Prayer

Chaps. 14-16 are traditionally called the farewell discourses of Jesus; chap. 17 the high-priestly prayer. Chap. 14 seems to continue the table conversation of chap. 13, however, and there is no change of setting at chap. 17. There are, nevertheless, some lines of demarcation. Plainly, Jesus begins to pray in chap. 17, and the distinctiveness of chaps. 14-17 is obvious in relation to the synoptic accounts. The events of chap. 13 have synoptic analogies and parallels through the prediction of Peter's denial (13:36-38), and these resume with the account of Jesus' arrest (18:1-11). The farewell discourses are without parallel in the other Gospels. Yet they function like the apocalyptic discourses of the Synoptics (Mark 13 and parallels) in that they tell the disciples what they may expect in the future. The synoptic apocalypses have to do with the events leading up to Christ's triumphal appearance in apocalyptic glory, while John's discourses concern his postresurrection manifestations to his disciples (14:22).

14:1-11, Jesus' Assurance and the Disciples' Questions. Jesus reassures his disciples: to believe in God is to believe in him and vice versa (v. 1)—a major theme of the entire Gospel. Jesus' statement that he is going to the Father to prepare a place for his disciples continues his answer to Peter's questions (13:36-37). Peter has rightly taken Jesus to mean that he is going to his death, but his death is also the way to the Father. How Jesus' death provides an access to himself and to God becomes a major theme of the farewell discourses. So at the outset Jesus assures his disciples they will be safe in his hands.

Despite Jesus' assurance (14:4), Thomas candidly expresses his ignorance (v. 5). Obviously, Thomas refers to the way to God; he knows of Jesus' death (11:16). Jesus answers with a ringing affirmation of his own role as the one access to the life-giving truth of God (14:6). His statement about his disciples' knowledge in v. 7 (the "you" is plural in Gk.), reveals a significant time distinction. At first he seems to imply that their failure has cut them off from God (v. 7a), but then he indicates the future state of their knowledge (v. 7b). During Jesus' ministry there are things the disciples cannot know, though they witness what Jesus says and does; but after he has departed they will truly understand how he has made God accessible to them. They will not only know him but see him.

Philip's question (v. 8) allows Jesus to reiterate and expand upon what he has just said (cf. 12:44-50). Philip's not knowing represents the disciples' inevitable ignorance at this time. In declaring that to see him is to see the Father (14:9) Jesus signals an end to the situation described in 1:18, in which no one has seen the Father (cf. 6:46; 12:45).

14:12-14, Jesus' Promise. Jesus promises his disciples that they will be empowered as well as informed (v. 12) and their prayers in his name will be answered (vv. 13-14). The qualification "in my name" is important, for it suggests the kind of prayer that will be answered, namely, one that accords with Jesus' own nature and purpose. Repeatedly in this Gospel, Jesus promises to answer his disciples' prayers (v. 14; 15:7, 16; 16:23), but assurance of answered prayer is found elsewhere in the NT as well (Matt. 7:7-11; Mark 11:24; James 1:5).

14:15-24, The Coming Counselor. Jesus' promise of his presence with his disciples is a gift, not something the disciples achieve, but it can be forfeited. Jesus demands they demonstrate their love by keeping his commandments (v. 15), that is, they are to love one another (13:34-35; 15:12).

At the same time Jesus promises them help: a Counselor (RSV), the Spirit of truth, the Holy Spirit (v. 26). (In 20:22, the risen Jesus bestows the Spirit.) "Counselor" translates paraklētos (Gk., "one called to the side of"), which in other contexts has legal connotations ("advocate"; cf. 1 John 2:1, where the term is used of Jesus). But this common juridical sense does not appear to be adequate to its meaning here. Jesus himself defines paraklētos, however, by indicating his function (see 14:15-26; 15:26; 16:7-11, 13-15). First, the Counselor underscores the distinction (dualism) between the disciples and the world (14:17). The Spirit's presence is then tantamount to the presence of Jesus, although the equation is not made explicitly (v. 18). The mysterious reference (v. 19; cf. 13:33) to Jesus' resurrection will not be lost on knowledgeable readers; Jesus points ahead to the disciples' future state and knowledge (14:20). The promise of his presence will be fulfilled for the person who keeps his commandments and therefore loves him (v. 21; cf. v. 15; → Holy Spirit, The; Paraclete).

Judas (v. 22) is not the betrayer but presumably the Judas son of James mentioned by Luke as one of the Twelve (6:16; Acts 1:13). His question allows Jesus to clarify a discrepancy between what he has just promised and other early Christian expectations (cf. 1 Thess. 4:13-17; Mark 13 and parallels). The manifestation of which Jesus speaks is not an apocalyptic, public event, but a spiritual presence contingent upon the expression of love for Jesus through keeping his word (or commandment; cf. John 14:15). Conversely, there is a threatening word to any nominal follower who does not heed Jesus: he ignores God (v. 24).

14:25-31, Jesus' Promise Repeated. Jesus now seems on the verge of taking leave of his disciples (vv. 15, 27, 30-31), although the discourses continue. Commentators have conjectured that chaps. 15-17 were interpolated, breaking an originally smooth connection between 14:31 and 18:1. Jesus repeats his promise of the Spirit (cf. 14:16-17), elaborating on its functions (v. 26), which fulfill expectations raised in 2:22; 7:39; and 12:16. "All things" surely does not mean anything conceivable but those things pertinent to Jesus' work that are necessary for disciples to know. The Fourth Gospel may itself be the literary deposit of what the Spirit-Paraclete has taught the disciples about Jesus.

In departing, Jesus bestows upon his disciples a blessing (cf. 16:33; 20:19), invoking the characteristic dualism to distinguish his peace from the world's, and again reassuring them (14:27). Jesus reiterates what he has said already (v. 28) and declares his own subordination to the Father. Once more he invokes the distinction between the time of his ministry, when he is speaking, and the time after his death when they may understand and believe (v. 29; cf. 13:19). Jesus then clearly signals the end of this conversation (14:30). The ruler of this world (Satan) is embodied in the party sent out to arrest Jesus (18:3). They, of course, do not determine Jesus' fate (cf. 7:6; 10:17-18); he does only what God commands him (14:31). Because Jesus' own command to depart is ignored until 18:1, chaps. 15-17 are often regarded as a later addition to the text.

15:1-17, The Allegory of the Vine. There now begins a long discourse of Jesus that continues uninterrupted until the disciples' question of 16:17. The fundamental point of the first part, the vine discourse, is the necessity and nature of the disciples' unity with Jesus.

15:1-8, The Vine and Branches. The metaphor of vine and branches represents the unity of Jesus and the disciples. The unity is a given, but it does not exist apart from the disciples' own participation. Jesus is both the one who commands them to abide and bear fruit and the one who enables them to do so (vv. 5-7). Their bearing of fruit is proof that they are Jesus' disciples (v. 8). In 13:34-35 Jesus has linked discipleship with mutual love; he reiterates this connection here (15:9-10, 12-14). The abiding and bearing fruit of which Jesus speaks is the mutuality of love among the disciples. The awful consequence of not abiding in Jesus' love by expressing love for one's fellow disciple is made clear by the imagery of casting out (as distinguished from pruning) and burning (vv. 2, 6; → Vine).

The distinctive meaning of two Greek words is important. "Pruning" (Gk. kathairein) can also mean "cleansing"; thus fruit-bearing members of the Johannine community are cleansed so they may bear more fruit (v. 2; cf. 13:10-11). The word used of the Father's function in 15:1, geōrgos (Gk.), is the ordinary term for farmer; the RSV's "vinedresser" appropriately narrows the application to the vineyard but perhaps does not do justice to the fact that the geōrgos would be the one responsible for the vine's existence in the first place.

15:9-17, Love as Bearing Fruit. The exposition of the vine image then makes its hortatory purpose clear (v. 12). The love of which Jesus speaks has its source in God, the Father, whose love for Jesus, the Son, finds further expression in Jesus' love for his disciples (v. 9). That love ultimately takes the form of Jesus' sacrifice of his own life (15:13; 10:11, 15). This sacrifice is the paradigm and example of the love the disciples are to manifest for one another (15:12). Thus the disciples become Jesus' friends as they obey his command (v. 14) and share his love among themselves. Inasmuch as the death of Jesus is understood as his self-giving act and as such becomes a model for the disciples' love, Jesus is himself understood in distinctly human terms. Precisely the consciousness of the humanity of Jesus, and his death as loss, gives the love command its moral force and exemplary power.

Friendship with Jesus (v. 14) is the condition of receiving his revelation of God (v. 15). That the initiative and priority lies with Jesus is clear enough (v. 16); Jesus has chosen and appointed his disciples with a purpose. Their bearing fruit (v. 16) is the fulfillment of his love commandment (v. 17). It assures them of their unity with him, and thus with God, and means that their prayers will be answered (v. 16).

15:18-16:4a, The World's Hatred. The solidarity of Jesus and his disciples is now stated in a negative vein; it distinguishes them from the world, which will bear them hate.

15:18-27, The Basis of Hatred. The world's hatred of the community of Jesus' followers is grounded in its prior hatred of him (v. 18); that hatred will be manifest in both the crucifixion of Jesus and the persecution of his disciples. The Gospel of John arose in the context of persecution (v. 20). The Johannine dualism, doubtless a reflection of that context, makes the sharpest contrast between Jesus and his disciples and the world (v. 19). In v. 20, Jesus refers to his saying of 13:16 (cf. Matt. 10:24; Luke 6:40) to explain the persecution of the disciples. Although the disciples may encounter some who will believe (15:20; cf. 17:20), the hostility of the world is emphasized, not its receptivity.

The world's hostility reflects its ignorance of Jesus' origin and commission (15:21), but the world did not become positively sinful until it rejected Jesus, God's emissary (vv. 22, 24; cf. 9:39-41). Before his coming, the world existed in darkness and death, so that he can be described as its light and life (1:4-5, 9; 8:12; 11:25; 12:46). He is sent by God to effect salvation, life, not judgment (3:17; 12:47). Nevertheless, the inevitable consequence of rejection of him is judgment, for that rejection is tantamount to ignorance and rejection of God (15:21, 23-24). Thus John insists that genuine belief in God has now become contingent upon belief in Jesus. In v. 24b Jesus does not represent his opponents as having seen God (cf. 1:18) except as they have had the possibility of seeing God in him (14:9) but have rejected it. This rejection, uncanny as it is, is nevertheless the fulfillment of Scripture (15:25; Ps. 35:19; cf. Mark 4:11-12, Acts 28:26-27; Rom. 11:7-10).

Over against the sharpness of the world's rejection will stand the heavenly witness of the Counselor (paraklētos), the Spirit of truth (John 15:27), which Jesus will send to his disciples (i.e., the church) from the Father after his departure from the disciples and his return to God (cf. 16:7). This spiritual witness will be complemented by that of the disciples, significantly described as having been with Jesus from the beginning (cf. 1 John 1:1; Acts 1:21-22). The disciples' historical witness as those who have been with Jesus from the beginning prevents revelation as a present, Spirit-inspired phenomenon from going unchecked.

16:1-4a, The Manifestations of Hatred. Jesus explains his purpose in speaking of the world's hostility (v. 1) and then describes specific threats the community of disciples must endure (v. 2), reiterating their theological basis (v. 3). The concluding statement (v. 4; cf. v. 1) expands upon the reason for Jesus' prophecies: to prepare the disciples for persecution.

There are other references to being put out of the synagogue (9:22; 12:42); here as elsewhere they seem to reflect the actual experiences, as well as the fears, of the Johannine community. Whether death threats against Christians had actually been carried out is uncertain. We read elsewhere in the NT of severe persecution (Gal. 1:13, 23; Acts 9:1-2; 1 Thess. 2:14-15), which at least in the case of Stephen (Acts 7:54-60) led to martyrdom. Doubtless Jesus' death was seen by his early followers as an intimation of what they might expect, and the rise of opposition doubtless enhanced this apprehension.

16:4b-33, Jesus' Departing Words. Jesus continues to direct his disciples' attention to the future and now deals primarily with his departure and coming again to be with them. His departure is put in a new light as the necessary condition of his continued presence among them. That his presence will not be diminished, but enhanced, is a major emphasis of the Gospel.

16:4b-15, The Final Promise of the Counselor. John's now familiar time distinction (between Jesus' earthly ministry and the postresurrection period) appears in v. 4b, where it affords a transition to Jesus' subsequent discourse. What Jesus says in v. 5 does not square with Peter's explicit question about his destination in 13:36. But Jesus seems simply to underscore the disciples' despondency to introduce the discussion that follows. The statements that have caused sorrow to fill their hearts (16:6) could be his predictions of persecution (15:18-16:4). But 16:7 suggests rather that Jesus refers also to his several previous allusions to his departure, for now he tells the disciples that because of the coming of the paraklētos (RSV: Counselor) it is to their advantage that he go away.

Only here (vv. 8-11) does Jesus speak of the paraklētos in its relation to the world rather than to the disciples. Thus the paraklētos, who was Counselor or Advocate for the disciples, becomes prosecuting attorney against the world. One can surmise that the Spirit will act directly to assure the disciples that God convicts and judges the world, although the world at first may not know it.

Among the disciples, the Spirit will extend the revelation Jesus has brought. This revelation is of, or about, Jesus (v. 14); but it will go beyond what Jesus was able to say before his death (vv. 12-13). Moreover, Jesus himself hints that many of the things he says will not be comprehended until after his departure (13:7). The additional revelation is from Jesus and is grounded in his ministry, but the Spirit unfolds what it means after his departure as it declares the things that are coming (v. 13), i.e., those things that have to do with the death, departure, and return of Jesus and the life of the church.

16:16-24, The Coming Joy. Jesus repeats a mysterious saying (v. 16; cf. 7:33; 13:33; 14:19), and some of his disciples puzzle over its meaning (16:17-18). Characteristically, he knows what puzzles them (v. 19) and proceeds to unravel his own saying (vv. 19-24). Still speaking enigmatically (v. 20), he employs an analogy from common human experience (v. 21) but then makes clear he means his own departure and return

(vv. 22-23) to the postresurrection church (vv. 23-24; cf. 14:13-14). The theme of joy recurs in this discourse (16:20, 21, 22, 24); joy will characterize the disciples' life after they are united with the risen Jesus.

16:25-33, Jesus' Speech and the Disciples' Understanding. Jesus continues to speak of the postresurrection period as a time when he will speak plainly to the disciples and they will pray to the Father in his name, reiterating the themes of the reciprocity of love and of belief in his origin with God (vv. 27-28). "In figures" (vv. 25, 29) applies to how Jesus' words appear to the disciples before his glorification and the advent of the Spirit. To knowledgeable readers, Jesus already speaks plainly. The disciples seemingly understand Jesus' speech (vv. 29-30), thinking that his promise to speak plainly and not in figures (v. 25) is fulfilled. Their confession that he came from God picks up on Jesus' immediately preceding statement (v. 28) and is theologically correct. But their comprehension and implied self-satisfaction are abruptly challenged and shattered by Jesus (v. 31), who alludes to their imminent desertion of him at the moment of his trial and death (v. 32; cf. Mark 14:27; Zech. 13:7). Nevertheless, Jesus concludes his farewell discourses on an entirely positive note (John 16:33), as he points ahead to the peace that his words will provide the disciples (cf. 20:21, 26), warns them of their parlous existence in the world (cf. 15:18-19; 17:14-16), and encourages them with his triumph over the world, in which they participate if they abide in him.

17:1-26, Jesus' Prayer. Jesus' Great High-Priestly Prayer has no parallel in the other Gospels, except that in the synoptic Gospels he prays in anguish in Gethsemane; here he prays in utter serenity—but, in both cases, just before his arrest. The prayer falls into three parts, in which Jesus declares what he has accomplished (vv. 1-5), intercedes for his disciples (vv. 6-19), and broadens that intercession to include the later church (vv. 20-26).

17:1-5, Jesus' Glory. Jesus again announces the hour has come and speaks of glorification. Several days have passed since he first did so (cf. 12:23), but theologically it is still the hour of Jesus' glorification (crucifixion); God glorifies Jesus by revealing himself in his death, and Jesus glorifies God by revealing God on the cross (17:1). Glorification in John means revelation; both are defined by Jesus' death. The power Jesus has over all humanity (v. 2, "all flesh") is the power through his death to give life to all those people God has given and will give him. Such life, defined as knowledge, is a present possibility (v. 3). Knowing God and Jesus Christ are not stages of knowledge but the same knowledge. Jesus glorifies God in revealing him to humanity, in his ministry (v. 4), and in his death and exaltation (v. 5). But Jesus' glory is not his own achievement but a primeval possession (v. 24); Jesus manifests what he already has been given. In this opening statement, Jesus sums up his ministry, his revelatory work, in characteristically Johannine terms (→ Glory).

17:6-19, Jesus' Prayer for His Disciples. As Jesus now prays for the disciples, described as the Father's gift to him (v. 6), he strongly implies divine election. Yet the statement that true followers have kept God's word hints that their own volition is meaningful. Jesus now describes them in entirely positive terms (vv. 7-8), and this description stands in contrast to his description of these same disciples just previously (16:31-32). Jesus now views them too as they are after his resurrection, when their earlier limitations have been overcome.

The remainder of Jesus' prayer for the disciples (17:9-19) deals with the world and the disciples' role and place in it. That Jesus sharply distinguishes his disciples from the world (vv. 9, 14, 16) is a typical expression of the Johannine dualism. Yet they must continue to live there (vv. 11, 15). Jesus, who had kept them safe as long as he was in the world (vv. 11, 12), as he now departs prays God to keep them "in thy name" (v. 11). Despite the world's hatred (v. 14), Jesus refuses to pray that they be taken out of the world (v. 15; the evil one is presumably Satan) but sends them into the world as the Father had sent him (v. 18). Thus the disciples too have a mission to the world (cf. 20:21), which is still intended for salvation (→ World, The).

Jesus prays that while they are in the world the disciples may be made holy (RSV: "sanctified") in the truth (17:17). "Thy word is truth" has an important, double meaning. Any Christian or Jew would quickly agree. But in Johannine terms, the word is Jesus (1:1-18), who is also the truth (1:14, 17; 14:6), so a distinctly Johannine Christian confession is concealed in this statement. At the end of this petition, Jesus says that he makes himself holy that his disciples may be made holy in truth (v. 19; cf. v. 17; the RSV translates the same Gk. word "consecrate"). The holiness of the disciples, their consecration to God, is dependent upon Jesus' holiness, as their salvation depends upon their unity with Jesus and God (v. 11; → Holiness).

17:20-26, Jesus' Prayer for the Church. Finally, Jesus prays for future believers (v. 20; cf. 20:29), for their unity with himself, the Father, and each other. This unity will serve their mission to the world (17:18, 20-21). Belief that the Father has sent Jesus (v. 21) is Christian faith (v. 8). The transmission of the glory from God, to Jesus, to the church effects this unity (v. 22) and renders believers, the church, transparent to the revelation of God. Oneness, an expression of believers' love for one another (13:34), convinces the world of the truth of the Christian message (17:23) as it reflects God's love for Christ and his church. That love motivates and justifies the church's mission to the world (cf. 13:35).

In asking that all his disciples may ultimately be within the realm of his heavenly pre-existent glory (17:24; cf. 14:2-3; 1:14), Jesus once more invokes the typical dualism in sharply distinguishing the world's ignorance from his own and his disciples' knowledge of God (17:25). Of course, there is now no knowledge of God except through belief in Jesus. As he turns to the cross (v. 26), Jesus sums up his revelatory work past and future, appropriately describing its purpose and character in terms of the realization of the love of God through Christ among his disciples.

The Passion Narrative

From the account of Jesus' arrest (18:1-11) onward, the Fourth Gospel's narrative is closely parallel to the Synoptics. Already as Jesus approaches Jerusalem, John's account begins to resemble the others. Quite possibly, the earliest Christians put together narratives of Jesus' Passion, whether in written or oral form, that antedate all the Gospels and account for the similarities between John and the Synoptics as well as the differences.

18:1-11, Jesus' Arrest. Jesus ends his final discourses with a prayer (chap. 17) and apparently only at this point leaves the site of the Last Supper (18:1) with his disciples. The garden to which Jesus and the disciples retire is not named; it is apparently Gethsemane (Matt. 26:36; Mark 14:32) on the slope of the Mount of Olives (Luke 22:39), the scene of Jesus' arrest. John characteristically emphasizes the initiative and authority of Jesus (18:4, 6, 8; cf. 10:18), who is arrested virtually at his own bidding. Only in John is Judas said to be familiar with the customary meeting place (18:2). Perhaps he betrayed this knowledge to the authorities. Only here are the Pharisees involved in Jesus' arrest (v. 3); their involvement is typical of their hostile role in John. In the Synoptics, Judas identifies Jesus with a kiss, but in John Jesus identifies himself (vv. 4-5). Although armed resistance and the cutting off of the ear of the high priest's slave is mentioned in every Gospel, only in John (v. 10) are the swordsmen (Peter) and the victim (Malchus) identified by name (cf. 18:26). Jesus' authoritative command to let his disciples go free (v. 8) is interpreted as the fulfillment of his earlier word (6:39; 10:28), a culminating Johannine touch underscoring Jesus' self-sacrifice for his disciples (cf. 10:11, 15). Finally, Jesus orders an end to violent resistance (18:11; cf. Matt. 26:52-53; Luke 22:51).

18:12-27, Jesus Before the High Priest and Peter's Denial. When Jesus is taken to the high priest's house, his prediction that Peter would deny him three times is fulfilled (vv. 15-18, 25-27). In this John agrees with the other Gospels, but his account is remarkable in that it reports no nocturnal trial before the Sanhedrin (Matt. 26:59-68; Mark 14:55-65; but cf. Luke 22:66-71 where this meeting occurs on the following morning). No witnesses appear and there is no verdict (John 18:19-24). After Jesus testifies that he has always spoken quite openly, is struck by one of the attendants, and protests, he is then taken from Annas's house to Caiaphas (v. 24). John does not reproduce the more elaborate synoptic trial scene, in which Jesus was condemned for blasphemy (a charge often suggested in the Fourth Gospel).

In John, both Annas and Caiaphas are called high priest. But in vv. 13-14 (cf. 11:49) and v. 24 Caiaphas is clearly identified as high priest, and so he was, his father-in-law Annas having been deposed over a decade before Jesus' ministry began. In the narrative of vv. 15-23, however, Annas plays that role. The difficulty may be partly due to the fact that the same Greek word (archiereus) is sometimes used in the plural to designate "leading priests" (e.g., Mark 14:1, 10, 43, 53, 55), but some confusion remains (cf. also Luke 3:2; Acts 4:6). That in John 11:49 and 18:13 Caiaphas is described as high priest "in that year" is also odd, for it was not an annual office. Furthermore, after being told that Jesus was taken to Caiaphas (18:24) we hear nothing of what transpired there (cf. v. 28).

Peter's repeated denials of Jesus (vv. 15-18, 25-27) are related in terms similar to Mark's (14:53-54, 66-72), although there are differences of detail. For example, only John identifies one of Peter's interrogators as a kinsman of the man whose ear Peter had severed (John 18:26). Also, the cock crows immediately after Peter's final denial (v. 27), but John fails to mention Peter's weeping (Mark 14:72 and parallels).

18:28-19:16, Jesus Before Pilate. John's narration of the trial is so dramatic that it has made a lasting impression upon Christian memory and tradition, not least with respect to Pilate, who at the end appears caught between Jesus and the Jews. In the shorter synoptic version, Jesus remains silent except to respond laconically to Pilate's question of whether he may be a king (Mark 15:2 and parallels). In the Johannine, Jesus initially talks more than Pilate (18:33-38) but much less in the latter half (19:1-16), where they appear before the Jews and Pilate upbraids Jesus for not answering (19:9-10; cf. Mark 15:3-5 and parallels; →Pilate, Pontius).

18:28-38, Jesus Arraigned. Jesus is brought to Pilate at his headquarters (praetorium), the exact location of which is disputed, early in the morning. In John's account, Jesus was condemned at about noon (19:14; cf. Mark 15:25, 33-34 and parallels) on a Friday, the Day of Preparation, just before Passover, so that the Jews refuse to enter the praetorium (John 18:28). According to the unanimous testimony of the Synoptics, however, the Friday of Jesus' crucifixion followed the Passover meal, eaten the preceding evening. (Jesus was crucified on a Friday; the Gospels differ only with respect to the Jewish calendar.) The Jews have already determined that Jesus is guilty but do not answer directly Pilate's question about the charge (vv. 29-32). Obviously, they want Pilate to put Jesus to death because they have no authority to do so (v. 31). (Probably their statement to that effect reflects the actual historical situation.)

Throughout this episode Pilate moves in and out of the praetorium to question Jesus, who is inside, and then confront the Jews, who refuse to enter. Now he reenters the praetorium to question Jesus (v. 33), asking the question he puts to him in each of the other Gospels as well. Jesus' counterquestioning of Pilate and the latter's rejoinder are unique to John (vv. 34-35), as is Jesus' remarkable statement about the origin of his kingdom or kingship, with its sharp distinction between that kingship and the world. A worldly kingship would necessitate the disciples' offering physical resistance to protect Jesus from the Jews. Although Jesus was finally condemned to death and executed by Romans, in John the Jews are his mortal enemies (cf. 19:16). This state of affairs doubtless reflects the hostility between Jesus' followers and the synagogue at the time the Gospel was written. Pilate's conclusion that Jesus is, after all, a king, is met by Jesus' evasive answer (18:37), similar to his response in the Synoptics (Mark 15:2), but Jesus expands upon his unique function as witness to the truth in lines that are distinctively Johannine. Pilate's question (John 18:38) expresses his disinterest and cynicism, but it also mirrors his profound alienation from the truth.

18:39-40, Barabbas. Pilate, who would as soon be rid of the whole matter (as in Matt. 27:24, he literally washes his hands of Jesus), declares his finding that Jesus is innocent, asking the crowd whether they would have him set free (John 18:38b). Barabbas (v. 40) until this point has not been mentioned in the narrative, and no such custom as Pilate mentions (v. 39) has been documented from sources other than the Gospels. Mark (15:6-14) gives this incident in much fuller form, but the question Pilate puts to the crowd (15:9) is quite similar in John (18:39). John offers the briefest explanation of who Barabbas was; the term he uses to describe him (Gk. lēstēs), usually translated "robber"

(RSV), could also be applied to the kind of rebel Mark describes. The irony of the incident is obvious.

19:1-16, Jesus Condemned. At the point of the crowd's choosing Barabbas, the other Gospels have them immediately demand Jesus' crucifixion, whereupon Pilate releases Barabbas, quickly has Jesus scourged, and delivers him to be crucified (cf. Mark 15:15). In John, the trial does not end at this point, although Jesus is scourged and mocked (John 19:1-3). Pilate, who had been outside the praetorium with the Jews (18:38), evidently went inside to have Jesus scourged and now comes out again (19:4).

The trial culminates as Pilate brings Jesus out before the Jews and for the second time declares him innocent (vv. 4-5). The Jews now shout, "Crucify him!" as the crowd does in the synoptic Barabbas scene, and Pilate for the third time proclaims Jesus' innocence (v. 6; cf. Luke 23:4, 14-16, 22). When the Jews once again make their case against Jesus (John 19:7), Pilate's fears rise (v. 8). Apparently, he stands in awe of Jesus, as his question may imply (v. 9); his reaction follows from the Jews' assertion that Jesus has made himself Son of God. Jesus' silence in response to Pilate's question (v. 9) evokes a motif of the synoptic trial scene (Mark 15:4); at this stage the Johannine Jesus is scarcely prepared to explain his origins to the same Pilate who has asked cynically about truth (John 18:38). Pilate's assumptions about who has power and what power is stand in sharp contrast to Jesus' knowledge (19:10-11). Jesus knows the truth that Pilate cannot begin to understand. But even here John makes clear that Pilate is relatively innocent in comparison with Judas or, more probably, the Jews (v. 11).

Pilate's final effort to release Jesus puts his loyalty to Caesar in question (v. 12). John more than once suggests that Jesus' fate is intertwined with Jewish-Roman relations (cf. 11:48) and that Jewish leaders intend to sacrifice Jesus to Roman authority so they may continue to stand in its good graces. In Luke (23:2) Jesus' Jewish accusers represent him as politically subversive. Here the Jews suggest that Jesus is somehow a threat to Roman power, but at the same time they must know he is not. He is rather a threat to their own religious authority.

The ensuing scene (John 19:13-16) continues the byplay between Pilate and the Jews that will lead to Jesus' condemnation. The location of the pavement (v. 13) has been identified by some archaeologists, but the identification remains disputed (→ Gabbatha). Both the day and the hour (v. 14) differ from the Synoptics, in which Jesus is condemned and crucified on the morning of the first day of the feast (cf. Mark 15:25). Pilate's "Here is your King" evokes his earlier "Here is the man" (John 19:5). Jesus is king of the Jews; the implication is that Pilate will no longer take responsibility for him. The chief priests then finally disavow Jesus in proclaiming their loyalty to Caesar alone (v. 15). There is a fine irony here as the chief priests disavow not only Jesus but any king other than the Roman emperor. If, as is likely, the Gospel was written after the disastrous end of the Roman war (A.D. 70), there is a double irony. The war that was fought in the name of the lordship of God alone ended with the unequivocal assertion of the lordship of Caesar. Thus the prophecy of the chief priests would be entirely accurate. The scene concludes with Jesus' apparently being handed over to the chief priests for crucifixion (v. 16). That the Romans actually carried out the execution is clear enough (v. 15; cf. vv. 19, 23), but that John should portray Jesus as being delivered to the Jews is entirely appropriate in this Gospel (cf. 18:36) for they have been Jesus' mortal enemies all along.

The question of the role of the Jews in the death of Jesus demands that two points should now be made. First, Jesus was, in fact, executed by the Romans. Nevertheless, some priestly authorities, who served at the pleasure of the Romans, may have had an interest in Jesus' demise; that, in fact, is what the Gospel of John suggests (11:48; 19:15). Second, the extension of this guilt to Pharisees and Jews generally is unjustifiable. By "Pharisees" (and "Jews") John means not just the contemporaries of Jesus (much less all Jews); he has in view certain members of the leadership of the synagogue of his own day, with which he sees himself and his church in mortal conflict. It is the dark side of the Gospel of John that allows the broader implications to be drawn. Certainly the Evangelist could not have foreseen the awful implications and effects of his words as they have resounded through the centuries.

19:17-30, The Execution of Jesus. The crucifixion and death of Jesus is described in as few words in John as in the other Gospels. In general, the Gospels do not draw out or dramatize Jesus' death, nor do they dwell upon its horror. Crucifixion was a common form of capital punishment in the Roman world (→ Cross).

In John, Jesus carries his own cross, as was customary (cf. Mark 15:21 and parallels), to the place of his execution, Golgotha (John 19:17). Its site may now be marked by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. According to all the Gospels, Jesus was crucified between two other condemned criminals (v. 18), and his cross bore a title that (again according to custom) named the charge on which he had been condemned (v. 19). Only in John do we read that the title was written in three languages (v. 20) and that the chief priests wanted it changed to indicate that Jesus only claimed to be king of the Jews (vv. 21-22). As they had put pressure on Pilate, they now get the back of Pilate's hand; this wretched criminal can be their king. John alone cites Ps. 22:18 on the dividing of Jesus' garments (John 19:23-24).

All the Gospels state that several women witnessed Jesus' crucifixion, although his disciples had fled at his arrest. All except Luke note that Mary Magdalene was one of them. The distinctive feature of John's account is the presence of the mother of Jesus and the Beloved Disciple at the cross. Jesus' words to his mother and to his disciple are clear enough in meaning (vv. 26, 27); whether they are to be understood literally or symbolically is the question. Christian interpretation has often seen the church symbolized in Jesus' mother, but the literal interpretation has persisted to the extent that in Ephesus, the traditional site of the grave of the apostle John, there is also a tomb venerated as Mary's.

Jesus' death is narrated much more briefly than in the Synoptics. There is no mocking of Jesus on the cross (Mark 15:29-32 and parallels); no cry of dereliction (Mark 15:34; cf. v. 37); no rending of the veil of the Temple at Jesus' death (Mark 15:38 and parallels); and no word from the centurion (Mark 15:39 and parallels). Jesus' thirsting (John 19:28) allows Scripture to be fulfilled (Ps. 69:21); as in the other Gospels he is given vinegar to drink (John 19:29). In John he says simply, "It is finished" (v. 30), and expires; the Greek phrase could be translated, "He gave over the Spirit." We have been led to expect that the glorified Jesus would send the Spirit. Jesus' earthly life and his revelatory work is complete (cf. 17:4). The hour has fully come.

19:31-37, The Piercing of His Side. This incident, found in no other Gospel, depends upon John's unique chronology in which Jesus dies before the beginning of Passover (v. 31). Breaking the legs of a crucified man was an act of mercy that hastened death by rendering the victim unable to maintain himself erect so that he could breathe. Thus because Jesus was found dead, his legs were not broken but his side pierced (vv. 33-34). The piercing causes an efflux of water and blood, which is attested by an eyewitness. The Scriptures are fulfilled (vv. 36-37). The first quotation is from Exod. 12:46 or Num. 9:12, both of which refer to the Passover lamb. (A similar passage in Ps. 34:20 refers to the righteous man.) In John 1:29 and 36, Jesus is called the Lamb of God. The second quotation is from Zech. 12:10, which speaks of the mourning of Jerusalem for him whom they have pierced (cf. Rev. 1:7). If the context of that passage is in view, it is appropriate, for Jerusalem has just caused Jesus to be pierced.

The witness (John 19:35) is likely the Beloved Disciple, who is said to have been present at the cross (v. 26) and in 21:24 also is extolled as a reliable witness. The blood and water came to have great symbolic value for Christians as signifying the Eucharist and baptism, whether or not that meaning was understood or intended originally, and commentators have pointed to a seemingly related passage in 1 John 5:6-8. The blood and water would thus symbolize the salvation wrought through the death of Jesus, particularly as it was represented in the earliest sacraments.

19:38-42, The Burial. According to all Gospel accounts, Jesus was buried by Joseph of Arimathea, variously described in the Gospels as a prominent person and an adherent of Jesus. He is not otherwise mentioned. That Joseph went to Pilate secretly because of fear of the Jews is, typically, said only by John (v. 38). Also only in John, Nicodemus joins him, bringing a large mixture of spices for anointing Jesus' body (v. 39) for burial. The Synoptics do not recount such a preparation (v. 40), for at least according to Mark and Luke the women who discovered the tomb empty intended to anoint Jesus' body. John alone notes that Jesus was interred in a garden tomb near where he had been crucified (vv. 41-42), supporting the tradition of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which commemorates the site of the crucifixion as well as the tomb of Jesus.

Empty Tomb and Resurrection Appearances

20:1-10, The Empty Tomb. The common factor in all accounts is that Mary Magdalene goes to the tomb early on Sunday morning and finds it empty (→ Mary). In John, Mary Magdalene alone makes the discovery; she conveys the news to Peter and the Beloved Disciple, who quickly go to the tomb and confirm it (vv. 3-10). The Beloved Disciple, as usual, outdoes Peter by arriving first at the tomb; he sees the discarded graveclothes (vv. 4-5) but allows Peter to enter first and see also (v. 6). Perhaps significantly, only the Beloved Disciple is said to believe (v. 8; cf. 13:21-30). That neither yet knew the Scripture predicting Jesus' resurrection (20:9; cf. 1 Cor. 15:4) underscores the unanticipated character of the discovery. The disciples return home (John 20:10) as Mary apparently stands outside the tomb weeping (v. 11), creating the impression that they go past her without sharing the good news. The poor transition and lack of attestation in other Gospels raises the question of whether the episode of Peter and the Beloved Disciple is a later insertion into a traditional text. But most ancient manuscripts of Luke contain a summary of this account or the nucleus from which it grew (Luke 24:12). Notably, Luke does not mention the Beloved Disciple but only

Peter, who leaves the tomb in a state of wonderment. Moreover, Luke 24:24 refers to such a visit to the tomb by disciples, who obviously did not attain faith. In light of this, John's reference to only the Beloved Disciple's belief (John 20:8) becomes more significant; it is somehow exceptional.

20:11-18, Mary at the Tomb. Mary, left weeping outside the tomb (v. 11), now looks inside and sees the angels mentioned in the other accounts. They ask her why she is weeping and receive an answer of unparalleled poignancy (v. 13). Then in a brief but artfully narrated scene (vv. 14-18) Mary sees and recognizes Jesus, having at first mistaken him for the gardener. This scene is paralleled only in Matt. 28:9-10, which briefly recounts how the two women, including Mary Magdalene, encounter the risen Jesus as they depart from the tomb. Both stories conclude with Jesus' instructions to deliver a message to "my brethren." In John, Jesus instructs Mary not to hold him because he has not yet ascended, although he is ascending (v. 17; cf. Matt. 28:9). Subsequent Johannine resurrection narratives are presumably to be understood as manifestations of the ascended Jesus.

20:19-29, Appearances to the Twelve and to Thomas. The resurrection scenes of chap. 20 culminate in a pair of appearances of the risen Lord to his disciples on successive Sunday evenings and find a parallel in Luke 24:36-43. In both the Lucan and the Johannine scenes, the risen Jesus' demonstration of his identity with the crucified is a dominant motif. Yet John omits Jesus' striking demonstration of his corporeal reality, namely, the eating of broiled fish. In John, the ascended, exalted Jesus appears to his disciples through closed doors (20:19, 26) and is scarcely a normal, physical presence.

The disciples must protect themselves from those Jews who have also been enemies of Jesus (v. 19). Jesus appears suddenly and mysteriously. He establishes his identity with the disciples, who are obviously convinced (v. 20), sends them to continue his mission to the world (v. 21; cf. 17:18), and equips them with his Spirit (20:22), the fulfillment of earlier promises (cf. 14:16; 16:7, 13-14). This scene marks the beginning of the church as a body inspired by the Spirit of Jesus and dedicated to the spreading of the gospel (cf. Acts 2).

Thomas' skeptical reaction to the other disciples' report of their encounter with Jesus (John 20:24-25) sets the stage for Jesus' next appearance (v. 26) and secures his own reputation as the proverbial doubting Thomas. When Jesus reappears and offers him the proof he has been seeking (v. 27), Thomas may not actually touch Jesus, although he confesses him as Lord and God (v. 28). Jesus' invitation to Thomas to touch him probably means that he has now ascended (cf. v. 17). (The ascended Jesus sends the Spirit in Acts.) Jesus' final word to Thomas puts even seeing Jesus, much less touching him, in proper perspective (v. 29), as Jesus in effect pronounces a blessing upon the church of the future for which he has already prayed (17:20).

20:30-31, The Purpose of the Gospel. The Evangelist's summation sounds like the conclusion of the book, although no manuscript lacking chap. 21 survives. Appropriately the purpose of the narrative is now stated. The theological themes of the Gospel are brought to a culmination in chap. 20, as is the literary development. Chap. 21 deals with other issues.

The Epilogue; Jesus' Appearance to Peter and Others by the Sea

Generally regarded as an appendix, or at best an epilogue, chap. 21 ties up neatly questions having to do with people somehow important to the Johannine community, particularly Peter and the Beloved Disciple. Whether chap. 21 was written by the same author who composed chaps. 1-20 is a debated question. The style and vocabulary, the interest in Peter, and the final appearance of the Beloved Disciple mark it as Johannine, that is, as a product of the same circles that produced chaps. 1-20. The chapter has two parts: vv. 1-14, an account of an appearance of the risen Jesus to seven disciples by the Sea of Tiberias (or Galilee); vv. 15-25, a long conversation between Jesus and Peter that continues in the same setting and concludes with an appearance of the Beloved Disciple.

21:1-14, The Appearance by the Sea. This resurrection story is unparalleled in the canonical Gospels. The closest parallel is Luke 5:1-11, a call story, in which the disciples are fishing on the Sea of Galilee (Gennesaret), Simon Peter figures prominently, and Jesus guides the disciples to make a large catch of fish. That the Lucan and Johannine stories are variants of the same tradition remains a possibility, especially in view of their apparent similarity of purpose as well as content: Jesus commissions, or recommissions, his disciples. Luke may have placed an original resurrection narrative at the outset of Jesus' ministry. The other Gospel call stories are entirely different. Interestingly, only here in John do the disciples of Jesus appear as fishermen, their vocation in the other Gospels.

This scene is said to be the third appearance of the risen Jesus to his disciples (John 21:14). Apparently, the appearance to Mary Magdalene (20:14-18) is excluded in the count, presumably because she is not a disciple. But the behavior of the disciples, before and at the appearance of Jesus, does not accord with the presumption that they know he has risen from the dead. Peter and company are returning to their previous occupation (21:3); they are assumed to see Jesus (v. 7). The story has all the marks of an initial appearance to these disciples.

The meal scene in vv. 9-13 has eucharistic overtones, although there is no wine and no eucharistic celebration that we know of involved fish. At least one of the Lucan resurrection appearances takes place at a meal (Luke 24:30; cf. 41-43). The meaning of the number of fish (153) remains a mystery. That the disciples do not dare question Jesus but know their host is the Lord (v. 12) allows a dimension of mystery to hang over the whole narrative to the end.

21:15-25, Peter and the Beloved Disciple.

The interchange between Jesus and Peter continues the same scene; the others fade into the background. Obviously, Jesus' questioning of Peter (vv. 15-17) allows Peter to reestablish himself. The exact meaning of Jesus' initial question (v. 15) is uncertain, because we cannot know precisely the antecedent of "these." We are not even certain whether "these" are the objects of Peter's love or others who also love Jesus. Nevertheless, Jesus clearly calls on Peter to validate his affirmations of love by feeding or tending Jesus' sheep or lambs, that is, his flock. Peter is thus cast in the role of church leader, pastor (i.e., one who tends a flock). Jesus' words about Peter's fate (vv. 18-19) provide the earliest hint we have of the martyrdom of Peter, which was in later tradition associated with Rome.

The final episode of the Gospel concerns the Beloved Disciple (vv. 20-24), who appears (v. 20) but does not speak. Peter's question (v. 21) probably reflects tension in the early church between circles loyal to him (cf. 1 Cor. 1:12) and those who looked to the Beloved Disciple. Jesus' response to Peter rejects that rivalry as of no concern to himself and indicates that it is no proper concern of Peter's (v. 22). The writer then notes a common misinterpretation of Jesus' statement about the Beloved Disciple and corrects it by reference to what Jesus actually said (v. 23). Probably the death of the Beloved Disciple before Jesus' return had caused some consternation. This disciple is identified not only as the true witness (cf. 19:35) but also as the author (or at least the source) of this Gospel. It has frequently been deduced, in light of church tradition, that the Beloved Disciple was John the son of Zebedee (cf. 21:2). There are, however, problems with this identification (see Introduction above). At the very least, however, this passage evinces a strong interest in the eyewitness testimony on which the Gospel is based. In the final statement (v. 25) we see a reflection of the earlier colophon (20:30-31).

ACTS

CARL R. HOLLADAY

INTRODUCTION

Authorship

In spite of the ancient, well-established tradition that the third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles were written by Luke the physician, Paul's traveling companion and close associate (Philem. 24; Col. 4:14; 2 Tim. 4:11), both works are anonymous. Neither the name "Luke" nor an unnamed "physician-disciple" is even mentioned in either writing.

Both works are linked together by their common addressee, Theophilus (Luke 1:1-4; Acts 1:1-2). The similarity of their language and style, as well as their unified literary and theological purposes, leave little doubt that they derive from the same author—possibly, but not certainly, Luke.

Date

At the earliest, Acts cannot have been written prior to the latest firm chronological marker recorded in the book—Festus's appointment as procurator (24:27), which, on the basis of independent sources, appears to have occurred between A.D. 55 and 59. At the latest, it cannot have been written after the mid-second century, when it begins to be alluded to or quoted by other authors. It is commonly dated in the last quarter of the first century, after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (which the Gospel appears to presuppose already; cf. Luke 21:20-24).

Literary Features

Genre. Since Acts is the second part of a two-volume work, the critical task is to identify appropriately the genre of Luke-Acts. The best internal clue is provided in Luke's own preface (Luke 1:1), which suggests that the work be classified simply as a "narrative." The story that unfolds exhibits biographical, historical, theological, sermonic, and apologetic elements, yet no one of these adequately captures the full range of the work. Rather, Luke-Acts should be understood as a narrative with different dimensions and multiple purposes.

Both its form and content suggest that the work was intended to be read as the continuation of the OT biblical story. The narrative throughout confirms what the preface states:

the story is told to strengthen faith (Luke 1:4). Consequently, it should be read as an edifying narrative intended to inform, reinforce, and render more credible faith where it already exists and probably to create and instill faith where it does not exist.

Structure. In one sense, Acts seems organized around geographical concentric circles (1:8), in which the progress of "the Word" is traced from Jerusalem (chaps. 1-7), throughout Judea and Samaria (chaps. 8-12), and finally to "the end of the earth," probably Rome (chaps. 13-28).

In another sense, the work comprises two parts: chaps. 1-12, which present the church's beginning in Palestine and its supplanting traditional Judaism as the new locus of God's presence within Israel; and chaps. 13-28, which tell how the gospel moves westward and how God's promises are extended fully to the Gentiles. Each section has its central figure: Peter in the first and Paul in the second.

Other Features. One conspicuous feature is the summaries provided throughout the work. There are both fairly extensive summaries (2:42-47; 4:32-35; 5:12-16) and briefer statements documenting the numerical growth and spread of the church (2:41, 47; 4:4; 5:14; 6:7; 9:31, 42; 11:21, 24; 12:24; 14:1; 16:5; 19:20; 28:31).

Related to this is the use of typical examples, a literary technique through which Luke depicts a single character or event to illustrate what occurred typically. The healing of the lame man (3:1-11) may be regarded as typical of the many "signs and wonders" performed by the apostles (5:12). Barnabas' generosity is presented as a concrete example that typified the many property owners who sold their possessions (4:34-37). The episodes reported in detail during Paul's preaching mission at Philippi (16:11-40) serve to illustrate typical features of his preaching among Gentiles. His vindication before Gallio (18:12-17) concretely illustrates the way Roman authorities typically treated Christian missionaries.

One of the most striking features of Acts is the number of speeches contained in the book and the amount of space they occupy—roughly 20 percent of the entire narrative. They occur throughout the work, in each of its major sections, exhibiting different types: missionary speeches directed to Jews (2:14-36; 3:12-26; 13:16-41; 28:25-28) and Gentiles (10:34-43; 14:15–17; 17:22–31); various defense speeches by Peter (4:8–12, 19b–20; 5:29b–32), Stephen (7:2–53, 56, 59b, 60b), and Paul (22:1, 3–21; 23:1, 3, 5, 6b; 24:10–21; 25:8, 10–11; 26:2–23, 25–27, 29; 28:17–20); “church speeches,” Christians speaking to other Christians (1:16–22; 11:5–17; 15:7–21; 21:20–25), especially Paul’s “pastoral homily,” or farewell address, to the Ephesian elders (20:18–35); and speeches by outsiders (5:35–39; 19:25–28, 35–40; 24:2–8; 25:14–21, 24–27). In addition, numerous prayers and conversations are reported throughout the work. By providing various types of speeches fitted to the characters and the occasion, Luke is following a practice well established among ancient authors—Jewish, Greek, and Roman.

Language and Style. Luke’s language and style reflect the Hellenistic Greek typically used in literary circles of his day. While it has much in common with popular, spoken speech, it is generally more polished, and intentionally so. With his considerable vocabulary and sophisticated use of language, Luke compares favorably with contemporary classical authors, such as Xenophon. Both his language and style are heavily influenced by the Greek OT, in which he is thoroughly steeped, and this distinguishes him sharply from his Greco-Roman counterparts.

His attention to literary style can be seen in his fondness for numerous rhetorical devices, such as the well-established Greek form of emphasis by understatement (12:18; 14:28; 17:4, 12; 19:11, 23–24; 20:12; 21:39; 27:20; 28:2). His skillful use of language is also seen in the way he effectively creates literary mood or captures the atmosphere of particular occasions, whether it be the primitive religious environment of Lystra (14:8–18) or Malta (28:1–10) or a poignant farewell (20:36–37). It is also seen in his ability to write in different literary styles. In describing the earliest period of the church (chaps. 1–12), he uses an archaic, biblical style that echoes the language of the Greek OT. This helps establish the close identity between his account and the biblical story he seeks to continue. Or, he can write in a more “modern” Greek style, especially on occasions where he needs to capture the mood of a contemporary setting, such as Athens (chap. 17), Ephesus (chap. 19), or a trial scene before Romans in Caesarea (chaps. 24–26).

Links Between Acts and Luke

Perhaps the best introduction to Acts is a thorough, attentive reading of the Gospel of Luke. To be sure, Acts can be read—and historically has been read—independently of Luke’s Gospel, for in one sense the story it tells is self-contained. Yet, when read in the light of Luke’s Gospel, certain aspects of Acts that otherwise might remain obscure become understandable.

There are, first of all, continuous themes that run through both volumes. The “kingdom of God,” which is mentioned over thirty times in the Gospel (e.g., Luke 4:43; 6:20; 8:1, 10; 9:2, 11, 27, 60, 62; 10:9, 11; 13:18, 20, 28–29; 16:16; 17:20–21; 19:11; 21:31; 22:16, 18; 23:51), continues to be preached in Acts (1:3; 8:12; 14:22; 19:8; 20:25; 28:23, 31). Jesus’ insistence that his suffering, death, and resurrection were “divine necessities” (Luke 9:22; 18:31–33; 24:7, 26, 44–46; also 9:31, 44; 13:33; 17:25) is a prominent theme in the apostolic preaching in Acts (3:18; 17:3; 26:23; also 8:32–35). The very visible role played by the Holy Spirit in the life and ministry of Jesus (e.g., Luke 1:35; 2:26–27; 4:1, 14, 18–21) continues in Acts, where the Spirit “comes upon” the church, especially at critical moments (1:5; 2:1–4; 8:15; 10:44–48; 11:15–17; 19:6), but also motivates the church’s prophets to speak and act (Acts 4:8; 6:3, 5; 7:55; 8:26, 29, 39; 10:19; 11:12; 13:2; 16:6–7; 19:21; 20:23; 21:4, 11).

Throughout Luke-Acts there is also a consistent emphasis on the proper use of possessions. Luke’s Gospel not only records Jesus’ instructions about almsgiving (3:11; 6:30; 11:41; 12:33–34; 14:14; 18:22; 19:8), it also presents many parables of Jesus where the proper attitude toward possessions is a central feature (Luke 10:29–37; 15:11–32; 16:1–9, 19–31; 19:11–27) and incidents in Jesus’ ministry where discipleship is defined in terms of this question (10:38–42; 18:18–30; 19:1–10; 21:1–4). Acts continues this emphasis in its depiction of the church’s generosity and willingness to dispose of its goods to assist the needy (2:44–45; 4:32–34). It also highlights the actions of generous individuals, such as Barnabas (4:36–37), Dorcas (9:36–43), and Paul (20:33–35), and churches, such as Antioch (11:29–30). It also provides negative examples to reinforce the point (1:16–19; 5:1–11; 8:20–24; 24:26).

Certain events or actions depicted in Acts are either already anticipated in Luke’s Gospel or explicitly predicted: the apostles as Christ’s duly appointed witnesses (Acts 1:8; 5:32; 10:41; cf. Luke 24:48); rejoicing while suffering on behalf of Christ (Acts 5:41; cf. Luke 6:23); the appropriate behavior of missionaries in the face of rejection (Acts 13:51; 18:6; cf. Luke 9:5; 10:10–11); the appropriate way to bear witness when brought before various officials (Acts 4:8–12; 5:27–32; 7:54–60; 22:1–21; 24:10–21; 25:8, 10–11; 26:1–23; cf. Luke 12:11–12; 21:12–14); offering the gospel to Jews first, and when rejected, then to Gentiles (Acts 13:46–48; 18:6; 28:23–28; cf. Luke 14:15–24; also 2:32, 34); Jesus’ promise that repentance and forgiveness of sins would be preached universally (Acts 2:38; 3:19; 5:31; 11:18; 17:30-31; cf. Luke 24:47; also 1:77; 3:3).

In some instances, Luke's Gospel illuminates more fully persons or events in Acts: the ministry and preaching of John the Baptist (Acts 1:4-5; 11:16; 13:24-25; 18:25; 19:3-4; cf. Luke 3:1-22, esp. vv. 15-17); Jesus' ministry (Acts 2:22-24; 10:36-40; amplified by the entire Gospel of Luke), especially certain images or scriptures used of Christ, such as God's prophet (Acts 3:22; 7:37; cf. Luke 24:19) or the rejected stone (Acts 4:11; Luke 20:17-18).

Certain incidents in Acts are depicted in ways that parallel similar incidents in the Gospel: the healing of paralyzed persons (Acts 3:1-11; 9:32-35; cf. Luke 5:17-26); raising persons from the dead (Acts 9:36-43; 20:7-12; Luke 7:11-17; 8:40-56); exorcisms (Acts 5:16; 8:7; 19:11-16; cf. Luke 4:31-37); healing persons with fever (Acts 28:8; cf. Luke 4:38-39). In some respects, Paul's final trip to Jerusalem and his trial echo the Lucan account of Jesus' Passion: the crowds' responses (Acts 21:36; 22:22; cf. Luke 23:18); Paul's being "handed over by Jews to Gentiles" (Acts 21:11; 28:17; cf. Luke 18:32; 24:6-7); his own declarations of innocence (22:25; 23:1; 24:12-13, 16, 19-20; 25:8, 10-11; 26:21-23; 28:17-19), confirmed numerous times by Jewish and Roman officials (23:9, 29; 25:18, 25-26; 26:31-32; on Jesus' innocence, cf. Luke 23:4, 13-15, 22, 41, 47; also Acts 4:27, 30; 7:52; 22:14).

COMMENTARY

1:1-26

Between Easter and Pentecost

1:1-8

Jesus' Story Continued

From the outset, Acts is connected with the third Gospel, Luke's "first volume" that gives a comprehensive account of Jesus' deeds and words until he was "taken up," or ascended into heaven (Luke 24:51). Their common addressee is Theophilus (Luke 1:1-4), otherwise unmentioned in the NT.

Whereas Luke 24 confines Christ's appearances to a single day (Easter Sunday), this period is now extended to "forty days" (Acts 1:3). His activity included "many proofs," presumably signs and wonders, various appearances to the apostles, and instructions (v. 3), which are summarized in Luke 24:44-49. The continuation of the kingdom of God is anticipated in the Gospel (Luke 22:16, 18, esp. vv. 28-30). Precisely what the kingdom signified remained unclear, as the apostles' question (Acts 1:6) shows.

During a meal (v. 4), Jesus enjoins the apostles to remain in Jerusalem, echoing his earlier instruction that their prophetic witness to him would begin from Jerusalem (Luke 24:47). John the Baptist had anticipated that his form of baptism would be superseded by a more impressive form of immersion administered by the Messiah in which persons would be suffused with God's Spirit (Acts 1:5) and confronted with the fire of God's judgment (Luke 3:16).

At perhaps another gathering (Acts 1:6), the apostles ask when Christ would "restore the kingdom to Israel." His response (v. 7) exposes their misunderstanding. Entering God's kingdom is not a matter of knowing when to mark the calendar but of awaiting and receiving God's promised Spirit. The geographical scheme (v. 8) provides the organizing framework for the rest of the narrative (see Introduction).

1:9-12

Ascension

Christ's ascension has already been anticipated (Luke 9:51; Acts 1:2) but now is amplified in greater detail. Compared with the rest of the NT, Luke attaches greater significance to it as a separate event (cf. Mark 16:19; John 3:13; 6:62; 20:17; Eph. 4:8-10; 1 Tim. 3:16). In Luke 24:51, one textual tradition records Christ's ascension on Easter Sunday, whereas here it occurs forty days later (Acts 1:3). By placing the ascension on the Mount of Olives (v. 12), Luke continues his pattern of locating the post-Easter appearances in close proximity to Jerusalem (Luke 24:13, 28, 33, 47, 50, 52).

Luke's portrait is slightly reminiscent of Elijah's ascension (2 Kings 2:11), though closer to the extrabiblical tradition depicting the end of Moses' life as a disappearance into a cloud (Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 4.326). His promised return in similar fashion (Acts 1:11) recalls Jesus' own earlier prediction of the Son of man's return (Luke 21:27; cf. Dan. 7:13-14).

The ascension occurs in the company of the apostles (Acts 1:2, 9), who thereby become eyewitnesses (cf. 1:22). In keeping with OT criteria for certified testimony (Deut. 19:15), Luke typically provides two witnesses who interpret the event's significance (Luke 24:4). Their "white robes" probably attest their extraordinary status (cf. Luke 24:4; John 20:12). By emphasizing the manner rather than the time of Jesus' return, Luke redirects the church's attention away from end-time speculation (Acts 1:7).

Replacing Judas

The Twelve are named earlier (Luke 6:13-16). Heading this list are Peter and John, who figure prominently in the succeeding narrative (Acts 3:1, 11; 8:14). James's death is later recorded (12:2). Omitting Judas Iscariot now confirms his expulsion from the apostolic circle and prepares readers for his replacement (1:15-26). To this point, readers know only of Judas's betrayal (Luke 22:47-53), not his fate.

Joining the apostles are "the women," probably those from Galilee named earlier who had been healed by Jesus, supported him financially (Luke 8:2-3), witnessed the crucifixion (Luke 23:49), and first bore witness of the resurrection to disbelieving apostles (Luke 23:55-56; 24:1-11). The family of Jesus has also been introduced earlier (Luke 8:19-21), and Luke treats them favorably, especially Mary (Luke 1-2). Elsewhere, they are portrayed as embarrassed and skeptical (Mark 3:21; John 7:5; though cf. John 2:1, 12; 19:25). Here, his family are among the nucleus of the faithful.

In keeping with Jesus' earlier promise that the Twelve would enjoy special status in his coming kingdom (Luke 22:28-30), the sacred circle must be reconstituted. Accordingly, both the death of Judas and the choice of his successor are interpreted as "divine necessities" foretold in Scripture (Acts 1:16, 20). Specifying the number as 120 (v. 15; cf. "many others," Luke 8:3) indicates a sizeable pool of candidates from which successors to Judas could be found.

Two OT citations figure centrally in this first speech by Peter (Acts 1:16-22).

In Ps. 69:25 the psalmist's enemies are cursed to live deserted and lonely. In Acts 1:20a, Judas is apparently regarded as such an enemy because his "small farm" (v. 18) had turned out to be a "desolate habitation." The Lucan accent falls on the tragic circumstances of Judas's death. His is the awful fate of those who attempt to thwart God's plan (cf. 5:1-11; 12:1-23). Matthew's account provides a sharp contrast: a remorseful Judas hangs himself (Matt. 27:3-10).

How he died is uncertain. "Falling headlong" (Acts 1:18) may suggest an accidental fall from a building or even a suicidal leap. The alternative reading, "swelling up," perhaps suggests some physical malady. In either case, the pit of his stomach burst, and his blood gave the field its name, Akeldama (v. 19).

The second OT citation (Ps. 109:8; Acts

1:20b) originally called for the seizure of the enemy's goods. In its altered form here, it provides the rationale for choosing Judas' successor. The chief qualification for the replacement is continuous participation in the historical ministry to Jesus from the time of John the Baptist until the ascension (v. 22). The essential apostolic function was to be a "witness to his resurrection" (v. 22; Luke 24:45-48; Acts 2:32; 3:15; 4:33; 5:32; 10:41; 13:31). The two candidates, Joseph Barsabbas and Matthias, are otherwise unmentioned in the NT. The final choice was by casting lots, but the decision was clearly God's (v. 24).

2:1-8:3

Beginning of the Church and Spread of the Gospel in Jerusalem

2:1-47

Inauguration of the Messianic Community on Pentecost

2:1-4, The Coming of the Spirit on Pentecost. Promises made earlier by John the Baptist (Luke 3:16) and the risen Lord (Luke 24:49; Acts 1:8) are now fulfilled. Among NT writers, only Luke sets the church's beginning on the day of Pentecost, fifty days after Passover (Luke 22:1; Lev. 23:15-21). His adopting the tradition of a forty-day period of post-Easter appearances required at least this much time (Acts 1:3). The nucleus of the messianic community certainly included the apostles to whom Christ had promised the Spirit (1:8) and conceivably the 120 disciples (1:15). The Spirit's arrival is presented in a way that anticipates the prophecy in 2:19: the loud wind from heaven serves as a "wonder in the heaven above," while the tongues of fire resting on those gathered become "signs on the earth beneath." "Wind and fire" may recall a similar extraordinary appearance of the Lord to Elijah (1 Kings 29:11-13). All of those gathered, whether the Twelve or 120, were "filled with the Holy Spirit" (Acts 2:4), the first of several such occurrences involving both individuals and groups in Acts (4:8, 31; 8:17; 10:44-47; 11:15; 13:9, 52; 19:1-6). What distinguishes this particular infusion of the Spirit is that the recipients speak "in other tongues," i.e., foreign languages (cf. 1:6, 8, 11). The phenomenon is repeated at the conversion of Cornelius (10:46).

2:5-13, The Worldwide Audience. The crowd attracted by this cacophony of sounds are Jews "living in" Jerusalem, not pilgrims from the Diaspora. They are struck by the speakers' distinctive Galilean accent (v. 7; cf. 1:11), yet they comprehend what is being said in their respective native dialects (vv. 6, 8, 11). The magnitude of the miracle is underscored as they list

Opposite: In the excavated ruins of Ephesus this peristyle offers a view of Ionian columns that once stood before a Greek council chamber; first century B.C. Ephesus, which became the fourth largest city in the Roman Empire in the first century A.D., was the site of Paul's mission described in Acts 18:24-19:41.

the nations from which they have emigrated (vv. 9-11). With its emphasis on universal understanding, the account is sometimes read as a reversal of the universal confusion of Babel (Gen. 11:1-9). More likely, Luke wants to stress that the Jewish community which first hears the gospel at Pentecost is genuinely universal in scope, hence representative of world Jewry. His narrative description here anticipates the promise in Peter's speech that "all flesh" (Acts 2:17; also v. 21) would receive God's Spirit.

2:14-36, Peter's Sermon. Among Peter's several speeches in Acts (3:12-26; 4:8-12, 19b-20; 5:29-32; 10:34-43), this sermon has special importance. Like Jesus at his Nazareth inaugural (Luke 4:16-30), Peter is introduced as an interpreter of OT Scripture. He now begins to unfold publicly the secrets of Scripture interpretation expounded by the risen Lord to the apostles on Easter (Luke 24:44-48). The sermon introduces major Lucan themes developed throughout the book, e.g., outpouring of God's Spirit (Acts 2:17, 18; cf. 10:45), universality of the gospel (2:17, 21; cf. 2:39; 13:47-48), authenticating signs and wonders (2:19; cf. 2:43; 4:30; 5:12; 6:8; 8:13), and salvation in the name of the Lord (2:21; cf. 2:39; 4:12).

In the first part (2:14-21), Peter interprets the events of Pentecost as fulfilling Joel 2:28-32. What was expected "in the last days" (Isa. 2:2) has now come to pass: a dramatic effusion of God's Spirit experienced by men and women, young and old, accompanied by signs and wonders, both visible and audible, with truly cosmic impact. This interruption of the normal course of events is seen as a prelude to "the day of the Lord," when history would end, and a time when people would call out to the Lord for salvation.

In the second part (Acts 2:22-36), Peter explains Jesus' death and resurrection in light of two Davidic psalms: 16:8-11 and 110:1. His introduction to this part summarizes the essential features of the Jesus story that have been rehearsed at length in the Gospel: a ministry empowered by God, death by human hands yet according to God's will, resurrection by God (Acts 2:22-24). Rather than proving these claims, Peter assumes them throughout the sermon. These things the apostles have witnessed (v. 32).

In Ps. 16:8-11, as Peter reads it, David acknowledged a "Lord" who would not be abandoned to the corruption of death in Hades (Acts 2:27). Since David both died and was buried, Peter concludes that he cannot have been speaking of himself but that he must have envisioned some later figure who would escape death. Peter insists that this could only have been Jesus, who had been raised (v. 31). Peter cites Ps. 110:1, also attributed to David, as evidence that he envisioned his "Lord" sitting at God's right hand, exalted in a position of victory over his enemies (Acts 2:34-36). Once again, Peter disqualifies David as the "exalted Lord" mentioned in the psalm since he "did not ascend into the heavens" (v. 34). By the process of elimination, Peter identifies the risen Jesus as the only legitimate candidate to whom these two psalms could intelligibly refer. Consequently, the exalted terms of the psalms, notably God's "Holy One" (v. 27) and "Lord" (v. 25), Peter applies to the crucified Jesus (v. 36). The risen Lord now is seen as the one who pours out the divine Spirit at this inaugural event (v. 33).

2:37-41, Response to Peter's Sermon. Peter's preaching strikes a responsive chord and turns the crowds into willing inquirers. The cry for salvation will be heard again (16:30; 22:10; cf. Luke 3:10, 12).

The call to repentance and the promise of forgiven sins echoes the preaching of John the Baptist (Luke 3:3, 8; cf. 5:32) and fulfills the promise of the risen Lord (Luke 24:47). The baptism Peter requires is distinguished from John's baptism by being "in the name of Jesus Christ" (cf. Acts 19:5). The formula may suggest that Jesus' name was pronounced over them at their baptism.

Along with the forgiveness of sins, the hearers receive (a measure of) what the risen Lord had received from the Father (Acts 2:33) and given to the apostles (1:4): the Holy Spirit as God's gift to the obedient (5:32). This promise of the Holy Spirit is first extended to the Jerusalem Jews assembled on Pentecost—"you and your children" and either to their chronologically distant descendants or to their geographically remote countrymen, the Jews in the Diaspora—"all that are far off." The latter expression can denote Gentiles (cf. 22:21; Eph. 2:13) but appears not to do so here. "With many other words" (Acts 2:40) indicates that Luke has provided only a summary of Peter's sermon.

2:42-47, Profile of the Early Church. Initially, the movement's success is marked with specific, impressively large numbers (2:41). Eventually, this will give way to further growth and expansion as indicated in periodic summaries (see Introduction).

This idealized portrait of the church emphasizes aspects of religious community valued in both Jewish and Greco-Roman society: daily devotion to both public and private religious activities (vv. 42, 46), awesome respect in the presence of divine power (v. 43), internal harmony and community solidarity expressed in concrete concern for each other (v. 44), and generosity (v. 45).

The voluntary sharing of possessions among members of the community distinguishes the early church (v. 44; cf. 4:32). Along with almsgiving and showing hospitality, Luke presents it as one way to use possessions responsibly (see Introduction).

3:1-4:31

Prophetic Witness in the Temple

This section exhibits a typical Lucan literary pattern: prophetic deed (3:1-11), prophetic word (3:12-26), resistance (4:1-12), divine vindication (4:13-31).

3:1-11, The Lame Man Healed. This episode has the typical features of a well-formed miracle story: setting (v. 1); description of malady or afflicted person (vv. 2-3); encounter between healer(s) and afflicted person (vv. 4-5); description of the healing miracle, consisting of healing word (v. 6), healing gesture (v. 7a), and act of healing (v. 7b); visible proof of healing (v. 8); and effects on audience or observers (vv. 9-11). Comparatively elaborate (cf. 9:32-35) and graphic in detail, it prompts Peter's sermon (3:11-12) and figures centrally in his subsequent defense (4:7, 9-10, 14, 16, 22). The portrait of the lame man is not complete until his age is finally reported as over forty years (4:22).

The prophetic deed occurs at the hands of the apostolic pair Peter and John (cf. 1:3; 4:19; 8:14-17; also Luke 22:8), but the central character here (Acts 3:6-7) and later (chaps. 3-5) is clearly Peter.

Details of time and place are given. The healing occurs at "the hour of prayer, the ninth hour"—one of the three periods of daily prayer (Dan. 6:10; Ps. 55:17) in midafternoon, coinciding with the Tamid, or daily whole offering, which was made throughout the year, twice a day, morning and evening, i.e., afternoon (Exod. 29:38-42; Num. 28:1-8; m. Pesah. 5:1; m. Tamid 4:1; Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 3.237; 14.65). The scene for this episode, as for the events recorded in chaps. 3-5, is the Temple area, significant because of how Luke portrays the church as supplanting the Temple and its leadership. The Beautiful Gate was perhaps located on the eastern side of the Temple.

The man is healed in the "name of Jesus of Nazareth," whose power Peter later proclaims and defends (Acts 3:16; 4:10). The healing power is mediated through physical contact (cf. Mark 5:27-28, 30; Acts 5:15; 19:12). The effects are visible through the man's leaping and shouting praise (cf. Isa. 35:6). Wonder and amazement are responses appropriate to dramatic displays of divine power (cf. Luke 4:36; 5:9, 26).

3:12-26, Peter's Sermon in the Temple.

Set within the precincts of the Temple, the sermon drives home a fundamental point: the very God whom the Jews had come to worship in the Temple (v. 13) has been at work in their midst but in a new way. The sermon throughout accents the activity of God—what God foretold in the prophets and fulfilled (vv. 18, 21), God's covenant with Abraham (v. 25), God's promise of a new prophet like Moses (v. 22; cf. Deut. 18:15-16), God's reversing the misdeeds of those responsible for Jesus' death (Acts 3:15, 26), God's glorification of his servant Jesus through the healing of the lame man (v. 13), God's eventual sending of his appointed Christ and the accompanying "times of refreshing" (vv. 19-21). The people of Israel are clearly being confronted with their own God, history, Scriptures, and legacy—in their own Temple—and are being asked to include the healing of the lame man, and by extension, the work of Jesus as part of their sacred story.

Even though God is the primary subject of the sermon, special emphasis falls on the trial of Jesus, with human misguidedness rhetorically juxtaposed with divine intervention (vv. 13-15; cf. Luke 23-24). Jesus is identified as God's servant (Acts 3:13, 26; cf. 4:27, 30; also Matt. 12:18), the fulfillment of the servant songs of Isaiah (Isa. 42:1; 52:13; 53:11). The designation "holy and righteous one" (Acts 3:14) doubtless recalls the Lucan passion narrative, with its particular stress on Jesus' innocence (cf. Luke 23:4, 13-15, 22, 41, 47; cf. Acts 4:27, 30; 7:52; 22:14). He is the "author" or pioneer of (resurrection) "life" (Acts 3:15), because through his resurrection he broke through for the first time to a new, unprecedented form of life (cf. 5:31; also Heb. 2:10; 12:2). The "prophet like Moses" image (Acts 3:22-23; cf. 7:37) makes more precise the recurrent depiction of Jesus as prophet in the Gospel (cf. Luke 4:16-30; 7:16; 13:33; 24:19).

The "times of refreshing" (RSV, Acts 3:19) may reflect the Jewish expectation that a period of relief from tribulations and woes would accompany the Messiah's final coming. Repentance and conversion are expected to trigger the Lord's final coming (cf. 2 Pet. 3:11-13; also Rom. 11:25-32). Meanwhile, Jesus as God's appointed Christ remains in heaven until God finally restores all things, as the prophets promised (Acts 3:21). The language recalls those in exile longing to be restored to their homeland by God.

4:1-4, Peter and John Arrested. Initial resistance comes from Temple authorities, Jesus' earlier antagonists (Luke 22:4, 52). A prominent source of resistance, now and in the second arrest (Acts 5:17), are the Sadducees, who had opposed Jesus (Luke 20:27-40) and later oppose Paul (Acts 23:6-10). Since they denied resurrection in principle (23:8), they specifically contest the apostles' claim that resurrection had begun with Jesus (4:2). Even though overnight custody is a relatively mild restraining action (v. 3; cf. 5:18; 12:1), it fulfills Jesus' prediction (Luke 21:12). Still, the gospel meets with significant numerical success (Acts 4:4).

4:5-22, Peter and John Before the Council. Naming members of the high-priestly family underscores the intimidating stature of the assembled Temple authorities. Annas and Caiaphas are introduced earlier as a reference point for the ministry of John the Baptist (Luke 3:2) but are unmentioned in Luke's passion narrative (cf. Matt. 26:3, 57; John 18:13-14, 24, 28; cf. 11:49). Though Annas is called high priest (Acts 4:6), he actually presided ca. A.D. 6-14. His son-in-law Caiaphas, who officiated ca. A.D. 17-36, would have been high priest during this time.

Like Jesus (Luke 20:1-8), Peter and John are challenged by the Temple authorities who inquire specifically about the lame man (Acts 4:7). As before, Peter is the principal spokesperson (v. 8), whose testimony is prompted by the Holy Spirit, in keeping with Jesus' promise (Luke 12:11-12). Salvation, understood doubly as the power to make well and to forgive sins (cf. Luke 4:18-19; 7:21-23), is now located exclusively in Jesus and his effectual name (Acts 4:12; cf. 2:21; 3:6, 16). With Jesus specifically identified as the stone rejected by Zion's builders but elevated preeminently (Ps. 118:22), readers now understand fully the parable of the vineyard (Luke 20:9-18; cf. 1 Pet. 2:4, 6-8).

The council (Acts 4:15) of authorities who had been Jesus' antagonists (Luke 22:66-23:16) are struck by Peter's unusual boldness (Acts 4:8-12). Similar forthrightness, which derives from the Spirit (Luke 12:11-12; Acts 4:8, 31), will continue to characterize their preaching (4:29) and later that of Paul (9:27-29; 13:46; 14:3; 19:8; 26:26; 28:31; cf. also 18:26).

The council also marvels that they were "unlettered," i.e., not literate as the result of formal schooling, and "outsiders," i.e., nonprofessionals (4:13). How the council identifies them with Jesus is uncertain; perhaps through their Galilean accent (cf. 1:11; 2:7; also Luke 22:59).

With the healed man standing in their midst as undeniable proof of the apostles' power, the council is stymied (Acts 4:16). Their inability to confute this visible sign of apostolic power renders true the earlier prediction of Jesus (Luke 21:15; also Acts 6:10). Their injunction (4:18) is two-pronged: neither to speak, i.e., heal anymore by pronouncing the name of Jesus (3:6), nor teach, i.e., preach publicly a message under his authority or with him as its subject (as, e.g., 3:12-26; 4:8-12). This second ban is later recalled explicitly (5:28).

Peter and John respond defiantly (4:19-20). They are compelled to speak what they have seen and heard, presumably the "deeds and words" of Jesus recorded in the Gospel (1:1; cf.

10:39; also 26:15) but most notably the Passion and resurrection (Luke 24:48; Acts 1:8, 22).

By reporting their release by the council (Acts 4:21), Luke notes the absence of any legal case against them. This action by a Jewish council signifies vindication by God, who becomes the object of widespread praise (v. 21).

4:23-31, Praying Confidently. The apostles' release is celebrated among "their own," perhaps the other apostles, more probably the small circle of disciples earlier depicted as a community of prayer (1:14; 2:42; cf. 6:4). Like Peter's earlier speeches (2:14-36; 3:12-26), the friends' prayer interprets aspects of Jesus' life as explicitly fulfilling Scripture. Its centerpiece is Ps. 2:1-2, which mentions adversaries of "the Lord" (Yahweh) and "his Anointed" (Gk. Christos). Luke interpreted the latter as a sure reference to Jesus, anointed with God's Spirit at his baptism (Luke 3:22; cf. 4:1, 14; Acts 10:38), hence becoming "beloved Son," or, as here, "God's holy child" (4:27).

The exact identification of the adversaries mentioned in the psalm (vv. 25-26) is difficult. As "Gentiles," the Romans are clearly implicated (Luke 23:36; cf. 23:11). The "peoples" are understood as Israel (Acts 4:27), consistent with Luke's depiction of "the [Jewish] people" as active conspirators (Luke 23:13; Acts 2:23; 3:13-14). The "kings of the earth" may refer to Herod, and "rulers" to Pilate, although Luke normally uses "rulers" to designate Jewish leaders (Luke 23:13, 35; 24:20; Acts 3:17; cf. 4:5, 8).

Here Acts looks back to the Gospel and provides a fresh interpretation of Jesus' Passion. This may help explain why Luke alone of the four Gospels includes Herod Antipas as a participant in the passion narrative, indeed connects him directly with Pontius Pilate (Luke 23:6-16).

The prayer's primary subject is God, who is addressed as Creator, and therefore Sovereign (Acts 4:24) who foretold these events (through David). Enemy actions against Jesus are placed under God's sovereignty (v. 28; cf. 2:23; Luke 22:22). This reassures the church that the resistance it now experiences is analogous to what Jesus experienced. Like Jesus, the church can expect to be vindicated by God, who is asked to empower the apostolic servants boldly to "speak the word," i.e., preach the gospel (cf. Acts 8:25; 11:19; 16:6, 32; cf. Phil. 1:14).

The prayer calls for the preached word to be accompanied by healing and "signs and wonders" in the name of Jesus (Acts 4:30), but these are seen as performed directly by "God's hand," not through human "power or piety" (cf. 3:12). This explains all the more why the council's injunction against such deeds is futile (4:7, 17–18)—it is an attempt to obstruct God's own work—and also why the apostolic witness cannot be suppressed (4:20).

God answers their prayer by providing visible signs: a quaking house and being filled with the Spirit. What was requested in prayer—boldness to preach—comes to pass, thus providing an instance of promise fulfillment within the story itself (v. 31).

4:32–5:11

Using Possessions

Luke's focus on apostolic activity in 3:1–4:31 resumes in 5:12, but this section focuses on a wider circle—the “company of believers” (v. 32)—and how God's presence is felt within the community through the proper and improper use of possessions.

4:32–37, Sharing Possessions: Barnabas.

With “everything in common,” the community fulfills the Hellenistic ideal of friendship expressed in sharing possessions. By selling property to care for its poor, it embodies the ideal Israel (Deut. 15:4; Lev. 25:35–38).

This generalized portrait of community generosity and submission to apostolic authority is rendered concrete in the actions of a single property owner, the Levite Joseph. The name given him by the apostles, Barnabas, is his more usual NT designation and serves to distinguish him from Joseph Barsabbas (Acts 1:23). Precisely how, if at all, the name means “son of encouragement” is unclear (→ Barnabas).

5:1–11, Hoarding Possessions: Ananias and Sapphira.

This negative counterpart to the story of Barnabas is partially influenced by the OT story of Achan, whose deceitful misappropriation of sacred possessions adversely affected Israel and resulted in radical exclusion from the community: the death of him and his family (Josh. 7:16–26).

The story continues to portray the church as a Spirit-filled community (Acts 4:31), Peter as a powerful prophetic figure, and is designed to elicit proper respect for the holy among the church itself, as well as outsiders (5:5, 11). Peter's enhanced prophetic status is reflected in his knowledge of Ananias' misdeed (v. 3) and the lethal force of his indictment of Sapphira (v. 9).

Precisely how and why they were at fault should be noted. The narrative implies that property owners could sell their possessions without thereby committing themselves to the community ideal of sharing everything in common (v. 4; cf. Deut. 23:21–23; though cf. Acts 4:32, 34). Their fatal mistake was in their failure to recognize the church as a Spirit-filled community and in failing to see that deceiving the church—and themselves—was tantamount to deceiving the Spirit. The couple's misuse of possessions is attributed to satanic force (5:3), paralleling Judas' misdeed (Luke 22:3; cf. John 13:2, 27).

5:12–42

Further Prophetic Witness in the Temple

5:12–16, Apostolic Signs and Wonders in the Temple.

This summary shifts the action back to the apostles and, in fulfillment of the prayer of 4:29–30 (also 2:19), portrays their ministry of signs and wonders as stunningly successful. The locus of activity is still the Temple, “Solomon's portico” (5:12; cf. 3:11; also John 10:23), although the marvelous effects of their activity now extend into the streets, even to “towns around Jerusalem” (Acts 5:16).

This summary extends spatial limits, but numerical limits as well. No numbers are given (cf. 2:41; 4:4), but the size of the group multiplies, encompassing women (mentioned as a group for the first time) as well as men (5:14). The generalized picture of apostolic activity is once again focused in the person of Peter, whose shadow even has therapeutic power (v. 15). Somewhat similar is the healing power of Jesus' clothing (Mark 6:56; suprisingly omitted by Luke; though cf. Luke 6:18–19) and cloths touched by Paul (19:12).

5:17–26, Apostles Arrested. In response to increased apostolic successes, a second resistance occurs. Again, the high priest (v. 17), presumably Annas (4:6), and the Sadducees form the core of opposition (4:1), prompted by jealousy (cf. 13:45; 17:5). The restraining action is more intense than previously; all the apostles, not just Peter and John, are placed in a public prison, or, perhaps, are imprisoned publicly (5:18).

The release is proportionately more dramatic and is the first of three instances in Acts when a prison miraculously opens (cf. 12:6–11; 16:25–27). It is achieved by an “angel of the Lord” (i.e., God; cf. Exod. 3:2), who makes the first of several appearances in the Acts narrative (7:30; 8:26; 10:3; 12:7, 11, 23; 27:23; cf. Luke 1:11; 2:9; for OT angels in deliverance roles, cf. Dan. 3:28; 6:22). The effect is heightened by the subsequent description in Acts 5:23. Moreover, the angel countermands the council's earlier injunction (4:18) and commissions the apostles to return to the Temple and teach “all the words of this life” (5:20), i.e., resurrection life pioneered by Christ (cf. 3:15; also John 6:68; Phil. 2:16). The apostles comply, both with the angel's command and the earlier prayer (Acts 4:29). Ironically, the miraculous release of the apostles is achieved by an angel, whose existence the Sadducees deny (23:8).

The authorities assembled to hear the case were introduced earlier (5:22; 4:5–6). The council (cf. 4:15) and “all the senate of the children of Israel” (5:21) are probably the same body (cf. Exod. 12:21; also 1 Macc. 12:6; 2 Macc. 1:10; Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 13.166). The dialogue in Acts 5:23–26 heightens the drama, portraying the council as comically helpless. The rhetorical flourish in v. 24b, in which the officers “wonder what this might come to,” provides on the lips of an outsider an unintentional prophetic insight of the outcome of future events; similarly, Gamaliel's words in 5:38–39.

5:27–32, Apostles' Defense. Though it is the apostles who are brought before the council and presented as making their collective defense (vv. 27, 29), Peter remains prominent (v. 29). The high priest's accusation (v. 28) recalls the council's earlier injunction (4:18), although the blood-guilt motif (5:28) is new (cf. 18:6; Matt. 27:25). It presupposes the earlier sermon summaries that directly accuse the Jewish people (Acts 2:23; 3:14–15) and leaders (4:10). Strictly speaking, it only implicates the high priests and the council, who are being addressed here.

The apostolic response opens by noting the moral obligation of obeying God rather than humans (5:29; cf. 4:19). The words are reminiscent of Socrates' defense before the men of Athens, “I shall obey the god rather than you” (Plato Apology 29D). Presupposed is the divine command of the angel (Acts 5:20–21) but earlier mandates as well (Luke 24:45–49; Acts 1:8; 4:29). The apostles have seen what their opponents have failed to see—that God has been at work in recent events (3:12, 16).

The defense summary (5:30–32) encapsulates major elements of early Christian preaching: God's raising Christ (3:15; 4:10; 10:40; 13:30, 37); Christ's death by “hanging on a tree” (Acts 10:39; Gal. 3:13; cf. Deut. 21:22–23); God's exaltation of Christ (Acts 2:33), identified, as earlier, as “pioneer (of life) and savior” (cf. 3:15); call for repentance (2:38; 3:19; 11:18; 26:20); and offer of forgiveness of sins (Luke 24:47; Acts 2:38; 3:19; 10:43; 13:38). God's role as primary agent is again stressed (5:30–31; cf. 3:12–26). Through divine reversal, God has righted their misdeed. The concluding motif is the double witness of the apostles and the Holy Spirit (5:32; Luke 24:48; Acts 1:8; cf. John 15:26–27), a gift to the obedient (Acts 2:38; also John 7:39).

5:33–42, Apostles Vindicated: Gamaliel. The council's violent urge to kill the apostles (v.

33) foreshadows its later reaction to Stephen (7:54; cf. 23:10). Vindication of the apostles comes through Gamaliel who urges caution (5:35; → Gamaliel [2]). Aligning Gamaliel with the Christian movement typically pits a sympathetic Pharisaic position against adversarial Sadducees (cf. 23:6–10; also 4:1; 5:17; Luke 20:27–40). Citing two examples of misspent leadership—Theudas (Acts 5:36) and Judas the Galilean (v. 37)—he proposes a hands-off policy (v. 38a; → Judas [7]; Theudas; Zealot). He warns his colleagues against becoming “God-fighters” (vv. 38b–39). Through this sympathetic outsider, Luke expresses his own viewpoint: to oppose the Christian movement is to oppose God. All such efforts are ill-fated (e.g., Herod, 12:22–23).

By accepting the advice of Gamaliel, the council vindicates the apostles. The punishment of beating (5:40; cf. 16:22–23; 22:19; 2 Cor. 11:24) is more severe than the earlier threat (4:21) but conforms to Jesus' promise (Luke 21:12; esp. Mark 13:9; Matt. 24:17). The prohibition to speak in the name of Jesus is repeated (4:18). The apostolic response was to rejoice in the face of persecution (Luke 6:23; cf. Matt. 5:12; also 1 Pet. 4:13; 2 Thess. 1:4), considering it honorable to suffer for the name (Acts 9:16; 15:26; 21:13). In defiant disobedience, they resume daily teaching and preaching (5:42; cf. 5:21; Luke 20:1).

Prophetic Witness Extends Beyond the Apostles: Stephen

The scope of the narrative now widens beyond the apostles and Temple. The next episode serves to introduce the next two major figures in the narrative—Stephen (6:8–8:1; also 11:19; 22:20) and Philip (8:5–40; also 21:8). A third new figure, Saul (9:1–30), is introduced in connection with Stephen (7:58–8:3). Peter re-emerges as a major figure in 9:32–12:25.

6:1–7, Choosing Seven Apostolic Assistants. The previously unified community (2:42–47; 4:32) experiences its first friction, the exact nature of which depends on properly identifying the disputing parties as well as their underlying differences (→ Greeks; Hebrews; Hellenists). The neglect of the widows (6:1; cf. 1 Tim. 5:9–16) possibly resulted from ideological differences between the Aramaic-speaking Hebrew Christians who supervised the daily distribution of assistance (4:35) and the Greek-speaking Hellenistic Christians.

As a solution, the church (identified here for the first time as “disciples,” 6:1, 2, 7) selects (vv. 3, 5) from their number seven men, who are installed by the apostles (vv. 3, 6), designated only here in Acts as "the twelve" (v. 2; cf. 1:26; 2:14; but cf. Luke 6:13; 8:1; 9:1, 12; 18:31; 22:3, 30, 47; also 1 Cor. 15:5, 7, 9). Their ordination to special service occurs by apostolic "laying on of hands" (Acts 6:6; cf. 13:3; 1 Tim. 4:14; 5:22; 2 Tim. 1:6; Heb. 6:2), a ritual act with OT precedent (Num. 8:10; 27:18, 23; Deut. 34:9), also employed in connection with baptism (Acts 8:17-19; 19:6) and healing (9:17; 28:8; cf. 5:12; 14:3; 19:11; also Luke 4:40; 13:13; Matt. 9:18; 19:13; Mark 6:5; 7:32; 8:23, 25; 16:18). The story, or process, reflects OT influence (Exod. 18:17-23; Num. 11:1-25; 27:15-23).

This group, which became known as "the seven" (Acts 21:8), is not here designated "deacons" (cf. Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:8-13). The two whose service is described further—Stephen and Philip—are distinguished by their prophetic deeds and words (cf. Acts 6:8, 10; 8:5-7, 13; 21:8). This is appropriate since their qualifications, apart from being well respected (cf. 16:2; 22:12; 1 Tim. 3:7, 10) and wise, included being Spirit-filled (Acts 6:3, 5; cf. 11:24; 13:52; also Luke 4:1; cf. Exod. 31:3; 35:31). "Full of faith" (Acts 6:5) may mean wonder-working faith (cf. Matt. 17:20; 21:21; Mark 11:22-23; also 1 Cor. 12:9; 13:2).

Their seven Greek names need not imply that they were native Greeks. Specifying that the Antiochian Nicolaus had become a convert to Judaism (Acts 6:5; cf. 13:43; also 2:10) suggests that the others were native Jews.

The successful resolution of the dispute is indicated by the impressive growth (6:7), especially the conversion of "a great many priests," a first. Luke thereby underscores Christianity's deepening penetration, and displacement, of the central Jewish institution—the Temple.

6:8-15, Stephen's Arrest. Resistance to Christianity now extends beyond Sadducees and Temple authorities (4:1; 5:17) to include Diaspora Jews resident in Jerusalem (6:9) and, for the first time, "the [Jewish] people" (v. 12). Whether Stephen's opponents should be envisioned as a single synagogue with different constituencies (Freedmen, Cyrenians, Alexandrians, Cilicians, Asians) or, more likely, as two separate groups—African Jews who comprised "the synagogue of freedmen" and Asian Jews—their loyalty was to the Jerusalem Temple and the Mosaic law. They see Stephen as a threat to both (v. 11). The second group later opposes Paul on the same grounds (21:27; cf. 25:8).

Unable to confute the prophetic deeds and words of the Spirit-filled Stephen (6:8, 10; cf. Luke 21:15), they resort to false witnesses and contrived charges that link Stephen's preaching to Jesus (Acts 6:13-14). Luke's account of Jesus' trial before the Sanhedrin (Luke 22:66-71) omits reference to false witnesses and their charge that he would destroy the Temple and rebuild it in three days (Matt. 26:59-61; Mark 14:55-58; cf. John 2:19-22; also Matt. 27:40; Mark 15:29).

7:1-53, Stephen's Sermon. The sermon surveys Israel's history in broad sweep, highlighting three figures: Abraham (vv. 2-8), Joseph (vv. 9-16), and especially Moses (vv. 17-43). It then treats the tabernacle/Temple (vv. 44-50) and concludes by assailing the hearers for identifying with Israel's heritage of resistance (vv. 51-53).

The historical survey is reminiscent of OT historical summaries that rehearse God's dealings with Israel (Josh. 24:1-15; Neh. 9:6-38; Jth. 5:5-21; Pss. 78, 105, 106, 135, 136). If anything, it reflects more the censorious spirit of Psalms 78 and 106, which stress Israel's persistent, cyclical disobedience throughout its history, than it does the more positive, doxological spirit of Psalm 105, which recalls God's gracious care and deliverance of Israel.

With its explicit OT quotations (Amos 5:25-27 in Acts 7:42-43; Isa. 66:1-2 in vv. 49-50), frequent OT phrases, references, and allusions, the speech has a thoroughly biblical ring. The hearers are being confronted with their own story told in the words of Scripture, although the treatment of events is selective rather than comprehensive.

In treating Abraham, Stephen omits most of the material in Gen. 12:10-16:16 and 18:1-23:20, most notably his severest test of faith, the offering of Isaac (Gen. 22). He essentially skips Isaac (Acts 7:8; Gen. 21, 24, 26) and includes Jacob (Acts 7:8; Gen. 25:19-34; chaps. 27-36) in the more important treatment of Joseph (Acts 7:9-18). He gives disproportionate attention to Moses' birth and youth (vv. 20-22), his slaying of the Egyptian (vv. 23-29), and his call (vv. 30-34), all of which summarize Exod. 1:1-4:17. He telescopes the rest of Exodus through Deuteronomy in a single section (Acts 7:35-41), major focus of which is Israel's rejection of Moses and God's consequent rejection of Israel. The giving of the law, which is prominently treated in Exod. 19-20, is mentioned only briefly (Acts 7:38).

At this point, the historical survey ceases rather abruptly, as Stephen introduces a fresh topic: the Temple. This part of the speech is less interested in historical coverage than it is in the tabernacle/Temple theme. He concludes with a trenchant critique of the Temple, citing Isa. 66:1-2 to show that no handmade building is adequate to house God.

In spite of its thoroughly biblical ring and the way in which it confronts Stephen's "brethren and fathers" (Acts 7:2) with their own story, there are some points of tension with the OT. For example, it places Abraham's call, which Genesis locates in Haran after the death of his father Terah (Gen. 11:31-12:3), much earlier "in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran" (Acts 7:2-3). His report of Abraham's purchasing a tomb in Shechem from the sons of Hamor (v. 16) conflates Abraham's purchase of the cave of Machpelah from the Hittites for a burial place (Gen. 23; 50:13) with Jacob's purchase of a piece of land near the city of Shechem from the sons of Hamor (Gen. 33:19; Josh. 24:32).

The speech may be read as a unified defense that develops three interrelated themes: God's dwelling place; promise-fulfillment; and Israel's rejection of God's duly appointed emissaries.

Stephen insists that, as early as Abraham, Israel is promised a place to worship God (Acts 7:7b; Exod. 3:12), the land of promise (Acts 7:4). Though removed to Egypt to live as aliens in a "land belonging to others" (vv. 6, 9-15), all the patriarchs were returned for burial in the promised land (v. 16). Still, "as the time of the promise drew near" (v. 17), the people of promise remained in Egypt until God commissioned Moses to deliver them (v. 34). They spurned Moses' leadership and "in their hearts turned to Egypt" (v. 39), thus refusing the chance to obtain their promised "place." Consequently, they would be exiled again "beyond Babylon" (v. 43). Eventually, the patriarchs transferred the "tent of witness" from the wilderness to the promised land (vv. 44-45), whereupon David and Solomon sought to establish a more permanent "dwelling place for the God of Jacob" (v. 46). Contrary to the prophetic word (Isa. 66:1-2), they mistakenly thought God's presence could be confined to a handmade house. Consequently, even with the Jerusalem Temple, God's initial promise (Acts 7:7b) remained unfulfilled (vv. 49-50). The "place" where God's Spirit resides, and where the presence of God is dramatically at work, is no longer the Temple but the newly constituted messianic community, which finally fulfills God's original promise.

Although the rejection theme emerges only in the latter part of the speech, and especially with reference to Moses, it is introduced earlier. The jealous patriarchs are censured for selling Joseph, only to have their misdeed reversed by divine intervention (v. 9). But it was Moses, above all, whose leadership was rejected by "his brethren, the sons of Israel" (v. 23). First, they refused to accept his God-sent deliverance of a fellow Israelite (vv. 25-28), which led to his exile in Midian. Second, they rejected him as the God-sent "ruler and deliverer" (v. 35) who would bring them to the land of promise, and this in spite of stunning displays of God's presence through him: wonders and signs in Egypt, deliverance through the Red Sea, receiving the law at Sinai (vv. 35-38). Instead, they "thrust him aside" (v. 39), turned their hearts toward Egypt, and became idolaters (vv. 40-41). Consequently, God rejected them, turning them over to their idolatrous instincts (vv. 42-43). The speech is informed by the conviction that Moses prefigures Christ. Read against the background of the rest of Luke-Acts, the speech presents the career of Moses, and Israel's reaction to him, in ways that parallel the Christ story (v. 37; cf. 3:22-23; Luke 24:19).

The rejection theme reaches its climax in the concluding indictment (Acts 7:51-53). With vivid metaphors drawn from their own past, the hearers are characterized as "stiff-necked" (Exod. 33:3, 5) and "uncircumcised in heart and ears" (Lev. 26:41; Deut. 10:16; Ezek. 44:7; Jer. 6:10; 9:26). They are assailed as historically having resisted God's Holy Spirit (cf. Isa. 63:10) and standing in the succession of their predecessors who persecuted and killed the prophets (cf. 1 Kings 19:10, 14; 2 Chron. 24:20-22; 36:16; Neh. 9:26; Jer. 26:20-23; also Jer. 2:30). Stephen's indictment here echoes Jesus' earlier accusation (Luke 11:47-51). The hearers are implicated in the betrayal and death of the innocent prophet Jesus, the "Righteous One" (cf. Acts 3:14).

7:54-8:3, Stephen's Death and Its Impact.

Resistance to prophetic words (6:10; 7:2-53) and deeds (6:8) now intensifies as the council, which earlier could only threaten, imprison, and wish to kill (5:33), finally does kill. Stephen's final accusation sends them into teeth-gritting rage (7:54; Ps. 35:16; 37:12; 112:10; Job 16:9; Lam. 2:16). In stark contrast, ■ Spirit-filled Stephen (Acts 7:55; also 6:3, 5) behaves like a prophet: he gazes into heaven to see God's glory (Isa. 6:1; John 12:41). He now vividly sees what Jesus had promised this same council would occur—the Son of man exalted to God's right hand (Luke 22:69), albeit standing (Dan. 7:13) rather than seated (Ps. 110:1). In reporting to the council what he sees (Acts 7:56), he both confesses and proclaims (for the first time) the risen Lord.

These same words attest the innocence of God's "Righteous One" whom they have slain (v. 52) and thereby convict the hearers. By rejecting yet another of God's prophets, the new Moses of whom their own law spoke (v. 37; Deut. 18:15), they stand under God's judgment and the threat of another expulsion from God's presence (Acts 7:42-43; cf. 3:23).

This unusual form of proclamation is met with mob violence (7:57) and a rejection that recalls Jesus' own rejection at Nazareth (Luke 4:29; cf. Job 16:10). The council's actions conform to the biblical prescription for dealing with blasphemers: death by stoning outside the city (Lev. 24:13-16; Num. 15:32-36; cf. Heb.

13:12–13), with witnesses going first (Deut. 17:2–7).

Once again, the crazed mob's frenzy contrasts with the prophet's calm confidence. Stephen's death is sketched in terms that recall Jesus' own Passion. It is the death of another innocent prophet. Like Jesus, Stephen utters a prayer of confidence rephrasing Ps. 31:5 (Acts 7:59; Luke 23:46) and finally "in a loud voice" (Luke 23:46) offers a prayer of forgiveness for his enemies (Acts 7:60; Luke 23:34).

The death of Stephen also functions to introduce Saul (Acts 7:58; 8:1, 3), who gradually enters the story (9:1–30; 11:25, 30; 12:25) and emerges as the major figure in chaps. 13–28. His participation in Stephen's death becomes a major reference point for Luke (Acts 9:1, 21; 22:4, 20; 26:9–11; cf. 1 Cor. 15:9; Phil. 3:6; Gal. 1:13, 23).

Stephen's death becomes pivotal in the narrative and marks a major transition. The "great persecution" (Acts 8:1) now widens the circle of resistance beyond Temple authorities and Jerusalem residents (chaps. 3–5; 6:12). Its salutary effect is to scatter the church throughout Judea and Samaria, in keeping with Jesus' mandate (1:8). Imagined here is a single, great community of believers, now expelled from Jerusalem. The apostles, however, remain behind to authenticate the gospel as it spreads beyond Jerusalem (8:1; cf. 8:14; 11:1, 22).

8:4–12:25

The Gospel Spreads Outside Jerusalem to Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and the Coastland

8:4–40

Prophetic Witness of Philip

8:4–8, Philip Preaches in Samaria. A new phase opens as the gospel moves beyond Jerusalem and Judea to Samaria (1:8; 8:25). The major figure in this expansion is Philip, earlier introduced as one of "the seven" (6:5), later identified as an "evangelist" living in Caesarea (21:8; → Philip [8]). The "city of Samaria" where he proclaimed Christ may have been either Sebaste or Shechem (→ Samaria, District of). This region, earlier unreceptive to Jesus' mission (Luke 9:52–56; though cf. John 4), "gives heed" (cf. Acts 8:10; 16:14; also Heb. 2:1), thereby fulfilling the prophetic hope that "peoples from afar" would hearken to the word of God (Isa. 49:1). Power to exorcise unclean spirits, earlier demonstrated by Jesus (Luke 4:31–37; 8:26–33) now extends beyond the apostles (Acts 5:16) to Philip, as does the power to heal the lame (Luke 5:18–26; Acts 3:1–11; cf. 9:32–34). God's reign, begun with Jesus (Luke 4:18–19; 7:22–23), continues through Philip's prophetic words and deeds (Acts 8:6).

8:9–13, Simon the Magician Converted.

This first encounter with magic (cf. 13:6–12; 19:18–19) exemplifies both the gospel's triumph over popular religion and the corrupting power of greed (8:18–24). Luke emphasizes Simon's Samaritan connection (v. 9), his presumptuous claim to be "somebody great," or perhaps a "great magician" (v. 9b; cf. 5:36; 12:22–23), his unquestioned success among the Samaritans, who apparently ascribed him divine status (8:10–11; → Simon Magus).

Simon's miracle-working prowess, however, is surpassed by Philip's two-pronged ministry of preaching and healing. In preaching the kingdom of God, he continues the theme sounded by the risen Lord (1:3), the first to do so explicitly in Acts (see Introduction). Preaching "the name of Jesus" doubtless signifies the "signs and great miracles" Philip performed (8:13; also vv. 6–7). Incredibly, and impressively, "even Simon" converts (v. 13).

8:14–25, Apostles Confirm the Samaritan Mission.

Even though God's power has been demonstrated through Philip's prophetic words and deeds (vv. 6–7) and has triumphed over Samaria's own hero Simon, apostolic authentication is still required (v. 14). The apostles who remained behind in Jerusalem (8:1) continue to serve as the vital link with the risen Lord (1:15–26). Their role is to validate authentic expressions of the Spirit when it moves out into new areas (cf. Acts 11:1, 22). As before, the apostolic circle is represented by the two emissaries Peter and John (8:14; cf. 3:1, 11; 4:13, 19), but Peter is clearly the spokesperson. Philip disappears from the Simon story, as it becomes a confrontation between Peter and a half-converted magician (cf. 5:1–11). Though Peter's Pentecost promise (2:38) appeared to imply a simultaneous bestowal of forgiveness and receipt of the Holy Spirit, here the two benefits are separated by a considerable lapse of time (cf. 10:44–48; 19:5–6).

Luke especially highlights the behavior of Simon. The genuineness of his full conversion is presupposed (8:13). Yet, like his Christian predecessors Ananias and Sapphira (5:1–11), he misconstrues the true nature of the Spirit and thereby the gospel. He mistakenly thinks, first, that the power to transmit the Spirit can be given to anyone indiscriminately, especially outside the apostolic circle, and second, that it can be bought (8:18) and, presumably, sold (v. 19). Peter's rebuke (vv. 20–23) takes the form of a curse, ironically almost magical in form if not in effect. The tone is solemnly biblical (cf. Deut. 12:12; 14:27, 29; Ps. 78:37; Deut. 29:18; Lam. 3:15; Isa. 58:6).

The possibility of repentance is real (though cf. Heb. 6:4-6). Simon's prayer for forgiveness (Acts 8:24) has the imploring tones of Pharaoh's confession and prayer before Moses and Aaron (Exod. 9:28; 10:17) and for this reason may be as halfhearted. Once the apostles confirm Philip's work, they themselves preach among the Samaritans (Acts 8:25).

8:26-40, Ethiopian Official Converted. In this story, the gospel continues its geographical spread beyond Judea and Samaria to the more distant coastland region, including Gaza (v. 26), and finally Azotus (Ashdod) and Caesarea (v. 40). In effect, however, the gospel has spread even farther—to the outer reaches of Ethiopia (v. 27), where the first known black Christian returned rejoicing in his newfound faith (v. 39).

If the previous story featured Philip's prophetic deeds (vv. 6-7, 13), this one features his prophetic words. His preaching of Christ (vv. 5, 12) is now seen to include Scripture interpretation as a prominent element. Like the risen Lord and his predecessors Peter (chaps. 2-5) and Stephen (chap. 7), his task is properly to interpret Scripture as it relates to Christ (Luke 24:27).

The episode further extends Luke's promise fulfillment program as yet another passage of Scripture is applied to Jesus (Acts 8:32-33). For the first time in Luke-Acts (and as a rare NT instance), Jesus' death is interpreted in light of Isa. 53:7-8: Jesus the suffering servant is denied justice in his death ("humiliation") yet vindicated in his resurrection ("life . . . taken up from the earth"). This interpretation continues the Lucan emphasis on Jesus' death as that of an innocent prophet (cf. Acts 3:14).

The story is presented as an extraordinary encounter in which God is the primary actor. From beginning to end, Philip is prompted by divine impulse (8:26, 29, 39), as later happens when the Spirit launches new initiatives (cf. 10:19; 11:12; 13:2; 16:6-10). Like his prophetic predecessors Elijah and Ezekiel, he moves at the behest of the angel of the Lord (8:26; 2 Kings 1:15) or of the Spirit, who even transfers him physically to a new locale for further mission (Acts 8:39; cf. 1 Kings 18:12; 2 Kings 2:16; Ezek. 3:14; 8:3; 11:1, 24). With such thoroughgoing, explicit divine confirmation, further apostolic confirmation would be redundant (cf. Acts 8:14-17).

The eunuch's conversion (unlike Simon's) is fully exemplary and illustrates the gospel's power to reach even the remotest regions and include outsiders (Luke 1:79). Ethiopia's remoteness and invincibility were legendary (cf. Isa. 18:1-2; Zeph. 2:12; cf. Ps. 68:31; Zeph. 3:10).

If the term "eunuch" is understood in its technical sense as a castrated male, his status as an outsider is further indicated (Deut. 23:1). It may, however, be an official title having nothing to do with his physical condition, thus indicating the social respectability of his position as the queen's minister of finance.

His inclusion within the people of God here appears to fulfill the prophetic hope that foreigners and eunuchs would eventually participate fully in the worship of God (Isa. 56:3-7). Yet, significantly, the foreigner who was previously attracted to Israel and its house of worship (1 Kings 8:41-43) is now attracted by their successor—"the good news of Jesus" (v. 35).

9:1-31

The Gospel Spreads to Damascus: Saul of Tarsus

This episode advances the Lucan narrative in two ways. First, it establishes the extraordinary nature of Saul's call, thereby certifying God's duly appointed prophet to the Gentiles who later emerges as the central figure in the church's mission (chaps. 13-28). Second, it extends the story geographically, documenting the church's spread from the coastlands (8:40) to northernmost Syria—Damascus (9:2, 3, 8, 10, 19, 22, 27), where the gospel had already taken root (v. 19b). The Damascus congregation is probably to be understood as an offshoot of the dispersion resulting from the Jerusalem persecution (8:1).

9:1-19a, Saul's Call. The story has two parts: first, Saul's encounter with the risen Lord (vv. 1-9), and second, Ananias's vision and ordination of Saul (vv. 10-19a). This narrative account is supplemented in certain ways by the two later accounts that occur in Paul's defense speeches (22:3-21; 26:2-23; also cf. Gal. 1:13-17).

Luke's portrait of Saul as the church's archenemy continues (cf. Acts 7:58; 8:1, 3) though his resistance now intensifies. His reach now extends beyond Judea (8:3) to the "synagogues at Damascus" (9:2), which are under Jerusalem's jurisdiction. The narrative implies that the intended victims are Jewish Christians who still attend synagogue.

This scene resembles other ancient accounts where enemies of God's cause through divine intervention are dramatically halted and "converted" into God's proponents (cf. 2 Macc. 3:24-40; 4 Macc. 4:1-14). The encounter is presented as a truly extraordinary reversal of events through direct, divine intervention. The blinding light appearing suddenly from heaven signifies God's dramatic interruption (Acts 9:3; cf. 22:6; 26:13). Although Saul does not "see" anyone (nor do his companions, 9:7), clearly the risen Lord "appeared" to him, presumably in a vision (v. 17; 22:14; 26:16; cf. 1 Cor. 9:1; 15:8; 2 Cor. 4:6; Gal. 1:16).

More important here than what is seen is what is heard: a prophetic call. A heavenly voice speaks to Saul using a form of double address found in earlier divine commissions (Gen. 46:2; Exod. 3:4; 1 Sam. 3:4; also cf. Luke 8:24; 10:41; 22:31). The voice indicts by interpreting Saul's activity with reference to the new reality of Christ's resurrection: to persecute (reject) Christians is to persecute (reject) Christ (Acts 9:5; Luke 10:16). The voice attests that Jesus, once rejected but now risen and vindicated, continues to be active in history. Earlier he had exerted healing power (Acts 3:16); now he exerts power to call new prophets.

The presence of witnesses, who also heard the voice (v. 7; though, cf. 22:9), confirms the reality of the occurrence. They correspond to the company of Israel who can attest the reality of God's revelation to Moses (Deut. 4:12; also cf. Wisd. of Sol. 18:1; Dan. 10:7).

It is Ananias, the Jewish Christian disciple from Damascus (cf. Acts 22:12), who experiences an explicitly defined vision (9:10), the first of several in Acts (10:3, 17, 19; 11:5; 12:9; 16:9-10; 18:9; 22:17; 23:11; 27:23; cf. Matt. 17:9). The risen Lord also speaks to him, directing his actions from heaven. In the dialogue, the Lord reveals Saul's whereabouts (Acts 9:11), predicts what is to occur (v. 12), but most importantly, encapsulates his commission to Saul (vv. 15-16).

These words summarize Luke's theological understanding of Paul as God's "chosen instrument" (cf. 22:15; Rom. 1:5; Gal. 1:15-16) and preview Paul's role later in the narrative. His chief contribution to the church's mission will be to carry the Lord's name "before the Gentiles" (Acts 13:46-49; 15:3-4, 12; 22:21; 26:16-18; 28:25-29). Yet he will also witness to the name "before kings" (25:13, 23; 26:1; 27:24; cf. Luke 12:11), as well as before "the sons of Israel" (e.g., Acts 9:19-22; 13:5, 16-41). Like the prophets (7:52), he will also suffer (9:23, 29; 13:45, 50; 14:19; 16:19-40; 19:23-41; 21:11, 27-36; 22:22; 23:10, 12-15, 27; 24:23; 25:3; 26:21; 28:17). In doing so, he follows his apostolic predecessors (5:41; cf. 15:26). In this latter respect, Luke's narrative portrait is confirmed by Paul's Letters (1 Cor. 4:9-13; 2 Cor. 6:4-10; 11:23-29).

With his deepest fears allayed by the Lord's command, Ananias obediently proceeds to ordain God's designee (Acts 9:17-19a). By laying his hands on Saul, he bestows God's healing power and restores his sight (vv. 12, 17). The reality of the healing is attested by the scales falling from his eyes (v. 18; cf. Tob. 11:12-13). Possibly, his restored sight is to be understood as the visible sign of the Spirit's presence (Acts 9:17), elsewhere manifested through speaking in tongues (cf. 2:1-4; 10:46; 19:6). His baptism removes the guilt resulting from his previous misdeeds (cf. 22:16).

9:19b-31, Saul in Damascus and Jerusalem. Saul immediately begins to carry out his divinely appointed role of preaching to the "sons of Israel" (v. 15; cf. vv. 20, 22, 27-29). Typically, prophetic proclamation is met with resistance that entailed suffering (v. 16; cf. vv. 21, 23, 29; cf. Luke 13:33-34; Acts 7:51-52). Thus this brief description of Saul's activity, first in Damascus (9:19b-25) and subsequently in Jerusalem (vv. 26-29), itself becomes a fulfillment of the Lord's words to Ananias (vv. 15-16).

The portrait of Paul that emerges here is a miniature of the portrait that unfolds later in the narrative: Paul preaching Jesus as Son of God (v. 20), the Christ (v. 22), and Lord (v. 29)—central themes of his missionary preaching (cf., e.g., 13:33; 17:3; 18:5)—to the Jews in their synagogues (9:20, 28; 13:14), creating controversy and meeting resistance (9:21; 13:45-46, 50; 14:2, 4-5, 19), even to the point of threats against his life (9:23-24, 29; 14:19; 20:3, 19), yet always dramatically delivered or vindicated (9:25, 27, 30; 14:19-20). Already readers sense the manifest destiny of this divinely commissioned prophet, that all efforts to obstruct his path will be unsuccessful, that he has God's favor and protection, that he will finally emerge triumphant (28:31). His miraculous escape from Damascus, unforgettably depicted (9:23-25; cf. 2 Cor. 11:32-33; cf. Josh. 2:15), recalls earlier vain attempts to restrain the apostles (cf. Acts 5:17-26; also 12:6-11).

Saul's immediate removal to Jerusalem (also 22:17-21; 26:20), his acceptance by the apostles through Barnabas' generous commendation, and his assimilation into the Jerusalem church (9:26-29) reflect the Lucan tendency to align Paul closely with Jerusalem (cf. 11:27-30; 15:2-30; 21:17-26). The Pauline Letters, by contrast, reflect Paul's opposite tendency—to stress his independence of Jerusalem (Gal. 1-2); in fact, Paul denies having been known by sight "by churches of Christ in Judea" (Gal. 1:22).

His opponents in Jerusalem are the Hellenists (Acts 9:29), possibly the same group who opposed Stephen (6:9). Later, Asian Jews figure prominently in opposing Paul in Jerusalem (21:27). Once again, efforts to kill him prove futile (9:29-30). Saved by the Jerusalem church, he is removed to Tarsus, his hometown (21:39; 22:3), where he remains until Barnabas fetches him (11:25).

Typically, Luke concludes the section with a summary that idealizes, generalizes, and marks a transition (9:31; cf. 2:47). With the Palestinian church (Judea, Samaria, Galilee) experiencing harmony, strength, religious devotion, and a quantifiable measure of the Spirit, Luke is now ready to describe a new stage in the church's mission. Geographically, the scene shifts to the coastlands, first Lydda and Joppa (9:32–43), then to Caesarea (chs. 10–11). The focus shifts back to Peter, who dominates the next three chapters. Most important, Gentiles officially enter the story through the figure of Cornelius.

9:32–11:30

Prophetic Ministry of Peter in Judea and the Coastland: Apostolic Witness to the Gentiles

9:32–43, Peter's Healing Aeneas and Raising Tabitha. Peter is reintroduced into the story through two "prophetic deeds": healing a paralytic and restoring to life a Christian woman renowned for her generosity. Both acts are reminiscent of Jesus' own activity (Luke 5:17–26; 7:11–17; 8:40–56). They show that Jesus is actually (still) at work through Peter (Acts 9:34; cf. 3:16; 4:10). The effects of Jesus' power are visible: in both instances, people "turn to the Lord" (9:35, 42), i.e., the Lord Jesus. This wording, as opposed to "turn to God" (cf. 14:15; 15:19; 26:20) probably implies that they were Jews (though cf. 11:21).

The latter story also echoes Elijah's raising the widow's son (1 Kings 17:17–24) and Elisha's raising the Shunammite woman's son (2 Kings 4:8–37). It thus casts Peter more firmly in an OT prophetic mold (cf. Luke 7:11–30).

Both stories are unusual in that both the afflicted persons are named: Aeneas and Dorcas. As before (when Barnabas exemplifies the church's widespread generosity, Acts 4:32–37), Luke renders generalized activity more specifically by using named instances (cf. 8:7; 9:31).

These two stories also document the further spread of the gospel. Before the pivotal Cornelius story is told, Luke will have described the spread of the gospel from Jerusalem through Judea, Samaria, and Galilee all the way northward to Damascus (9:10, 19) and now westward to Lydda and Joppa, where there are already "saints" (vv. 32, 41) and disciples (vv. 36, 38), but where additional conversions occur (vv. 35, 42). Moreover, Peter's (and therefore the apostles') influence and authority are seen to extend beyond Jerusalem to the coastlands (v. 32). In terms of the story line, Peter is now in place in Joppa (v. 43) awaiting his summons by Cornelius (10:5).

10:1–8, Cornelius' Vision. Luke's portrait of Cornelius is a model of compactness: an introductory cameo portrait (vv. 1–2) that comes to life in the narrative itself (vv. 3–8; → Caesarea). He is undeniably Gentile, a point repeatedly emphasized (10:22, 28, 35, 45; also 11:1, 3, 17–18) and on which the story hinges. Yet, he is a Gentile utterly devoted to Judaism (Rom. 2:28–29).

As a "God-fearer" (Acts 10:2, 22; cf. 13:16, 26; → Proselyte), his religious devotion is exemplified by his almsgiving and prayer, activities highly prized by Jews (Tob. 12:8; Matt. 6:2–6; 1 Pet. 4:7–9)—and by Luke (on almsgiving, see Introduction; on prayer, cf. Luke 3:21; 5:16; 6:12, 28; 9:18, 28–29; 11:1–13; 18:1–14). Though a Gentile, he has supported Jewish causes financially (Acts 10:2, "people" = Jews; cf. 10:22; also Luke 7:5). Not surprisingly, the vision occurs while he—a Gentile—observes a Jewish hour of prayer (Acts 10:3, 30; see commentary above on 3:1–11). Nor is it a prayer before deaf ears. God has accepted his exemplary service as a fitting sacrifice (10:4; cf. Lev. 2:2, 9, 16; also Tob. 12:12). Not only does he pray to God, but, completely in character, he obeys God—fully and promptly (Acts 10:7–8, 33).

10:9–16, Peter's Vision. The scene shifts from Caesarea to Joppa, and the action centers on Peter (9:43). Once again, prayer provides the setting for a vision (10:9; cf. 10:3; see commentary above on 3:1–11). All the marks of a divine revelation are present: Peter in a trance, not asleep in a dream; a "rift in the sky" (v. 11, NEB; cf. 7:56; Luke 3:21; Mark 1:10; Matt. 3:16; also John 1:51; Rev. 19:11), and a heavenly voice (Acts 10:13, 15).

The image of "great sheet of sail-cloth . . . slung by the four corners" (v. 11, NEB) is both unusual and without obvious literary parallels. The list of animals (v. 12) perhaps recalls OT lists (Gen. 1:24; 6:20; also Rom. 1:23). The divine injunction to Peter (Acts 10:13) is puzzling, unless only unclean animals are imagined in the sheet or the command is understood to apply only to unclean animals. Either way, its force is clear to Peter. With horror reminiscent of Ezekiel's (Ezek. 4:13–14), he recoils at the very thought of violating scriptural food laws (Acts 10:14; Lev. 11; Deut. 14; → Animals). The divine corrective (Acts 10:15) is sometimes understood to reflect Jesus' relaxed reinterpretation of Jewish food laws (Matt. 15:1–20; Mark 7:1–23; also Rom. 14:14). It may, however, be an appeal to the primordial period, when all creatures were "good" (Gen. 1:31; Sir. 39:33–35; also 1 Tim. 4:4). The threefold occurrence (Acts 10:16), after which the sheet ascends, attests its undeniability.

10:17–23a, Peter Receives Cornelius' Messengers. The vision so radically challenges Peter's worldview that he is genuinely perplexed (vv. 17, 19; cf. Luke 9:7; 24:4; Acts 2:12; 5:24). Even his movement to receive the delegation must be prompted by the Spirit (10:19; 11:12)—another instance where the gospel is edged along by divine impulse (8:29; 13:2; 15:28). Like Cornelius, Peter is compliant (10:21). The messengers summarize the earlier narrative but introduce the note that Peter will preach to Cornelius (v. 22). This paves the way for the sermon (10:34-43). By inviting them in as his guests (v. 23a), Peter is already acknowledging the truth of the vision and providing grounds for the later criticism (11:3).

10:23b-33, Peter and Cornelius Meet. Since they are acting at God's behest, the combined delegation leaves "the next day" (v. 23b) and travels to Caesarea, the scene of the next several events (vv. 24-48). Joining Peter are Jewish Christians from Joppa (v. 23b; cf. 9:41-42), later numbered as six (11:12), who become crucial witnesses to the conversion of the Gentiles (10:45) and confirm Peter's account at Jerusalem. The cluster of friends and family gathered by Cornelius (vv. 24, 27) becomes the nucleus of the Caesarean church (cf. 12:19; 18:22; 21:8, 16). His deference to Peter (10:25), by which he acknowledges God's messenger as well as confirms the truth of his earlier vision (vv. 5-8), also further illustrates his piety. It also allows Luke another opportunity to distinguish between divine power and human agent (cf. 3:12; 14:15; also Rev. 19:10; Wisd. of Sol. 7:1-6). Both Peter and Cornelius are responding, in their respective ways, to the same divine impulse.

10:34-43, Peter's Sermon. Whereas earlier sermons feature OT promise fulfillment and Israelite history (chaps. 2, 3, 7), this one is distinguished by its introductory statement about God's impartiality (vv. 34-35; cf. Deut. 10:17; 2 Chron. 19:7; Job 34:19; Sir. 35:12-13; Rom. 2:11; Gal. 2:6; Eph. 6:9; Col. 3:25) and its concentrated summary of the Jesus story (Acts 10:36-42), an admirable distillation of Luke's Gospel. Prophetic witness to Jesus is mentioned only briefly at the end (v. 43).

Like earlier sermons (see commentary above on 3:12-26), its chief subject is God—God's nature and what God has done through Christ. Its essential message to Gentiles is that Jesus is God's story continued. God sent, even "preached," the good news of Jesus (10:36); Jesus' anointing by God (at his baptism; v. 38; Luke 3:21-22), and being empowered by God's Spirit (cf. Luke 4:1, 14-21); his alliance with God demonstrated by his "good deeds" of healing (Acts 10:38; cf. 2:22); God righted the wrong of his death by raising him (10:40; cf. 2:24, 32; 3:15) and revealing him alive (10:41; Luke 24:13-53; Acts 1:3-11); he is ordained by God as the ultimate judge (10:42; cf. 17:31); and the story continues to be told through God-appointed witnesses under divine mandate (10:41-42; cf. Luke 24:48-49; Acts 1:8). The God to whom Gentiles, like Cornelius, are already attracted has been at work visibly and audibly through Jesus and is now being heard in the apostolic witness. By acknowledging Jesus as God's Anointed, they will be acknowledging truly the God they already "fear" (10:2, 22).

Admittedly, God's story has Jewish roots. Jesus was attested by the prophets (v. 43) and introduced first to Israel (v. 36; cf. 13:26). His sphere of activity was "the country of the Jews [Galilee] and Jerusalem" (10:39). Yet, he is no local, national deity but has universal appeal as "Lord of all" (v. 36b). Eventually he is destined to be universal judge of the "living and dead" (v. 42). Forgiveness is now universally available (v. 43).

One important new element in this sermon is the emphasis on the God who does not "play favorites" (v. 34, JB, NEB). In Jesus is now realized God's intended vision of a humanity "without distinctions" (cf. 11:12). God fully accepts Gentiles and Jews on equal terms, and such labels as "clean"/"unclean" no longer apply (cf. 10:28); indeed, they no longer can exist. Not only can all persons be accepted by God; they can fully accept each other in ordinary social relationships, such as table fellowship (10:23; 11:3).

10:44-48, Gentiles Accepted. In this sequel, their favorable response to Peter's preaching is indicated: "hearing the word" (v. 44; 11:1; cf., e.g., 2:41; 4:4; 8:14) and "extolling God" (10:46). But especially stressed is how God takes the initiative in letting the Holy Spirit "fall" upon the Gentiles, even during Peter's sermon (v. 44), as he "began to speak," as he later reports (11:15). Clearly, God used this as an occasion to bestow the "gift of the Spirit" to the Gentiles in a manner comparable to Pentecost (11:17; cf. 2:4). Accordingly, Peter challenges anyone present to deny them water baptism, the ordinary initiation rite admitting them to Christian fellowship (10:47). Since there were no dissenters, he commands them to be baptized "in the name of Jesus Christ" (v. 48), thus acknowledging Jesus' universal lordship. His remaining with them "for some days" indicates his full acceptance of them (v. 48b; cf. John 4:40).

11:1-18, Peter Answers Jerusalem Critics. The final scene shifts to Judea, specifically Jerusalem, where the (other) apostles reside (cf. 8:1). As before, the apostles' authority to confirm legitimate expressions of the gospel is implied (8:14; cf. 11:22). Accordingly, Peter's defense of his actions occurs before them at Jerusalem. His critics are "those of the circumcision" (11:2; NEB: "those of Jewish birth"; JB: "Jews"; cf. 15:1, 5; Gal. 2:12), presumably a subgroup of Jewish Christians ("Judean brethren," Acts 11:1) who thought Gentiles should be circumcised. They appear to have criticized, first, his going to Gentiles, i.e., launching a mission to Gentiles, and second, his eating with Gentiles, i.e., engaging in table fellowship with them (v. 3), which, according to Peter's own testimony, was prohibited (10:28).

Peter's response is to rehearse "in order" (v. 4) what had transpired. His remarks in vv. 5–16 provide a condensed account of what has already been described in 10:9–48. Repeating it underscores the signal importance of this episode, although some new details emerge. Peter's reminiscence of the risen Lord's promise (11:16; cf. 1:5; cf. Luke 3:16) is significant because it shows that the event is a fulfillment of a promise made by Jesus himself. He insists that the Gentiles had experienced precisely what the apostles had experienced at Pentecost (11:17; 10:47). Accordingly, God not only approved, but initiated, his going to the Gentiles and associating with them. Failure to recognize this, even more, refusal to act accordingly, would be tantamount to opposing God (11:15), about which readers have already been cautioned (cf. 5:3, 38–39).

The only proper response, as to Peter's earlier challenge (10:47), is silence. Accordingly, Peter's critics, and presumably the apostles and Judean Christians, "glorified God" (11:18; cf. 13:47–48). Their final concession aptly summarizes the whole preceding story: from start to finish, it has been the work of God (11:18; cf. 26:20). God moved the crucial players—Cornelius and Peter—into action, brought them together "in God's sight" (10:33), unleashed the Spirit through the preached Word, provided undeniable proof of divine presence and confirmation, and now silences the critics.

11:19–30, Christianity at Antioch. Having reported the gospel's success in Caesarea, Luke now documents the church's further geographical extension: northward up the coast to Phoenicia, notably Tyre (21:3–4) and Sidon (27:3), northwest to Cyprus (13:4–12), finally (and most impressively), some three hundred miles farther north to Syrian Antioch, the third largest city of the Roman Empire (→ Antioch). His real concern is to sketch the beginnings of gentile Christianity at Antioch, which figures prominently later (13:1; 14:26–28; 15:22–35, 40; 18:22; cf. Gal. 2:11). He also uses this occasion to relate Barnabas and Saul to the earliest stages of gentile Christianity, thereby preparing them, especially Paul, for their leading role in missionizing Gentiles (Acts 13–28).

The gospel's thrust into these regions is attributed to those Jewish Christians who fled Jerusalem because of the persecution prompted by Stephen's controversial preaching and death (8:1–4). While the majority seem to have preached exclusively to Jews, a courageous minority ("some," 11:20) of Diaspora Jews from Cyprus and Cyrene took the bold step of preaching to Greeks, i.e., Gentiles. The unspoken assumption is that they did so without requiring circumcision (cf. 15:1, 5). They thus put into practice generally what Peter had done specifically with Cornelius—and without divine prompting!

Even though this outreach effort occurs independently of the Jerusalem church, and without apostolic initiative, it has numerical success, which is attributed to the "hand of the Lord" (11:21; cf. Luke 1:66; 2 Sam. 3:12). Since preaching to Gentiles had been accepted in principle by the Jerusalem church (11:18), it commissions not an apostle, but Barnabas, who is nevertheless duly qualified (v. 24; cf. 4:36–37), to confirm the effort as legitimate (11:22). He sees what was already clear to the Antioch church—evidence of God's grace (v. 23). True to his name ("son of exhortation," 4:36; 9:27), he strengthens the church (cf. 13:43; 14:22). This apparently results in a second wave of conversions (11:24).

So impressive was the strength of this mission that Barnabas fetches Saul from Tarsus (where the narrative had left him earlier, 9:30; though cf. Gal. 2:1) to assist in establishing gentile Christianity at Antioch (Acts 11:26). Their year-long joint ministry succeeds in producing results conspicuous enough to require coining the new name "Christians" (v. 26; 26:28; 1 Pet. 4:16). The designation was perhaps given by outsiders as a way of distinguishing them from the Jewish community or even identifying them as a subset of Jews with specific loyalty to "Christ" (→ Christian).

In displaying generosity comparable to that of the Jerusalem church (Acts 11:27–30; 2:44; 4:32–37), gentile Christianity is seen to be equally legitimate. Typically in Luke, the proper disposition of one's possessions signals authentic faith (see Introduction).

It is difficult to correlate this trip by Paul to Jerusalem with his own chronology sketched in Gal. 1:11–2:14 (→ Paul).

12:1–25 Gospel Resisted and Vindicated in Jerusalem

12:1–5, Herod's Resistance. The gospel now meets its most intense opposition yet reported by Luke. Previously, resistance has come from religious authorities (4:1–3, 5–6; 5:17–18, 21–28, 33–42; 6:12–15; 7:54–8:3; 9:1); now the lead is taken by the chief regional civil authority (→ Agrippa I).

The form of opposition intensifies. Previously, Stephen had died violently at the hands of religious authorities (7:54–60); now, Agrippa takes more widespread action against "some who belonged to the church" (12:1). By decapitating James, he strikes at Jesus' innermost circle of apostles (→ James [1]). The pleasure taken by the Jews at this action (v. 3) also represents an intensification. Until now, no blanket resistance from "the Jews" has occurred (though cf. 6:12). The core of opposition has largely been Jewish leaders, mainly Sadducees. Clearly, what Agrippa did to James he now intends to do to Peter; hence, the unusually "earnest prayer" of the Jerusalem church (12:5; cf. Jth. 4:8-15).

12:6-11, Vindication: Peter's Release. But just as the resistance intensifies, so does the form of divine vindication. The elaborate, detailed description of the security measures taken against Peter merely underscore the point. Overnight custody (4:3) and a "common prison" (5:18) now give way to a prison guarded by four squads of soldiers (12:4) and Peter chained not to the usual one guard but to a soldier on each side (v. 6). The greater the attempt to restrain God's messenger, the more dramatic the escape (vv. 7, 11). As if there were any doubt, Peter's words interpret these events for readers: rescue has come at the hands of God (v. 11). Foiled are God's opponents: Herod and the Jewish people (v. 11b). Once again, God's cause has been vindicated (cf. Dan. 3:28; also Exod. 18:4).

12:12-19, Proof of Vindication. God's vindication of Peter (and therefore the gospel) is first confirmed within the Christian community. The comic scene of the terrified girl fleeing in disbelief while Peter calmly keeps knocking (vv. 12-17) not only shows that his release was attested by witnesses—the "many gathered" (v. 12) and eventually "James [Jesus' brother] and the brethren" (v. 17; → James [3])—but also serves to reiterate the main theme: divine deliverance (v. 17).

Second, Peter's escape is confirmed publicly. The soldiers' inability to find him confirms the miracle, as does Herod's execution of them for negligence (vv. 18-19).

12:20-25, Divine Reversal. The final proof of divine vindication is Agrippa's death (vv. 20-23). More important than identifying the actual occasion mentioned in v. 20 is to note the manner and stated cause of death. Like Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 19.343-52), Luke stresses its suddenness, but his horribly graphic description (v. 23b) serves to place Agrippa among the pitiable company of those who have vainly—and naively—sought to obstruct the ways of God (2 Macc. 9:5-9; Jth. 16:17). Josephus also mentions the popular acclamation of his divinity, but Luke establishes the causal connection. Not content to resist God, Agrippa competed with God. In doing so, he had met the fate Ezekiel promised Tyre (Ezek. 28:1-10). This ultimate presumption was his fatal mistake; hence, his ignominious death. As predicted, arrogant rulers would be brought low (Luke 1:52).

With such a defiant opponent vanquished, Luke needed only to observe briefly the steady, unobstructed growth of the gospel (Acts 12:24). Another ironic reversal has occurred: the killer king himself died; his innocent victim, the church, "grew and multiplied." With this last opposition movement foiled, God's messengers, Saul and Barnabas, move about freely and boldly, now in place for an even more dramatic push beyond Palestine to Asia Minor (v. 25).

The Gospel Spreads Westward "To the Ends of the Earth": Paul's Mission

13:1-14:28

Beginning of the Pauline Mission: Preaching in Cyprus and Eastern Asia Minor

Even though a major new phase of the church's westward expansion is being depicted here, the story is told in ways reminiscent of earlier chapters. Once again, a duly selected, divinely appointed pair of named individuals bears witness to the gospel (cf. Luke 10:1). Peter and John now have their counterparts in Paul and Barnabas. Just as Peter emerged as the dominant spokesperson in the earlier narrative, now it is Paul who does so.

13:1-3, Antioch: Commissioning Barnabas and Saul. Readers are already prepared to expect the church at Syrian Antioch to be a vital mission center (11:19-26). Its renown is indicated by the list of five named prophets and teachers associated with it (13:1).

Presumably through one of these prophets, the Spirit commissions Barnabas and Saul for their divinely appointed vocation (v. 2; cf. Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:15). The very words of the commission, as well as the subsequent reference to the Spirit's explicit role (cf. Acts 13:4), indicate that the mission occurs at God's initiative, not merely because of human deliberation and planning. This is reinforced by noting the sacred setting in which the commission occurs (worshiping, fasting, and prayer).

13:4-12, Cyprus. Even though Barnabas and Saul preach to Jews in the synagogues of Salamis, on the eastern edge of Cyprus, the central event occurs at the opposite end of the island in the capital city of Paphos (→ Cyprus).

The prophetic deed reported is a confrontation between Paul and the Jewish magician Bar-Jesus, whose Aramaic name was Elymas (v. 8). The latter's status as a false prophet (v. 6; cf. Matt. 7:15; 24:11, 24; 2 Pet. 2:1; 1 John 4:1; Rev. 16:13; 20:10) is confirmed by his efforts to obstruct the true word of God (Acts 13:8). Luke's designation of him as "magician" (v. 6; Gk. magos) is uncomplimentary, given the generally negative biblical attitude toward magic (cf. Deut. 18:10-12; Isa. 8:19; 44:25; 47:12-15; → Magic and Divination).

Paul's unusually harsh condemnation of Bar-Jesus (Acts 13:10) recalls biblical images (cf. Sir. 1:30; 19:26; Jer. 5:27). The emphasis on perverting God's straight paths also echoes the OT (Prov. 10:9; Hos. 14:9) and may recall the preaching of John the Baptist (Luke 3:5). The words with which Paul inflicts blindness on him also echo biblical imagery (Acts 13:11; cf. Judg. 2:15; 1 Sam. 12:15). Perhaps aware that Paul's actions will appear unjustifiably inhumane, Luke stresses that he was acting under the impulse of the Holy Spirit (Acts 13:9) and thus as God's agent against the devil's surrogate (v. 10). Also, noting the punishment's temporary status (v. 11) softens the effect.

The immediate effect of Paul's action is salutary: the proconsul believed (v. 12). This may suggest that Bar-Jesus's efforts to counter Paul's preaching involved magical deeds; hence, Luke would be portraying Paul as a more effective miracle worker. The direct correlation here between miracle and faith is comparable to that found in the Fourth Gospel (cf. John 2:11).

This story has parallels to that of Simon Magus in Acts 8. It shows the gospel's superior power over popular forms of magic as well as its power to attract an intelligent Roman official. Consequently, Rome is presented as sympathetic to the Christian movement. At the same time, Paul gains status as a miracle worker fully on par with Peter (3:1-11; 5:12-16; 9:32-43).

13:13-52, Pisidian Antioch. Here Paul's prophetic word (vv. 16b-43) is met with a divided response: Jews resist and Gentiles accept (vv. 44-52). The synagogue at Pisidian Antioch, located in Galatia, the heart of Asia Minor, some one hundred miles northeast of Perga, provides the setting for Paul's extensively reported sermon, or "prophetic word." Going first to the synagogue becomes Paul's typical missionary practice (v. 14; 14:1; 16:13; 17:1-2, 10, 17; 18:4, 19; 19:8). The sermon, identified as a "word of exhortation" (13:15; cf. 15:32; Heb. 13:22), is given in response to the invitation of the rulers of the synagogue. Paul's mode of delivery (Acts 13:16) suggests a Greco-Roman oratorical style (cf. 21:40; 26:1).

Paul's sermon here is roughly equivalent in length to Peter's Pentecost sermon (2:14-36), and both are half the length of Stephen's speech (7:2-53). While Peter's Pentecost address consists more of explicit scriptural exposition (Joel 2; Pss. 16 and 110) than does Paul's synagogue sermon here, both culminate in preaching about Jesus, with notable emphasis on his death and resurrection. This latter feature is less prominent in Stephen's address. Paul's synagogue sermon resembles Stephen's speech, however, in the way it initially rehearses Israel's history, albeit in drastically summarized form. Though there is some overlap, it begins about where Stephen's speech leaves off—with Moses. This suggests that Luke is using sermons delivered on different occasions to unfold different stages or aspects of the Christian proclamation.

Broadly speaking, the sermon comprises two parts. First, there is a summary of Israel's history from the time of the Exodus until David (Acts 13:17-22), roughly a third of the speech. Then, the explicitly Christian story begins (vv. 23-41), with Christ introduced as David's posterity (v. 23; cf. 2:30; Rom. 1:3; Matt. 1:1; John 7:42). The outline then follows a more conventional pattern, similar to Peter's Cornelius sermon (Acts 10:34-43). The preaching of John the Baptist is an essential chapter in the story (13:24-25; cf. Luke 3:1-22, esp. 3:16; 16:16; Acts 1:22; 10:37; also John 1:20), which serves as the crucial middle link between David and Christ. A definite structural break occurs at Acts 13:26, with the repeated address introducing the second main part (cf. v. 16).

With no specific attention given to the life and ministry of Jesus (cf. 2:22; 10:36-39), the sermon moves directly to Jesus' Passion (vv. 27-29), with emphasis on the following elements: failure of the Jerusalem inhabitants and the Jewish rulers to recognize Jesus as the fulfillment of the prophets (v. 27; 3:21-25; 10:43; on the motif of the Jews' ignorance, cf. 3:17; also 17:30; 1 Cor. 2:8), which resulted in Jesus' trial (Acts 13:27); Jesus' innocence (v. 28; see commentary above on 3:14); Pilate's role (v. 28; Luke 23:1-25; see commentary above on 4:27); Jesus' death on a tree and burial (Acts 13:29); God's raising him (v. 30; see commentary above on 5:30); and his postresurrection appearances "for many days" (cf. 1:3; Luke 24:13-53) in Jerusalem to his Galilean followers, thereby qualifying them as witnesses (cf. Acts 1:8; also 10:39). Special emphasis is given to promise fulfillment (13:32-33) by interpreting his resurrection with reference to Psalms 2 and 16 (Acts 13:33-37). The form of argument is similar to that used by Peter in 2:24-36.

The sermon concludes with an offer of forgiveness of sins (13:38; cf. 2:38; 3:19; 5:31; 10:43; Luke 24:47) and freedom from the Mosaic law (Acts 13:39). With this latter motif, Luke gives the sermon a distinctive Pauline ring (cf. Rom. 3:28; 8:3; Gal. 3:23-25; 4:21-5:4), thereby preparing for the subsequent controversy created by the Pauline gospel (esp. Acts 15; cf. 15:1, 5; 21:20-26). This dual offer of good news is punctuated by a final prophetic threat (13:41) drawn from Hab. 1:5, which anticipates the Jews' rejection. Its harshness is reminiscent of Stephen's concluding accusation (Acts 7:51-53) and anticipates the note on which the Pauline mission ends (28:26-29).

The initial response to the sermon is positive, among both "Jews and devout converts to Judaism" (13:43). Opposition a week later comes from Jews, presumably members of the synagogue, whose jealousy is prompted by the unusually large response of the "whole city" (v. 44). By resisting, they fulfill Paul's prophetic anticipation of their inability to see God at work in their very presence (v. 41). Accordingly, it provides Paul and Barnabas an opportunity to state formally their principle of preaching first to the Jews, according to "divine necessity" (v. 46; 3:26; Rom. 1:16). Equally important, their rejection provides explicit justification for the gentile mission, which is also understood as direct fulfillment of the biblical promise (Acts 13:47; Isa. 49:6) as well as the full realization of Simeon's earlier vision (Luke 2:32). Thus, both the Jewish resistance and the gentile mission are presented as instances of biblical promise fulfillment.

Ironically, Paul's sermon in the synagogue becomes the occasion for the Gentiles' hearty reception and the spread of the gospel through the entire region (Acts 13:48-49). The Jews' expulsion of Paul and Barnabas from the city and the latter's corresponding response conform with Jesus' own predictions and instructions concerning appropriate missionary behavior (v. 51; cf. Luke 9:5; 10:11; also 18:6). Divine approval of the Pauline mission to the Gentiles, and thus disapproval of the Jewish resistance, is indicated by the presence of joy and the Holy Spirit among the disciples (Acts 13:52).

14:1-7, Iconium. This brief description of the Pauline mission in Iconium serves as a bridge between events described at Antioch and Lystra. The account is a generalizing summary of a mission that lasted "a long time" (v. 3), accompanied by the usual two-pronged witness of prophetic words and deeds (v. 3). Even though memorable events might have occurred during this time, none is singled out.

Luke uses Iconium to illustrate what must have happened typically in Diaspora cities that contained Jewish communities. First, as long as it could be judged on its own merits and without interference, Paul's preaching in the synagogue convinced both Jews and God-fearing Greeks who attended the synagogue. Second, resistance came from both Jews and Gentiles (unattached to the synagogue) within the city, but the real source of such resistance could be traced to the "unbelieving Jews" (v. 2). Third, in spite of such resistance, the gospel could be proclaimed boldly and attested by signs and wonders, both to great and visible effect (v. 3). Fourth, the gospel always stayed ahead of the resistance. Efforts to suppress the gospel, however hostile or threatening (v. 5), were unsuccessful in arresting the apostolic witness.

14:8-20, Lystra and Derbe. The Pauline mission now goes to a thoroughly gentile setting. Lystra has no Jews (hence no synagogue) except those who come from elsewhere (v. 19). Paul speaks not in a synagogue but openly, probably in the village street (v. 9). Every detail of the account contributes to this masterfully composed portrait of a rural, pagan village.

As usual, Luke depicts Christian witness by using the twofold structure of prophetic deed and word (cf. 3:1-26): first, a tightly composed miracle story (14:8-10; on the literary form, see commentary above on 3:1-11) that causes misunderstanding and provides the occasion for clarification (14:11-14); second, a sermon (summary) that corrects the misunderstanding and in doing so offers a new worldview through the gospel (vv. 15-17).

The story shows how Luke understood the Pauline mission to have occurred typically in a popular pagan setting. "Signs and wonders" are given a prominent role, but their significance must be properly understood and interpreted. As before, Luke insists that such power derives not from humans but from God (cf. 3:12). By employing a local Phrygian legend relating how Zeus and Hermes appeared in the human forms of Philemon and Baucis (Ovid Metamorphoses 8.611-725), Luke portrays the innocent misconstruction of divine power. Barnabas and Paul's emphatic disclaimer (14:14), combined with their insistence on being fully human (v. 15; cf. 10:26; Rev. 19:10; also James 5:17; Wisd. of Sol. 7:1-6; 4 Macc. 12:13; though cf. Acts 28:6), corrects this misimpression. It also shifts the accent to the true object of human worship—the Creator God.

The sermon summary (Acts 14:15-17) encapsulates essential features of early Christian missionary preaching to pagans: turning from "vain things," i.e., polytheism (v. 15; cf. Gal. 4:8-9) and turning to "a living God" (cf. 1 Thess. 1:9-10; Acts 15:19; 26:20). The main element of proclamation is God as Creator (Acts 14:15), a central feature of the biblical understanding of God (see commentary above on 4:24), yet also acknowledged among Gentiles. A theology of "natural revelation" is expressed in the conviction that in nature God has been revealed visibly to all persons as the Creator and Sustainer of human life (14:17; cf. Lev. 26:4; Jer. 5:24; Ps. 145:15; 147:8). These themes are amplified later in the Athens sermon, which introduces specific claims about Christ not mentioned here (Acts 17:22-31).

As usual, both acceptance and rejection occur. Whereas the locals are enthusiastic (14:18), resistance comes from outsiders—neighboring Jews who attempt to silence the gospel (v. 19). But the gospel is vindicated when Paul recovers from “death” (v. 19) with astonishing speed, and the mission continues unabated (v. 20).

14:21-28, Return to Syrian Antioch. The return trip is not narrated in detail but is used to introduce another important element of the Pauline mission—consolidating newly founded mission churches by providing further teaching and some organizational structure. The “strengthening” (v. 22) may be understood as an essential feature of early Christian mission (cf. 11:23; 13:43; 15:32, 41; 16:5; 18:23) and doubtless included general Christian exhortation, much of which is preserved in the Pauline Letters. But here its specific purpose is to brace the churches for continued hostility they would experience in the absence of their founding missionaries. This too seems to have been standard fare (cf. 1 Thess. 3:3; 2 Thess. 1:5-8). Jesus had envisioned as much (Luke 6:22-23; 10:16; 12:4-7, 11-12).

The organizational “strengthening” consisted in appointing leaders in each congregation. Here they are designated as “elders” (Acts 14:23), a leadership structure found in other congregations (cf. 20:17-35; also Titus 1:5; 1 Tim. 4:14; 5:17, 19; perhaps Phil. 1:1), possibly following the Jerusalem organizational model (cf. Acts 11:30; 15:2, 4, 6, 22, 23; 16:4; 21:18). “Elders” are noticeably unmentioned in the undisputed Pauline Letters.

In his carefully worded description of the return to Syrian Antioch, Luke gives special emphasis to God’s role in the Pauline mission to the Gentiles. By reporting “what God had done with them” (14:27; cf. 15:4, 12; 21:19) and the “door of faith” (v. 27; 1 Cor. 16:9; 2 Cor. 2:12; Col. 4:3; Rev. 3:8) opened by God to the Gentiles (Acts 14:27; 2:17; 10:45; 11:1, 18; 13:47-48; 15:7, 12), Paul and Barnabas merely echo what Luke has repeatedly reported throughout chaps. 13-14: the primary actor in the whole mission has been God who, through the Spirit, has initiated, motivated, and sustained this mission. This explains why it has been a series of successes. A considerable length of time (14:28) is envisioned between the end of this first Pauline mission and the controversy it creates, reported in chap. 15.

The Jerusalem Council Resolves the Status of Gentiles

With the initial success of the gentile mission, it now becomes appropriate for Luke to address the network of questions created by an emerging gentile Christian church. If Gentiles increasingly become Christians, are they to be regarded as full equals with Jewish Christians before God? Are they not obligated to “keep the law of Moses” (v. 5)? In particular, must they not undergo circumcision, the one ritual act that symbolizes full admission to the people of God? By extension, are they not obligated then to live by the law? In a word, must not Gentiles become Jews, at least in some minimal sense, to be truly saved?

The seriousness of these questions for Luke is seen by the way he reports the Jerusalem meeting. By treating it at this juncture in the narrative, he acknowledges its importance as a watershed event.

15:1-5, Convening the Council. The reasons requiring such a called meeting of the Jerusalem authorities are carefully outlined. The disputing parties are clearly identified, and the heat of the debate noted (v. 2). It is a genuine threat within the life of the church requiring the attention of both the entire Jerusalem (Judean) church (vv. 4, 12, 22) and the highest echelons of its leaders (“apostles and elders” are mentioned five times in the chapter—vv. 2, 4, 6, 22, 23; also 16:4).

The picture is further filled out by the parade of distinguished figures, including Barnabas, Paul, Peter, James the Lord’s brother, Judas Barsabbas, and Silas (→ James [3]; Judas [12]; Silas, Silvanus). Peter represents the “old guard,” the apostles who figure as the prominent leadership structure in chaps. 1-14 and who disappear after chap. 15 (though cf. 16:4). James, by contrast, represents the “new guard,” the elders who figure as the prominent leadership structure in chaps. 16-28 (cf. 21:18).

Luke reports two speeches, one by Peter (15:7-11), the other by James (vv. 13-21), and the contents of the agreement, formally stated in a letter (vv. 23-29). No extensive report by Barnabas and Paul is given (v. 12) since their activity reported in chaps. 13-14 is still fresh in the readers’ minds.

15:6-11, Peter’s Speech. His remarks reiterate three points already registered in the Cornelius episode (chaps. 10-11): first, the decision to preach to the Gentiles was God’s choice not his (15:7; 10:19-20; 11:12); second, visible evidence of God’s approval occurred in giving the Gentiles the Holy Spirit “just as he did to us”

(15:8; 10:44–47; 11:15–17); third, since God has “cleansed” the Gentiles, the distinction between “clean” (Jews) and “unclean” (Gentiles) no longer holds (15:9; 10:9–16, 28–29; 11:4–10, 12; cf. Rom. 10:12). His conclusion: Gentiles had been admitted by divine not human initiative. To have refused admission to Gentiles would have been to “withstand God” (Acts 11:17).

To these retrospective observations, Peter adds two new considerations, both having a distinctive Pauline ring: first, even our Jewish predecessors found the law burdensome and impossible to keep (v. 10; 13:39; Gal. 5:1; also Matt. 23:4), and second, there is only one way of salvation—“through the grace of the Lord Jesus” (Acts 15:11; cf. Rom. 3:24; 5:1–2; Gal. 2:15–16; Eph. 2:5, 8).

15:12–21, James’s Speech. After Peter’s remarks calm the assembly, Barnabas and Paul report “God’s activity” through them among the Gentiles (v. 12; cf. Acts 14:27; 21:19). Then follows James’s speech, which makes two contributions to the debate, both new. First, he provides scriptural warrant for the gentile mission, thus to what Peter started (chaps. 10–11) and what Paul and Barnabas continued (chaps. 13–14). Arguing from the Greek version of Amos 9:11–12, supplemented by Jer. 12:15 and Isa. 45:21 (Acts 15:16–18), James insists that the gentile mission was God’s ancient intention, not a novel idea (v. 17).

James’s second contribution was to propose a concrete solution: Gentiles should adhere to a fourfold set of prohibitions outlined in Scripture (vv. 19–20). These included abstinence from, first, pollutions of idols (Exod. 34:13–16; Lev. 17:8–9; cf. 1 Cor. 10:7, 14), including eating sacrificial meat offered to idols (Acts 15:29; 21:25; 1 Cor. 8:1–13; Rev. 2:14, 20; 4 Macc. 5:2); second, sexual immorality, specifically prohibited types of marriages (Lev. 18:1–30; 1 Cor. 6:18; 10:8); third, strangled animals, that is, those not ritually slaughtered (Gen. 9:4; Lev. 17:13; 19:26; Deut. 12:16, 23–28; 15:23); and fourth, eating animal blood (Gen. 9:4; Lev. 3:17; 17:10–14). The order of the prohibitions is not uniform (compare Acts 15:20 with v. 29 = Acts 21:25), and some ancient manuscripts omit the third prohibition since presumably it was included in the fourth.

The genius of this proposal is that these are the strictures the OT itself places on “strangers among the Jews” (Lev. 17:8, 10–13; 18:26), i.e., Gentiles. The implication is that circumcision was meant only for Jews in the first place, not Gentiles. Accordingly, gentile acceptance of these prohibitions would be fully in keeping with the Mosaic Scriptures that have been read weekly in the synagogue “from early generations” (Acts 15:21). James’s proposal thus commends itself because it is scriptural in the strictest sense—it binds on Gentiles what God through Scripture had bound, and that alone, and it succeeds in waiving circumcision as a requirement for Gentiles. It thus allows Gentiles “to keep the law of Moses” (v. 5) in God’s intended sense, not in the narrow sense insisted on by the “particularist” Jewish Christian Pharisees (v. 5).

15:22–29, Letter of Accord. The letter embodying this agreement repeats (for emphasis) the fourfold prohibitions (v. 29). It also indicates the scope of Jerusalem’s influence over Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia (v. 23). The primary addressee was, of course, Syrian Antioch, where the problem especially had surfaced, probably because of its reputation for being the stronghold of the gentile mission (11:20–26) and for sponsoring the Pauline mission to eastern Asia Minor (13:1–3; 14:26–28). The letter also characterizes the “particularists” as a minority who had acted without due authorization from the highest authorities (15:24; cf. vv. 1, 5). In addition, it reaffirms the work of Barnabas and Paul, indeed heroizes them (v. 26), and acknowledges the importance of Antioch by sending two highly respected men, Judas Barsabbas and Silas (v. 22), to vouch for the authenticity of the agreement.

15:30–35, Joy at Antioch. Luke’s report of the sequel closes this controversy. The authorized delegation before a formally assembled Antiochian congregation presents the letter, which is received joyously (v. 31)—the typical Lucan response to genuine instances of the Spirit’s work (8:8; 13:52; 15:3; cf. 5:41; 8:39; 16:34). The former acrimony (15:2) is past, and Judas and Silas are returned “in peace” to Jerusalem (v. 34). The letter thus not only brought peace and joy to Antioch, it sealed harmonious relationships between Antioch and Jerusalem. This leaves Paul and Barnabas in Antioch continuing in their ministry of preaching and teaching, in position to begin the next stage of the mission, which ironically begins not with peace but with a sharp contention between these two intimate co-workers.

Paul’s Mission in the Aegean

The Pauline mission now moves westward to the area of the Aegean, first focusing on mainland Greece (Macedonia and Achaia) and later on western Asia Minor, mainly Ephesus. Considered as a single “panel” of material, this section illustrates Luke’s capacity for selective treatment of representative events, as well as his ability to give a comprehensive picture over a broad geographical sweep.

15:36-41, Paul's Split with Barnabas. The next major phase begins not with a long-term vision for a Pauline mission to Europe but with a modest proposal to visit the churches recently established in eastern Asia Minor (v. 36). Only en route, and through divine intervention (16:6-10), do such plans develop. Luke thereby continues to emphasize that Paul's mission to the Gentiles is God's doing, not Paul's.

From other sources, it is well known that Paul and Barnabas came down on separate sides of a critical question of principle and that this occurred at Antioch (Gal. 2:1-13). This incident goes unmentioned in Acts. Luke rather explains their split as the result of a "sharp contention" over the suitability of John Mark as a mission companion. It now becomes clear why Luke earlier mentioned his departure (Acts 13:5, 13).

16:1-5, Strengthening Churches in Eastern Asia Minor. Mentioning Timothy here serves to introduce a well-known Pauline co-worker, who perhaps was converted by Paul on his initial visit to Lystra (14:6-19; cf. 1 Cor. 4:17) and who figures prominently in the Aegean mission, usually in the shadow of Silas (Acts 17:14-15; 18:5; though cf. 19:22; 20:4; → Timothy [2]).

But more than introducing a new face in the narrative, Luke is here explaining and thereby defending Paul's decision to circumcise Timothy. By showing that this action enhanced Paul's and Timothy's credibility among Jews (perhaps Jewish Christians) in the region, Luke is presenting Paul as sensitive to Jewish concerns (cf. 21:17-26; 22:3; 24:14).

At the same time, however, Paul delivers the Jerusalem "decisions" to his mission churches at Derbe, Lystra, and probably Pisidian Antioch (16:4). Since they were initially addressed to a more limited circle (15:23), Luke indicates the wider scope of the decisions. He thus places Paul's earlier gentile mission under the authority of Jerusalem's church leaders (not merely the church at Syrian Antioch), thereby emphasizing even more its full legitimacy.

16:6-10, A New Mission Emerges. In the lengthy journey westward to regions well beyond Paul's earlier stated goal (15:36), Luke depicts the emergence of a new, previously unplanned European mission as the triumph of divine over human initiative. Paul's "best laid plans" are three overruled as first the "Holy Spirit," then "Jesus' Spirit" redraws the itinerary (vv. 6-7). At Troas, a third, even more dramatic intervention occurs in the form of a vision (dream?) beckoning Paul to Macedonia (v. 9). The Spirit's earlier messages might have come through the prophetic voice of Silas, but not this one. So direct and visibly clear was it that Paul could only conclude that Macedonia was God calling (v. 10). Not one to disobey heavenly visions (9:4-9; 26:19), Paul complies promptly, like Peter, whom the Spirit had also directed into uncharted waters (10:19-23; 11:12).

The surprising shift to the first-person plural (16:10) introduces the first of four "we" passages in Acts (16:10-17; 20:5-15; 21:1-18; 27:1-28:16). These intriguing references may signify that the author of these sections here joins Paul's entourage and thus writes from the perspective of an eyewitness. By extension, this same traveling companion may very well have written the entire book, enhancing his overall credibility by subtle, occasional references to what he saw and experienced personally. Or, these sections may be travel diaries from an unnamed traveling companion, employed by the author, though loosely edited. Tradition has seen behind the "we" a reference to "Luke the physician," elsewhere mentioned as Paul's companion during his imprisonments (Col. 4:14; Philem. 24; 2 Tim. 4:11). The change may be purely stylistic, however, yielding no concrete historical information either about Paul's traveling companions, eyewitnesses to these events, or the authorship of these sections and the book as a whole.

16:11-40, Philippi. Paul's company responds promptly to the heavenly vision, wasting no time making the trip from Troas to Philippi in two days (v. 11). Identifying Philippi as "the principal city of that particular district of Macedonia" (v. 12, JB, one way of rendering a difficult textual problem) shows it to be the intended fulfillment of the Troas vision (→ Philippi). Luke thus gives it extended treatment. With memorable dramatic style, he skillfully sketches several representative episodes from Paul's several days there. Readers are able to see "a day in the life" of Paul the missionary to the Gentiles.

Since it is the first major stop of the European mission, Luke takes pains to underscore the thoroughly gentile setting. At the outset, he notes the city's status as a "Roman colony" (v. 12), thereby preparing readers for the narrative's preoccupation with things Roman (vv. 21, 37-39). Roman officials play prominent roles, and Luke uses proper technical terms to describe them (vv. 20, 22, 35, 36, 38). The gentile complexion of the city is reinforced by its minimal Jewish presence. Unlike most other cities visited by Paul, it has only a "place of prayer" (v. 13), which was located over a mile outside the city gate.

Other touches of local color capture the mood of a gentile city. The slave girl's "spirit of divination" is literally "spirit of Python" (v. 16) which readers would recognize as the serpent at the oracle of Delphi. The transparent profit motive of the girl's owners is also exposed in a manner typical of pagan social critics.

Five episodes are reported: (1) the conversion of Lydia (vv. 13-15), (2) Paul's confrontation with the possessed slave girl (vv. 16-18), (3) the Romans' hostility (vv. 19-24), (4) the conversion of the jailer (vv. 25-34), and (5) Paul's vindication (vv. 35-40). Each scene has its own purpose in the narrative.

The opening scene demonstrates Paul's consistent practice of going to the Jews first, for both theological and practical reasons (13:46; cf. Rom. 1:16-17). Once again, it is a gentile "worshiper of God" who is the most responsive (Acts 10:2, 22; 13:43; 17:4; 18:7). Her high socioeconomic status is suggested by her occupation (→ Purple) but also because both her name and hometown are given—the only person so identified in the narrative. Her conversion is prompted directly by the Lord (16:14; cf. Luke 24:45). After her baptism, she becomes the model of hospitality—an indication of her true discipleship (cf. Luke 19:1-10). Her home becomes the mission base for the Philippian church, which provides long-term support for the Pauline mission (cf. Acts 16:15, 40; Phil. 4:15-18).

The encounter with the slave girl has its counterpart in earlier instances where the gospel confronted Jewish magic (Acts 8:9-24; 13:8-12). Now it is pagan magic, a first. The girl's oracular utterance (16:17) is accurate and prescient: these men actually are obedient servants of God (v. 10) and will proclaim the "way of salvation" to the jailer (v. 31). Paul's exorcism of the spirit of Python, performed "in the name of Jesus" (and after the manner of Jesus; cf. Luke 4:35, 41; cf. Mark 1:25, 34; Luke 8:29; cf. Mark 5:8) is instant, indicating that the power of the risen Lord continues to work in Paul as it did through the apostles earlier (cf. Acts 3:6, 12, 16; 4:10).

The repercussions of Paul's actions are significant in that they reveal, for the first time, Roman resistance to the Christian movement. Precisely what illegal "customs" (16:21) they were thought to be advocating is not clear—probably overt proselytizing of Roman citizens. Their disturbance of the peace was serious enough to cause the Roman magistrates to inflict physical punishment (vv. 22-23; cf. 2 Cor. 11:25; cf. 1 Thess. 2:2).

The midnight prison scene resembles earlier episodes where Peter and the apostles are imprisoned (Acts 4:3; 5:17-21; 12:3-11). Similar divine intervention occurs: an earthquake that opens the prison doors and loosens chains (16:26). But unlike previous episodes, this is no escape miracle per se. Though illustrating God's power to thwart enemy attempts to suppress the gospel, it mainly serves as the backdrop for a conversion story. Edifying elements decorate the story. Imprisoned messengers of God show faith in adversity by praising God in song and prayer, thereby preaching to the other prisoners (cf. T. Jos. 8:4-5; also Dan. 6:10-13). But the central figure is the jailer, whose cry for salvation echoes earlier cries (Luke 3:10, 12; Acts 2:37; cf. 22:10).

The jailer's conversion is compactly but fully depicted. He hears the Christian proclamation of the "word of the Lord" (16:32; cf. 4:29, 31; 8:25; 11:19; 13:46; 14:25; 16:6; Phil. 1:14; Heb. 13:7), demonstrates his penitence by washing Paul and Silas's stripes (cf. Luke 3:8; Acts 26:20), is immediately baptized along with his family (cf. 11:14; 16:15; 18:8; also John 4:53; 1 Cor. 1:16), demonstrates the genuineness of his discipleship by extending hospitality (as Lydia had done), and gives sure proof of the Spirit's presence by "rejoicing" with his household (cf. Acts 8:39; see commentary above on 15:31). Luke perhaps indicates his Christian status by portraying his newly acquired religious vocabulary—he extends the biblical greeting of peace (16:36; 1 Sam. 1:17; 20:42; 2 Sam. 15:9; 2 Kings 5:19; Jth. 8:35; Mark 5:34; Luke 7:50; James 2:16).

The final scene (Acts 16:35-40) illustrates Luke's consistent interest in vindicating the cause of the gospel. While it is the Romans who take hostile action against God's messengers (vv. 22-24), it is also the Romans who finally quail before a defiant Paul, indeed apologize and humbly ask him to leave their city! A final visit to Lydia's house suggests that Paul leaves behind a small band of committed converts, "the brethren," living under the patronage of this well-to-do Roman merchant (v. 40).

17:1-15, Thessalonica and Beroea. The ninety-five-mile journey from Philippi to Thessalonica, the capital of the province of Macedonia (→ Thessalonica), led along the Via Egnatia, which ran east-west across Macedonia from Dyrrhachium and Apollonia on the Adriatic Coast through Thrace to Byzantium. Paul's practice of going first to the synagogue by now is "customary" (see commentary above on 13:14). Specially noted is the length of his preaching ("three sabbaths," probably consecutive, v. 2), but also that Paul's argument was "from the Scriptures" (v. 2). For the first time, Paul's preaching is said to focus specifically on the necessity of Christ's suffering and resurrection (v. 3; cf. 26:23; see Introduction). This aligns Paul's preaching even more directly with the early apostolic preaching as well as the preaching of Jesus himself.

The meager response by the Jews to Paul's preaching sharply contrasts with that of the "God-fearers" and leading women (v. 4). But Luke gives even greater emphasis to the negative, "jealous" response by the Jews (v. 5; cf. 5:17; 13:45; also 7:9) and the episode involving Jason, the only "event" in either Thessalonica or Beroea Luke describes in any detail (17:5-9). It shows that in Europe, as in Asia Minor (chaps.

13-14), the real source of opposition to the gentle mission came from the Jewish synagogues, not from Roman officials.

Luke uses the episode to introduce two charges leveled by Jews (and perhaps pagans) against Christians. The first charge, "they have turned the world upside down" (RSV, 17:6), refers not to the astonishing rapidity with which the movement has spread but to its rather consistent tendency to upset the peace (16:20; 24:5, 12). The second charge implied that Christianity was a political threat because of claims about Jesus' kingship (17:7; cf. Luke 1:32-33; 19:38; 23:2-4, 37-38; on "kingdom of God," see Introduction). Especially sensitive to the potentially serious implications of such charges, Luke reports the Romans' refusal to take action, thus vindicating the church (Acts 17:9; cf. 18:12-17).

Even when the Thessalonian Jews follow the scent to Berea and there resort to similar tactics (17:13; cf. 14:19), they are thwarted once again. The ever vigilant "brethren" protect Paul and manage his escape, thus enabling the gospel always to stay one step ahead of its opponents (17:10, 14-15; cf. 9:25; 20:3; 23:16-35). Resistance to the gospel is seen to be an exercise in futility.

In treating Berea (17:10-14), Luke does more than continue the travel narrative. By juxtaposing Berea with Thessalonica, he compares two different responses to Paul's gospel and thereby scores an important theological point. He first depicts the impressive response to Paul's preaching in Berea by both Jews and Greeks (vv. 11-12). Even in the midst of the gentle mission, Jews respond positively to Paul's gospel when they are "open-minded" (JB, v. 11; preferable to RSV: "noble" and NEB: "civil"), perhaps serious-minded, and willing to "examine the Scriptures daily." Luke's fundamental point is that Jews' responsiveness to the gospel is in direct proportion to their willingness to give Scriptures a fair hearing and close scrutiny and to have them properly "opened" by Christian interpreters (Luke 24:27, 32, 45; Acts 8:35).

17:16-34, Athens. In Luke's overall literary strategy for depicting the Pauline mission in Europe, Athens provides the occasion for summarizing Paul's missionary preaching to Gentiles. This section supplements the Lystra episode (14:8-20), which shows Paul engaging popular pagan religion and only briefly outlines his preaching.

Luke sets the stage for Paul's sermon with a well-drawn description, lively with movement and dialogue, intended to capture fully the spirit of the intellectual and cultural center of Greece (vv. 16-21; → Athens). Paul's preaching in the synagogue to "Jews and God-fearers" is introduced but dropped immediately (v. 17). Paul engages well-known schools of popular philosophy (vv. 17-18; → Epicureans; Stoics). The caricature "babblers" (v. 18), literally "seed-picker" (Gk. spermologos), marks Paul as a social type well known in antiquity—the wandering philosopher/preacher who, like a bird picking up seeds, collects philosophical terms here and there and uses them in his street diatribes with little or no grasp of their meaning (Demosthenes 18.127; Dio Chrysostom Oration 32.9). Less scornful was the suggestion that he might be preaching "foreign divinities," a charge similarly leveled against Socrates (Plato Apology 24B, 26B), whose memory Luke's description recalls. Noting that Paul preached "Jesus and the resurrection" (v. 18) not only helps account for their charge—they perhaps misunderstood "resurrection" (Gk. anastasis) as a goddess alongside Jesus—but also identifies the unnamed "man" later in the sermon (v. 31).

Luke continues to portray the ethos of Athens as Paul is led away to the Areopagus (v. 19). Whether it should be understood as a formal council or a place for uninterrupted conversation is uncertain (→ Areopagus).

Paul's sermon (vv. 22-31) is carefully linked to the Lucan setting and as carefully composed for maximum rhetorical effect, fit for a standing Greek orator (v. 22). It is addressed to the same audience as Socrates' "men of Athens" (v. 22; cf., e.g., Plato Apology 17A). Paul's mention of their being "very religious" (v. 22) appropriately acknowledges their renowned esteem for things divine. Concrete proof was provided by their "many objects of worship" (v. 23; cf. Wisdom of Solomon 14:20; 15:17), most notably the inscription "To an unknown god," which suggests there is one they had missed. Even though no inscription with precisely this wording is known from ancient architecture or literature, pagans acknowledged the existence of unknown gods. As an introductory theme, linking the setting to the sermon, the "unknown god" provides an effective strategy for introducing Christian preaching without offending pagan sensibilities.

Like the Lystran sermon (Acts 14:15-17), this sermon differs markedly from the other missionary sermons in Acts. There is neither reference to Israel's history nor any mention of the life, ministry, teachings, and Passion of Christ. Only at the end does it become explicitly Christian with a brief, unnamed reference to the "man" whom God raised from the dead and appointed universal judge (17:31).

Nevertheless, the sermon is anchored firmly in the biblical tradition, specifically in its presentation of God as Creator and, therefore, universal Sovereign of heaven and earth (see commentary above on 4:24). In this respect, it resonates with an equally well ingrained tradition of Greek religious-philosophical thought.

Two conclusions are drawn from this basic theological claim: first, humanly constructed shrines are inadequate to house this cosmic Creator (17:24; cf. 7:48-50), and second, sacrifices served up by human hands, with their attendant altars and images, are inappropriate for a self-sufficient God (17:25; cf. Ps. 50:12-14).

Besides "the world," God had created humanity as well (Acts 17:26-28). This contention is informed by both biblical and nonbiblical understandings of creation. Tracing the nations to "one" (person, v. 26; perhaps "stock," NEB) doubtless recalls the biblical story of Adam (Gen. 1:26-28; also Gen. 10). The ordering of "allotted periods" (probably seasons rather than historical epochs; cf. Gen. 1:14; Ps. 74:17; Wisd. of Sol. 7:18) and establishing (geographical) "boundaries" defining where nations live (cf. Deut. 32:8; also Ps. 74:17) also reflects a biblical outlook, yet not exclusively.

The more important point, however, is the corollary that humans are living beings created to "seek and discover God" (Acts 17:27-28; Deut. 4:29; Isa. 55:6; Wisd. of Sol. 13:6-7). Because of God's proximity to "each one of us," both spatially and historically (Acts 17:27; Ps. 145:18; Jer. 23:23-24; Dio Chrysostom Oration 12.28), "finding God" is no remote possibility. Yet neither is the discovery of God inevitable, something that happens automatically.

The claim that human beings are inseparably related to God their Creator is explicitly supported by quotations from pagan poets. The first, which is usually attributed to the sixth-century B.C. Greek philosopher-poet Epimenes, reverses the usual pantheistic Stoic assertion of divine immanence, namely, that God "is in" everything, and asserts that those who are given life by God necessarily find their life in God. Creatures are indissolubly linked with their Creator, utterly dependent on God for life, movement, and breath (v. 28). The second quotation, more certainly attributed to Aratus, the third-century B.C. Cilician poet, draws the defensible conclusion that God's creatures are also God's "offspring" (v. 28b). The relationship, then, is not simply that of Creator and creature, but Parent and child. So far, biblical and nonbiblical religious traditions have converged in a unified understanding of God as Creator and its implications.

Next, the sermon explicitly addresses the question of how appropriate lifeless images are for the worship of a living Creator (v. 29). Although it is informed here by biblical traditions that eschew idol worship (Deut. 4:28; Isa. 40:18-20), its tone is less polemical (cf. Wisd. of Sol. 13-15; → Idol). Even some pagan critiques of idol worship were harsher. Absent is the satirical description of the woodworker or stonemason who crafts an idol and prays to it, only to be met with stone silence (cf. Isa. 44:9-20; Wisd. of Sol. 13:10-14:7). Rather, a gentler point is made: artistic images, as aesthetically pleasing as they might be, inadequately represent Deity because they are humanly imagined and crafted, not divinely created: how can that which we fashion adequately represent the One who fashioned us?

At this point, the sermon takes a sharp turn away from the common ground established between biblical and pagan religion. Even so, image worship is attributed to "ignorance" (Acts 17:30; cf. 3:17; 13:27; Luke 23:34). God is said to "overlook" such previously misguided efforts (Sir. 28:7; cf. Rom. 1:20-23). What is now required is a fundamental change—universal repentance, which would be reflected in a more enlightened form of worship appropriate to a sovereign deity. Previously, Christian preaching has called for repentance especially on the part of Jews (Acts 2:38; 3:19; 5:31; esp. 20:21). Now a similar reorientation is being required for Gentiles as well (cf. 26:20; 1 Thess. 1:9-10; though cf. Acts 11:18).

Only now does the sermon become explicitly Christian, as Paul introduces the notion of God's universal judgment, which also reflects a biblical perspective (Acts 17:31; Ps. 9:7-8; 96:11-13; 98:8-9; also Acts 10:42; Rom. 2:16; 14:9-10; 2 Tim. 4:1; 1 Pet. 4:5). The "fixed day" renders the OT notion of the coming "day of the Lord" (Obad. 15; Amos 5:18-20; Joel 1:15; Zeph. 1:14-18; Isa. 24:21; → Judgment, Day of).

But why does the sermon take this turn before a gentile audience? Perhaps it is the theme of "universal righteousness," or "universal justice," which Luke hopes Greeks will find appealing. Retributive justice is assured because the living God has already reversed one injustice by raising Jesus from the dead (cf. Acts 3:14-15). Moreover, such justice is most likely to be mediated to the rest of humanity not through lifeless idols but through the "man" who is now alive, like God, Jesus.

The conclusion to Paul's sermon is conspicuously abrupt (17:32-34), though not unexpected, given Luke's earlier description of the setting. The light response (v. 34) included two named individuals, Dionysius and Damaris, who for some reason do not qualify for the honored status of "first converts of Achaia" (1 Cor. 16:15).

18:1-17, Corinth. Just as Philippi, Thessalonica, Beroea, and Athens have served to illustrate different aspects of Paul's missionary practice and preaching in the European mission, Corinth presents still another situation. Certain features are familiar, e.g., preaching in the synagogue first to Jews (and Greek God-fearers), then turning to Gentiles. But the total configuration is distinctively new.

Here, Luke shows, first, how Paul, assisted by co-workers, establishes the "word of God" (v. 11) in a major Greco-Roman urban center (→ Corinth); second, how he justifies directing his mission in this city away from Jews and primarily toward Gentiles; and third, how Christianity, after "settling in" to a community and then being formally charged by Jews with being illegal, is officially vindicated before Roman authorities.

Unlike other founding visits, both before and after, a vital role is played by named co-workers (v. 2; → Aquila; Prisca, Priscilla). Though described as Jews expelled from Rome by Claudius (ca. A.D. 49), quite possibly these Diaspora Jews were already Christians who figured in "disturbances [made] at the instigation of Chrestus" (Suetonius Claudius 25) in Rome involving Jews and (Jewish) Christians. Their initial association with Paul at Corinth was professional, perhaps as members of the same "leather-workers guild." During this initial period, Paul was only able to preach in the synagogue "every sabbath," presumably because during the week he actively worked at his trade. This previously unmentioned feature of his missionary practice is later stressed by Luke (20:34); it had been emphasized by Paul himself (1 Thess. 2:9; 1 Cor. 4:12; also 2 Thess. 3:7-9).

The arrival of Silas and Timothy from Macedonia marks a new stage (Acts 18:5). They increased the work force and possibly brought financial contributions from Philippi (Phil. 4:15-16; 2 Cor. 11:7-9), which enabled Paul to be "occupied [full-time] with preaching" (Acts 18:5). More explicit claims about Christ result in intense Jewish resistance not unlike previous occasions (v. 6; 13:45; 17:5, 13). This results in Paul's formal repudiation of the Jews, both by symbolic gesture (18:6; cf. Neh. 5:13; also Acts 13:51; Luke 9:5; 10:11) and solemn, biblical pronouncement of their guilt (2 Sam. 1:16; 14:9; Jer. 51:35; Ezek. 33:4-6; cf. Matt. 23:34-35; 27:25; Acts 5:28), his innocence (Acts 20:26; cf. Matt. 27:24; Sus. 46), and the legitimacy of directing his mission toward Gentiles (Acts 13:46-47; 28:28; cf. Rom. 1:16; 11:11).

The move from the synagogue next door to the house of the gentile God-fearer Titius Justus symbolizes the beginning of the gentile mission proper (Acts 18:7). Reporting the conversion of the prominent synagogue official (v. 8) may be intended to show that in direct competition with the synagogue, Paul's mission was still effective, even among Jews. In any event, the number of gentile converts ("Corinthians") swelled (v. 8).

But what happens when the church takes root in a place and becomes more highly visible, when outsiders, especially Roman officials, recognize it as something distinct from the synagogue? Might it lose its legal status and social acceptability? Would such long-term success provoke the authorities to take counter-measures against it, even suppress it? To such fears, Christ's nighttime vision to Paul appears to be addressed (vv. 9-10). As had his prophetic predecessors (Josh. 1:9; Isa. 41:10; 43:5; Jer. 1:8, 19), Paul receives divine assurance. He is urged to be fearless in proclaiming God's message and is assured of God's presence and his own personal safety. Paul's full compliance is indicated by his staying an unusually long time (eighteen months, Acts 18:11). This also confirms the truth of Christ's promise. The length of stay attests that "many people" (v. 10) did respond.

Paul's vindication before Gallio (vv. 12-17) is presented as the climax of Paul's stay in Corinth, occurring after the impressive growth of the gospel from meager beginnings has been carefully documented (→ Gallio). This episode shows that even if Christianity begins, grows, and flourishes in a Roman city like Corinth, and even if Jews bring formal charges against it before a Roman tribunal, it will elicit "no attention" from Rome. No Roman laws are being violated; only Jewish laws are being debated. By his silence Gallio approves.

18:18-23, Moving Toward Ephesus. The main function of this section is transitional, serving to get Paul from Corinth to Ephesus. With no formal ending to a "missionary journey," as previously (e.g., 14:26-28), or well-advertised beginning for a "third journey" (e.g., 15:36-41), this section should be read as a continuation of Paul's mission to Gentiles in the Aegean.

At the Corinthian suburb of Cenchreae, Paul (possibly Aquila) fulfills a Nazirite vow (though shaving the head normally occurred at the end rather than the beginning of such vows; cf. Num. 6:1-21, esp. v. 5; → Nazirites). Thereby Luke demonstrates Paul's continued fidelity to his Jewish heritage, which becomes important later (cf. Acts 20:16; 21:20-26).

Landing at Caesarea, some three hundred miles south of Antioch, remains puzzling, as does the unusually vague reference to "going up and greeting the church" (18:22). Probably the Jerusalem church is meant, although conceivably it could be the Caesarean church. Finally, having reached his home base Antioch (cf. 13:1-3; 14:24-28; 15:36-41), his departure is rather straightforward and perfunctory (18:23). Such inattention to details suggests that Luke did not intend to signal the end of one phase of Paul's mission and the formal beginning of another.

18:24-19:41, The Pauline Mission in Ephesus. The account of activities in Ephesus consists of six parts: (1) Apollos's conversion (18:24–28); (2) Paul's baptizing twelve disciples (19:1–7); (3) establishing an effective mission in Ephesus for Asia (19:8–10); (4) Paul's prophetic deeds and the gospel's triumph over pagan magic (19:11–20); (5) Paul's plans to go to Rome (19:21–22); and (6) the gospel confronting pagan religion: Christ and Artemis (19:23–41).

Apollos's conversion occurs before Paul's arrival in Ephesus, but it is achieved by Priscilla and Aquila, duly certified members of the Pauline circle. It thus becomes the first episode of the Pauline mission at Ephesus (18:24–28).

There obviously existed a Christian community (v. 27) at Ephesus prior to, and therefore independent of, Paul (unless 18:18 intends to portray Paul as the founder of the Ephesian church). From somewhere—probably Alexandria (Egyptian Christianity is otherwise untreated by Luke; though cf. 6:9), less likely from Christians already resident in Ephesus—Apollos had been “instructed in the way of the Lord” (i.e., Jesus; 18:25; cf. 9:22; 22:4; 24:14, 22; → Apollos).

This episode illustrates how the early church, Pauline Christianity in particular, dealt with cases of imperfect knowledge, or how independent streams of Christianity were brought into the mainstream of apostolic Christianity. In this instance, the issue was an inadequate understanding of Christian baptism.

Luke also uses the Apollos episode to show how a Pauline church enters its second phase under the leadership of another teacher. A Christian teacher duly corrected by members of the Pauline circle is thus recommended by letter (18:27; cf. 2 Cor. 3:1–2; also Rom. 16:1; Col. 4:10) to another church, and Paul's successor continues to do precisely what Paul himself did when he was there (Acts 18:28).

Coupled with the Apollos confirmation is the episode involving twelve disciples of John (19:1–7), which presents a new situation. When Paul arrives at Ephesus, he finds those who are already “disciples”—probably Christians, assuming Luke uses the term consistently (v. 1; e.g., 19:9, 30; also 11:26). Yet their (Christian?) discipleship is lacking in one vital respect. They are completely ignorant of the Holy Spirit, the sure sign in Luke-Acts of full-fledged forms of Christianity (cf. Luke 3:16; Acts 1:4–5; 11:16; 13:52). They had, however, received John's baptism (19:3), although where, how, and by whom are not stated. Apollos perhaps? This suggests the existence of “Baptist sects” and the continuing influence of John's movement outside Palestine long after the death of Jesus.

The inclusion of this episode shows what Paul did to incorporate quasi-Christian groups into the church's mainstream. Just as their predecessors who were also “firsts,” albeit in different ways, had done, they receive, first, baptism “in the name of Jesus” (v. 5; signifying fully their shift of loyalty from John to Jesus) and, second, apostolic (or equivalent) confirmation by the bestowal of the Holy Spirit (v. 6), visibly evidenced, usually through speaking in tongues and prophesying (2:4, 38–39; 8:14–19; 10:44–48; 11:15).

Establishing an effective Pauline mission in Ephesus (19:8–10) follows a familiar pattern with some new features. For the first time, the content of Paul's synagogue preaching is said to focus on the “kingdom of God” (v. 8), already hinted at earlier (14:22), and repeated later (20:25; 28:23, 31; see Introduction). This links Paul still further with his predecessors (8:12) but, more importantly, with Christ (1:3; also Luke 4:43). Also striking is the duration of his ministry possibly in a public hall (→ Tyrannus, Hall of)—two years, the longest yet, and when combined with the earlier three months (Acts 19:8), can be rounded off to a three-year stay in Ephesus (20:31). Accordingly, Paul's mission radiates beyond a single city to an entire region (cf. 13:49), reaching both Jews and Greeks throughout Asia, i.e., western Asia Minor. Included would be cities of known Pauline connections: Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis (Col. 4:13–17). Luke thereby shows Paul's ever-widening influence.

Luke highlights Paul's healing “powers” as an integral part of his two-year ministry (Acts 19:11–12; cf. 2 Cor. 12:12). While he has earlier performed “prophetic deeds” (Acts 13:9–12; 14:3, 8–10; 16:16–18), what now occurs is clearly “extraordinary”: healing and exorcising through both direct (laying on hands) and indirect contact (19:11–12). This picture of enhanced healing power casts him even more firmly in the mold of the apostles (5:12–16) and Jesus himself (Luke 4:31–41; esp. Luke 8:43–45; cf. Mark 5:27; Matt. 9:20–22; also Mark 6:53–56; Matt. 14:34–36).

Paul's reputation as an exorcist is further enhanced as he is pitted against seven “itinerant Jewish exorcists” (Acts 19:13–17). Oddly, however, Paul does not actually exorcise the man's evil spirit (cf. Luke 4:33–37; Mark 1:23–28). Rather, the Jewish exorcists themselves acknowledge Paul's unquestioned power over the demonic order (Acts 19:13). The evil spirit then utters a confession that simultaneously qualifies Paul and disqualifies them as rightful colleagues of Jesus (v. 15). As proof, one man singlehandedly whips seven, which apparently serves to demonstrate the superiority of Paul's “power” to that of his seven Jewish competitors (cf. Luke 11:21–23). The episode ends with the point clearly made: the power of “the name of the Lord Jesus” is mediated exclusively through Paul, who brooks no rivals (cf. Luke 9:49–50; Mark 9:38–41).

Paul's own demonstrated power (Acts 19:11–12) and his proven superiority over his Jewish rivals (vv. 13–16) have a twofold effect: increased respect among the wider public (v. 17) and strengthening of the Christian community (vv. 18-20). The impressive triumph over magical practices, clearly banned in the OT (Deut. 18:10-14), Luke depicts as a purge within the Christian community. Those who were already "believers" now "confess" (their sins? cf. Acts 8:22-23) and publicly abandon all vestiges of pagan practices. Thereby Luke shows that Christian communities are formed gradually, not instantly. Properly purified, as before in the case of Ananias and Sapphira (5:1-16), the church experiences new growth and strength (19:20).

The mention of Paul's travel plans (vv. 21-22) signals a break in Luke's account of Ephesus. Events just described have firmly established Pauline Christianity at Ephesus. This is indicated by the summary in v. 20 and by Paul's willingness to think now of churches previously established, indeed to dispatch two co-workers to Macedonia (v. 22), but especially to look ahead, for the first time, beyond Jerusalem to Rome (v. 21). In his own words, Paul says now what was hinted earlier (9:15; also 1:8) and becomes evident later. It is a divine necessity for his mission to the Gentiles to culminate in Rome (cf. 23:11; 25:12). Luke now begins to set the stage for chaps. 21-28.

In light of Paul's statements in his letters about his mission stay at Ephesus (1 Cor. 15:32; 16:8) and Asia (2 Cor. 1:8-10, 15-17), and what is known (or reconstructed) more generally about his activities during this period, this brief Lucan interlude, as indeed the whole account of his stay in Ephesus, contains some puzzling omissions.

The final episode at Ephesus—the riot in the 24,000-seat theater prompted by the complaints of Demetrius the silversmith—serves as Luke's most detailed encounter between the gospel and pagan religion (Acts 19:23-41).

The scene depicted here is much bolder than the previous episodes where the gospel has engaged pagan culture and religion. If Paul showed polite deference to pagan religion in Athens (17:16-31), the implications of "the Way" (19:23) are now more emphatically stated: manufactured gods are not gods (v. 26). Paul no longer deftly introduces "the unknown god" but now directly confronts the world-renowned goddess Artemis (v. 27). Just as Luke has portrayed Paul's growing influence in the city and region (19:10, 17), so now the Pauline gospel becomes a major challenge to both the religion and economy of an entire city and region (vv. 26-27). In Corinth, Paul had been challenged before city officials, but the event was not widely publicized (18:12-17). Now Paul becomes a public figure, the friend of prominent regional officials (19:31), whose mission causes "no small stir" (v. 23) throughout the city, indeed threatens the city's peaceful reputation (v. 40). Generally, Luke's description of the episode realistically captures certain features of social, commercial, and religious life in Ephesus (→ Artemis of the Ephesians; Ephesus).

Perhaps the most remarkable feature of Luke's account is the way he achieves his literary purpose through the words uttered by the two most prominent pagan spokespersons: the silversmith Demetrius (vv. 25-27) and the town clerk (vv. 35-40). Through Demetrius, Luke depicts the widespread and penetrating effect of the Pauline mission (v. 26). However meager the results of his preaching might have been in Athens (17:32-34), he has now succeeded in turning "a considerable number of people" away from the worship of gods (19:26). So successful has Paul's preaching been that now "Asia and the whole world" (v. 27) can consider Christ as a genuine alternative to Artemis.

Through the words of the town clerk (vv. 35-40), Luke defends the Christian cause. He exonerates Paul (i.e., his co-workers) as being "neither sacrilegious nor blasphemers of our goddess" (v. 37). Just as Jews earlier had been able to coexist with Romans by demonstrating a more tolerant attitude toward pagan cults (see Josephus Against Apion 2.237; Antiquities of the Jews 4.207), so now Luke similarly depicts "the Way." For all the impact Paul's mission has made on the city and region, it cannot be shown that it has been done in a way that dishonors pagan religion! Because the charges against Christians are unfounded and because Demetrius and the townspeople have failed to use proper legal channels, the real threat to peace and stability is the Ephesians themselves, perhaps the Jews, but not the Christians (Acts 19:40-41).

20:1-38, Concluding the Aegean Mission.

As planned (19:21), Paul travels to Macedonia (20:1) and Achaia (here Hellas, or Greece, v. 2), thereby adhering to his pattern of visiting recently established churches (14:21-23; 15:36), probably Philippi, Thessalonica, Beroea, perhaps Athens. The three-month stay in Greece (20:3) almost certainly occurred in Corinth, where continued Jewish resistance can easily be imagined (18:6, 12-17) and where he could catch a ship to Syria. This is a plausible time and place for his writing Romans (cf. Rom. 15:22-29; 16:1-23). Once again a Jewish plot is averted (Acts 9:23-25; cf. 20:19; 23:12-35; 2 Cor. 11:26), this time by returning overland through Macedonia.

Paul's increasing circle of co-workers (Acts 20:4) now includes persons representing various regions of his gentile mission. Puzzling is the omission of representatives of Achaia (Corinth, Athens). These seven (though perhaps only the two Asians) proceeded to Troas, while Paul and whoever is included in the "us" (v. 5) remained at Philippi, possibly so he could observe the seven-day period of Passover, thereby indicating further his continued fidelity to Jewish traditions (v. 6; cf. 18:18; 21:23-26). The mention of Passover dates Paul's stay in Philippi in the spring.

The seven-day stay at Troas (20:7-12) is notable for its description of an early Christian worship service "on the first of the week" (cf. 1 Cor. 16:2; Rev. 1:10; also Luke 24:1; Mark 16:1; Matt. 28:1), which likely ran from Saturday (so NEB; though conceivably Sunday, depending on whether Luke used a Jewish or Roman form of reckoning time) evening through daybreak (Acts 20:11). Worship in this Pauline mission church is portrayed as having three central elements: preaching (vv. 7, 11), healing (vv. 8-10), and breaking bread, i.e., the Lord's Supper (vv. 7, 11; cf. 2:42, 46; 1 Cor. 11:17-32). Luke shows Paul's mission churches conforming to the earlier apostolic pattern (Acts 2:42, 46). Raising Eutychus (vv. 9-12) also documents Paul's prophetic powers (cf. 1 Kings 17:21-22; 2 Kings 4:33-35) and his equal status with both Jesus (Luke 8:49-56; Mark 5:35-43; Matt. 9:18-26) and Peter (Acts 9:36-43). It also shows how his miraculous "powers" directly benefit the Christian community (cf. 19:11-12).

Paul's continued travels (20:13-16) are rehearsed primarily to get him to Miletus (v. 15), the site of his last sermon as a missionary in the Aegean. Apparently, he is still accompanied by the retinue described in v. 4; also the "we" section resumes, having broken off temporarily in v. 7 (cf. 16:10). Luke especially explains that Paul chose to bypass Ephesus not because it still posed a threat (2 Cor. 1:8-10; 1 Cor. 15:30-32) but to save time in reaching Jerusalem. By mentioning Pentecost, Luke again may be stressing Paul's faithfulness to his Jewish heritage (cf. Acts 18:18; 20:6; also 21:23-26).

Together with his synagogue sermon to Jews (13:16-41) and the Areopagus sermon to Gentiles (17:22-31), Paul's sermon to the Ephesian elders at Miletus (20:17-38) completes the cycle of speeches recorded by Luke in chaps. 13-20. The only sermon by Paul addressed specifically to the church (through the elders), this "pastoral homily" rounds out Luke's portrait of Paul as missionary preacher and church minister. Here Luke unfolds Paul's theology of ministry.

The sermon forms a natural conclusion to his Ephesian ministry (Acts 18:24-19:41), where Luke especially has stressed pastoral aspects of Paul's ministry: perfecting quasi-Christians through additional teaching (19:1-7; also 18:24-28); preaching (19:8-10); his ministry of healing, competing with other miracle workers, and the complete elimination of pagan, magical practices from the church (19:11-20); developing further mission plans (19:21-22); and fully engaging the social, economic, and political life of the city and region (19:23-41). His pastoral role continued as he strengthened other churches (20:1-6) and attended to matters of worship (20:7-12).

The sermon and occasion also reflect the earlier picture of governance by "elders" (Gk. presbyteroi) within Pauline churches (14:21-23), although here the "presbyters" (v. 17) also bear the title "bishops" (Gk. episkopoi, v. 28; cf. Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:1-2; Tit. 1:7; 1 Pet. 5:2).

In form, the speech is a farewell sermon, addressed primarily to the Ephesian elders and church, who do not expect to see Paul again (Acts 20:25, 38). His "departure" (v. 29) refers ostensibly to his departing Ephesus (21:1) but clearly means his death (20:24; 21:13; cf. 2 Tim. 4:6; Phil. 2:17). Thus Luke has Paul here bidding farewell to all his mission churches and the church at large.

Woven into his "testament" are the standard themes of such addresses (cf. John 14-17; 2 Timothy): anticipations of his "departure" and the circumstances surrounding it (Acts 20:25, 29); review (and defense) of past conduct (vv. 18-21, 26-27, 31, 33-34); preview of the future, immediate (vv. 22-24) and long term, including the predicted threat of heresies (vv. 29-30); "passing the torch," or preparing for his departure by advising his successors (vv. 28, 31-32). The legacy of exemplary conduct and the call to imitation, important ingredients of testaments, are heard throughout (esp. v. 35; cf. 1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1; 2 Tim. 1:8, 13-14; 3:10-17).

The speech encapsulates various features of Paul's ministry unfolded in the previous narrative. It also echoes sentiments expressed in Paul's own writings, which suggests that Luke has sought to capture the essence and tone of Paul's understanding of his own apostolic ministry.

One new element is the prospect of false teachers who would threaten Paul's legacy (Acts 20:28-30). They are depicted as wolves, a common epithet for heretics (Matt. 7:15; 10:16; John 10:12; also Did. 16:3; Ign. Phld. 2:2; 2 Clem. 5:2-4). Bishops as shepherds recalls OT images (Ezek. 34:1-31; Jer. 23:1-4; Zech. 10:3; 11:16-17) and later becomes standard Christian parlance (1 Pet. 5:1-4; John 21:15-17). He cautions against both external and internal threats (cf. 1 John 2:19). This threat of heresy echoes other NT sentiments, especially in the pastoral Letters (1 Tim. 1:3-7, 19-20; 4:1-3, 7; 2 Tim. 2:14-18, 23-26; 3:1-9; 4:3-4; Titus 1:13-16; 3:9-10), and may envision quasi-Gnostic teachings encountered by the church in Luke's own time during the late first century A.D. (→ Gnosticism).

The speech throughout underscores Paul's orthodoxy and fidelity to the apostolic preaching. The essential features of his preaching and teaching are in line with that of his apostolic predecessors (Acts 20:21, 25, 32). Especially significant is Paul's concluding reference to the saying of Jesus (v. 35), unrecorded in any of the canonical Gospels, calling for responsible care for the weak (cf. Rom. 15:1; Gal. 2:10). Paul is thus portrayed as faithful to the mission of Jesus (Luke 4:18-21), who himself commissioned Paul (Acts 20:24). Having preached and ministered in ways reminiscent of Jesus, he now bequeaths Jesus' teachings to his churches. He is a faithful and humble servant of the Lord (i.e., Jesus; v. 19; cf. Col. 3:24).

By placing Paul's "farewell address" here, Luke tacitly acknowledges awareness of Paul's death. Consequently, it need not be reported at the conclusion of the narrative (28:31). It also prepares the way for the final stage of the story—Paul's "afflictions and imprisonment" in Jerusalem (20:23; 21:11, 33), unfolding of which thereby becomes a fulfillment of the Spirit's own predictions. Coming at the end of this major period of Paul's mission in the Aegean, the sermon also becomes Luke's most compactly stated apology for his own hero and his best defense of Paul's conduct as missionary and church minister.

21:1-14, Journey to Jerusalem. Paul's next major destination is Jerusalem (cf. 19:21), where the next series of events occurs (21:15-23:30). His journey there from Ephesus is swift. This third "we" section (21:1-18; cf. 16:10) reads like a travel diary: ports of call, lengths of stay, names of hosts, and travel details about ships and the traveling party are given.

Luke uses this travel narrative to introduce some other Christian communities at Tyre (21:4), Ptolemais (v. 7), Caesarea (v. 16). Perceptive readers already might have expected to find followers of Jesus at Tyre (11:19; also Luke 6:17; 10:13-14) and Caesarea (Acts 8:40; 10:1-11:18; 12:19; 18:22). But more than simply describing an itinerary, Luke demonstrates Paul's acceptance by Palestinian churches that he himself had not established.

In the Caesarean scene (21:8-14), Luke achieves several things. First, he links Paul even more firmly with Judean Christianity. He is welcomed by "one of the seven" (v. 8), an apostolic appointee with early ties to Jerusalem whose evangelistic work had received full apostolic confirmation (8:4-40).

Second, he prepares readers for what follows immediately—Paul's arrest and imprisonment. Heretofore, Paul's mission has experienced no significant setback. At each turn, Paul narrowly escaped being caught (9:23-25; 14:19-20; 16:35-40; 17:10; 19:30-31; 20:3, 19). This time he will not. Consequently, Luke introduces the Judean prophet Agabus (cf. 11:27-28), who performs a symbolic gesture reminiscent of the OT prophets (21:11; Isa. 20:2-6; Jer. 13:1-14). Speaking for the Holy Spirit, he also predicts that Paul's real nemesis would be "the Jews at Jerusalem"; that he would be "bound," i.e., imprisoned; and that the Jews would "deliver him over to the Gentiles," i.e., the Romans. As the Lucan narrative unfolds, each turns out to be accurate.

Third, Luke is possibly beginning his portrayal of the "passion of Paul." In one sense, Paul's journey to Jerusalem is a miniature of the much longer travel narrative in Luke's Gospel in which Jesus journeys from his Galilean mission field to his ultimate destination in Jerusalem (Luke 9:51-19:44). Certain elements of the Caesarean scene suggest some parallels between Paul and Jesus (see Introduction). Paul resolutely travels to Jerusalem (Acts 21:12-13; cf. Luke 9:51-53; 13:22; 17:11; 18:31-33; 19:11, 28), willing even to meet the fate expected of God's faithful prophets—death in Jerusalem (Acts 21:13; 20:24; Luke 13:33-34). His destiny is finally interpreted as conforming to "the will of the Lord" (Acts 21:14), even though, unlike Gethsemane, it is his companions who concede this, not Paul himself (Luke 22:42). Luke leaves little doubt, however, that Paul's going to Jerusalem, and what happens there, are divinely willed (Acts 9:15; 19:21; 23:11).

21:15-23:30 Paul in Jerusalem

21:15-26, Paul's Arrival in Jerusalem. Paul is welcomed by the Jerusalem church ("brethren," v. 17), which includes the Cypriot Mnason, one of the "earliest disciples" (v. 16), perhaps an early associate of Barnabas (4:36-37). Since Paul's last official visit to Jerusalem (15:2-4; though cf. 18:22), the leadership structure has changed. The Jerusalem elders, who earlier shared in the leadership with the apostles (15:2, 4, 6, 22, 23; 16:4), now stand alone (21:18; though cf. 11:30), probably presided over by James, the Lord's brother (21:18; cf. 12:17; 15:13-21; 1 Cor. 15:7; Gal. 1:19; 2:9, 12; also Mark 6:3; Matt. 13:55).

Paul's return is reminiscent of his earlier return to Antioch (Acts 14:24-28) and his report at the Jerusalem conference (15:4, 12), where he depicted the gentile mission as "God's doing" (21:19; cf. 9:15). His detailed report is enthusiastically received by the Jerusalem church leaders who "glorify God" (21:20). This is the typical response in Luke-Acts acknowledging that God incontestably has been at work (Luke 2:20; 5:25-26; 7:16; 13:13; 17:15; 18:43; 23:47; Acts 4:21; 11:18). God's full approval of the Pauline mission is thus explicitly acknowledged by the Jerusalem church.

In their "speech" (21:20-25), they report the dissatisfaction of "many thousands" of Jewish Christians, probably still in Judea, perhaps especially in Jerusalem (v. 24), who are still "zealous for the law" (v. 20).

Since Luke is here introducing a new element of opposition to Paul and his mission, their precise objection should be noted. They do not object to the policy of admitting Gentiles into the church (as was once the case, 11:2-3) or to the terms for admitting them or having fellowship with them (15:1, 5). This has been settled (15:19-21, 23-29), and the terms of the Jerusalem conference are fully acceptable to them (21:25).

Instead, they are worried about the implications of Paul's teaching for those Christians who wish to remain faithful to their Jewish way of life. They fear Paul as a threat to the continued vitality of Jewish Christianity, especially in the Diaspora, and therefore in their own region. These "Torah-zealous" Jewish Christians are not trying to make gentile Christianity Jewish; they are trying to keep Jewish Christianity from becoming gentile.

Since Luke has not yet addressed these questions in his narrative, he carefully states the objections of Paul's detractors. Their general complaint (v. 21) is that Paul is teaching "apostasy from Moses" to "Jews among the Gentiles" (probably Jews living in the Diaspora). Specifically, they fear that Jews who become Christians, in Paul's view, are no longer obliged, first, to practice circumcision, and second, to "observe the [Jewish] customs." And, given Paul's own stated views about "justification apart from the law (of Moses)" (Rom. 3:21-22; 10:4; Gal. 3:23-25) and circumcision (Rom. 2:25-29; 4:9-12; 1 Cor. 7:17-19), it is not difficult to see how their perceptions might have developed.

It now becomes clear why Luke earlier reported Paul's decision to circumcise Timothy (Acts 16:3). He wished to show that circumcision is still appropriate, if not obligatory, for Jews, even in the Diaspora. Also by depicting Paul as consistently sensitive to Jewish concerns and faithfully observing Jewish customs, such as the Nazirite vow (18:18), Passover (20:6), and Pentecost (20:16), Luke has shown that even a Jew in the Diaspora "keeps the customs." In the preceding narrative, Luke has already answered these objections in advance!

Yet proof that Paul "lives in observance of the law" (21:24) is needed for this group of concerned Jewish Christians in Jerusalem. The proposed solution is some public display of Paul's fidelity to Judaism. Paul is asked to assist four Jews (doubtless Jewish Christians) who had taken a Nazirite vow (vv. 23-24; cf. Num. 6:1-21). To complete the vow, expensive sacrifices had to be offered (Num. 6:14-17), and Paul is asked to underwrite their expenses (v. 24). This would demonstrate not only that he thinks it appropriate for his fellow Jewish Christians to "keep the customs," even as he himself had done (18:18), but also display his generosity.

But more than this, he is asked to purify himself along with them (21:24, 26). It appears that Paul is being asked to enter into the vow with the four men, but apparently this would have required a minimum thirty-day period (m. Nazir 1:3), which Luke's seven-day period of fulfillment would not allow (vv. 26-27). In fact, the biblical instructions for the Nazirite vow do not entail an "ordinary" seven-day period of purification prior to the completion of the vow, as Luke's account seems to suggest (vv. 26-27).

What may be unstated in Luke's account is that the four men, in some way, had become defiled through association or contact with a corpse and that they are now in the process of fulfilling the requisite seven-day purification period (cf. Num. 6:6-12; 19:11-12).

21:27-40, Paul's Arrest in Jerusalem.

Luke now describes a second source of resistance in Jerusalem to Paul—non-Christian Jews. Agabus has already predicted that "the Jews at Jerusalem" would finally "bind" Paul (21:11). Eventually, this turns out to be the case, but the real source of opposition is traced to "the Jews from Asia" (v. 27; cf. 6:9), probably Ephesus, since they recognized "Trophimus the Ephesian" (21:29; cf. 20:4; 2 Tim. 4:20). Complaints similar to those leveled against Stephen (Acts 6:13), and in a sense against Jesus himself (cf. Mark 14:58; Matt. 26:61; Mark 15:29; Matt. 27:40), are now leveled against Paul (Acts 21:28; cf. 18:13; 25:8). As one who is allegedly anti-Jewish, antilaw, anti-Temple, Paul is charged with being a threat to "everyone everywhere"—a universal menace (21:28).

Luke emphasizes that the Asian Jews mistakenly thought Paul had taken the gentile Trophimus into the Temple (v. 29). Their charge is thus unfounded. Nevertheless, they succeed in inciting the entire city against him. They act with a frenzied violence already encountered in Acts (5:33; 7:54, 57-58), and their murderous intentions are underscored (21:31; cf. 23:27). The mob's cry, "Kill him!" (21:36), echoes similar shouts against Jesus (Luke 23:18; cf. John 19:15). This is perhaps another stroke in the Lucan portrait of Paul's "passion."

As certainly as "the Jews" try to kill Paul, the Romans (again) come to his rescue (Acts 21:31-36; cf. 19:31). This is to be a recurrent theme of the final chapters of Acts. Even so, it is a Roman who orders Paul bound "with two chains" (21:33; cf. 12:6), thereby fulfilling Agabus' prophecy (21:11). From this point on in Acts Paul remains imprisoned.

The interchange between Paul and the tribune (vv. 37-39), which sets the stage for Paul's first defense speech (22:1-21), provides Luke an occasion to distinguish Paul from an Egyptian who, during the procuratorship of Felix (ca. A.D. 52-59), led four thousand terrorists (Lat. sicarii, lit., "dagger men"; → Assassins) on a revolutionary mission against the Romans (21:38). Such a figure is described in some detail (though with some differences) by Josephus (Jewish War 2.254-65; also Antiquities of the Jews 20.169-172).

22:1-21, Paul's Defense Before the Temple Crowd. The need for such a defense, or "apology" (Gk. apologia; also 25:16; cf. 19:33; 24:10; 25:8; 26:1-2; 26:24; also 1 Cor. 9:3; Phil. 1:7, 16; 2 Tim. 4:16; 1 Pet. 3:15) was anticipated by Jesus, who saw such occasions as opportunities not only to answer charges but to bear positive witness for the faith (Luke 12:11; 21:14). This speech sets the tone for the remainder of Acts, which becomes Luke's defense of Paul. So important is this apologetic theme for Luke that Paul's defense is repeated, albeit in different versions, twice in the following narrative (Acts 24:10-21; 26:2-23).

There is considerable overlap between what Paul reports in this speech (22:3-16) and what Luke has already related in his earlier narrative (9:3-19), though some new details emerge.

One major difference is that Ananias plays a more prominent role in chap. 9. His interchanges with the Lord carry the narrative (9:10-16). The Lord's commission of Paul is actually delivered to Ananias, not to Paul himself (9:15-16). In chap. 22, by contrast, Ananias plays a less central role (vv. 12-16). He restores Paul's sight, then directly delivers to Paul God's commission, which has several noteworthy features.

In chap. 22 God is defined in strongly biblical tones: the God who commissioned Moses at Sinai is now the God who commissions Paul (v. 14; Exod. 3:15-16). His "appointment" by God is reminiscent of earlier prophetic appointments (Jer. 1:4-5; Gal. 1:15-16; cf. Acts 26:16). The divine appointment entailed the ability to "discern God's will" and also see "the Just One" (in the Damascus road vision) and hear his voice. God, therefore, intended for Paul to be confronted by the Innocent Christ (cf. Luke 23:47; Acts 3:14; 7:52) and to receive his commission directly from Jesus. Thereby he becomes a duly qualified "witness" (22:15; cf., e.g., Luke 24:48; Acts 1:8; 2:32; 3:15) able to testify both to the risen Christ whom he has seen and proclaim what he has heard (4:20).

Response to his prophetic call is to be immediate, requiring the removal of his former sins (of persecution) by baptismal washing (22:16; cf. 1 Cor. 6:11; Eph. 5:26; Titus 3:5; Heb. 10:22; 2 Pet. 1:9; also Ezek. 16:9). His baptismal initiation is like that of earlier predecessors: it was in "the name of Jesus Christ" (2:38). It now entailed "calling on his name" (22:16), which meant acknowledging loyalty to Christ primarily through formal confession but likely through prayer as well (cf. 2:21 [= Joel 2:32]; 9:14, 21; Rom. 10:12-13; 1 Cor. 1:2; 2 Tim. 2:22; also Ps. 99:6).

Two new elements are the brief rehearsal of Paul's past (Acts 22:3) and the vision in the Temple at Jerusalem (vv. 17-21). As to the former, these opening words repeat what Paul has told the tribune privately (21:39) but do so with a well-established formula for describing one's life story: born, reared, and educated (22:3; cf. Acts 7:20-22). The formula suggests that Paul probably spent the first three years of his life in his birthplace Tarsus in Cilicia but early moved to Jerusalem where he was "reared" by his family and then "educated" under Gamaliel (cf. 5:34-39). As such, he becomes a Jerusalemite, formally educated to adhere strictly and zealously to the sacred traditions of the fathers (cf. Gal. 1:14; Phil. 3:5-6; also Rom. 10:2). This opening self-portrait responds effectively to two of the charges leveled against Paul (Acts 21:28): his past record is one of utmost respect for both the Jewish people and their law.

As to the latter, Paul's speech is consistent in reporting an immediate return to Jerusalem (9:26; cf. Gal. 1:17-18). His receiving a vision in the Temple while "in a trance" (Acts 22:17; cf. 10:10; 11:5) has all the characteristics of a prophetic call (Isa. 6:1-13). But it is a call not from God, but Jesus himself. In sharp contrast to the commission mediated by Ananias, in which God appointed Paul to be a witness "to all men" (Acts 22:15), it is now Jesus who sends Paul away from Jerusalem (v. 18) exclusively to Gentiles (v. 21). With a reluctance reminiscent of Moses and other hesitant prophets (Exod. 4:10-17), Paul recalls his participation in the death of Stephen and his subsequent terroristic acts (Acts 7:54-8:3), but to no avail. He is clearly Jesus' chosen prophet to the Gentiles.

This Temple vision is perhaps Luke's response to the third charge that Paul is "against this place" (21:28). On the contrary, the Temple serves as the place where his prophetic service to God actually begins, as did Isaiah's.

Jesus' prediction of the (Jerusalem) Jews' rejection (22:18) apparently prompts the interruption, in a manner similar to the Stephen speech (7:51-8:1). Earlier Luke reported resistance among the Hellenists to Paul's preaching in Jerusalem (9:28-29) but not the wholesale Jewish obduracy implied here. Even so, Jesus' parable of the banquet (Luke 14:16-24) has prepared the way for this theme that becomes something of a commonplace in Acts (cf. 28:24-29).

Chaps. 13–20 have consistently demonstrated the resistance, for the most part, by Diaspora Jews to Paul; chap. 21 has shown widespread resistance among Jerusalem Jews (so 21:11).

22:22–29, Paul the Roman Citizen. Luke depicts the aftermath of the speech in his typical manner: Paul is rescued from the fury of the Jews by a Roman (cf. 18:12–17). Through brief but lively dialogue, the tables are turned as the Roman centurion finally defers to the Roman Paul. The central issue is Roman citizenship (22:25, 29; cf. 16:37, 38; 23:27). Bought citizenship bows before natural born citizenship (22:28). Once again, the enemies quake in fear before the freeborn Roman citizen Paul (v. 29; cf. 16:38). Luke also emphasizes the Romans' inability to obtain any clear evidence against Paul: he is innocent (cf. Acts 23:1, 28–29; 24:22; 25:25, 26; see Introduction).

22:30–23:11, Paul Before the Sanhedrin. In appearing before the Sanhedrin, Paul's visibility before "Jews at Jerusalem" increases. Accordingly, Luke portrays Paul as a figure of increasing significance in the life of Jerusalem Jewry.

The curious exchange between Paul and Ananias (23:1–5) contrasts the high priest's disobedience of the law with Paul's complete fidelity to the law. Ananias's unexplained action in striking Paul is seen to be in direct violation of the biblical prescriptions for impartial judgment (Lev. 19:15; Deut. 1:16–17; 19:16–19). By contrast, Paul both quotes the law (Exod. 22:28) and expresses willingness to live by it. Ananias's external, visible actions have exposed the superficial whitewash of his own Jewish loyalty (cf. Ezek. 13:10–16; also Matt. 23:27). Whether Luke knows that Ananias later died a violent death at the hands of a mob (Josephus Jewish War 2.441–42), and therefore has Paul uttering a prophetic death threat, is less certain (→ Ananias [3]).

As was the case with Peter earlier, the Sanhedrin hearing serves as a forum in which Christianity is heard—and vindicated (Acts 5:27–42). In spite of significantly different proceedings that are reported, in both cases, Pharisees emerge as allies of Christians. The "scribes of the Pharisees' party" who declare Paul innocent of any wrongdoing (23:9), and wonder whether he might truly be an agent of some divine messenger, are echoing the cautious advice of Gamaliel (5:38–39).

Luke continues his earlier agenda in depicting Christianity and Pharisaism as natural allies, hence the direct continuity between the Pharisaic branch of Judaism and Christianity. The link is expressed directly in Paul's own testimony: he is (now) a Pharisee, with a Pharisaic heritage (23:6). His Pharisaic loyalty is a present commitment, not a recently jettisoned stage of his religious past (cf. Phil. 3:5–9). His Christian proclamation of a risen Lord, and by implication, of a risen humanity (Acts 23:6), represents a particular, but defensible, form of Pharisaic theology. Belief in the risen Messiah represents the continuation of God's promises to Israel.

As the debate in the Sanhedrin unfolds, Luke distinguishes the Sadducees from "main-line Jews." He portrays them as skeptics who deny the existence of spirits or angels (v. 8), both of which are central features of the biblical witness (→ Sadducees; Pharisees).

That Paul emerges from the Sanhedrin vindicated is seen in the night vision of Jesus (v. 11), who reconfirms the validity of his testimony before the council and now also confirms his mission plans formulated earlier in Ephesus (19:21). It is one of many Lucan "promises" made within the narrative that is later fulfilled (28:23).

23:12–30, Plot Against Paul and His Planned Transfer to Caesarea. This third plot by "the Jews" against Paul (cf. 9:23; 20:3; also 9:29; 20:19) is by far the most meticulously planned and elaborately described; it includes over forty conspirators (23:13, 21), a full-fast oath (vv. 12, 14, 21), conspiracy with the "chief priests and elders" (v. 14; 25:15; also 4:23; 22:30; 25:2), and repeated references to their determination to kill Paul (23:12, 14, 15, 21, 27).

Following the typical Lucan pattern, intensified efforts to resist the gospel are met with even more dramatic forms of deliverance (see commentary above on 5:17–26). In this case, the plot is aborted by the combined efforts of a lad (23:18), identified as Paul's nephew (v. 16), and a friendly Roman tribune who is finally willing to deploy half the city's garrison to foil the plot (vv. 23–24).

The proper interpretation of these events for readers is provided in the letter from the tribune to the governor (vv. 26–30). Even though the tribune's recounting of the events in the Temple courtyard (21:30–36) is bent in his own favor (23:27), all the important (Lucan) elements of the story are included: (1) primary responsibility for the hostile actions against Paul lies with "the Jews" (v. 27; 9:23, 29; 21:11, 27, 36); (2) Roman soldiers have shown proper respect for a Roman citizen—Romans as allies of Christians (22:24–29; also 16:38–39; 18:12–17); (3) Romans have followed proper procedures, attempting to determine precisely the nature of the charges against the accused (23:28; 22:24, 30; 25:26) and ordering his accusers to face him directly (23:30; Deut. 19:16–19); (4) it is essentially an internal conflict within Judaism concerning "questions of their law" (Acts 18:14–15; 25:18–20)—Christians are to be seen as continuous with Judaism and therefore entitled to Roman rights extended to Jews; and (5) unqualified declaration of Paul's innocence, certainly with respect to a capital offense (23:29; see Introduction).

23:31–26:32

Paul in Caesarea

The remainder of Paul's stay in Palestine occurs in Caesarea, the seat of Roman government in Palestine. This section unfolds Paul's various appearances before increasingly important Roman officials: Felix (24:1–27), Festus (25:1–27), and Agrippa (26:1–32).

23:31–35, Paul's Transfer to Caesarea.

The tribune's plans as outlined earlier (vv. 23–24) are carried out. Especially noted is Paul's safe delivery to the care of Felix, who follows carefully defined protocol in ascertaining Paul's provincial home and waiting for his accusers to present their case against Paul (vv. 34–35).

24:1–27, Paul's Defense Before Felix. This episode goes well beyond Paul's appearance before Gallio (18:12–17), where the Jews' charges are repeated (18:13) and Gallio formally responds (18:14–15). Here there is a formal statement of the accusations against Paul by a prosecutor, Tertullus (24:2–8), and an equally formal response by Paul (vv. 10–21). Both speeches exhibit rhetorical polish, and legal technical terminology is used throughout the scene. Luke has sought to capture the atmosphere of a formal hearing before a high-ranking Roman official.

Tertullus' speech serves to state, in proper form, the Jews' case against Paul. The opening ad hominem characterization of Paul as a "plague-spot" ("perfect pest," NEB, JB) depicting him as a danger to the public good (cf. 1 Macc. 15:21) may also suggest that he is churlish or foolish (1 Sam. 25:17, 25). More to the point is the charge that he is seditious, a "fomentor of discord" (NEB; lit., "inciting riots"; cf. Acts 19:40), who causes dissensions (23:7, 10) wherever he goes among Jews "throughout the world" (cf. 16:20; 17:6)—a universal threat to Roman peace and stability. "Ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes" probably depicts him as the instigator of a new religion, since "sect" (Gk. hairesis) here carries an unfavorable connotation (cf. 24:14; 28:22) absent elsewhere (5:17; 15:5; 26:5). The portrait of him as an outsider, a Jewish renegade, continues in the final charge that he "profaned the Temple" (cf. 21:28; 25:8; also 6:13; Luke 21:6). He is thus presented as insensitive to the customs and institutions of a well-established, legally protected religion.

Paul's response (24:10–21) is an adroitly crafted "defense" (v. 10). His polite deference to Felix (v. 10), which contrasts sharply with Tertullus's ingratiating introduction (vv. 2–4), scores points with informed readers who know Felix's scandalous reputation (Tacitus Histories 5.9; Annals 12.54; Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 20.137–44, 162–63; →Felix, Antonius). Moreover, by limiting his remarks to his conduct in Jerusalem, Paul shrewdly redefines the charge.

But the more important element of Paul's defense is his consistent claim to be an utterly loyal Jew. He refuses to concede that he is the spokesman for a new religion. What his enemies mistakenly call a "sect" is better understood as "the Way" (v. 14). Even though "the Way" is being used here in a highly technical sense to describe the Jesus movement (9:2; 18:26; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:22), it nevertheless has a certain resonance with an OT expectation for the truly obedient people of God (cf. Exod. 32:8; Deut. 5:33; 9:12, 16; 11:28; 31:29). Consequently, as Paul's preferred term for the movement with which he gladly identifies himself, it more closely aligns him with the biblical tradition.

In spite of his participation in "the Way" he still speaks of his "forefathers' God," expressed here in a thoroughly gentile form (cf. 4 Macc. 12:17; Sophocles Antigone 838), which nevertheless is authentically biblical in tone (Exod. 3:6, 13). Moreover, his loyalty to the entire Scripture remains unshaken (Acts 24:14; also 26:22; 28:23). This has just been demonstrated in his interchange with Ananias (23:1–5) but amply attested in the earlier narrative.

He also adheres to what Scripture teaches (however minimally): the resurrection (24:15, 21; Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2–3; →Resurrection). His faith in this "hope" is not an unorthodox position but one "these [Jews] themselves accept" (Acts 24:15). By implication, Paul is aligning himself here with the Pharisees (23:8) and against the Sadducees (cf. Luke 20:27–40), thereby suggesting that the former (like himself) represent mainline Judaism.

Yet another line of defense is his self-portrait as a devout pilgrim who came to Jerusalem neither to preach, nor to cause riots, but to worship (v. 11). His almsgiving (v. 17) could only be construed as evidence of his loyalty to Scripture and tradition (Ps. 112:9; Isa. 58:6–8; Prov. 14:21, 31) as well as his commitment to help the weak (Acts 20:35). What is striking here is that these funds are for his "nation" (24:17), which would suggest donations to Jews generally. Conceivably, this is a reference to the Pauline relief fund for the poor Jewish Christians in Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 8:3–6; Gal. 2:10; Rom. 15:25–28, 31), but if so it is an unusual way of putting it. His mention of "offerings" is intended to recall his participation with the four men who had a vow (21:23–27).

While Felix does not decide formally in Paul's favor, neither does he sustain Tertullus' charges. That his was not an uninformed decision is indicated by his having "a rather accurate knowledge of the Way" (24:22). By not losing, Paul wins. This is also reflected in the relative freedom he enjoys as a prisoner (v. 23).

The final meeting between Paul and Felix (vv. 24-27) portrays a shift in Luke's portrait of Felix. Paul the defender now becomes Paul the preacher. Accompanied by his Jewish wife, Drusilla, the youngest daughter of Agrippa I, Felix takes the initiative in summoning Paul. Luke shows the gospel actually attracting another Roman official (cf. 13:7-12).

Luke presents Felix as a case of failed faith, seen especially in his expressed hope for a bribe (24:26; cf. v. 17). Like others in Luke-Acts who finally are excluded from service in the kingdom (ruler, Luke 18:18-30; Ananias and Sapphira, Acts 5:1-11; Judas, 1:15-20), Felix's love for money wins out over his love for the virtues.

The final stroke in Luke's portrait of Felix is his currying favor with the Jews, which resulted in his decision to leave Paul in prison. His action closely approximates that of Pilate (Luke 23:18-25). "Two years" (Acts 24:27) probably describes the length of Paul's imprisonment rather than the duration of Felix's reign.

25:1-27, Paul Before Festus. The next stage of the proceedings takes place before Porcius Festus, who succeeded Felix as procurator between A.D. 55 and 59 (→ Festus, Porcius).

These two stages present an interesting contrast in terms of central characters. Earlier Paul spoke on his own behalf to a virtually silent Roman procurator. Now the Roman procurator speaks—and acts—on Paul's behalf, while Paul remains in the background.

The hearing before Festus serves several purposes for Luke. First, it continues the Lucan portrait of the Jerusalem Jews as Paul's arch-enemies. Luke reinforces the point by repeatedly identifying these enemies of Paul (vv. 2, 5, 7, 15). By the end of this section, the geographical extent of the Jewish resistance has widened to Caesarea as "the whole Jewish people demand his death" (v. 24). If anything, this stage reveals intensified Jewish resistance to Paul. They insist that a newly appointed procurator press the case against Paul (vv. 1-5). Their urge to kill Paul is undiminished as the cries of the Jerusalem mob are still echoing two years later (21:27, 36; 22:22-23). Presumably, their full-fast oath is still in effect (23:12-15)! Oblivious to due process (25:15-16), they are still willing to lodge serious charges unsubstantiated by hard evidence (vv. 7, 18, 26).

Second, the Festus stage describes the circumstances that enabled Paul finally to reach

Rome. More specifically, it explains why Paul appealed to Caesar. Luke places squarely on the shoulders of Festus the responsibility for continuing Paul's trial. As procurator, he could have rendered a final verdict after having heard both sides in a specially called hearing. Yet, like his predecessor, Felix (24:27), he yielded to Jewish pressure (25:9). Indirectly, then, Luke suggests that Paul's hopes for justice are jeopardized by the Jews.

Many historical questions about Paul's appeal to Caesar remain unanswered. Yet from the standpoint of Luke's narrative, the significance of this episode is clear. His brief defense remarks (vv. 8, 10-11) serve Luke's purpose in several ways. Paul's threefold denial (v. 8) effectively summarizes previous charges against him. He is not against the Temple (21:28; 24:7), the law of the Jews (21:21; 23:5; 24:14-16; perhaps 18:13), or Caesar (16:21, 38-39; perhaps 18:13). The last named charge is a freshly formulated reference to sedition (24:5). Once again, Paul responds to charges made earlier in the narrative by the Jerusalem crowds (21:28) and Tertullus (24:5-7).

His second set of remarks (25:10-11) reveals a resolute Paul, sure of his rights, unwilling to be intimidated by Roman officials who themselves are willing to bend to political pressure (cf. 16:35-40). Perhaps most importantly, it allows him to state formally his appeal to Caesar (25:11). Since this is the legal mechanism through which God's plan for Paul to reach Rome is made possible, it is the most critical element. In confirming Paul's appeal (v. 12), Festus unwittingly makes possible Paul's earlier formulated mission plans (19:21) and officially confirms what God has already told Paul privately (23:11).

Third, the Festus stage reinforces Luke's portrait of Rome as sympathetic to Christianity. Except for his willingness to bend to Jewish pressure and thereby continue Paul's trial (25:9), Festus is presented throughout this section quite favorably. He emerges as a model of efficiency (v. 5), a governor who is both cautious and objective in his judgment (v. 18), scrupulously respecting Roman procedures (vv. 9, 16).

With his character duly certified by Luke, Festus serves as an important pagan witness who testifies in Paul's behalf. In both of his "speeches," he sounds the same theme. His considered judgment is that Paul's accusers have vastly overstated the seriousness of his offense (v. 18). Echoing the earlier verdict of Gallio (18:14-15), Festus sees Paul's case as an internal dispute within Judaism, "their own religion" (25:19). By placing Paul and the Jews in the same camp, he confirms Paul's own defense before the Sanhedrin (23:6-10) and his subsequent defense before Felix (24:10-21); he is not an outsider trying to be contentious; he is an insider trying to be heard.

Festus also introduces the distinctive feature of Paul's position vis-à-vis other Jews: the Easter faith—"one Jesus, who had died, is now alive" (v. 19). This conviction Paul had placed on the public record in his defense before the Jerusalem crowd, although not in this form (cf. esp. 22:6-11). Yet neither before the Sanhedrin (23:1-10) nor before Felix (24:1-27) had Paul or any of his detractors raised this point.

Festus's words (25:19) characterize exactly the secular observer puzzled by both the heat and fog of religious debate. Yet in his own odd way, Festus sees the central issue: Paul trying to convince his fellow Israelites that the risen Lord is the promised fulfillment of their (and Paul's) own Scriptures, history, tradition, and theology. It is another instance where an outsider sees the truth more clearly than Paul's opponents do (cf. 5:38-39).

In his second speech, Festus is even more emphatic. Now he is able to respond to the petition of the "whole Jewish people" (25:24). Their judgment is that Paul should die (v. 24). His verdict, by contrast, is that Paul has "done nothing deserving death" (v. 25). With this unqualified declaration of Paul's innocence, he reiterates earlier declarations by Paul himself (see Introduction). Festus's repeated stress on the need for having substantiated charges (vv. 26-27) makes essentially the same point: the absence of evidence underscores his innocence.

Fourth, the Festus stage also serves to introduce King Agrippa, the final and most important dignitary before whom Paul formally appears (vv. 13, 23-27; → Agrippa II; Bernice), thus preparing for Paul's grandest defense speech (26:2-23). As the first "king" (repeatedly identified as such by Luke, cf. 26:13, 14, 24, 26; 26:2, 7, 13, 19, 26, 27, 30) encountered by Paul, Agrippa represents the fulfillment of God's purpose for him (9:15). The other "king," of course, before whom Paul was destined to carry Jesus' name, was Caesar himself. Unlike Agrippa, he never makes an appearance in the Acts narrative, but he is already introduced, however subtly (25:8, 10, 11, 12, 21, 25, 26).

26:1-23, Paul's Defense Before Agrippa.

Paul's final "apology" is suitably crafted for the occasion. The distinguished audience and setting lend an air of expectancy to the occasion (25:23).

Even though it overlaps his earlier defense speeches (22:1-21; 24:10-21) and Luke's narrative account of his "conversion" (9:1-19), this speech has a distinctive flavor and profile. Once again, it touches on Paul's early life but identifies him exclusively with Jerusalem, no longer with the Diaspora (26:4; cf. 22:3). By underscoring his Pharisaic heritage (26:5; 22:3; 23:6), he becomes a credible defender of the resurrection faith, an important opening motif (26:7-8) and the climactic note on which the speech is interrupted (v. 23). This too has been a recurrent theme of his earlier defenses (23:6; 24:15, 21).

His life as a persecutor remains a central element (26:9-11; 7:58; 8:1-3; 9:1-2; 22:4-5), although both the force and extent of his persecution are now stated more strongly: not simply a consenting bystander to Stephen's death (8:1; 22:20) but now casting his vote in the death sentence of many Jerusalem Christians (26:10); no longer the single city of Damascus (9:2-3; 22:5-6) but "foreign cities" (26:11).

The Damascus road encounter with the risen Lord still remains the moment of dramatic reversal (vv. 12-18; cf. 9:3-9; 22:6-11), but it too has enhanced features. The "great light" (22:6; cf. 9:3) now becomes "a light brighter than the sun" (26:13). It no longer encompasses Paul alone (9:3; 22:6) but his companions (26:13). Consequently, they all fall to the ground (v. 14), not just Paul alone (9:4; 22:7).

The language of the risen Lord is now identified as Aramaic (26:14), which was already evident by the way he addressed "Saul" (9:4; 22:7). Surprisingly, he challenges Paul's obstinance by using a common Greek proverb (26:14; cf. Euripides Bacchae 794-95; Julian Orations 8.246b).

Paul receives his divine commission as part of the Damascus road encounter. There are no instructions to proceed to Damascus (22:10-11; cf. 9:8-9), nor is God's mediator Ananias even mentioned (9:10-19; 22:12-16). The risen Lord commissions him directly on the road, in a manner reminiscent of prophetic calls (26:16; cf. Ezek. 2:1, 3). He is directly appointed as a "servant and witness" (Acts 26:16; cf. 22:15) of what he has just seen but also of future divine revelations (16:9-10; 18:9; 22:17-21; 23:11; 27:23). Like the prophets (Jer. 1:7-8, 19), he is promised divine protection from the (Jewish) people (Acts 26:17; cf. 9:23-25, 30; 14:19; 17:10, 14; 18:12-17; 20:3; 21:30-36; 22:22-29; 23:12-35) and from the Gentiles (16:19-40; 19:23-41).

His mission efforts are bifocal: to both Jews and Gentiles (cf. 9:15; 22:15) but apparently with special attention to Gentiles (22:18-21). Again his task is stated as a prophetic commission: to open the Gentiles' eyes (26:18; Isa. 42:6-7, 16), turning them from darkness to light (cf. Isa. 9:2; Eph. 5:8; Col. 1:12-13; 1 Pet. 2:9), from Satan to God (cf. 2 Cor. 4:4; Eph. 2:2), extending them forgiveness of sins (Acts 26:18; cf. 10:43; also to Jews: Luke 1:77; 3:3; 24:47; Acts 2:38; 5:31; 13:38) and a portion of the inheritance reserved for God's holy ones (26:18; cf. 20:32; also Col. 1:12).

Unlike previous defense speeches, Paul proceeds to tell Agrippa how he executed these divine orders. The conduct that has brought him before Agrippa is the result of obeying a compelling heavenly vision (Acts 26:19). Since his commission was two-pronged, he proceeded to preach to Jews first: in Damascus (9:19-22), Jerusalem (9:26-30; 22:17-21; cf. Rom. 15:19), then throughout all Judea (Acts 26:20; though, previously unrecorded in Acts). Second, he preached to Gentiles, calling them to repent (v. 20; cf. 11:18; 17:30; 20:21) and "turn to [faith in the one] God" (26:20; cf. 14:15; 15:19; cf. 1 Thess. 1:9). Requiring deeds exemplifying repentance is a new element, reminiscent of John's preaching (cf. Luke 3:7-9; Matt. 3:7-10).

The previous narrative has also shown how his mission efforts consistently met Jewish resistance, which was especially typified by the Temple incident (Acts 26:21; cf. 21:30-31). Yet his presence before Agrippa attested the fulfillment of the promise of divine protection (v. 17), enabling him to carry out his commission as a witness (v. 16).

The speech's climax (vv. 22-23) compactly summarizes his earlier sermons (13:16-41; 14:15-17; 17:22-31) and preaching activity that has been reported extensively in the previous narrative. Basic to all his preaching has been his unshaken belief in "Moses and the prophets" (26:22; cf. 24:14) and the "promises made by God to our fathers" (26:6; Luke 24:27, 44; Acts 3:18; 28:23). Luke has consistently portrayed Paul as "arguing from the Scriptures" (e.g., 17:2), insisting that the story of Jesus is the continuation of Israel's story.

The specific focus for which Paul has claimed fulfillment of the divine promise is the suffering and death of Christ (26:23). Since this was promised, it was a "divine must" (see Introduction). But coupled with this was the Easter faith: Christ as the first to rise from the dead (26:23; 1 Cor. 15:20; Col. 1:18). As the first to experience resurrection life, he was thereby proclaimed as the "pioneer of life" (Acts 3:15). In his exalted status, the risen Lord (through Paul) has proclaimed light to both Jews and Gentiles (26:23; cf. 2 Tim. 1:10; also Matt. 4:16).

In describing what he himself has done he has presented what Agrippa and his audience should do. The defense has become a sermon.

26:24-32, Paul Vindicated. Typically, Paul's sermon is interrupted at its climactic point (cf. 17:32; 22:22). The effects of the sermon are dramatized by the contrasting responses of Festus and Agrippa. As a pagan, Festus regards belief in resurrection as incredible and Paul as deranged (26:24; cf. 12:15; John 10:20; Wisd. of Sol. 5:4). By attributing Paul's madness to "great learning," Festus unwittingly vouches for Paul and disqualifies himself (and other pagans) from rendering a proper judgment on the matter.

Agrippa, by contrast, more nearly resembles

Felix in making overtures, however tentatively, toward the faith (24:22-27). While Luke never explicitly identifies Agrippa as Jewish, Paul's remarks subtly imply what readers know (26:26-27; 23:3). One who assuredly "believes the prophets" (26:27) is expected to see the clear force of Paul's argument that Christ is the fulfillment of God's biblical promise. Especially crucial is Paul's insistence to Agrippa that "these things were not done in a corner" (v. 26). As Luke's narrative has shown, the story of "the Way" has occurred in the public domain, on the stage of world history.

Whether Agrippa's response (v. 28) is to be understood as playful irony or as a serious declaration of Paul's persuasiveness, it is far short of outright rejection, much less condemnation of Paul. His final verdict is an unqualified vindication of Paul (v. 32; see Introduction). Even though Paul's speech has confirmed what Festus has already declared (25:25), it is also a subtle reminder that Festus's proposal to continue the trial was ill-advised and unjustified (25:9).

Paul's Journey to Rome

This fourth "we" section most likely is based (partially or wholly) on a travel journal to which editorial additions (vv. 9-11, 21-26, 33-36, 38) have been made (cf. 16:10). One of its distinctive features is a detailed itinerary of ports of call and geographical reference points and the mention of other place names relating to the voyage (→ Trade and Transportation). Luke unfolds the journey to Rome in well-defined sections, each contributing in its own way to an overall heroic depiction of Paul, God's duly appointed servant and witness (26:16), who makes his "triumphal entry" into Rome.

27:1-8, Getting Under Way. The decision to sail for Italy from Caesarea begins to carry out concretely Festus's earlier declaration (25:12). The mission's importance is reflected in naming the Roman centurion, Julius, and his Augustan cohort, possibly the same cohort stationed in Syria during the first century A.D. The Thessalonian Aristarchus (v. 2) is doubtless Paul's earlier traveling co-worker (19:29; 20:4; cf. Philem. 24; Col. 4:10).

Julius's kindness toward Paul (Acts 27:3) characterizes the Romans' favorable treatment generally (cf. 27:43; also 21:31-32; 22:24-30; 24:23) and typifies the hospitality extended to Paul throughout the trip (28:2, 7, 14-16). The Sidon "friends" (27:3), possibly a technical designation for Christians (cf. Luke 12:4; John 15:14-15; 3 John 15), may have been members of the Phoenician Christian community (cf. Acts 11:19; 21:3-5; also Luke 6:17; 10:13-14).

The journey northwestward from Sidon leads east of Cyprus, then westward along the southern coast of Asia Minor, past Cilicia and Pamphylia, areas well known to Paul (Cilicia: Acts 21:39; 22:3; 23:34; also 9:11; cf. Gal. 1:21; also Acts 15:41; Pamphylia: 13:13; 14:24; 15:38), to Myra, the chief city of the southwestern Asia Minor district of Lycia. Changing to one of the Egyptian grain ships bound from Alexandria to Italy that regularly stopped at Myra, they sail westward to Cnidus on the southwestern tip of Asia Minor, then southward, probably along the southern coast of Crete, past Salmone, on its northeastern tip, finally to Fair Havens, on the south-central coast of Crete. The nearby city of Lasea marked the point where the coast turns sharply north, thus exposing ships to direct winds from the sea.

27:9-12, Paul's First Prophetic Word. The travelogue is now interrupted by deliberations among the principal figures on the voyage (v. 11). The "fast" that had already occurred (v. 9) is likely a reference to the Jewish Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:29-31; 23:27-32), which fell on the tenth of Tishri (September/October). Ancient nautical wisdom regarded sea voyages after mid-September as dangerous and any between mid-November and mid-March as extremely inadvisable. Given the previous delays and difficulties already experienced, Paul predicts disastrous results if the voyage continues (Acts 27:10). The majority overrule Paul, however, deciding that the more western Cretan harbor of Phoenix is the preferable place to winter.

27:13-20, Getting Off Course in the Storm. As they sail from Fair Havens along the southern coast of Crete toward Phoenix, the northeast wind (→ Euroclydon) blowing from the coast onto the sea blows the ship off course, south of the small island of Cauda, off the southwest coast of Crete. The sailors' emergency measures include securing the small lifeboat and "undergirding" the ship. The exact nature of the latter operation is unclear. Their fear is that the ship would eventually be driven southwest to the northern coast of Africa into the hazardous bays of Greater and Lesser Syrtis (cf. Josephus Jewish War 2.381). The continuation of the storm into the next day causes them to begin throwing off miscellaneous equipment (vv. 18-19; cf. Jon. 1:5). Covered by the storm and blocked off from daylight, the ship loses its course completely and drifts in the Mediterranean (Acts 27:20).

The essential function of this section is to confirm the accuracy of Paul's earlier warning (v. 10), at least partially. The narrative has already demonstrated the loss of much cargo, and the threatened loss of ship and lives (v. 20).

27:21-26, Paul's Second Speech. Here Paul the prophet speaks, insisting that his previous caution has now proved true (v. 21 fulfills v. 10). Though revising his earlier prediction slightly, he is nevertheless specific as he predicts, first, no loss of life, only the ship—fulfilled in vv. 41-44; second, his successful arrival in Rome to stand before Caesar—fulfilled in 28:14, 16; third, the safety of the passengers—fulfilled in vv. 33-38, 44; and fourth, their eventual arrival at an island—fulfilled, beginning in vv. 27-32, finally in 28:1.

His vision of "God's angel" is reminiscent of earlier divine interventions during crises (18:9; 23:11; also 16:9-10). Before a pagan audience, his report also becomes an occasion for confessing "the God to whom I belong and whom I worship" (27:23; cf. Gen. 50:19; also Acts 24:14). Besides allaying Paul's fears, the divine voice confirms Festus's earlier declaration (25:12) and provides incidental Lucan testimony that Paul actually appeared before Caesar's tribunal, which is otherwise not reported later in the narrative.

27:27-32, Approaching Land. Paul's prophecy immediately begins to be fulfilled in this section when, after fourteen days, the ship approaches land. The episode raises some questions, e.g., whether the sailors' attempt to get into the lifeboat to secure the anchors from the bow represents defensible nautical practice or whether their action is properly interpreted as an escape attempt. The episode serves primarily to confirm the truth of Paul's earlier remarks (v. 22). It thus becomes the occasion for another prophetic pronouncement illustrating the umbrella of divine protection extended by Paul.

27:33-38, Paul's Third Speech. The ship's passengers now become Paul's sole responsibility. Using a familiar biblical proverb (v. 34; 1 Sam. 14:45; 2 Sam. 14:11; 1 Kings 1:52) that echoes the words of Jesus (cf. Luke 12:7; 21:18), he reaffirms his prophetic promise that none of them would be lost. Even though there are slight echoes of Jesus' eucharistic meal (cf. Luke 22:19), this should be seen as an ordinary meal before which a devout Jew offers thanks (cf. Luke 9:16; cf. John 6:11).

The effectiveness of Paul's words and actions is indicated by Luke's noting the total number of passengers as 276 (or 76, according to one textual tradition). It is not an unlikely number considering the passenger loads known from other ancient sources (cf. Josephus Life 15).

27:39-44, Getting to Shore. Paul's prediction is more fully realized as they now spot land (v. 39; cf. v. 26). The detailed description of the ship's striking a "shoal" (v. 41), thereby being shattered to pieces, confirms another Pauline prediction (v. 22). Some swam, others clung to pieces of the shattered ship (or perhaps to the shoulders of those who could swim), with the result that "all were saved" (v. 44).

28:1-10, Paul at Malta. Their safe arrival at Malta itself finally fulfills Paul's earlier prediction (27:26). The two incidents at Malta continue Luke's heroic portrait of Paul. On the ship, his prophetic word has proved true; on the island, his divine protection is acknowledged and his prophetic deeds are demonstrated.

Luke supplies the proper interpretation of these events through the naive reaction of the Maltese natives (v. 4), who are convinced that Paul has been protected by Dike, the Greek personification of justice. They rightly recognize that Paul has been "allowed to live." Luke has already made clear, however, that it is not by the gods of pagan religion but by the God to whom Paul belongs and whom he loyally serves (27:23-24, 35; cf. 24:14-16; 26:6-8). Surprisingly, Luke allows their testimony about Paul's being a "god" to stand without any disclaimer (28:6; cf. 14:12-18; also 10:25-26). Paul's surviving a poisonous snakebite places him under the divine protection Jesus promised to his missionaries (Luke 10:19; cf. Mark 16:18).

Paul's prophetic deeds are demonstrated concretely in his healing the father of Publius, the island chief (28:8; cf. Luke 4:38-39). Through his healing hands continues to run the power of Jesus attested throughout Luke-Acts (Luke 4:40; 13:13; Acts 5:12; 9:17; 14:3; 19:11). Typically, what happens to one happens to all (Luke 4:40-41; Acts 5:12-16; also Luke 8:1-3); consequently, the whole island benefits. Their "many gifts" (Acts 28:10) serve to confirm the reality of Paul's prophetic deeds.

28:11-15, Completing the Journey to Rome. In this final stage of the journey Paul proceeds with remarkable freedom. No mention is made of his armed guard or even of other prisoners. The image of Paul the prisoner gives way to that of Paul the missionary being given a hero's welcome by Christian communities in Italy. By reporting the existence of "brethren" at Puteoli (vv. 13-14), a major Italian port city, and in Rome itself (v. 15), Luke fully acknowledges that Christianity has preceded Paul in reaching Italy. Thus Luke does not present Paul as the founder of Italian Christianity (cf. Rom. 1:8-15). His primary interest, at this point, is to show that just as Paul had earlier been welcomed openly, and therefore accepted, by churches he himself had not established (Acts 21:1-14), so now he is fully recognized by western Christians as God's "servant and witness."

28:16-31 Paul in Rome

The primary focus of Paul's activity in Rome is on his dealings with the Roman Jewish community. Two stages are reported: defense (vv. 17-22) and proclamation (vv. 23-29). The subsequent two-year period represents a definite shift to the much broader ministry of Paul, the vindicated apostle (vv. 30-31).

28:16-22, Meeting with Jewish Leaders in Rome. Lodging in an inn under the protection of a single soldier (v. 16), Paul has considerable freedom, which allows him to summon local Jewish leaders (v. 17; cf. Luke 19:47; Acts 25:2). His "speech" to them (28:17-20) is a highly abbreviated account of previous charges made against him (21:20-21, 28; 23:26-30; 24:2-9; 25:7, 15-21, 24-27) and his previous defenses at his various trials (22:1-21; 23:6-10; 24:10-21; 25:8, 10-11; 26:2-23). In spite of its brevity, it does provide some new features. His insistence that the Romans actually had wanted to release him (28:18) represents their intentions more explicitly than previously reported. His appeal to Caesar is now justified as a response to the Jews' objections (v. 19). This renders more explicit the reason for Festus's suggested change of venue (25:9). Certain themes, however, recur: he insists that he is completely innocent (28:17-19; see Introduction) and a legitimate spokesperson for "the hope of Israel" (v. 20; cf. 23:6; 24:15, 21; 26:6-7).

In reporting that the Jewish leaders have received neither written reports from Judea nor oral reports from their fellow Jewish "brethren" (28:21; note title of address in v. 17), Luke is suggesting that whatever Jewish opposition has occurred against Paul is localized in the eastern Mediterranean, namely, Asia Minor (21:27), but especially Jerusalem (21:11, 27-36; 22:22-23; 23:1-10, 27; 24:9; 25:2, 5, 7, 15) and perhaps Caesarea (25:24). The Roman Jews have only general information about "this sect" (28:22; cf. 24:5, 14) and are willing to listen to Paul as its representative spokesperson. They stand before Paul as objective, receptive listeners, as eager to listen to new viewpoints as the Athenians were (17:22-23).

28:23-29, Preaching to Roman Jews. Obviously unable to go to one of the several synagogues in Rome at this time, as was his usual practice, Paul summons the Jewish community to his lodging, and they come in "great numbers" (v. 23). The brief outline of his testimony to them represents a digest of Paul's previously reported preaching before Jewish audiences. Once again, it conforms fully to the apostolic preaching of his predecessors, both Jesus and especially Peter: the breaking in of God's new reign (see Introduction) in the person of Jesus (the entire Gospel of Luke; also Acts 2:22-24; 10:36-41; 17:3; 18:5), both of which represent the fulfillment of God's promise in Scripture (Luke 24:27, 44; Acts 2:25-36; 3:18; 10:43; 24:14; 26:22).

Their mixed response is reminiscent of earlier occasions when Paul preached to Jewish audiences (28:24-25; 13:43; 14:4; 17:4, 11; 18:4-8; 19:10). Even though "some were convinced" (28:24), not all were, and this failure to achieve broad acceptance is regarded, oddly enough, as wholesale rejection. By interpreting their response as the very obduracy for which Israel is condemned in Isa. 6:9-10, Luke (through Paul) places them outside the pale of the Christian mission. The most receptive hearing for "God's salvation" is to be found among Gentiles (Acts 28:29). What had happened in Asia Minor (13:46-48) and Greece (18:5-6) is now repeated in Italy, thus becoming a universal pattern.

Even though this explicit use of Isa. 6:9-10 occurs only in the context of Paul's preaching to Roman Jews, its placement at the end of the narrative is significant. It applies retrospectively, strongly indicting Jewish resistance generally. It most likely reflects Luke's own situation and final assessment. In contrast to Romans 9-11, where Paul envisions an eventual conversion of Israel, Luke sees the Christian mission to Jews as finished, probably hopeless, with the church's only real hope lying with its mission to Gentiles.

28:30-31, Paul Vindicated. The rather abrupt ending of Acts leaves tantalizing questions unanswered. Luke has already anticipated some of these questions in his previous narrative. He implies that Paul did appear before Caesar's tribunal (27:24) and finally died a martyr (20:25, 38; 21:13; 25:11). Reporting the full details of either of these events, which he doubtless knew, is less relevant to his purpose than the final picture he sketches of Paul, which has two fundamental elements: first, the fulfillment of the divine purpose in Paul, who as "chosen instrument" carries God's name to "all who came to him," most likely, Gentiles; and second, the full vindication of Paul and "the Way," both of whom have proceeded and flourished throughout the narrative under Roman protection and are left to proceed "boldly and unhindered." In the end, the gospel turns out to be irrepressible.

THE PAULINE LETTERS

INTRODUCTION TO THE PAULINE LETTERS

---

ROBERT JEWETT

---

A distinctive feature of early Christianity is that so many of its sacred writings originated as letters. All but five of the twenty-seven books in the NT are either in the form of letters or contain significant epistolary components. Letters also predominate in the writings of the apostolic fathers, the successors of the apostles. This curious feature, which sets Christianity off from other religions of the ancient world, particularly from its origins in Judaism, is due primarily to the influence of the apostle Paul. His letters, originally written to troubled congregations too distant to visit at the moment, provided the model for other writings that eventually became part of the Christian Bible.

NEW TESTAMENT LETTERS IN THE LIGHT OF ANCIENT LETTER WRITING

A large number of ancient letters have been brought to light by modern research, providing a vivid sense of how they functioned as means of communication. Several thousand papyri of private, business, and bureaucratic correspondence have been discovered in the arid regions of the Mediterranean world. Other letters have been preserved in governmental documentary collections, inscriptions, and quotations in Greco-Roman literature. Many elegant letters by classical writers and church fathers are also available for comparison.

On the basis of these examples, and the discussions of ancient epistolary theorists, it is possible to summarize the way letters were approached in the Greco-Roman world. They were understood as conversations between persons separated by distance. The writer was thought to be present to his or her readers within the letter itself, which was supposed to bear the marks of the personality and social status of the writer. Distinctions were often made between official and personal letters, but the sense of conversation at a distance surfaces even in philosophical letters and bureaucratic correspondence. The broad functions of maintaining contact between sender and recipients, imparting information, and conveying requests or commands appear to link all of these letters with those found in the NT.

A number of epistolary conventions found in the NT are typical of Greco-Roman letters. The standard opening of a letter was "sender to recipient, greeting." This was often followed by a prayer or wish for the health of the recipient and an assurance of the writer's well-being. Expressions of joy or sorrow at news received are frequently part of the epistolary opening. The closing of a letter usually consisted of a health wish and a formula of farewell. These opening and closing formulas served to communicate the desired relationship between the sender and recipient. The selection of particular formulas reveals whether a particular letter is between equals, from a superior to a subordinate, or from a subordinate to a superior.

The openings of NT Letters are clearly adapted from Greco-Roman models. The sender and addressee are incorporated in the opening sentence (e.g., 1 Thess. 1:1; 1 Cor. 1:1–2) in a typical manner. That Paul frequently introduces himself as the "apostle of Jesus Christ" signals that his letters have elements of official and authoritative communication, comparable in some regards to letters from philosophers to their disciples. The recipients are identified as churches, saints, or brethren, which conveys a religiously egalitarian, collective ethos unlike that of philosophical letters. The salutations also express the early Christian ethos: "Grace to you and peace from God our Father and Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 1:3; cf. 2 Cor. 1:2; Phil. 1:2). Compared with the opening greetings of typical letters in the ancient world, such salutations remind recipients of the participation in the new age of Christ shared by them and the writer. An even more elaborate adaptation is visible in the Christian transformation of the Greco-Roman thanksgiving. In the place of a relatively simple formula like, "I thank the god Serapis for the safe journey . . .," Paul's thanksgivings are lengthened and filled with new theological content. In Phil. 1:3–11; 2 Cor. 1:3–7; and 2 Thess. 1:2–10, for example, the agenda of the Letter and a kind of table of contents are contained in the thanksgiving. In the case of 1 Thess. 1:2–3:13 the main argument of the Letter appears to be included in the thanksgiving, the extraordinary length of which is unparalleled in ancient or modern epistolography.

The body of a NT Letter typically opens with a disclosure formula such as "I want you to know, brethren . . ." (Phil. 1:12; cf. 1 Cor. 1:10; 2 Cor. 1:8). With the exception of the term "brethren," such formulas are typical of Greco-Roman letters. The typical formulas for closing the body of a letter, expressing the desire to be "favored" by compliance with the request, are replaced by more elaborate, charismatic formulas (formulas that wish a spiritual gift for the addressees), for example, "Yes, brother, I want some benefit from you in the Lord. Refresh my heart in Christ" (Philem. 20). Often the body of a NT Letter closes with a homiletic benediction that sums up the foregoing argument and expresses a charismatic realization of divine presence and power (Rom. 15:13; Phil. 4:7; 1 Thess. 3:11–13; 2 Thess. 2:16). Another component sometimes found in the body of Pauline Letters is the travelogue, often expressing what has been called the "apostolic parousia," the spiritual presence of the apostle in the Letter (Gal. 1:18–2:21; 2 Cor. 1:15–2:13; 1 Thess. 2:17–3:10).

Unclear in epistolary theory is the relation of hortatory material to the body of a typical NT Letter. The tendency to perceive exhortative sections as separate from the theological "body" fails to account for the argumentative coherence of Letters like Romans or Hebrews. Typical opening formulas mark such parenetic sections (Rom. 12:1; Phil. 3:1; 1 Thess. 4:1) and in some instances the "now concerning" formula of Greco-Roman business letters is employed (1 Cor. 7:1; 7:25; 8:1; 2 Thess. 2:1). Research on the parenetic sections of NT Letters has also suggested the use of standardized topoi (Gk. "topics") from popular Greco-Roman, Jewish, or early Christian ethical instruction (e.g., Rom. 13:1-7; 1 Thess. 4:9-5:11; 2 Thess. 2:3-12). Parenetic sections of NT Letters are sometimes concluded with homiletic benedictions (e.g., 1 Thess. 5:23; 2 Thess. 3:16). At many such points a powerful sense of spiritual solidarity between writers and recipients of early Christian letters was expressed. Having initially experienced apostolic letters as means of divine encouragement, it was natural for the church to use them in later settings to reinforce the shared values of the community.

The epistolary categories that have been developed in the research of the past fifty years are admittedly modern and somewhat abstract. They derive from extensive studies of common letters, business letters, governmental correspondence, philosophical letters, and other materials from the Greco-Roman world. The inability of such categories to explain fully the organization of the body of Pauline Letters, in particular, has stimulated the rise of rhetorical analyses. The current stage of scholarly discussion centers on the relation between the epistolary types found in ancient handbooks, the rhetorical categories found in rhetorical treatises, and epistolographic categories such as "body" or "parenesis."

RHETORICAL FEATURES OF NEW TESTAMENT LETTERS

Ancient rhetorical theory was oriented primarily to the spoken word. Although rhetoricians taught their students how to write standard letters, often following the models of standard types or classical examples, they did not classify such letters under the three types of rhetoric. Modern researchers have attempted to fill this gap by classifying letters according to their epistolary type and associating them with the genres of judicial, deliberative, and demonstrative rhetoric. Among the twenty to forty types of letters listed in ancient epistolary handbooks, it is possible to identify accusing and apologetic types as fitting the judicial genre, praising and blaming types under the demonstrative category, and advising and consoling types as deliberative. No such classification is fully satisfactory, however, because exhortative materials are found in both the demonstrative and deliberative genres. Moreover, many letters in actuality are mixed types, and many pieces of literature, oratory, and epistolary discourse contain elements of more than one rhetorical genre.

Despite the difficulties in classification, there is no doubt that some NT Letters are masterpieces that conform to the highest standards of Greco-Roman rhetoric. A case has been made that Galatians fits the judicial genre as a letter of the apologetic type. The material in 2 Cor. 10–13 is an ironic apologetic letter type of the same genre. Romans appears to be a diplomatic letter with elements of popular philosophical diatribe and parenetic letter types, all of which would place it within the demonstrative genre of rhetoric. 1 Thessalonians is also demonstrative, concentrating on praise and blame with prominent emphasis on thanksgiving to God. It fits the epistolary type of the praising or thankful letter. Philemon and 2 Thessalonians are examples of deliberative rhetoric, providing advice concerning an action to be taken in the future with the traditional motifs of honor and advantage. While 2 Thessalonians would be an example of the denying or reproving letter type, Philemon appears to fit the supplicatory or advisory type.

The organization of these letters follows the guidelines of the Greek and Latin rhetorical handbooks concerning the creation of persuasive discourse. While embodying the highest standards of rhetoric in avoiding slavish conformity to standard formulas, these letters are creative vehicles of persuasion that would have been easily understood by first-century readers and hearers. For instance, the introductory section of a Pauline Letter functions as an exordium, the classical opening of formal discourse that establishes rapport with the audience and states the issue to be discussed (e.g., 1 Thess. 1:1–5; Rom. 1:1–12; Philem. 4–7). A narratio, or narration of events relevant for the issue at hand, is found in places like Gal. 1:12–2:14; Rom. 1:13–15; and 2 Cor. 2:12–13; 7:5–7. In the case of 1 Thessalonians it is possible to understand a substantial part of the extended thanksgiving as a narration of the grounds for giving thanks to God for salvation already experienced (1 Thess. 1:6–3:13). In Romans we find a formal partitio, a statement of the thesis of the entire letter in 1:16–17 (cf. also 2 Thess. 2:1–2). In Gal. 2:15–21 there is a well-developed propositio, a formal statement of the points of agreement and disagreement between Paul and the church (cf. also 2 Cor. 2:16c–17).

The main body of most Pauline Letters consists of a series of well-organized proofs that deal with theological, ethical, and organizational issues in the churches. The form of argument is heavily Jewish in its orientation, using scriptural examples and quotations. Common experiences and beliefs within the Christian community are used to support certain forms of belief and behavior and reject others. Occasionally Paul resorts to typical Greco-Roman forms of argument from natural law, household codes of behavior, or examples from everyday experience. Despite their unusual content, these proofs match Greco-Roman standards of organizing discourse. For instance, Galatians contains six interrelated proofs (Gal. 3:1–5; 3:6–14; 3:15–18; 3:26–4:11; 4:12–20; 4:21–31), followed by an exhortative proof that argues against accepting the Jewish law and following lures of the flesh (5:1–6:10). 2 Thessalonians contains two proofs concerning the issue of the second coming of Jesus Christ (2 Thess. 2:3–12; 2:13–3:5) that precisely match the topics listed in the partitio of 2:1–2. The most elaborate and formal proofs in the Pauline Letters are found in Romans. The first proof (Rom. 1:18–4:25) serves to confirm the thesis dealing with the power of the gospel concerning divine righteousness in 1:16–17 while the next three proofs (5:1–8:39; 9:1–11:36; 12:1–15:13) amplify the implications of the thesis for the Roman house-churches and the proposed mission to be shared with them. Each of these closely related proofs is organized in ten well-developed paragraphs, reflecting careful planning, a high level of rhetorical finesse, and a desire to find common ground with Jewish Christians for whom series of ten had theological significance. Even the most formal Pauline proof was designed for a specific audience and situation, with a concern to maintain or develop the relationship between sender and recipient that was characteristic of letters throughout the ancient world.

The conclusions of Paul's Letters contain elements characteristic of the peroratio of Greco-Roman rhetoric. Perorations contained recapitulations of the preceding argument and emotional appeals to support the viewpoint of the speaker or writer. It is possible to construe the conclusion of Romans (15:14–16:27) as an elaborate peroration of this type, reviewing the argument of the Letter and appealing for cooperation with Paul's missionary plans. Smaller examples of perorations have been identified in Philem. 17–22; 1 Thess. 5:23–28; and 2 Thess. 3:16–18. These are distinctively epistolary perorations, with closing greetings, final admonitions sometimes written in Paul's own hand, and requests to extend the fellowship of the holy kiss. The intense sense of commonality within the Christian communities and between them and Paul is powerfully expressed in these concluding sections of Pauline Letters, full of emotional appeals for unity and integrity.

THE ORIGINAL FUNCTION OF NEW TESTAMENT LETTERS

---

Most NT Letters related directly to the problems of individual congregations and to the relationships between them and the sender. The Letters are written by authoritative persons such as Paul, who founded most of the congregations he addressed. Similarly, the Johannine Letters are written by a congregational leader who calls himself "the Elder" (2 John 1:1; 3 John 1:10). A certain John, otherwise unidentified, writes to enclaves of his adherents in the seven churches of Asia (Rev. 1:4–3:22). It is likely that Hebrews, James, 1 and 2 Peter, and Jude were also perceived by their original recipients to come from founders or spiritual advisers of churches.

Despite differences in the definition of the term, NT Letters are apostolic. They express the authority of leaders perceived to be foundational for the communities being addressed. In this regard, the NT Letters are comparable to philosophical letters designed to exhort individuals to follow wise examples in response to particular situations. Senders of such letters serve as wise guides to less mature students or friends; their example is to be emulated in the quest for sound character and appropriate self-knowledge. Such letters are similar to NT writings in many ways. Still, the nature of the relationship between Paul and his recipients differed both in rationale and context from philosophical relationships. The recipients of NT Letters are groups rather than individuals; even in the case of Philemon, the Letter is also addressed to other leaders of the house-church as well as to "the church in your house" (Philem. 2). There is a peculiar combination of authority and equality between senders and recipients in most of these Letters, which contrasts not only with philosophical letters but also with other epistolary materials in the ancient world, which was highly sensitive to status differences.

Perhaps the most significant distinguishing mark is that Christian Letters express the ethos of groups and leaders that together had experienced conversion to a form of sectarian consciousness that differed substantially from the surrounding society. The intensity of their sense of internal solidarity and of their separation from a world perceived to be controlled by evil principalities and powers comes to powerful expression in epistolary materials, which were uniquely suited for maintaining distinctive relationships and conveying important information. Thus not only the formal development but also the peculiar content of these Letters display unusual features when compared with other materials in the Greco-Roman world.

THE CREATION AND INITIAL CIRCULATION OF NEW TESTAMENT LETTERS

Although no original copies are available to us, there is no doubt that the initial stage of NT Letters consisted for the most part of dictated material written by reed pens on papyrus rolls for the use of a specific congregation. On the basis of thousands of examples in the ancient world, it is clear that letters were typically written on papyrus sheets that had been pasted in series and rolled up in the form of a scroll. Scribes would cut off enough to write their particular letter, drafting their material on the inside of the scroll so that delivery instructions could be placed on the outside. The technical difficulty of working on the uneven surface of papyrus required the assistance of scribes, whose names occasionally surface in NT writings: Tertius in Rom. 16:22; Silvanus in 1 Pet. 5:12; perhaps Timothy or Silvanus in 1 Thess. 1:1. That Paul dictated his letters is also proven by the closing greeting in his own handwriting (1 Cor. 16:21; 2 Thess. 3:17), whose difference in size and elegance from the rest of the Letter is referred to in Gal. 6:11.

The original circulation of NT Letters was by messenger. The postal system of the Roman Empire was restricted to governmental agents, so private correspondence had to be sent by couriers or trusted travelers. There are many indications that messengers were often entrusted not only with the letter to be delivered but also with an intimate knowledge of its background. Since epistolary communication renders any immediate dialogue between sender and recipient impossible, emissaries often supplied this vital function. Delicate details concerning the business or controversy under discussion were often left to the trusted emissary, and in some instances the customary address was omitted on the premise that the emissary would supply the appropriate greetings. This may explain why a letter like Hebrews lacks an epistolary opening, while containing a normal epistolary closing. The expectation of a crucial role for the letter carrier may also explain the peculiar wording of Phil. 3:1, which implies that extensive admonitions have been entrusted to the emissary, to which Paul simply adds a confirmatory note. There are clear indications that knowledgeable Christian leaders carried letters to specific congregations, and were thus entrusted with the task of interpreting their message and adjudicating the disputes at hand. Phoebe is recommended as a reliable Christian leader in Rom. 16:1–2; it is generally assumed that she brought the Letter to Rome, and there is every likelihood that she was its first interpreter. Stephanas and his associates are affirmed at the end of 1 Corinthians as being privy to Paul's mind and spirit, adequately representing the congregation to him and in turn recommended as authoritative when they return to Corinth with Paul's Letter (1 Cor. 16:15–18). Titus is recommended in 2 Cor. 8:16–23 in terms that make clear that he not only bears the Letter concerning the Jerusalem offering but also will carry out the delicate negotiations with the congregation concerning its collection and delivery.

The original Pauline Letters were experienced by congregations in oral form, read aloud before the assembled church by messengers or scribes. This procedure, which would have been typical for the ancient world in which silent reading was unknown, is presupposed by the wording of Col. 4:16, "And when this letter has been read among you, have it read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and see that you read also the letter from Laodicea" (cf. 1 Thess. 5:27). This means that the rhetorical impact of NT Letters was oral; for the church as a whole, such reading of letters sounded like spoken discourse, in which an authoritative person like Paul was present in a manner that could be even more impressive than when he was actually physically present in the assembly (cf. 2 Cor. 10:10–11). The authority and eloquence of the professional scribe, messenger, or church leader reading the letter would inevitably become blended with that of the author of the letter. The author was thought to be present in spirit during the reading (1 Cor. 5:4). And unlike modern experience with NT Letters, in which small sections are read aloud or silently, the early church would have experienced even the longest Letters in one sitting. It is therefore understandable, given our more recent discoveries of the rhetorical coherence and power of this material, that such public readings would convey communication of considerable persuasiveness. The original audiences to whom the Letters were addressed would have felt in direct communication with the absent sender; the so-called apostolic parousia, or presence of the apostle in the experience of hearing the letter, is an appropriate category for this culturally conditioned attitude toward epistolary communication.

All of the evidence points to the conclusion that these occasional letters were intended for the use of specific local congregations facing particular issues that were not necessarily present in other congregations. A review of the original Pauline Letters will provide a sense of the unique congregational situations to which they were addressed as well as clues to their later publication as books.

The earliest Pauline Letter was written ca. A.D. 50 to the church at Thessalonica in response to a collapse of morale due to the unexpected ed death of congregational members (1 Thess. 4:13–18) and the onset of persecution (1 Thess. 3:3–10). Some interpreters think that the Thessalonian Christians had misinterpreted Paul's proclamation of the last days as though their conditions were already present and would eliminate suffering. Some of the radicals had abandoned their occupations (1 Thess. 5:14) and others were questioning the traditional marriage ethic as inappropriate for the millennial age (1 Thess. 4:1–8). Other interpreters reconstruct the setting in a different way (see the commentary on 1 Thessalonians). Although there is disagreement about the authenticity of 2 Thessalonians, it was likely written by Paul soon after the first Letter to counter a serious misunderstanding. The radicals had intensified their activities and actually called on the first Letter as proof that the millennium had arrived (2 Thess. 2:2). The second Letter to the Thessalonians reiterates Paul's futuristic eschatology and repudiates the misunderstanding of 1 Thessalonians. Both Letters are tightly organized and closely related to a peculiar set of congregational circumstances not replicated elsewhere in early Christianity, so far as we know. There is no reason to suspect that either Letter circulated widely out of its initial geographic area prior to the publication of the Pauline Letter corpus.

Galatians was written ca. A.D. 53 to a gentile Christian congregation that had accepted the message of anti-Pauline agitators who promoted circumcision (Gal. 6:12–13) and the adherence to Jewish festivals (Gal. 4:8–10). The congregation was also having difficulty living in the new age without falling victim to libertinism (Gal. 5:13–6:10). The argument concerning salvation by faith alone that Paul developed in response to this situation gained fundamental importance for the later church, but there are no clear quotations or allusions to Galatians until the middle of the second century in the writing of Justin and Marcion. Here again one gains the impression of a letter that was not circulated apart from the Pauline Letter collection.

A similar impression of highly occasional letters that attracted little interest beyond their initial audience emerges from a consideration of Philippians and Philemon. Paul's Letter to the Philippians, probably dispatched from an Ephesian imprisonment in A.D. 54–55, contains obscure references that would have been clearly understood by the original audience but baffling to outsiders. In addition to the "same things" in Phil. 3:1, there is an awkward transition from a benediction in 4:7 to a kind of peroration in 4:8–9 and then to a peculiar thank you note in 4:10–20. The Letter changes subjects rapidly from a discussion of enemies of Paul's imprisonment (1:12–30) to a criticism of congregational arrogance (2:1–18) to a consideration of the travels of Paul's associates (2:19–30). A harsh critique of libertinists (3:17–21) follows hard on an equally vehement attack on Judaizers (3:2–16), followed by an appeal for the cessation of conflict between two congregational leaders (4:2–3). Several division hypotheses have been proposed by modern researchers to eliminate these problems, none of which is more satisfactory than the canonical Letter as it stands, which appears to contain all of the elements announced in the thanksgiving in 1:3–11.

In contrast there is no doubt about the integrity of Philemon, probably written from another imprisonment in A.D. 55–56. We now understand this Letter as a subtle and profound appeal for the voluntary manumission of a runaway slave by the name of Onesimus, but for first-century congregations, unaware of the circumstances, it was little understood. While Philemon is only obliquely visible in early Christian writings, Philippians was used quite extensively by Polycarp (ca. A.D. 69–155) in his Letter to the Philippians. This seems to fit the pattern of the other letters being used for some decades primarily in the area of their initial address.

When we come to Romans and the Corinthian correspondence, a contrasting picture of extensive circulation emerges. Surveys of literary allusions and quotations indicate that 1 Corinthians was the most widely dispersed and frequently used of the Pauline Letters through the second century, with Romans following close behind. It seems consistent that these Letters also display the clearest indications of redactional activity. Texts for both Romans and 1 Corinthians have variations in their addresses indicating they were adapted for generalized use. A number of different versions of Romans circulated independently in the early church, reflected in the tangled textual history of Romans 14–16. Some passages, like Rom. 16:17–20; 1 Cor. 14:33b–36; and 2 Cor. 6:14–7:1, seem to conflict either with their immediate contexts or with things said elsewhere in the same letters. Many scholars therefore regard these passages as interpolations added by later hands to the original letters. Other apparent discrepancies, such as the differences of tone and apparent situation between 2 Cor. 1:1–2:13 and 2 Cor. 10:1–13:14 and the duplication of purpose between 2 Corinthians 8 and 9, suggest to many scholars that parts of several letters may have been combined to create the two large books we now have. Thus the Letters to Romans and Corinthians and possibly others come to us in an edited form.

THE TRANSITION FROM OCCASIONAL LETTERS TO PUBLISHED BOOKS

With the exception of the detail from Col. 4:16, cited above, there is no clear proof that Pauline Letters were used by congregations outside of the immediate area to which they were originally addressed before ca. A.D. 90. The transition from the initial period of local circulation in the 50s to the wider distribution of NT Letters toward the end of the first century is shrouded in darkness. A crucial event in this period was likely the redaction and publication of the Corinthian correspondence. Some scholars have speculated that this editing and publishing activity may have been carried out by “conservative” members of the Pauline school, to counter interpretations of Paul’s letters by others that they deemed improper. If so, this “orthodox” edition of the Corinthian correspondence must have occurred in the early 90s, prior to citations from 1 Corinthians in 1 Clement, which was written in the late first or early second century A.D.

Even if the precise details of this reconstruction are incorrect, it remains likely that the transition from occasional apostolic letters to authoritative apostolic books began with the redaction, publication, and distribution of several Pauline Letters to serve ecclesiastical purposes. After the circulation of 1 Corinthians and the various efforts to do the same with Romans, other Pauline materials began to make their appearance. The pastoral Letters were created toward the end of the century, bearing the marks of the same conservative outlook evident in the redaction of the Corinthian correspondence. It appears likely that the early collections of Pauline Letters contained seven to ten letters arranged according to length, with the two Corinthian and Thessalonian Letters occasionally counted as single letters. Ultimately the Pastorals, Colossians, Hebrews, and Ephesians were included to bring the total up to thirteen. Given the derivative quality of Ephesians in particular, its role as a kind of introduction to some early form of the Pauline Letter corpus remains an intriguing speculation. That some collection of Paul's letters was extant at the turn of the century is evident from 2 Pet. 3:16. The ten-letter collection published by Marcion in the middle of the second century, with Galatians in the lead position, remains a unique variation.

The wider distribution of the Pauline Letters appears to have stimulated the creation and distribution of their critical counterparts: 2 Peter, Jude, James, the Johannine Letters, and Revelation. When the Pauline Letters were later located in a canon where they were preceded by the Book of Acts and followed by the general Letters and Revelation, the potentially dangerous and sometimes incomprehensible material could function as sacred writ. It is interesting to observe, however, that this did not take place until advances in the manufacture of larger codices (books with leaves, as opposed to scrolls) allowed material as large as the NT to be included in a single book. Within this context, each writing was able to function as a book within a comprehensive and authoritative book, capable of communicating to churches far from the locale or time of their original provenance.

General Features

The position of the Letter of Paul to the Romans as the first Letter in the NT is due to the simple fact that the earliest collections of Paul's Letters were arranged in order of decreasing length and Romans is the longest. Its resulting place has been oddly appropriate, however, since it is also the most deliberate and reflective of Paul's Letters and its influence on Christian theology the greatest. The sixteenth-century reformer Philipp Melancthon called it a "compendium of Christian doctrine" and it has in fact functioned as such for most of its long history. Its contents seem at first sight to conform to this assessment. In all other cases, Paul's Letters clearly served as surrogates for his personal presence as an apostle and leader in situations of crisis that developed in churches he himself had founded. In those other Letters Paul writes because he has to, to protect, correct, or strengthen some aspect of the gospel in the life of a particular congregation that is under risk. Romans appears to be an exception to this pattern. It is addressed to a church Paul did not establish. It does not seem to arise from an occasion that has been forced on him. There is no defense of himself, as in Galatians or 1 and 2 Corinthians, and no counterattack on those who have assaulted him or tried to seduce his converts. Instead, the argument of the Letter proceeds by a serial treatment of interlocking and perennial themes, often in sections that stand out as independent literary "blocks." Indeed, one of the challenges in the reading of Romans is to see how these sections were intended to fit together as parts of a coherent whole.

These themes, furthermore, do not seem to be peculiar to Romans; there are very few of them that do not echo passages in the other Letters. Some examples are the failure of the world to know God on his own terms (Rom. 1:18-32; 1 Cor. 1:18-25); justification by faith rather than by works of the law (Rom. 3; Gal. 3; 4; Phil. 3); Abraham (Rom. 4; Gal. 3); Adam and Christ (Rom. 5:12-21; 1 Cor. 15:21-22, 45-49); the church as the body of Christ (Rom. 12; 1 Cor. 12). There are exceptions. Conspicuous by its absence from Romans is any discussion of the nature of Paul's apostleship, any defense of his credentials or cataloging of the trials he has endured to authenticate his ministry. That these are missing appears to be a function of the absence of polemic. Conversely, one major theme that is treated at length and with passion in Romans but has no parallel in the other Letters is the discussion of the past and future destiny of Israel and its relation to the gospel (Rom. 9-11).

If Romans is the first of Paul's Letters in the order of the NT books, it is the last of his undoubted Letters to have been written (→ Paul). The themes Romans shares with the other Letters always come up elsewhere in situations of conflict or uncertainty that elicit Paul's discussion of them. But in Romans they are elaborated as part of a longer argument he has himself initiated, in deliberate and self-conscious progression. Many of its turning points are clearly marked by literary conventions (Rom. 1:8; 12:1-2; 16:1), anticipated objections and queries (3:1; 4:1, 9; 6:1), short summations (6:11; 7:12; 15:5-6), rhetorical climaxes (8:37-39; 11:28-32), and the insertion of liturgical fragments (4:25; 9:5; 11:33-36). It seems that the historical concreteness of those earlier crises and conflicts has receded and been displaced by a more deliberate accounting of what Paul has come to regard as crucial and definitive in his total work as an apostle; he appears to transcend at least to some extent the particular situations he has lived through and make available for a new audience the fruits of his experience. As a result, there has always been a powerful temptation to read Romans as a "compendium of Christian doctrine," or a systematic statement of Paul's theology.

Yet there are three important reasons for not resting with such an appraisal. For one thing, it is clear from the other Letters that Romans simply does not embrace everything that was important, even necessary, in Paul's own understanding of Christian faith and life (one may mention especially the Lord's Supper, 1 Cor. 11:23-26, and the resurrection, 1 Cor. 15:3-8, 12-19). In the second place, no part of the NT was composed simply as a presentation of its author's ideas, divorced from specific human occasions and needs. One should hesitate a long time before making Romans an exception to this rule and sundering it from early Christian history. Above all, Romans itself contains the most important evidence to help us understand its place in that history.

Occasion and Purpose

The most direct evidence for the occasion of Romans appears in the personal remarks Paul makes in the opening and closing sections of the Letter. In 1:10–15 it is clear that he is preparing the way for carrying out a long-cherished plan to visit the church at Rome, a visit he hopes will be of mutual benefit. In 15:14–33 he is much more specific. He feels he has no more “space” to carry on his mission to the Gentiles in the eastern Mediterranean and wants to extend it to the west and to Spain, and to be “sped on his way” (15:24) there by the church at Rome, to be supported by them in this enterprise. Since Paul hopes for such help from a church he did not himself establish, one motive for writing is clearly implied: he wants to present this church with an authentic representation of his message to gain its trust and backing. Before he can come to Rome, however, Paul has to make one last trip to Jerusalem to deliver the collection of money he has raised for the Jewish Christians there (→ Contribution for the Saints). This fixes the date and place for the writing of Romans fairly well, that is, during his last stay in Greece prior to his final trip to Jerusalem (at the point in the narrative of Acts represented by Acts 20:3), and probably from Corinth (Rom. 16:23 mentions “Gaius, my host,” and Gaius is one of the few persons Paul admits to having baptized in Corinth, 1 Cor. 1:14). The time is probably the winter of A.D. 55 or 56. This generally undisputed dating of Romans has a significant bearing on the Letter’s content. Its composition comes after the writing of Galatians and all the letters to Corinth (whatever their number), after the resolution of the Corinthian crisis, and probably also after the writing of Philippians.

If this gives us time and place, it does not yet yield a very convincing account of Paul’s purpose in writing. Why should a letter aimed at gaining trust and recognition deal with just the themes we have identified? Romans is much more than a neutral exposition of admirable ideas, however coherent. It is an argument with thrust and edge; it seeks to overcome resistance and counter objections. One may easily imagine that agitators and enemies from Paul’s earlier conflicts over his mission to Gentiles have had some influence in Rome that he would have been anxious to neutralize before his visit, especially if the church in the capital city was linked to the synagogue community there. (Rom. 3:7–8 shows in passing that Paul is aware of charges that have circulated against him.) We have very little knowledge of the actual composition of the church in Rome. But the evidence from Paul’s Letter itself is perplexing. He seems to address the church clearly at certain points as gentile (1:13; 11:13), at others as Jewish in background (2:17; 3:9). He seems to draw his justification for writing to the Romans and his right to be heard by them from his being an apostle to the Gentiles (1:13–14) and on their being a gentile Christian community. Yet he does not incorporate into this Letter some of the themes and preoccupations most characteristic of gentile urban Christianity as these had emerged in Corinth. Instead, the argument itself is cast in profoundly Jewish terms: its controlling vocabulary, its appeals to authority and tradition, the values invoked, the techniques employed in interpreting Scripture, the things taken for granted in the minds of its readers.

The puzzle is compounded when one notes that Paul’s missionary strategy included a “principle of noninterference,” i.e., a resolve not to pursue his missionary activity where others had begun theirs. This resolve is clearly stated in Rom. 15:20–21; it appears earlier in 2 Cor. 10:15–16. It is an understandable policy in the light of the division of labor agreed on at the Jerusalem conference (Gal. 2:7–9) and is certainly congruent with the affectionate possessiveness Paul felt toward his own churches (e.g., Gal. 4:19–20; 2 Cor 3:1–3; 11:1–3). But how is it then that we find him writing to Rome at all? Is his departure from this principle adequately explained by his need of support from Rome for his mission to Spain? Answers to these questions have been sought by attempting to reconstruct in more detail the circumstances in which Romans was written.

These attempts have generally moved in one of two directions. The first may be called the “Roman exile hypothesis.” On his first arrival in Corinth about A.D. 50, Paul made contact with a Jewish couple, Prisca and Aquila, who had recently come from Rome “because Claudius had ordered all the Jews to leave” that city (Acts 18:2–3; → Aquila; Prisca, Priscilla). Apparently they were already Christian converts by that time. The Roman biographer Suetonius, in his Life of Claudius (25), gives the reason for the emperor’s edict (A.D. 49) in words generally taken to refer to disturbances in the Roman Jewish community over the messiahship of Jesus. We may conclude that the church had been started in Rome by A.D. 49, and that it was sufficiently Jewish in composition to have come under Claudius’ ban, though presumably an indeterminate gentile Christian component would have been allowed to remain in the capital. When the ban was lifted in A.D. 54 after Claudius’ death, a good part, perhaps a majority, of the Christian community was allowed to return after its five-year exile. Enormous problems of reconciliation would have resulted. The situation faced earlier by Paul in Antioch (Gal. 2:11–14) would have become an acute local Roman problem, but with a reverse twist: now it would not be the Jewish Christians who had to accept former Gentiles into the community, but the other way around. Gentile Christians would need to be reminded of their debt to their Jewish heritage (Paul seems in fact to do just this in Rom. 11:18) and to be urged to be more tolerant of Jewish religious practices (cf. 14:3, 5–6, 14). For many scholars just such a situation is reflected in Paul's exhortations in the concluding chapters of Romans, thus confirming the exile hypothesis.

Yet this proposal does not answer all questions. The last chapters of Romans do more than simply reverse the arguments of Galatians to apply them to an inverse situation. The contrast between the "weak" and the "strong" (Rom. 15:1) appears to have developed not out of the Galatian debate but out of the distinction made in 1 Cor. 8:7–13 between the "weak" and "those who have knowledge." While this distinction is now subtly but firmly linked to the themes of Israel's history among the Gentiles and God's faithfulness (Rom. 15:7–12), a thread that runs through the body of the Letter, the connection appears contrived. Paul is very careful in Romans not to take sides; he no longer uses himself as a model (cf. Gal. 6:14; 1 Cor. 9:15–23; 10:32–33; 11:1) but points more directly to Christ (Rom. 15:3, 7). In short, Paul's exhortations do not seem to address concrete problems so much as they present paradigms of Christian behavior generated out of his experiences in both Galatia and Corinth. But most important, all the previous bulk of Romans, the profoundly Jewish appeal of the argument, is not adequately accounted for by reconstructing a situation in which it is gentile Christians who are being called upon to welcome back their exiled Jewish Christian associates.

Thus there has been another major attempt to reconstruct the occasion of Romans, which we may call the "Jerusalem crisis hypothesis." It is not time and place of writing that are in doubt, but Paul's motives, the circumstances that impelled him to write this Letter. Proponents of this view point particularly to Rom. 15:30–33, where Paul's anxiety over the outcome of his impending visit to Jerusalem is clearly expressed. That anxiety is in proportion to the importance attached by Paul to the money he has collected for the Jerusalem church and is about to deliver. The collection exemplified and actualized the unity of a church composed of both Jews and Gentiles that had been the issue at the apostolic conference in Jerusalem (Gal. 2:1–10) and that constitutes one of the running themes of Romans (cf. Rom. 1:16; 9:24; 15:7–12). With it, in Paul's view, the "truth of the gospel" stood or fell (Gal. 2:5). Whether Paul's whole career had been worthwhile or futile depended in turn on Jerusalem's recognition of that truth (Gal. 2:2). His anxiety therefore is not limited to what might occur in Jerusalem; it is at least in part an anxiety to be rightly understood in Rome not only so that he might have the Roman Christians as allies but also that his entire mission should not be misunderstood as the irrelevant experiment of a free-lancer. The situation that occasioned Romans in this view is a crisis that lies before Paul in Jerusalem. The resources for facing it lie in his exposition of the gospel as its apostle. As a matter of fact, the themes of Romans fall rather precisely under two headings: first, the results of the controversies in Galatia, Corinth, and Philippi, now reflected upon in their interconnections and with more distance (Abraham and his promise, the Mosaic law, justification, spiritual gifts, unity and diversity in the church, eating and drinking in a religious context), and second, just those convictions Paul was going to have to defend in Jerusalem (the faithfulness and impartiality of God, the equal accountability of Jew and Gentile before God [chaps. 1–2], the equal right of Gentile and Jew as offspring of the one Abraham "who is the father of us all" [chaps. 3–4], the terms on which true obedience to God is possible [chaps. 5–8], the meaning of Israel for the life of the church [chaps. 9–11], the equal freedom and responsibility of Jewish and gentile Christian in the everyday life of the community in the world [chaps. 12–15]).

Such a reconstruction of the setting for Romans has the advantage of making historically intelligible the composition of this Letter with its undeniable thematic and reflective character. Deeply rooted in the history of Paul's relations with his congregations, it is the rendering of an account of his gospel, its fundamental warrants, the major misunderstandings to which it is susceptible, its consequences, and above all the continuities and differences between it and the Judaism out of which Paul had come.

Significance

While some find one more compelling than the other, the "Roman exile" and the "Jerusalem crisis" hypotheses are not, strictly speaking, mutually exclusive. What they have most notably in common is the perception that the relation of the infant Christian movement to Judaism, a complex mix of both continuity and innovation as in the case of most significant new departures in religious tradition, is a fundamental motif of the Letter. Being himself a participant in this transition, i.e., being himself

COMMENTARY

1:1-17

Introduction

profoundly Jewish and Christian, Paul could not deal with the issues confronting him on either hypothesis—or on both—without involving his own religious identity. The “adversary,” the debating partner, in Romans is not some enemy or some heresy; it is not gentile Christianity, of which Paul is rather the advocate; nor is it Judaism, as though this were a rejected alternative left behind. It is instead in large measure the Hellenistic Jew that Paul himself was: a religious person in his highest aspirations, in his self-esteem but also his devotion to God, in his full knowledge of what God requires of human beings, in his loyalty to the Jewish Torah—yet one who despite all these virtues does not realize how religious life has been poisoned and perverted by the power of sin and needs to be shown how God has provided in his Son Jesus Christ a way of obtaining that integrity, that “righteousness,” in one’s relationship to God that has always eluded religious people. The expository argument that results and that forms the substance of Romans has played an immeasurable role in the centuries since, most especially in two ways: first, in helping to shape the Christian community’s understanding of its relationship to the Hebrew Scriptures and to Judaism, both its debt and its distinctiveness; and second, in restoring and clarifying a sense of direction and identity in Christian reflection in times of great contention and change, such as the Pelagian controversy in the fifth century, the emergence of Protestantism in the sixteenth, and the breakdown of liberal optimism in the twentieth. These two ways in which Romans has functioned are intimately connected and are, one might say, but two sides of its significance.

The other Letters of Paul have undergone various levels of editing in the process of circulation and canonization in order to make and keep available for subsequent generations what they initially intended and contributed in their original, contingently historical settings. Romans has been comparatively free of such modification. Its authenticity is not debated. Serious questions about its integrity, i.e., whether it left the apostle’s hand in the form in which we have it, are confined to chap 16. The situation in which it was composed near the end of Paul’s career called forth a type of argument that transcended that situation from the beginning by its comprehensiveness and because of the perennial nature of the issues of religious identity and integrity it addresses. Thus, even though it cannot be fully understood in isolation from the other Letters that follow it in the canon, Romans has not unjustly been perceived as comprising the heart of the apostle’s legacy to the Christian church.

1:1-7, Salutation. Paul begins by using the conventional opening pattern of Hellenistic letters: “A (writer) to B (addressee): greeting” (cf. James 1:1; Acts 15:23). But this structural skeleton admits, and even invites, augmentation in a variety of ways. First, the greeting at the end (v. 7b) is modified under the influence of the Jewish “peace” greeting (also used in letters, cf. Dan. 4:1; 2 Macc. 1:1) and of Christian liturgical practice. Paul expects his letters to be read in public assembly. Second, descriptive modifiers are attached to the designations of both sender and recipients, allowing Paul to present his credentials and at the same time to coordinate to his own calling “as an apostle” (v. 1) that of his readers “as saints” (v. 7). This last term is explained by the addition of “beloved by God” (v. 7) and “belonging to Jesus Christ” (v. 6) and is the closest equivalent in Paul’s vocabulary to the later term “Christian.” That is a reminder that all Paul’s extant Letters are written “within the family” to sustain, encourage, or correct people who are assumed to be baptized. God’s calling initiative binds writer and recipients together, though it also distinguishes Paul by assigning him his own role as an “apostle,” an envoy commissioned for a particular purpose. That is Paul’s principal credential: he “has” authority because he himself stands under it. The purpose of his calling is to serve “God’s gospel,” a message anticipated in the writings of the Jewish prophets that formed part of the Scriptures of the early Christian community from the beginning. As the subsequent argument will elaborate, this message has its roots in the continuity of God’s past relationship to his people but has its goal in eliciting trust and obedience among non-Jewish peoples as well.

In the third place, Paul augments his salutation most strikingly in Romans by noting the content of God’s gospel; it “concerns his Son . . . Jesus Christ our Lord.” Two parallel relative clauses further identifying this Son in vv. 3b-4 show linguistic and formal signs of being a pre-Pauline creedal fragment and are of great interest for the light they shed on the early development of Christology (Christian understanding of Jesus’ nature):

[his Son] who was descended from the seed of David according to the flesh, who was appointed Son of God with power according to the spirit of holiness by [or from] the resurrection of the dead.

This couplet is best explained as having originated from the combination of two strains of early Christian affirmation about Jesus. First, while it appears nowhere else in Paul, the origin of the Messiah from the royal line of David was one of the constants in Jewish messianic expectation based on 2 Sam. 7:11b–16 and is found in the NT in the infancy narratives of Matthew and Luke (Matt. 1:1; Luke 1:27; 2:4; cf. Mark 10:47 and parallels; Mark 12:35 and parallels; Matt. 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 21:9, 15; John 7:42; Rev. 5:5; 22:16). Second, another tradition developed from the confession that with the resurrection Jesus was exalted to become the Son of God or the Messiah. This tradition made use of Ps. 2:7 and Ps. 110:1 and appears in its simplest form in Acts. 2:36; 5:30–31; and 13:33. Such an understanding of “Son of God” as a titular office or role to which Jesus was “appointed” at a given moment in time is also without parallel in Paul. The two traditions, one oriented more around the earthly life of Jesus as a descendant of David, the other centered in the preaching of God’s resurrection of the crucified Jesus, seem to have developed at first as alternative ways of affirming Jesus to be the bearer and fulfiller of Jewish messianic hopes. In the couplet above quoted by Paul, the two traditions (which appear together again in looser order in 2 Tim. 2:8) have been clamped together by means of the word pair “flesh” and “spirit” (→ Flesh and Spirit). These terms appear in other early creedal or hymnic passages to distinguish the earthly sphere of reality (without morally pejorative connotations) and the transcendent realm of divine power (1 Tim. 3:16; 1 Pet. 3:18; 4:6; cf. John 3:6; 6:63). Combined in this way, the two sets of messianic ideas are no longer parallel but have become sequential, creating narrative movement in the creedal pattern: the earthly life of the descendant of David is a first stage followed by the postresurrection reign of the Son of God installed in divine power. An important later development is then clearly observable in Ignatius’ letters (Ign. Eph. 7:2; 18:2; 20:2; Ign. Smyrn. 1:1–2): the two sets of messianic categories are again brought into parallelism but now, under the influence of the virgin birth tradition and to meet a new polemic situation, the link with the resurrection is broken and both are connected with the birth of Jesus to affirm a double origin of his person, one human and one divine. With that a major step is taken toward the patristic doctrine of the two natures of Christ. This is to go far beyond the meaning of the present passage in Rom. 1:3b–4, but it indicates the historical significance of the creedal fragment Paul quotes (→ Messiah; Son of God; Virgin Birth).

In this context the quotation is an important part of Paul’s initial move to establish the common ground of a shared faith with his unknown readers. Both the title “Son of God” and the mention of the resurrection, understood as God’s vindication and authorization of Jesus “in power,” show that what is decisive for Paul about Jesus of Nazareth is God’s identification with him. The close operating association that results is central to Paul’s Christology, appears in the liturgical blessing with which the salutation ends (v. 7b), and is seen in the way Paul embarks on his next paragraph, in which he prays to God “through Jesus Christ.”

1:8–15, Thanksgiving. Another standard practice in Hellenistic letter writing was to begin with a prayer of thanksgiving for the favorable circumstances of recipient or writer or both. Paul often gives thanks for the faith of his readers, not only because he understands it to be symptomatic of God’s working but also because in his world confession is a public act with repercussions for the further spread of the gospel, not simply a private faith. In the present passage, the thanksgiving quickly merges after v. 8 into statements about Paul’s desire to visit Rome (see above “Introduction: The Occasion and Purpose of Romans”). At the end (vv. 14–15) he explicitly traces this desire to the higher duty that governs his life and authorizes his mission; he is “one under obligation” to all alike. To register the universal range of that imperative he abandons for a moment (and only here in his Letters) his customary division of humankind into Jew and non-Jew that always has a religious dimension and adopts the cultural and linguistic designations “Hellene” (to which the Romans would have counted themselves) and “barbarian,” “learned and simple” (NEB). Paul’s thanksgivings often serve to signal certain concerns or themes of the subsequent letter bodies, and this deliberate point that his gospel pertains to all without regard to social standing and privilege confirms that pattern.

1:16–17, Statement of the Theme. In close logical continuity with the preceding, Paul asserts, “For I am not put to shame by the gospel.” This somewhat surprising expression has little to do with moral disgrace or with personal pride. In the Septuagint (LXX), “to be put to shame” is to have a hope or expectation disappointed, a confidence proven to be misplaced (cf. Ps. 119:6; Isa. 54:4). Its opposite, as here, is to have the base on which one rests one’s life turn out to warrant the trust placed in it. Paul can “have complete confidence in the gospel” (TEV) because it is God’s effective way of working for human salvation. In itself that does not yet state an issue that is subject to debate. But with vv. 16–17, which bring the thanksgiving to its conclusion, Paul takes one further step. Because the content of the gospel is God’s Son (vv.

3-4), God's way of providing salvation pertains from now on to all who believe, Jew and Greek alike, and it involves a fresh revelation of "the righteousness of God" on these new terms. As a matter of fact, the ensuing argument of the Letter elaborates this last step and in so doing rejects certain alternative understandings of salvation (see 3:21-26). Verses 16-17 thus function as a statement of the theme of the Letter.

It is characteristic that Paul ends this introductory statement by appealing (for confirmation) to an OT text (Hab. 2:4) that brings together the three major terms "righteousness," "faith," and "life" (or salvation). But the sense in which Paul understands it is not immediately apparent. It differs in detail from both the Masoretic Text (MT) and the LXX. More important, the phrase "by faith" can be construed to modify either the subject, "the righteous person," or the verb, "shall live." A widely held view, choosing the first possibility, concludes that chaps. 1-4 of the Letter describe "the person who is righteous by faith," while chaps. 5-8 show how such a person "shall live." That would suggest that Paul simply accepts the premise that righteousness is a condition of salvation and that the issue in Romans concerns only the terms on which that righteousness is to be attained. That is probably much too simple. In the actual course of the Letter all three of the major terms of this text undergo basic redefinition and turn out to have more than one level of meaning. For example, while Paul is certainly concerned with human believing, his Greek term for "faith," as in the LXX version of Hab. 2:4, is also used for the faithfulness of God on which human trusting rests. It appears wiser, therefore, not to press this key "title" verse too hard at this point but to allow Paul's own line of thought to disclose his understanding of it.

1:18-11:36

The Central Argument

Rom. 1:18-11:36 forms a first major whole in the composition of Romans; chaps. 12-16 draw important consequences for the readers, but move at another level and incorporate materials of a quite different nature. One should avoid characterizing the first as "theological" or "dogmatic" and the second as "ethical" or "didactic," for in both parts Paul uses theological arguments of many kinds to inform, instruct, and guide his readers. Yet this first part of the body of the Letter forms the base and must be taken on its own terms.

1:18-3:20

Preparatory Considerations

A clear indication of the deliberate nature of Romans in comparison with his other Letters is that Paul does not move directly to the central content of his gospel. After the opening address, Jesus Christ is not mentioned until 3:21-26. Instead, Paul carefully prepares his readers and provides a context for his exposition in two ways. First, every interpretation of the meaning of Jesus Christ for human beings implies a certain understanding of the world, a diagnosis of the human condition to which that interpretation is addressed. Since 3:24-25 speak of "redemption in Christ Jesus" and of God's provision of a "means for dealing with sin," this preceding analysis involves mounting a "charge that all human beings, both Jews and Greeks, are under sin" (3:9), demonstrating the world's need for God's saving action. Paul does not leave the diagnosis to be inferred; he develops it at some length. A careful reading of this preparatory argument is thus crucial to a correct perception of his intentions later. Second, more importantly, if the exposition is to be persuasive and convincing, this diagnosis of the human predicament must also come to terms with the perceptions religious people have already formed about it. The tendency of religious moralists, in their scrutiny of the world about them, is to exempt themselves from their own negative judgments upon others. But since Paul wants to set forth the gospel as God's way of working for the salvation of all persons without distinction, he must also demonstrate that all stand on the same footing before God. This requires him to question certain typical and recurrent religious assumptions about God and about the terms on which salvation and life are bestowed on human beings. These two strategies of preparation are intimately intertwined in these first three chapters.

1:18-32, The Operation of God's Wrath in the World. Somewhat surprisingly, the point at which Paul begins is not human activity but God's. The word "sin" does not appear until 3:9. In striking parallelism to his claim that in the gospel God's righteousness is revealed (1:17), he asserts that on the wider stage of the world apart from the gospel what is being disclosed is God's wrath in action upon and against human beings who suppress God's truth. Paul is quite specific about that suppression. Human beings have had every opportunity to know God, indeed they have known God. Nevertheless, "in spite of knowing God, they did not honor him as God or give thanks to him" (v. 21). That is the central failure; everything else is a consequence of that. To be sure, it is a failure of human beings; they are responsible and indeed without excuse. But in presenting those consequences of their behavior, Paul insists three times (vv. 24, 26, 28) that it is God who has been at work.

Several features of this rehearsal call for attention. The first is the very notion of "the wrath of God." While the wrath of the gods plays a role in many religions, in Israelite thought it had come to be understood as God's response to human provocation that violates the divine holiness and majesty (cf. 1 Sam. 5:6; 6:9; 2 Sam. 6:7). Following the trend of postbiblical Judaism, the NT writers tend to avoid terms for divine anger and rage that occur in Greek literature, to play down the elements of passion and arbitrariness, and to link the term "wrath" with God's impartial and just judgment, his zeal for righting the wrongs that have afflicted his creation (cf. such quite different texts as 1 Enoch 91:7 and Wisd. of Sol. 5:17-20; → Wrath). The interpretation of "the wrath of God" is subject to two tendencies. One is to construe it as an impersonal process of moral retribution built into the very structure of the world, a cosmic nemesis, to sunder it from belief in a living God. The other is to overpersonalize it and to dismiss it as too human language for God. But recognition of the background to Paul's use of this phrase in apocalyptic and wisdom traditions as represented by 1 Enoch and the Wisdom of Solomon makes clear that his intent is not to trivialize the distance between the human and the divine but to sharpen the sense for God's transcendent presence in the face of, and in spite of, human suppression of his truth. The revelation of God's wrath is here the reverse side of the manifestation of his righteousness; it is God's divinity asserting itself where it is not recognized by human beings. Paul does not suggest that the revelation of God's wrath is in any way the content of the gospel. Nor does he suggest that God's wrath is revealed to some (the ungodly) while his righteousness is revealed to others (the godly), as though God had different "faces" for different classes of people. The scope of Paul's canvas has no limits; in speaking of both sorts of revelation, he has all humankind in view. And there is no suggestion that the revelation of God's wrath belongs only to a bygone era, that it has been replaced by a revelation of God's righteousness, as though the two "faces" of God succeed each other. The revelation of God's righteousness in the gospel does not take place against the backdrop of the absence of God from a world that has repudiated him; its other side is God's reacting presence in a world over which he remains in charge even when it defies him.

The second feature of this depiction of God's wrath is the way in which it is executed. The passage has many similarities to the literature of Hellenistic Judaism, especially Wisdom of Solomon 11-15. In keeping with that tradition, there is a kind of ironic appropriateness to the reversals that follow upon human behavior "in order that they might learn that a person is punished by those very things by which one sins" (Wisd. of Sol. 11:16): failure to perceive God's power and deity with the "mind" brings a darkening of the mind (Rom. 1:20-21); those who claim to be wise turn out to be fools (v. 22); disregard for the creator obliterates the distinction between creator and creature and produces confusion about what befits nature and what violates it (vv. 25-26). The climax is reached in a traditional and artfully patterned "vice list" (vv. 29-31), the force of which derives from its cumulative impact in portraying an ordered world that has turned to moral chaos. Three times (vv. 23, 25, 26) human beings are said to have "exchanged" or "substituted" one reality for another, and three times (vv. 24, 26, 28) God is said to have given them up or "delivered them over" to the consequences of their own action. The language Paul uses, especially in depicting the power of human sensuality in vv. 26-27 (v. 27, "they were burned out by lust"), conveys the strong impression of a resulting impairment and perversion. This is not the outburst of an offended Victorian, though Paul does break off in v. 25 to utter a liturgical prayer at the thought of worshiping God's creature in place of the creator. It is the response of a representative Hellenistic Jew to the spectacle of God's grand creation, which includes human sexuality, deformed. There is a moral dimension to this distortion, as the vice list shows, but the depiction itself is surprisingly free from moralizing. Idolatry and the abuse of sexual distinctions are not here the objects or cause of God's wrath but the symptoms of its operation, examples of the disorders that result from the root failure to honor God or give thanks to him. The worst distortions are those of human religious practice. "One does not thumb one's nose at God" (Gal. 6:7b); suppressions of his truth produce corresponding negative realities to press with a new fatefulness upon the human race and shape its world. That is how a wrath traditionally associated with God's final judgment is already now being disclosed.

A third significant feature of this sober assessment of the world's condition is that the argument presupposes throughout that God is indeed known from his works, his deity manifest in his handiwork. Here too Paul shows his roots in a Hellenistic Judaism flavored with the language of Stoicism (cf. Wisd. of Sol. 13:1-9). But he emphasizes the initiative of God in making himself known (Rom. 1:19b) and universalizes access to this knowledge. The knowledge of God is not the special attainment of an intellectual elite, nor is godlessness the result of ignorance. This knowledge is not only open to all, it is given to all, "with the result that they are (all) without excuse" (v. 20b). Paul does not suggest that God is by nature or in principle unknowable, nor does he propose that what the world worships as an "unknown God" the Christian gospel now makes known (cf. the Lucan representation of Paul on the Areopagus, Acts 17:23). He does not, like the author of the Fourth Gospel, claim that no one has ever seen or known God and that the point of Christ's coming was to make him known (John 1:18). The foundation lines of Paul's argument are laid down differently: God has been known, yet he has not been recognized or honored as God. Such an argument requires one to think of the knowledge of God on two levels: God is known, yet remains unknown; not necessarily unknown but actually unknown—and that paradox is the paradox of human sinfulness itself, which is not necessary but actually universal. That the manifest God should remain without the recognition and obedience due him is the fundamental perversion of the relationship between creator and creature that draws every other kind of distortion in its wake.

We may for a moment anticipate Paul's later argument: the knowledge of God at this deeper level of recognition and honor, which otherwise is never actual because of the power of sin, is reached when the defeat of sin's power in Christ makes available a new life of obedience and righteousness. The whole argument of Romans may be summed up as an exposition of God's way of rectifying, setting right, that flawed relationship by his Son, Jesus (to whom Paul refers in his earliest Letter as "the one who delivers us from the impending wrath," 1 Thess. 1:10). In the present section, some consequences of that failure of human beings to honor God are in abuse of their bodies (Rom. 1:24), a distorted form of worship (v. 25), and a "reprobate mind," i.e., one no longer capable of discerning good and evil (v. 28). After the conclusion of this whole argument, as Paul opens the other major division of his Letter, he appeals to his readers to make their own that new life Christ has brought: "... present your bodies as a living sacrifice ... which is your appropriate worship ... be transformed by the renewal of your mind so that you may discern what the will of God is" (12:1-2).

2:1-16, Moral and Religious Persons Before an Impartial God. So far Paul has not needed to name those he has been describing for he has been referring to all inhabitants of God's creation. There has been one specification in 1:18: God's wrath is "against all ungodliness and wickedness on the part of those who by their wickedness suppress the truth." Now it is the inevitable reaction of all moral and religious people, all those who would agree with the preceding diagnosis of the world's condition, to suppose that these words exempt them from the wrath of God. The clear and simple purpose of this next section is to close off that imagined escape.

The first six verses make this apparent. It is a mistake to picture Paul as a prosecutor indicting first the Gentile (in chap. 1) and now the Jew (in chap. 2). Rom. 3:9 may state his conclusion, but it does not describe his method. He does not now "prove" that religious moralists (there is no direct focus on the Jew until v. 17) in fact do the same things that they condemn in others. He simply assumes that they do (v. 1c). The moralist knows perfectly well the terms of God's judgment (v. 2, anticipated in 1:32). That is not the point. It is the presumption of those who put themselves on God's side in passing judgment, their illusory notion that they are exempt from judgment (v. 3), and the resulting "contempt" (v. 4) for a divine goodness and patience that ought to lead them to repentance, that is "storing up" God's wrath against them (→ Judgment, Day of). For their denial of their own accountability to God is simply their form of a knowledge of God that fails to "honor God or give thanks to him" (1:21). In its place, in vv. 6-11, Paul rings the changes on God's impartial judgment; all persons without exemption, "the Jew first and also the Greek," stand on the same footing before God and must face the consequences of their actions, whether for good or ill. Just how axiomatic this impartiality of God is for Paul is shown by the form in which Ps. 62:12 is echoed in v. 6, as an adjectival clause, almost an epithet for God. Paul's main point here stands firmly in the prophetic tradition; Amos (9:10), Micah (2:6-7), and Jeremiah (2:35; 14:13-16) all had to counter the tendency of religious people to turn trust in God into a self-immunization from his judgment, a shield behind which to evade accountability.

Just as Amos's oracles begin with the nations around Israel's periphery only to zero in on his own people (Amos 1:2-2:16), so Paul's argument quickly becomes more specific. Since he has referred now "to the Jew first and also the Greek" (resuming Rom. 1:16), the last verses of this section (2:12-16) press the point of their equal standing before God in terms of the one thing that most conspicuously divides them. Twice in one verse (v. 14) the Gentiles are defined as those who do not have the (Mosaic) law. The point of the verse is not to say that somehow Gentiles too have that law. What v. 12 states negatively, that the absence or presence of the law makes no difference in the consequences of human sinning, vv. 13-14 put positively: performance counts, and non-Jews who do "the things of the law" on their own, without being enjoined by the Mosaic law

(this is the natural sense in Greek of the phrase “by nature”), do not need the Mosaic law when they come before God as their judge. Their conscience and the very existence of their moral disputations demonstrate their accountability for their own deeds (→ Conscience). Paul carefully avoids saying that the law itself is “written on their hearts,” which to a Jew could only mean the end-time realization of perfect obedience on the part of God’s people (cf. Jer. 31:33).

2:17–29, The Jew Before an Impartial God. If the point that no one is exempt from accountability to God is to be carried through all the way, it must be made with explicit reference to the exemplary religious person. So Paul, in one of the most dramatically rhetorical passages in all his Letters, addresses the Jew directly in the second person singular—not because the Jew is the enemy or guilty of violation of God’s law, but just because this person represents the very best in Paul’s religious world, indeed the highest claims of his own religious tradition. Verses 17–21a are a single sentence, in which Paul itemizes a whole series of convictions that both reflected and shaped the Jewish sense of identity and of mission in the world during the intertestamental period. It is easy to translate with a sarcastic tone, but Paul has a sure eye for Jewish self-respect and pride, and the argument turns on that, not on Paul’s demeaning his own tradition. The prerogatives of Judaism listed here (cf. Rom. 9:4–5 for a less polemic enumeration) revolve around possession of the law as the hallmark of distinction from the non-Jewish world and are climaxed in v. 20b in the strikingly Hellenistic phrase, “possessing in the law the very embodiment of knowledge and truth,” i.e., the answer to all human inquiry and searching. This possession notwithstanding, the rhetorical denouement at the end puts four ironic questions, two of which directly echo the Decalogue, challenging the Jew to answer to the same divine interrogation that every religious person is inclined to proclaim to the surrounding world. Using in v. 24 a text from Isa. 52:5 that referred to the scorn of the Babylonians for the apparent weakness of the God of the Israelite exiles in their midst, Paul turns to charge that the goal of every serious religious person, to bring honor to God, is in fact subverted into its opposite by those who presume to judge the world but themselves evade accountability to God by taking their prerogatives as surrogates for obedience.

Returning in vv. 25–29 to his more sober argumentative style, Paul singles out circumcision, the most vivid symbol of individual participation in the covenant in the Hellenistic period, to make the point that all the formal tokens of religious identity depend for their meaning and validity on actual obedience, thus putting Jew and non-Jew once again on exactly the same footing before an impartial God. In the last two verses, far from obliterating the identity of the Jew, Paul proceeds to redefine and reclaim it by contrasting what is public and secret, flesh and heart, letter and spirit. (This last contrast, repeated in Rom. 7:6 and 2 Cor. 3:6, has become a major idiom of theological language.) Genuine religious identity (including that of the Jew in the first instance) is at once authentically human and immune to human manipulation, hidden except to God. Its ultimate approbation depends on the God who judges truly, not on human appraisal. This radical appeal from all outward criteria to an inner religious integrity known and determined by God alone is a positive ingredient in Paul’s preparatory argument in Rom. 1:18–3:20, apart from which his negative indictment (3:9) cannot be rightly understood. It taps the deep lode of the OT prophets’ critique of religion and is reminiscent of the sharp juxtaposition in the Sermon on the Mount between the visible marks of piety and what is recognized by “your Father who sees in secret” (Matt. 6:4, 6, 18).

3:1–8, Two Objections Anticipated. A characteristic feature of Paul’s didactic style is exemplified in this section. Not only does he directly address an imagined interlocutor in the second person, as in 2:17–24 he anticipates responses and answers them, thus ensuring that his own major conclusions are not misunderstood. Whereas in his other Letters such dialogic interchange remains occasional, it is an index to the deliberate quality of the presentation in Romans that such rhetorical questions and replies mark stages in the argument and provide clues to the structuring of the Letter (cf. 3:9; 6:1, 15; 7:7, 13; 9:14; 11:1, 11).

As is often the case, the first question (3:1) arises with unrelenting logic out of the preceding section: if that religious integrity that really counts before God has no connection with religious distinctions, what is the point of being a Jew? The question is only partially answered. The Jew has an “advantage” but it consists in the initiative and faithfulness of God, which does not depend on human fidelity. The answer is only partial because the question still lurks whether, in treating Jew and non-Jew on equal terms, God has not himself broken faith with the “direct utterances” he has entrusted to the Jews. That momentous issue, the connection between God’s faithfulness and Israel’s past election and future destiny, is suppressed here for full discussion in chaps. 9–11. Deferring that side of God’s faithfulness, Paul focuses for the moment on God’s truth and righteousness instead. One who genuinely honors God will desire, in the words of the central penitential psalm of the Hebrew Scriptures (Ps. 51:4) that God be “justified [i.e., acknowledged to be right] whenever he speaks and be vindedicated whenever he enters into court proceedings with his people.” Justification, on its first appearance in Romans, is not the justification of human beings but the vindication of God himself in the face of a world that fails to honor him as God and in the face of evasive religious substitutes for obedience.

This reply only hastens the second objection in vv. 5–8; if God is vindicated no matter what the infidelities of human beings, what grounds are there for condemnation or wrath at all? Paul responds by turning the train of thought in the opposite direction: the certainty that God is the judge of the world makes such a protestation ridiculous. But the question only takes new forms. God’s prerogative to judge may stand, but what about his integrity and the moral consequences? Wickedness and sin seem no longer to mean anything. Why not conclude “let us do evil that good may come”? For a moment the curtain is lifted on personal charges that have been leveled against Paul. But once again no real answer is provided (until, in this case, 6:1–7:6), for a proper rejoinder cannot come until Paul has begun his positive account of justification. Until then, there is only a rough dismissal: people who talk like that deserve what they get.

3:9–20, The Solidarity of Jew and Gentile Under the Power of Sin and Before the Law.

Having for the moment set these objections to one side, Paul returns to his main line of thought to draw up his indictment. There is some subtlety to the way he resumes the question of the Jew’s “advantage” in v. 9. At first he seems flatly to take back what he had granted in v. 2. But he has been very careful so far—and remains so throughout Romans—not simply to obliterate the distinction between Jew and Gentile even though he insists that they stand as equals before God. It is the last point that now comes emphatically to the fore. Whatever the “advantage,” it makes no difference in this: all human beings, both Jews and Greeks, are “under sin.” This first mention of “sin” in Romans personifies it as an oppressing power, setting a pattern that holds for the rest of the Letter. The “evidence” to verify the charge is not merely empirical; it is certified by Scripture, here cited in a carefully constructed collage of passages from the Psalms and Isaiah that declares first the nonexistence of a single righteous person and then catalogues the symptoms of human debasement in speech and action. At the end, Paul makes sure there is no room left for religious self-exemption. The “law” (which here includes the passages just cited from Psalms and Isaiah and thus stands for the whole of the Hebrew Scriptures, as in 1 Cor. 14:21) makes this declaration “to those who are covered by the law,” the Jews as well as Gentiles. It follows that the whole world is not only answerable to God but indictable. Something of Paul’s distinctive view of the Mosaic law emerges when he goes a step further to declare this silencing of every self-defense to be the very purpose of that law, a statement for which no Jewish parallel is known. The psalmist, calling on God for deliverance, had cried (Ps. 143:1c–2, LXX):

In thy righteousness, hear me!
Enter not into judgment with thy servant;
for no one living shall be found righteous before thee.

By adding to that last line the expression “by works of the law,” Paul had already in Gal. 2:16 constructed a motto, which he now repeats (v. 20a). The true religious integrity that enables authentic obedience, but which all humankind lacks, cannot itself be produced by performing any deeds enjoined by the law. That would amount to self-salvation. It is precluded by the power of sin, which renders the law impotent to produce the obedience it calls for (cf. Rom. 8:3–4; Gal. 3:21b). Instead, “all that law does is to tell us what is sinful” (JB).

3:21–8:39

The Justification of the Unrighteous

The right knowledge of God that truly honors God as God and gives thanks to him, the proper relationship of creature to creator, and the genuine integrity that issues in true obedience are all wanting because of the power of sin. That void cannot be filled by human effort to live by the Mosaic law. Only a fresh initiative on God’s part can recover for all human life a right relationship to him, the power of a new beginning, a restored integrity, and a hope for a future share in God’s own glory. That this fresh initiative for the salvation of all has been effectively taken in Jesus Christ is the heart of Paul’s gospel (1:16), and it is to the positive exposition of that claim that he turns at this point and for the remainder of his Letter. Such a comprehensive claim requires an appropriately rich language. In Paul’s usage, the controlling terms are “righteousness” and “justification”—first of God and then of human beings. This creates some problems of understanding for modern readers, but the first solution, as in every instance of listening to another person, is to follow his own explanatory line of thought, for these are not the only words or concepts Paul uses. Each subsequent unit of Romans adds another dimension to Paul’s presentation of his gospel and so refines his use of these terms.

3:21–26, The Death of Jesus Christ as the Revelation of God’s Righteousness. The most important step Paul takes in this introductory passage is to locate God’s fresh saving initiative in the death of Jesus on the cross, the first mention of Christ in the argument of the Letter. What is significant about Jesus here is not his teaching, his preaching or expectation of the kingdom of God, or his moral behavior, but his death. The righteousness of God now manifest apart from law is thus not first of all a divine attribute or a human moral quality bestowed by God and exemplified in Jesus' life, but God's delivering activity in the death of Jesus. Not until later does Paul elaborate his own understanding of the way this death alters the human situation. For the moment he simply accepts and uses in v. 25 what appears to be an early summary Jewish-Christian liturgical statement of the meaning of Jesus' death in terms drawn from the OT institution of sacrifice. It refers to that death as an "expiation," a place or means of removing or covering sin. Since the Greek word behind this expression is used in the LXX (e.g., Exod. 25:17) for the "mercy seat," the slab on top of the Ark of the covenant that was sprinkled with the blood of the sin offering on the Day of Atonement, this liturgical language may have been composed originally to affirm that Jesus' death surpasses and replaces the atonement ritual of the Jewish Temple (cf. Heb. 9). But the reference to the Temple may not be so direct; the same Greek term is used for the vicarious atoning effect of the deaths of the Jewish martyrs in the early Hasmonean revolt (4 Macc. 17:22; →Maccabees). In either case, Jesus' death is understood in terms of the atoning efficacy of the blood of a sacrificed life, i.e., its power to remove not only the consciousness of sin on the part of those involved but also its objective consequences in the world, to break the guilt-punishment sequence that follows violations of God's will (→Atonement; Expiation). Even elsewhere Paul does not develop such sacrificial ideas, though he frequently betrays their presence in his Christian traditions (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3; Gal. 1:4). Here he uses this traditional language to make a number of points that further his present argument.

The first is to emphasize God's own initiative in freely providing a solution to the problem described in the preceding chapters. The undeserved quality of this deliverance as a "free gift," prompted by God's own graciousness ("his grace" is not the gift itself but the generosity that produces it), will be developed further in Rom. 5:1-11. Here Paul calls it "redemption," using a figure of speech for salvation that still has some of the financial overtones of its everyday sense (cf. 1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23; →Redemption). But the emphasis is on its releasing effect. There is no suggestion whatsoever of compulsion on God to pay a price to anyone other than himself. What God has undertaken, in the formula Paul quotes, is "expiation," a means for dealing with human sin, and not "propitiation," a means for meeting God's wrath by offering something to appease it. In all Paul's references to atonement, Christ was crucified "for us," never for God; always as a gift, never as punishment.

That leads to the second point. Paul does not play God's graciousness off against his righteousness. Instead, God's gift in the death of Jesus is itself a manifestation of God's righteousness apart from the Mosaic law. In clear continuity with the OT, especially the Psalms and Second Isaiah (Isa. 40-55), the righteousness of God is in the first place his saving action in coming to the aid of his people, his "deliverance" (e.g., Isa. 46:13; Pss. 31:1; 143:1). But vv. 25b-26, resuming a note struck in 3:3-4, show that Paul understands righteousness to refer also to a quality of integrity and consistency on God's part. God cannot go back on himself; his faithfulness to his own covenant commitments means that the working of his wrath, which abandons human beings to the consequences of their actions (and which Paul never equates with his righteousness), cannot be the last word. Even patience and forbearance cannot, for by themselves they would mean God's capitulation in the end to the disorder and distortion in his creation. Justification cannot mean simply acceptance and amnesty, though it includes these. God's claim over his own creation must finally be demonstrated by renewing its right relation to him and in this way restoring to it its own integrity and order. What justification, as this bestowal of a new righteousness and obedience, means for human beings will be discussed in Rom. 6:1-7:6. But in the meantime what is demonstrated in Christ's death is God's own integrity precisely in his acting to restore integrity to every person whose righteousness comes by faith in Jesus.

That faith is the third point. Four times in this paragraph Paul has inserted references to faith or believing (twice in v. 22; vv. 25, 26). Just what faith is like will become clear from the example of Abraham in chap. 4. But if a true relationship to God cannot be brought about by human action, faith cannot mean some prerequisite condition to be fulfilled by human beings before God can act. It is not human performance at all (4:4-5). It describes, in deliberate contrast to the law, the terms on which God's rectifying action is taken. These terms are that Jew and non-Jew alike trust God, i.e., rely completely for the renewal of life on his act in Christ, just as Paul has staked his own life on the gospel (1:16). Only these terms put all human beings on the same footing before God.

3:27-31, Jew and Gentile Before an Impartially Justifying God. This section presses the previous point about faith in two ways. First, God's generous provision of a way out of the human predicament absolutely precludes the "boasting" that was detailed at some length in chap. 2, that vaunting of the advantage or position of one group over against another that evades accountability to God, violates his impartiality, and denies the dependence of all on him for life. In explaining why this is so, Paul repeats in positive form (v. 28) the motto that was stated negatively in 3:20. The Mosaic law, by requiring certain behavior, appears to encourage "boasting" by suggesting that such behavior does not depend on a right relationship to God but can create it in the first place. Over against this Paul sets "the law of faith" (v. 27c), an expression without parallel in his Letters but similar to "the law of the spirit of life" in 8:2 and "the law of Christ" in Gal. 6:2. Contrary to appearance, the Mosaic law presumes complete trust in God and reliance on his prior salvation, and so does preclude this "boasting." In both Hebrew and Greek, one word for "faith" denotes both God's trustworthiness and reliability and the trust and reliance on him that is the appropriate human counterpart made possible by God's own faithfulness. This kind of trust is not a prerequisite for a healthy relationship to God; it is that right relationship. That is why faith is almost always mentioned when Paul writes about justification.

Second, v. 29 makes clear that behind these opposite and incompatible aspects or effects of law, one producing "boasting" and the other excluding it in favor of trust, is the fundamental issue of God himself. Every human claim to special position or advantage before God denies that all stand on an equal footing in relation to him. By making God the patron of this or that constituency, it carries with it the implicit denial that God is the God of all human beings. But that, Paul points out, contradicts the central watchword of Judaism that God is one (Deut. 6:4; → Shema). This creed requires one to embrace instead Paul's central claim that Jew and non-Jew alike are rightly related to God on the same terms. It is striking that in repeating that claim, while he denies any difference in standing, Paul still carefully refuses to obliterate the distinction itself between Jew and Gentile. Nor, he adds, does his argument signal a dismissal of the Mosaic law. Instead, "we confirm the law." Only the later stages of Paul's argument can fill out what he means by that.

4:1-25, Abraham: The Paradigm of Justification and of Faith. At one level Paul understands his gospel to "confirm" the law (3:31) by the general congruity with the OT that he now proceeds to demonstrate with the example of Abraham. But this is a very loose sort of confirmation, requiring Paul to return to the specific issue of law later. Actually the appeal he now makes to the OT confirms his gospel, and therein lies its significance. The credibility of his own position is at stake. Since he had contended that this new demonstration of God's righteousness apart from the law was attested already in "the law and the prophets" (3:21), a whole range of claims made in 3:21-30 has to be made good with scriptural arguments if they are to stand. One of the most important premises shared by the early Christian communities with their Jewish antecedents was that Scripture provides reliable access to God's truth. Paul would really have to abandon his gospel if such verification were not available. The appeal to Scripture is thus a form of appeal to God himself to substantiate his message. Paul can claim a hearing from an unknown congregation only because he stands himself under the authorization that Scripture provides (cf. commentary above on 1:1-7), and this explains why OT quotations form such a conspicuous part of Romans. The methods by which Paul constructs these arguments are of course those of first-century Judaism; its study and use of Scripture is on the one hand itself a tradition in which he stands and from which he draws. On the other hand, his recourse to Scripture, exactly like every use of tradition throughout human history, is a selective process in which his own priorities and perspectives become evident. By appealing, one might say, over the head of Moses, the lawgiver, to Abraham, the recipient of the promise, Paul signals his own understanding of what is pivotal in his own Jewish tradition and reclaims it to authenticate his gospel for his readers. Even this appeal to Abraham is selective. The traditions about the patriarch appear to have been extraordinarily varied in Paul's time. Abraham was a heroic figure whose story could be used to support a variety of ends. This can be seen within the NT itself. In James 2:21-24, the same verse Paul cites (Gen. 15:6) is quoted, but because it is read in the light of Abraham's offering of his son Isaac (Gen. 22:2, 9), the conclusion drawn from it is exactly contrary to Paul's. So it might seem that Paul's appeal to Scripture is circular in nature, drawing out of it only what his gospel has already determined he will find in it. But that suspicion attaches to any use of the past. The integrity of the appeal can be ascertained only by examining its inner logic in each particular instance.

In chap. 4, this invoking of Abraham proceeds in several clearly recognizable steps. In the first (vv. 2-8), Abraham, whose status in the collective memory as a paragon of rectitude is beyond question, confirms what Paul has just written in 3:27-28: boasting is precluded if a right relationship to God is determined by faith. Verses 4-5 state the mutually exclusive alternatives that shape the argument: justification is either earned or it is a matter of grace; it rests either on achievement or on trust in a God who justifies the ungodly. The place of "grace" in the contrast of v. 4 is taken by "trust" in that of v. 5. And the text of Gen. 15:6 clearly states that it was Abraham's believing God that God "regarded" as righteousness. Even Abraham was dependent on a God who "justifies the ungodly," who does not merely confirm the virtues of good people but takes the initiative in restoring a world that cannot save itself. Is that so clear if Abraham was such an exemplary figure? Was Abraham ungodly? To close that loophole, Paul applies two well-established procedures of early rabbinic exegesis, adducing a second text that repeats some wording of the first, and supporting a text from the law (the Pentateuch) with another from the prophets or the Psalms. Here it is the traditional penitential Ps. 32:1-2a that fills the breach, for it shows that "reckoning righteousness" is the equivalent of "not reckoning sin," i.e., forgiveness. Abraham, the model of religious probity, was as dependent on God's gracious initiative as David, the paradigmatic repentant sinner (assumed to be the author of that psalm). This yoking of Psalm 32 with the Genesis text intercepts such a use of the latter as is made in James 2. So the precedent of Abraham confirms that God's justifying proceeds on the basis of trust in his undeserved graciousness and leaves no room for "boasting."

The second step (vv. 9-12) rests on chronological sequence: God's consideration of Abraham's faith as righteousness precedes his covenant with Abraham and Abraham's circumcision (Gen. 17:1-27). The outward marks of Abraham the prototype Jew are therefore secondary to the faith that makes him a "true Jew" (cf. 2:28-29). Another side of Abraham, his role as ancestor, like the blessing of the Psalm just quoted, turns out to embrace all who believe without circumcision. Even in the relation of his physical descendants to him, the controlling factor in his patriarchal function is trust in God, theirs and his. So the precedent of Abraham also confirms that the terms of faith established by God for justification apart from the law mean that Jew and non-Jew stand on the same footing before an impartial God. In saying so, Paul again carefully avoids, this time only by tortured Greek syntax, a simple denial of the distinction between them (cf. 3:30).

In vv. 13-17 a third side of this powerfully symbolic figure Abraham emerges: he was the recipient of God's promise for the future. In Gen. 15:4-5 this promise was for an heir and descendants (Rom. 4:18); in Gen. 17:6-7 it was for many nations among these descendants (Rom. 4:17); by Paul's own time (Sir. 44:21) the tradition had expanded it into an end-time promise of inheriting the whole world (Rom. 4:13), a code word for all the benefits that the descendants of the patriarch might hope for. Paul's point now is that the transmission of this legacy is determined not by law but by "the righteousness of faith." This expression, used only here in Paul's Letters, directly echoes v. 11 in Greek: it is "the righteousness that was attributed to the faith [Abraham had] in the uncircumcised state" he was in when he believed. One might expect Paul to use a chronological argument again (Abraham preceded Moses), but his own reason in v. 14 is more forceful: "If the heirs are those whom the law defines as heirs, then faith is empty and this promise has been voided." The issue is not what human beings do at all, whether they adhere to the law or whether they believe (as a substitute achievement). What is at stake is the competence to determine who the heirs are. Clearly that capability does not belong to the law, whose effect is rather to evoke wrath by marking human conduct as transgression and so to disqualify people from the inheritance (v. 15; cf. 3:20, 31; 5:13, 20). (These accumulating side remarks about the law will require special treatment. See commentary below on 7:7-12.) The terms that do define the transmission are faith (God's trustworthiness and human reliance upon God) and promise, for that is the only way in which the legacy can remain a matter of God's undeserved graciousness and so be guaranteed to all the descendants of Abraham impartially in the inclusive patriarchal role that the promise itself assigned to him (Rom. 4:17a).

In these three ways Abraham confirms the gospel's description of God's justification of the unrighteous. He not only provides the illustrative example; he furnishes the determining precedent for the way in which God deals with human beings. God has not changed between Abraham and Christ. In Christ he has done what Abraham trusted him to do. So Abraham's precedent helps interpret what God has done in Christ. Verse 17 restores this focus on Abraham's God, who not only justifies the ungodly but also gives life to the dead and calls into being the things that are not. That places justification as a life-giving act in an all-embracing context. God is the creator of life at the world's beginning, the one who restores order and integrity to life in the world's dissolutions, the one who bestows eternal life at the world's end.

But what about faith? Having so far provided the paradigm for God's action in justification, Abraham now provides also the model for human believing (vv. 18-22). Faith is not some internal condition in contrast to external acts, nor intellectual assent to propositional truths. It is not anything Abraham "does" (vv. 4-5). Instead, it is his unwavering reliance in hope on God's promise to him. It is to live by another, by what God has done and will do. Verses 19-21 play on the words: instead of being "disabled" at the contemplation of his own and Sarah's bankruptcy of life, Abraham was "empowered" by his confidence in God's "power" to carry out what he had promised, and he gave glory to God.

Verses 23-25 supply the bottom line. Abandoning his descriptive third-person language, Paul for the first time since his opening address shifts to a first-person plural style that signals the confessional stance of the Christian community. Abraham's God, who gives life to the dead, is the God who "raised Jesus our Lord from the dead"; Abraham's justification lies in store for those who trust in this God. The text of Gen. 15:6, which has echoed throughout this chapter, was ultimately written for them. Paul ends by quoting another short two-part Christological formula (v. 25; cf. 1:3-4): "[Jesus], who was delivered over [to death] because of our trespasses and raised for our justification." By employing parallel passive verbs, for both of which God is the implied active agent, the formula unites Jesus' death and resurrection as inseparable parts of a single action by God, one addressed to the expiation and forgiveness of sin, the other to the renewal of life. That justification is the term for the latter brings this whole first part of Paul's argument to a fitting conclusion and prepares the way for the next chapters.

Distinctive Words and Themes in Romans 5-8

From the next section through chap. 8 an undeniable shift takes place, but it is important to note carefully what is altered and what is not. The change of style observed in 4:23-25 continues through chap. 8 except for a brief return to the more objective third person in the second section (5:12-21). Some dominant vocabulary changes. After the first two verses of chap. 5, "faith" and "to believe/trust" are scarcely used, whereas "death" and "life," "to die" and "to live" frequently appear. The "righteousness of God" is not mentioned again until 10:3. "Jew" and "Greek" disappear, along with mention of God's impartiality and faithfulness, until after chap. 8. Clearly there is a move away from the relationship of Christianity to Judaism and its traditions; only two brief quotations from the OT occur (7:7 and 8:36) and exegetical arguments like those of chaps. 3 and 4 drop out until chap. 9. Instead there is a greater focus upon the Christian community and its experience, except again for that block in 5:12-21.

New theological terms appear, such as "enmity" and "reconciliation," "slavery" and "freedom," "adoption" and "peace." God's love and the (Holy) Spirit enter the discussion for the first time (and together, 5:5). Yet all this does not mean that the treatment of the justification of the unrighteous has been abandoned. Indeed in some respects it has become more focused: the forensic language of indictment and acquittal becomes more specific than it has ever been so far (5:13-14, 18-19; 7:1-3; 8:1, 3, 31-34); in just these passages Paul provides his own most telling reformulations of justification. Furthermore, if "righteousness" is now no longer "the righteousness of God," its new referent is the quality of rectitude and integrity in human life that belongs with obedience to God; it has a new synonym in "consecration" (or "sanctification"), a term that establishes a link in Greek with the word "saints" Paul had used in his address for "Christians" (1:7; 6:19, 22; cf. 1 Cor. 1:30; → Sanctification).

Law and sin continue to receive detailed attention, especially their relation to each other (5:20-21; 7:1-25). But above all, chaps. 5-8 (5:12-21 is now not an exception) continue the connection made in 3:25 to the death of Jesus and elaborate, first from one side and then another, Paul's understanding of its meaning and consequences for all human beings as well as for baptized Christians. The clue provided in 4:25 turns out to be the right one to follow: the "justification of the unrighteous" means for Paul not only forgiveness and acquittal but God's gift in Jesus Christ of a reordered life and hope as well. It is the burden of chaps. 5-8 to set forth this side of Paul's gospel, without any fundamental change of subject.

5:1-11, Justification Interpreted as Reconciliation: The Death of Jesus Christ as the Basis of Confidence and Hope. In this section readers encounter a variety of new ideas for the first time in Romans; the task is to ascertain their relationship to each other and to what has preceded. Paul begins by saying that justification results in peace in one's relationship to God. Verses 8 and 10 show that peace here is the removal of enmity toward God by the reconciliation effected in Jesus' death. It is not God who is reconciled but human beings, because the enmity is not God's; it is human opposition and resistance to God (Rom. 8:7-8; → Reconciliation). The removal of this barrier opens up access to "this grace" (v. 2), which is not a human condition but the undeserved graciousness on God's part that has been a key element in Paul's earlier argument (3:24; 4:4, 16). It may be "the sphere of God's grace, where we now stand" (NEB), for Paul later declares that his readers are "under grace" (6:14). In the present context, however, it seems to be that graciousness by which men and women are sustained through the trials of life, for to hold firm or fast under stress is the usual meaning of the everyday word "to stand" in Paul's Letters. But the most significant connection with the earlier chapters is concealed in many English translations, perhaps unavoidably. Both at the beginning of this section and at the end, Paul speaks of "rejoicing" (ASV, RSV, TEV), "glorying" (KJV), or "exulting" (NEB). The Greek root is the same one translated up to this point in the Letter as "boasting" (2:17, 23; 3:27; 4:2), for Paul has been describing that self-protective, unrepentant, and presumptuous confidence in God that is a recurring trait of religious people but that is irreconcilable with trust. Against that illegitimate confidence, Paul now sets a legitimate sort of "joyful trust in God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (v. 11, JB). What makes possible the change from one to the other is God's undeserved justification of the unrighteous in Jesus' death because it eliminates the need for that instinctive self-defensiveness before God that Paul calls "enmity." Verses 3 and 4 contain a rhetorical sequence (cf. 8:29-30; 10:14) that draws attention to this life as one of suffering, testing, and patient perseverance. The point is that this legitimate confidence provides staying power through the afflictions of life because it enables those who enjoy it to be "looking forward to God's glory" (JB). And this hope does not "put to shame," it does not in the end expose those who entertain it to the embarrassment of having followed a false hope (cf. Paul's own statement in 1:16). Why not? Because God has already demonstrated his love for human beings in Jesus' death (v. 8). In the meantime, Paul declares that God's love has been "poured out" in human hearts (v. 5), a striking statement found nowhere else in the Bible. Once (Sir. 18:11) it is God's mercy that is poured out; frequently it is his wrath; but the conventional language is that God pours out his Spirit (cf. the narrative of Pentecost, Acts 2:17, citing Joel 2:28). Since v. 8 makes clear that "love of God" here means God's love for human beings, not their love for God, Paul is equating the sustaining assurance of God's demonstration of his love in the death of Jesus with the life-giving power of the Spirit, which is God's own recreating presence with human beings in the world in spite of its afflictions and threats.

Just how the death of Jesus provides such supportive assurance for the future is spelled out in two steps in the second half of this section (vv. 6-10). First, Paul contrasts the death of Jesus with the rare but not impossible heroic death of an individual on behalf of another righteous person or in the name of "the good," some commanding cause like that perhaps of the Jewish martyrs in the Hasmonean revolt, an event that shaped the consciousness of many Jews under Roman rule in Paul's time. Jesus' death is totally different. Its force as a sustaining demonstration of God's love stems from its having occurred at just such a time as conventional religion would least expect it of God, on behalf of those who in no way deserve it—in short, from its being an act of Abraham's God who "justifies the ungodly" (4:5). Second, by using a standard rabbinic method of inferring a more comprehensive conclusion that is implied in what has already been stated, Paul argues that this given present reality of justification and reconciliation in the death of God's Son makes further salvation by his life "much more certain." So justification is the granting of life in an uncertain world by extending hope and certainty, the certain hope of sharing in the life of Christ for all those who have shared in his death by receiving its benefits of reconciliation.

By filling out in this way the import of Jesus' death for human life, Paul has anticipated dominant themes of chap. 8: present affliction and future hope, enmity and peace, the sustaining power of God's love and of the presence of the Spirit. These are all treated more fully in that climax to his presentation of the justification of the unrighteous. Thus the beginning of chap. 5 and the end of chap. 8 form a bracket marking these chapters as a major whole, distinct in content as well as style (see "Distinctive Words and Themes in Romans 5-8" preceding the commentary above on 5:1-11). The interpreter needs to ask how each subsequent section advances Paul's thought.

5:12-21, Justification Interpreted as Acquittal and Life: The Universal Reign of Grace in Place of the Universal Reign of Sin. Paul himself provides the best summary of this section in an earlier Letter: "For just as in Adam all die, so also in Christ all shall be made alive" (1 Cor. 15:22). A parallelism is drawn between Adam, the biblical progenitor of the human race (Gen. 1:1-2:46; → Adam; Human Being), and Christ. Each is the first of many. Each is also a single individual who represents all others and whose actions determine and affect all others. (Throughout these verses, "the many" and "all people" are simply interchangeable expressions, according to a well-established Semitic and biblical usage; cf., e.g., Isa. 53:6, 12c.) Thus each is perceived as a universal and all-inclusive figure, not only a predecessor but a prototype of all humanity. Yet these two act and affect others in exactly opposite ways so that they are symbolic of antithetical powers and realities of worldwide scope: disobedience and obedience, condemnation and acquittal, sin and righteousness, death and life. All of history is embraced in the cosmic conflict between these powers, a major sign of Paul's indebtedness to the apocalyptic tradition in Judaism (→ Apocalyptic Literature).

The section falls naturally into three parts. The first is vv. 12-14. A full and balanced statement of the analogy between Adam and Christ is not reached until vv. 18-19. But Paul begins to set out the correlation on its negative side in v. 12. Without speculating on the origin of sin and evil, he simply takes for granted the biblical depiction of the original disobedience of Adam and Eve in Gen. 3 (→ Fall, The), with its correlate that death is the consequence of sin (Gen. 2:17; 3:19), in order to affirm the universal penetration of sin and death through Adam to the whole human race. Because the Vulgate (Vg.) Latin translation of v. 12c could be understood as "one man [Adam] ... in whom all sinned," the verse has served for centuries as the main Pauline proof-text for the notion of genetically transmitted sin, but a more natural translation is, "because all sinned." This results in an apparent contradiction, but the verse summarizes a characteristic understanding in Judaism of sin as at once guilt and fate, both an individual responsibility and a destiny that overpowers each person (as in Paul's discussion of God's wrath in 1:18-32; cf. Wisd. of Sol. 1:13; 2:23; Sir. 25:24; 2 Apoc. Bar. 54:15; → Sin). It is to this second aspect that Paul turns first. In the period between Adam and Moses, "in the absence of law," sin was "not counted," i.e., each individual was not held responsible for sin. Nonetheless everyone died, showing clearly the fateful reign of death over all as a result of Adam's action, even over those who had not committed the same kind of explicit transgression of a command as Adam's. In thus determining the fate of others, Adam prefigured Christ. In so distinguishing the period prior to Moses, Paul already has in mind what he refers to later (v. 20) as the "intrusion" of the law.

Verses 15-17 form the second part of the section. Having just touched on the similarity that coordinates the two figures, Paul in these verses underlines the differences between the two sides of the typology. The correlation is decidedly unbalanced, both quantitatively and qualitatively. Death proceeded from a single act, but the gift of life began with a multitude of trespasses. There is a lavish profuseness, an "abounding" surplus on the side of God's gift that explicitly recalls the "much more" of 5:9-10. Paul's vocabulary clearly indicates that he now has in view the situation after Moses, created by the coming of the law. On the one side, trespass, judgment, condemnation, and death emphasize in juridical language the deserved guilt and responsibility of every sinner. On the other side, the language of free gift, grace, extravagant generosity, and life emphasizes the displacement of what is due to all sinners by a totally undeserved gift in God's act of justification (mentioned in v. 16).

Verses 18-21 form the final part of the section. With these verses a difficult train of thought emerges into the clear. Over against the trespass of the one is set "the righteous act" or, better, "the justifying" (Tyndale's translation, 1535) of the other (v. 18). Opposite Adam's disobedience, by which all "were constituted sinners," there is Jesus Christ's obedience, by which all "shall be constituted righteous." The restatement of 1 Cor. 15:22 is complete, but it is cast now in the language of justification. Jesus' "obedience," mentioned for the first time in v. 19, is a new explanation for the way in which his whole life, but especially his death, saves others, namely by reversing the effect of Adam's disobedience. This is an independent, alternative interpretation of Jesus' death, alongside "expiation" (3:25), "God's love for us while we were still sinners" (5:8), and "reconciliation" (5:10), and should not be submerged into the notion of atonement. (This use of obedience to explain Jesus' death, and the life that preceded it, appears elsewhere in Paul's Letters only in Phil. 2:8; cf. Heb. 5:8. The idea, though not the word, is much more common in the Gospels, e.g., Matt. 3:15; Mark 14:36 and parallels; John 4:34; 6:38.)

In sum, apart from the law, sin and death (from Adam) and righteousness and life (from Christ) would be similar impersonal and inexorable destinies inflicted upon all people by virtue of the solidarity of all, first with Adam and then with Christ. But Paul returns (v. 20) to that watershed, the "intrusion" of the Mosaic law between Adam and Christ (vv. 13-14). The law adds to trespass the "sting" of condemnation (1 Cor. 15:56; Rom. 4:15). Now that sin is "counted" (v. 13), magnified and deepened by the addition of guilt, death is more than a neutral destiny; it is deserved by all. But by the very same token, now that sin is counted against everyone, life has become something more than a neutral destiny; it is the free and undeserved gift of a gracious God. It has become the overflowing abundance of grace (v. 20). Verse 21 sums up what Paul has said about the law in a remarkable sentence: the purpose of God, served by its "intrusion" on the human scene, is that just as death has been the symptom of the reign of sin as a power over human lives, so righteousness (justification) might become the symptom of the new reign of grace. Just as the law turned the reign of death in Adam (v. 14) into the reign of sin, so that same law has turned the reign of life in Christ (v. 17) into the reign of grace.

It is not the purpose of this section to weigh determinism and free will, a problem that is simply not on Paul's horizon. Chap. 6 will show very clearly that he treats his Christian readers as responsible moral agents. The issue is the universal and pervasive tyranny of sin as a power, and Paul's gospel of an overwhelming liberating power of a grace that has replaced it (cf. 6:14). This section is still about the justification of the unrighteous. It does not just describe justification as the bestowal of life in place of death (5:1-12 does that in its own way). It does not merely portray the cosmic and universal scope of justification over against the universality of death (though it does also do that). It underlines the character of justification as an act of God's undeserved graciousness, elaborating the note struck first in 3:24 and then again in 4:4, 16; 5:2—and does this in such a way as to make the Mosaic law contribute to its grace character.

6:1-7:6, Justification as the Gift of a Reordered Life. Paul has just made the astonishing claim that one of God's purposes with the Mosaic law was to use its "increase" of sin's power over men and women to augment and reinforce grace. If that is so, one must necessarily ask the question of 6:1: "Are we to continue in sin in order that grace might increase?" Paul's imagined interlocutor has already raised this question as part of an objection pertaining to God's own moral integrity in 3:5-8. It now serves as the transition to another facet of justification. But one should pause for a moment to reflect on its significance. Rom. 3:8 shows its personal importance for Paul, as a charge leveled against him by opponents who presumably thought his teaching undermined the Jewish law and invited irresponsible license in human behavior (cf. Acts 21:21). But the theological importance of the question "Why not sin?" lies in the fact that it is inevitably and regularly raised whenever the claim is made, as here, that human perversity cannot decisively frustrate God's benevolent purpose. Such a claim has always seemed to deny the reality and seriousness of sin, as Rom. 3:5-7 exemplifies. Throughout Christian history, the universal scope that Paul has clearly attributed to grace by pitting it against the worldwide grip of sin and death in 5:12-21 has seemed to undermine everything he set forth in the early chapters about human accountability to God for moral behavior. Every radical message of grace stirs the ghost of libertinism to life. For just that reason, in Rom. 6:1-7:6 Paul does not simply turn aside from his main argument temporarily to put down a local objection. Rather, his answer forms another carefully constructed stage in his presentation of the justification of the unrighteous. Chap. 5 showed that righteousness, the rectitude and integrity restored to human life in its relation to God through the death of Jesus, is "a matter of grace" (4:16, my emphasis). It shows God's love for human beings while they are still sinners (5:8); it is an undeserved gift, manifesting the lavish profuseness of God's generosity (5:17, 20). But in the present section Paul turns the argument in the opposite direction, answering the question of 6:1 by showing that God's grace involves for its recipients a new righteousness, a reordering and integrity that preclude an undisturbed continuation of life's previous patterns.

This sudden reversal has seemed to many interpreters to suggest a shift of audience, as though Paul were turning from the Jewish Christian members of the Roman church to the gentile Christians, correcting first the presumed legalistic tendencies of the former and now the libertarian proclivities of the latter. Such a reading gains a certain plausibility from the clear evidence that Paul had previously encountered both of these perennial religious tendencies in the churches he had founded, the one most conspicuously in Galatia and the other in Corinth. But one should avoid projecting stereotypes from his earlier correspondence onto the reading of Romans. There is little support from Paul's argument up to this point for such a hypothetical division. On the contrary, the early emphasis on God's impartiality, the tight construction of his case, and its internal continuities suggest that in this Letter, just because of diverse reactions to his preaching, Paul is fashioning a theological position that will effectively counter both tendencies at the same time. His instrument for doing this is a broad and flexible doctrine of justification that includes both God's free and undeserved initiative in the face of all kinds of conditions that legalism tries to set, and the restoration of integrity to human lives in the face of the moral chaos that libertinism breeds. The resulting exposition here in Romans has always resisted the artificial separation of justification and sanctification, of "forensic" and "sacramental" grace, of "imputed" and "infused" righteousness that the confessional debates of Christian history have produced and tended to impose on these chapters. It is just this separation that results in a corresponding literary isolation of chaps. 6-8 from chaps. 1-5, as though they were not written to the same audience. But this division should be resisted. If the formal instrument Paul uses is now the language of justification, the material heart of his theological position is his interpretation of the death and resurrection of Jesus. It was from this single vantage point that he had argued in both Galatia and Corinth. This remains the case here. As each stage in Romans, from 3:25 on, has involved recourse to the death and resurrection of Jesus as the decisive clue to God's nature and action, so this new section contains Paul's reflections on some hitherto unmentioned facets of the meaning of that event.

There are three stages to the argument of 6:1-7:6, so clearly distinguished as to amount to three separate answers to the question "Why not continue in sin?" The connection with 5:12-21 remains close, for the answers Paul now gives employ the polarities of sin and grace, death and life, disobedience and obedience that were set up by contrasting Adam and Christ.

6:1-14, Through Death to Life. The first answer to the question is that justification is a new life of righteousness because it is a death to sin. In 5:12-21, Christ was seen to be not an isolated individual but a figure who includes and represents others in such a way that he determines their circumstances and their lives; a solidarity or correspondence exists between them and him. Now Paul develops that idea. He takes it for granted that all his readers have been baptized, and that they understand this baptism to have been a baptism "into Christ's death." He does not here say that baptism created that solidarity (though it is possible to read Gal. 3:27 and 1 Cor. 12:13 as saying so), but as a "burial with Christ" (v. 4) it presupposes such solidarity and shows that it is now a solidarity in death. For his readers too a death has taken place that is irrevocable and involves the ending of each person's whole past way of life (v. 6). This is what precludes "continuing in sin."

This argument deserves a brief closer look. Paul's assumption that his readers will recognize the reference to baptism is an important indication that pre-Pauline development in Christian teaching about baptism revolved around the meaning of Jesus' death and included some kind of transfer of the benefits of that death to the baptized convert (→ Baptism). Second, the argument rests on a very basic understanding Paul has of Jesus Christ as a representative figure, a rich idea capable of being nuanced in a variety of ways quite apart from baptism. In the discussion of Adam and Christ, it is apocalyptic and universal in its symbolic scope, embracing primeval beginnings and end time, the "first" and the "last Adam" (cf. 1 Cor. 15:45). But there is also a cultic and sacrificial representation, in which Jesus died "for" others (Rom. 3:24-25; 5:6, 8, and many other passages). And there is the more legal and political kind of representation, in which one person's actions commit and oblige others, as when someone has power of attorney for another. These are all intimately connected in Paul's Christology, as one can see in one of his clearest formulations of the idea of representation, 2 Cor. 5:14-15 ("... one has died on behalf of all; therefore all have died"). What happens to Christ happens to all those who are "in him." The phrase "in Christ Jesus" that runs through Paul's Letters (occurring in our section at 6:11 and 23, the two major dividing points) rests on this base perception, not on "mystical" ideas that have been anachronistically attributed to him.

Paul now refines this conception of Jesus Christ as a representative figure by drawing on the temporal sequence of Jesus' death and resurrection, as recounted in early liturgical summaries (beside Rom. 4:25, cf. 1 Cor. 15:3-4; 1 Thess. 4:14; Phil. 2:8-9; 2 Cor. 5:15; Rom. 8:34a). The adding of this new ingredient leads to various statements in Paul's theology about dying and rising, or suffering and living, "with Christ" (e.g., 1 Thess. 4:14; Gal. 2:19-20; Phil. 3:10-11, 21; 2 Cor. 4:10-11; 7:3; 13:4). In the present context this establishes a connection between the Christian's past and future: "For if we have been united with him in a death like his, we shall certainly be united with him in a resurrection like his" (v. 5, RSV). The solidarity that already exists between Christ and the individual in death must be followed by a solidarity in life as well. Since the latter still lies in the future, this solidarity has become a shared destiny. Verse 8 repeats this result as a flat indicative assertion about the future resurrection (like 1 Cor. 15:22). But significantly, here in v. 4 this future indicative is deflected into a statement of God's purpose for men and women in the present: "the reason why we were buried with him through this 'baptism into death' is that, just as Christ was raised from the dead through the Father's glory, we also might [now] live a new life." What shall be, already ought to be; hope and ethical obligation are simply two sides of the same future given to each individual in Christ. Verse 11 draws the bottom line: "So you also should consider yourselves to be dead to sin and alive to God in Christ Jesus." That is why one should not "continue in sin."

Verses 12-14 press this conclusion home with general exhortations that return to the terms with which chap. 5 had ended: the reign of sin and the reign of grace as two contrary authority structures. One has displaced the other, and the Christian's allegiances are to be shaped accordingly. What is remarkable about these verses is the view of the human self implicit in the injunctions. "Mortal bodies" (v. 12), "members," and "selves" (v. 13) are interchangeable terms. Bodily existence, even though still subject to death, is an aspect of the self that one has at one's disposal, as an "implement" (v. 13) to be put in the service of a transcending allegiance (cf. 1 Cor. 6:15). The self is not an end to itself; its end has been given to it in Christ.

6:15-23, Through Slavery to Freedom. The second answer to the question "Why not sin?" is that justification is a new life of righteousness because it is a being set free from the power of sin, but paradoxically it can have that quality only insofar as it is also a being brought into servitude to righteousness. Whereas the first answer was cast in terms of life and death, the categories now shift to freedom and bondage. But the most striking feature of this second answer is that it exists at all. Once one accepts Paul's premise, the destiny-creating role of Jesus as the Christ, the logic of his first reply would seem to be impregnable. Why then does he have to repeat the question once again in v. 15 and mount a second answer in these new terms? Verse 16 provides the clue by clarifying the issue of allegiance Paul raised in vv. 12-14. He does not think of human beings as autonomous creatures, or of freedom as a condition devoid of all commitment or obligation beyond oneself. No person can serve two masters, to be sure; but Paul presupposes that everyone has some "master," some controlling allegiance. The question is not whether life has such a point of orientation but which one it is, and what the outcome or goal is to which it ultimately leads. He sees the self faced with two basic alternatives, either to live in the service of sin as a power, the end result being death, or to live in service of righteousness, the end result being life. By v. 22 it is clear that the latter is a life lived for God. But at the beginning, in v. 16, he seems to put it rather clumsily when he speaks of obedience "to obedience" as the opposite of obedience "to sin"; this awkwardness only shows that in the back of his mind is the contrast between obedience and the lack of commitment altogether, the total absence of a sense of obligation that lies behind the question "Why not sin?" Verse 16 shows why the language of slavery is appropriate, for here again (cf. 5:12) Paul balances the fatefulness of human life with its freedom. People make choices, but these have lasting consequences from which one cannot escape. And in moral decisions, the constraints within which one has to live have many of their roots in fateful choices one has already freely made. So slavery to sin was a kind of "freedom with respect to righteousness" (v. 20) and freedom from sin is to be found only in a "slavery" to righteousness and to God. Paul seems to be fully aware of the scandalous incongruity of calling redemption and justification "slavery" (v. 19), but he retains the language nonetheless. Freedom, by itself, is not the answer to human existence; it is ambivalent, and its profounder dimensions open up only when one asks "Freedom from what, and for what?" and "Slavery to what?" Then the issue turns to what is being served, what allegiance is operative in every "slavery" or "freedom." As for his Christian readers, their conversion and baptism is clearly for Paul a point at which a transfer of allegiance and obligation has taken place, not because they were free to make it but because it has been made for them by God. They have "been committed" (passive) to a new pattern of living, yet they have concurred in it themselves "from the heart" (v. 17)—the same combination of fatefulness and freedom as before, but now in a liberating direction that restores human integrity ("righteousness"). That is the second reason one should not "continue in sin" (→ Liberty). (It is instructive to compare Paul's understanding of fate and freedom with that of contemporary Stoicism; → Stoics.)

Why was the first answer, which drew upon Christian baptism to characterize the Christian life as an irrevocable death to a past way of life, inadequate? It is hard not to conclude that the explanation lies in Paul's own experience in Corinth, where his invitation to "consider oneself dead to sin and alive to God in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 6:11) had simply incited a libertarian absolutizing of freedom (→ Corinthians, The First Letter of Paul to the). A profounder exploration of human freedom and its ambivalences is required if the recipients are to remain accountable to the God who gave it and are to "honor God as God and give thanks to him" (Rom. 1:21). That is what made it necessary for Paul to add Rom. 6:12-21.

7:1-6, Through Acquittal to Commitment. This third section in Paul's answer to the question "Why not sin?" consists essentially of a legal detail that provides, when applied to the Christian life, an example and conclusion for both of the first two sections. The chosen example transcends parochial usage and applies as easily to Greek and Roman society as to Jewish (and to the twentieth century as easily as to the first). Considered by itself, the illustration (vv. 1-3) is one of the clearest definitions of justification in all of Paul's Letters, for it exemplifies the way in which a person is put into a completely altered situation by the death of someone else. The extent of the change is apparent from the fact that for a married woman exactly the same action (living with another man) brings in its train the damning epithet of an adulteress before her husband's death, but has no such effect after he dies. In the latter case, the marriage legislation is still in force; it has not been abrogated. Paul is very careful not to suggest that it has, saying rather curiously that "she has been vacated from the law" (v. 2b) rather than that the law has been voided. But the law's power to condemn her has been broken. Her deliverance from this power, simply by virtue of a death having occurred, is the point. All seems clear: the woman is the Christian set free by the death of Christ from the law's condemnation. But then the application in vv. 4-6 scrambles this neat analogy: the former husband is now the law, and it does not die; Christ, far from dying, has become the new husband to which the Christian is now free to belong; and the effect of the death is not only to end a period of captivity but to legitimate a new relationship of commitment and productive loyalty. This reconstruction of the analogy is not the product of confusion but stems directly from the movement of Paul's thought from 6:1 on, which it in turn exposes to clear view. The Christian life is not merely a liberation, but is like ending one marriage and beginning a new one. Like the sequence of cross and resurrection adduced at the beginning (6:5, 6, 8, 10), solidarity with Christ (in his "body," 7:4a) brings a past quality of life and service to an end and opens a new one for the future. Resuming the contrasting terms he had last used in 2:29 to distinguish the outward aspects of religion that are subject to manipulation and abuse from genuine religious integrity, Paul labels the old relationship "letter" and the new, "Spirit."

7:7-25, A Backward Look: The Power of Sin to Use the Law to Effect Death. In the course of Paul's presentation of justification, a great deal has been said about sin. Paul has always used the singular of the noun (except in 4:7, an OT quotation, and 7:5, where the plural functions as a modifier of "passions"). Almost personified, it has turned out to reign and have dominion (6:14). Death is the symptom of its rule (5:21), the daily ration it distributes to its subjects (6:23). Yet its power is curiously dependent on the Mosaic law, apart from which it lies dormant (7:8b, resuming 4:15b and 5:13b). Only the law confers upon the married woman's act of living with another man the result of condemnation (7:2-3). The law magnifies sin (5:20) and accords sin its power (cf. 1 Cor. 15:56). Indeed, so closely have the functions of sin and the law meshed in Paul's reflections that death to the law (7:4) is required if one is to escape the power of sin. What in chap. 6 was a "dying to sin" (v. 10) has been replaced in the marriage illustration by "dying to the law" (7:4, 6). Correspondingly, what 6:18 referred to as "being set free from sin" has turned in 7:6 to "being exempted, vacated, from the law." It is hardly a surprise that the same logical necessity that produced the question of 6:1 now gives rise to 7:7: "what follows, then? That 'the Law is equivalent to sin'? Never!" (Moffatt's translation). When such questions have appeared earlier (in 3:1, 9, 27; 4:1, 9; and most notably in 6:1, 15), they have introduced clarifications and eliminated misunderstanding, but they have always advanced the discussion to new stages as well. That is the case here, but since the rest of chap. 7 clearly falls into two parts, each should be taken in turn.

Verses 7-12 form the first part. The inferential conjunction at the beginning of v. 12 shows that a first conclusion is being drawn to support the emphatic denial of v. 7. The Mosaic law is not the origin of sin; it is not to be confused with sin; it remains God's good and holy law. Yet law does in fact play a role in relation to sin: it identifies sin and makes it known. (Verse 7b explicitly resumes the point Paul had made in 3:20b, after affirming that the law impartially silences every attempt to evade indictment.) What law supplies, however, is not merely cerebral information about sin, nor does it bestow psychological enticement on evil by the mere act of forbidding it. As the experience of the Decalogue's prohibition of inordinate desire shows (in selecting just this one of the Ten Commandments, Paul may also have the story of the Fall in mind; cf. Gen. 3:6), it produces the very thing it is supposed to prevent. Just therein lies the exoneration of God's law; it has been captured and used by sin. The most striking feature of these verses is that, even though a question concerning law is being addressed here at the outset, the real subject whose activity is recounted through the rest of chap. 7 is sin. This is the power whose sinister rule has provided the foil for the reign of grace and the justification of the unrighteous in one form or another from 5:12 on. Just as in 5:12-21, its operation is chronicled in terms of the opposites, death and life. Continuing in the vivid first person singular adopted in v. 7, Paul goes on: "in the absence of law" (v. 8b, a striking resumption of 5:13), sin was "dead," i.e., dormant, and he was alive. But when the law "came on the scene" (v. 9, an echo of 5:20), sin "sprang to life" (NEB) and Paul died (v. 10). The climax is reached in vv. 10b-11: "the very commandment that was supposed to lead to life turned out for me to lead to death; for sin, by taking advantage of me through that commandment, tricked me and by using it killed me."

The clear force of these words gives pause. The law held out the promise of life. Paul's phrasing here is carefully ambivalent. He does not say whether the arousing of such a hope was an intended function of the law in God's good purpose, frustrated by sin (as suggested by Rom. 2:13; 8:3a; and the quotations of Lev. 18:5 in Rom. 10:5 and Gal. 3:12); or whether it was a misunderstanding to expect life from it, a result of sin's deceitful use of the law (as seems required by Gal. 3:21b and Rom. 9:31-32; 10:2). The law, in scope and function, has many facets. In any case, the purpose of the law is not the first issue. It is enough that experience discovers that God's law in fact turns out to serve the strategies and ends of sin. Its result is not life but death, the symptom of sin's rule. There is not one syllable to suggest that this result is limited to those who have transgressed the law. Sin's deceit lies in its taking advantage of just those religious aspirations that make a person look to the law for life. By using the law precisely where it is honored and treasured and even obeyed, it destroys the integrity of a person's relation to God, corrodes trust and replaces it with a defensive posture no longer gratefully dependent on God nor unreservedly accountable to him.

Paul recounts this capture of the law and of the self by sin in the past tense and with the first-person singular "I." It is a mistake to read this as a personal autobiography and so to wring from it details of Paul's early life. Rom. 3:7; 1 Cor. 6:15; 10:29-30; 13:1-3, 11; 14:11, 14, 15; and especially Gal. 2:18-21 and 6:14 amply exhibit his penchant for casting his analyses of fundamental religious experience into the exemplary "I" of the born teacher. The past tenses depict the "history" of sin on the same epic scale as in 5:12-14, 18-21. But the settings of Gal. 2:18-21 and Phil. 3:8-14 in the manifestly autobiographical contexts that precede these passages show that it would be equally mistaken to abstract Paul's description of sin from his personal discovery of its power to pervert devout allegiance to the Mosaic law. One can as little do that here as one can sanitize his perception of Jewish religious self-awareness in 2:17-29 from his own profound personal participation in it.

Verses 13-25 form the second part of the remainder of chap. 7. As 6:15 repeated the question of 6:1 in order to advance the train of thought to another level, so 7:13 renews the question of 7:7 and repeats the emphatic assertion that it was sin that was responsible for bringing about death. But there is a difference. "The law" has been replaced by "the good." While this certainly has to do with God's law, the goodness of which Paul has just upheld, the reference now is to the good that the law held out "to me" in its promise of life (as in 7:10), thus preparing for the following verses. In addition, two parallel purpose clauses now make clear that even in sin's use of it, the law remains God's instrument. The end result fits into God's purpose for the law, namely to disclose the true nature of sin and show how "incomparably sinful" it really is. Continuing his intimately illustrative use of "I," but shifting to the present tense to emphasize its recurring pattern, Paul turns to analyze more carefully the experience in which the religious self encounters this power of sin.

Paul shifts from the contrasting words "life" and "death" he used in vv. 7-12 to a closely related but quite different pair, "good" and "evil." (The same sort of shift occurs between the two stages of his argument in chap. 6.) This pair, in turn, is joined to contrasting verbs, and these contrasts carry the argument. This is clear in vv. 18-19: "For I know that the good does not dwell in me, that is in my flesh. For to will the good is within my reach, but to produce it, to carry it out, is not. For what I do is not the good that I intend [desire, and prefer]; instead, what I actually accomplish is the very thing I do not intend [do not want, and wish to avoid]." Good and evil in this context are not abstract moral labels. They develop v. 13, where "that which is the good" is closely allied with the life promised "to me" by the law. The attraction of the law is that it seems to lead to the life that the religious person wants and desires above all else, the more so if it is God's holy, just, and good commandment. (In 12:2, Paul will equate "the good" with the will of God.) Paul is here touching on the deepest nerve of the Jew's allegiance to the Mosaic law. This is why the person who lives by the law, and not just under it, "delights" in God's law (v. 22, a clear echo of the psalmist's praise of the law; cf. Ps. 1:2). Of course this is "moral" in a profound sense, for in religion at its best, represented for Paul by Judaism, the desire to attain life and the desire to do the good that God commands are fully joined. This willing and desiring are the more pressing the more one realizes that the good that amounts to life does not dwell within the native resources of the self taken on its own ("my flesh," v. 18).

But now, Paul goes on, this self that wants life and wills the good makes an astonishing discovery. What it does, creates, produces, and brings into being (the changes are rung on three overlapping Greek verbs) by its actions is not the intended good but exactly what it thought it could avoid by the law (exactly like the Decalogue's prohibition in vv. 7-8). The early chapters of Romans make clear enough what this means: the loss of inner integrity and of trusting reliance on God, the resulting claim to special standing that exempts one from accountability, the denial that all stand on the same footing before the same God, leads every religious person to abuse God's goodness and end up blaspheming his name. Verse 15 now gets its full force: "I don't understand the results of my own action!" One is compelled to paraphrase: "I know the law is good; the trouble cannot lie there. Indeed, it can't be I that am acting any longer; another power resides in me to which I am sold as a slave" (vv. 14, 17). To go a step further: "as a person wishing to do the good, I discover that God's own law, used by sin, has become a qualitatively different law, contrary to the one I adhere to in my sincere intentions. It has taken over my members, those aspects of myself by which my service and allegiance are implemented and which should be at the disposal of my own will (cf. Rom. 6:12-13), and put them at the disposal of sin. The result is that I am a prisoner of war; when I want to do the good, evil is what comes out" (vv. 21-23). "Thank God that because of Jesus Christ our Lord this demonic power is not ultimate" (v. 25a).

This passage has been a battleground for debate almost since it was written. That is because it seems to lend itself to a wide variety of applications. What is needed is to take it on its own terms as far as possible, in its literary context in Romans, and in its religious and historical context in Paul's world. It is frequently understood as describing the common frustration produced by the discrepancy between ideal intentions and actual human performance, or between reason and desire (formulated, for example, in Ovid's Metamorphoses 7, 18-21). This reading assigns the performance to the "flesh" as a lower self and the good intentions to an inner nature untouched by sin and results in a dualistic conflict between passion and reason in the understanding of the self that is foreign to Paul. Such dualism is suggested by v. 25b, which is Paul's terse summary; but it is refuted by his analysis, in which the "inmost self" and "flesh" are not different selves at different levels but two aspects of the one person who is "sold under sin," his sincere desire and his helpless vulnerability. What v. 15 describes is not the failure to produce results but the same bewilderment over the actual results of one's action that Paul spoke of in v. 10. Again, the experience that is detailed in this whole passage 7:7-25 is not the despair felt by a Martin Luther over his inability to live up to a demanding code; Phil. 3:4-7 shows conclusively how different Paul's self-perception is. Nor is it the exposure felt by an Augustine at the discovery that he had oriented his life's striving around an attractive but inferior surrogate for God's highest good. It is the much more shocking encounter with sin's power to use genuine devotion to the true God, channeled through adherence to God's own law, to bring about exactly the opposite of what one has hoped for: a perverted relationship to God in place of an authentic one, evil in place of the good, death in place of life. That yields a far more sinister perception of evil operating at the very center of religious life to debase it and turn it into slavery. It is this slavery from which Paul gratefully acknowledges having been set free by Christ. Rom. 7:7-25 is a backward look at "the old life of the letter" (7:6).

Finally, debate has raged over whether Paul is describing his experience as a Jew or as a Christian. That is the wrong question. There is for Paul one God of all human beings (3:29-30), and one authentic relationship to him for all, the trust exemplified by Abraham (chap. 4). All serious religious devotion is subject to being taken captive by sin and subverted into distrust and defiance of God. Of course one cannot abstract Paul's experience of that distortion from his experience with the Mosaic law. But he makes no suggestion that sin respects any boundary between Judaism and Christianity or any other religion, and his other Letters show that he knew quite well that the best intentions of Christians are subject to the same falsification. Throughout all his Letters, his gospel is that God has taken the initiative in his Son to break that power and set things right—for Jew and non-Jew alike. God's justification in Christ of the undeserving is what confers integrity on human religion.

8:1-17, A Forward Look: The Power of the Spirit to Effect Life for Righteousness.

To move to the other side of the contrast of 7:6, Paul first restates the change effected "in Christ Jesus" (for the meaning of this phrase, see commentary above on 6:1-14). There is "no condemnation"; the power of the law to condemn has been decisively broken (the resumption of 5:16 and 7:3 is unmistakable). "The law of sin and death" (v. 2) is a shorthand summary of 7:7-25; it is the Mosaic law used by sin in such a way as to cause death. The parallel phrase, "the law of the Spirit of life," is clearly intended as a rhetorical counterpart and suggests that life is the result when the same law is used by God's Spirit, his life-giving presence and power, instead of by sin. Like the expression "law of faith" in 3:27, it joins what Paul often sets in tension; only the context can supply its meaning. But that context is clear enough. The law itself is not demonic; to link law with Spirit instead of sin is the logical sequel to the argument of chap. 6 that freedom in Christ is aimed at the reshaping of human life, both individual and corporate, according to the good that God wills for it. Verses 3-4 supply the grounding for this new connection by declaring that this was the whole purpose behind God's "sending of his own Son." This reference to Jesus is cast in formal language closely paralleling Gal. 4:4-5. It emphasizes first the complete entry of God's Son into the human condition. Paul is not worried about the "sinlessness" of Jesus, Heb. 4:15, because he conceives of sin as a power, not as defilement or guilt. Without fully entering the domain of that power, "flesh," the Son could not have broken it. The fundamental contrast in the whole passage is between the inability and weakness on the one hand of the law to renew and reorder life so long as sin is in control, and the effectual life-giving power of God's own presence in the Spirit on the other. The outcome is to open the way for the fulfillment of God's holy and just commandment. Only on these terms can Paul come back to the starting point of his Letter, an impartial God whose righteousness is to be vindicated and acknowledged (3:4) if the relationship of creature to creator is to have integrity and God is to be "honored as God and given thanks" (1:21-25).

Verses 5-8 elaborate briefly on the contrast between "flesh" and "Spirit" as these affect human beings. Each is a reality transcending the individual, but each is also a "mind-set" that involves a deliberate choice of values and human effort toward a goal. (How Paul conceives of such a "mind-set" is most clearly illumined by Phil. 2:1-13 and the "Christ hymn," vv. 6-11, cited there as its source and norm.)

Above all, each is most basically a relationship to God. The one, flesh, is a regression to the deadly "enmity" and defiance that preceded reconciliation (cf. 5:10). The other, Spirit, is God's life-giving presence and power. It is renewing because it creates a new mind-set that is not inimical to God, that submits to God's law without the distrust that corrupts obedience into self-defensiveness, and that no longer allows God's law to be used as an instrument for holding one in its power.

If these definitions of flesh and Spirit suggest that human choices are the ultimate determinants of human destiny, vv. 9–11 quickly correct that impression by returning to God's primal life-bestowing act in the resurrection of Jesus (cf. 6:1–14). What is most striking about these verses is the free interchangeability of a whole series of phrases: "belonging to Christ" (v. 9b), "being in the Spirit" (v. 9a), "God's Spirit dwelling in you" (vv. 9a, 11b), "Christ's Spirit" (v. 9b), "Christ in you" (v. 10), and "the Spirit of the one who raised Jesus from the dead" (v. 11). Each interprets the others and is interpreted by them. God is the one who gives life to the dead (4:17); he has raised Jesus from the dead. The Spirit is not the possession of some elite group within the church. It is another word for God's life-giving power present through Jesus to all that belong to him, active already in their lives in spite of the mortality that still belongs to the body, working toward righteousness and undergirding the promise that the Son's identification with them will issue ultimately in their sharing in his resurrection (cf. 6:5, 8). The Spirit is not only a mind-set; nor is it merely the external power by which God raised Jesus from the dead. It is also the power of the risen Jesus to take men and women into his power and reshape life to make it well pleasing to God—thus doing what the law could not do and reversing the power of sin. That is why Paul could call the gospel "the power of God for salvation to all who rely on him, the Jew first and also the Greek" (1:16).

Verses 12–17 bring this unit to a close in two ways. First, Paul draws the consequences for his readers in a direct call for their response that reminds one of the challenge of the Deuteronomistic covenant: "See, I have set before you this day life and good, death and evil" (Deut. 30:15, RSV)—only here death and life are correlated to the conflicting claims of flesh and Spirit upon the self for its "deeds done in the body" (v. 13b; cf. 2 Cor. 5:10; → Body). But second, Paul reminds his readers that, as in Deuteronomy, such a call only follows a change of allegiance and direction already made for them. Obedience is not finally the work of the self but the result of the Spirit's leading. The Spirit produces an authentic filial relationship to God in place of slavery and verifies that gift by enabling people to address God with the intimate term "Father" (→ Adoption). The Aramaic word "Abba" suggests a liturgical acclamation of God in the mutually supportive and confirming worship of the gathered community and not simply the intimacy of private prayer. (This whole series of new terms occurs also in Gal. 4:6–7 and seems to have formed a single cluster in Paul's preaching.) It is noteworthy that the full-fledged opposite of slavery, "freedom," is reserved by Paul for future salvation (v. 21). In the meantime (v. 17), the legal image of an "heir," one whose entitlement is firmly established even though actual possession remains outstanding, offers a way to affirm the certainty of the new life in the Spirit despite its provisional and unseen aspects, and to link it to the still unrealized future consummation of God's deliverance (→ Inheritance). Both certainty and hope are based once again on that central element in Paul's gospel, the inclusion of all in the one destiny of Jesus Christ: "... if it is in fact true that we share his suffering in order to share also his glory" (v. 17).

8:18–30, Justification as the Gift of Hope in a Still Unredeemed World.

Paul now returns to the afflicted and precarious quality of life mentioned in 5:3–4. The credibility of his many intervening affirmations is threatened by the falsifying power of the actual experience of transiency and suffering, the footprints of death's continuing presence. Careful readers will have noted that Paul has never denied that presence, even in the last section (8:10a). Death is still "the last enemy" (1 Cor. 15:26). This is exactly why the death of Jesus remains so central to Paul's gospel. The indisputable reality of death in human life is also the most public feature of Jesus' life. His destiny-creating role as the Christ rests on his prior identification with the human condition (5:5, 8; 8:3; cf. Gal. 4:4–5). Only the irreversible sequence of Jesus' own crucifixion and resurrection clamps life to this death, discloses God to be "the one who gives life to the dead" (Rom. 4:17, 24), and enables Paul to speak of life as a final destiny. For human beings, Paul is always careful to say, the culmination of that destiny remains future (cf. 5:10, 17; 6:5, 8; 8:11). "It is in this hope that we have been saved" (8:24, the only place in Paul's undisputed Letters where he uses the verb "to save" in the past tense). This insistence on the futurity of salvation is undoubtedly a residue of Paul's past experiences with the excessive enthusiasm of Christian perfectionism, against which he repeatedly drew the cruciform shape of his own life as an apostle and as a model for authentic life in others (cf. esp. 1 Cor. 4:8–13; 2 Cor. 4:7–12; Phil. 3:12–16, 20–21). But here, as in so many other instances, a strategy in his churches became also an emphasis in his theology; the hard realism of this distinction between present and future reinforces the correspondence between Christ's life and those who are "in him," so that present affliction verifies the truth of the gospel instead of refuting it (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:26–2:5; 2 Cor. 4:7; 6:3–10; 11:23; 13:3–4; Gal. 5:11; 6:17; Phil. 1:14). In both 8:17 and 8:29, Paul returns to this basic pattern of Christ's life; in between, as he moves to a first climax of his Letter, this line of thought is elaborated in three progressive stages.

First, in vv. 19–22 the whole of creation is included in the same sequence. This is the only place in the NT where the natural world is singled out for attention, but the passage draws directly on the firm understanding of the affinity between human beings and God's total creation, of which they are a part, that runs through the OT and apocalyptic literature. (Its opposite, an essential incongruity between human beings and their world, appears in many forms of dualism in the Hellenistic world; →Gnosticism.) Frequently in Jewish writings God's end-time redemption includes the renewal of creation (e.g., Isa. 11:6–9; 65:17, 25; 66:22; 1 Enoch 91:16; Jub. 1:29); an extension of this idea traces the ills and woes of the nonhuman world to the defilement and curse of human sin (e.g., Isa. 24:1–6, 18–23; Jer. 4:19–26; Ezek. 32:6–8; with specific reference to Adam's transgression, 2 Esd. 7:11). The pangs of childbirth (Rom. 8:22) are conventional imagery for the cosmic woes accompanying God's judgment (Isa. 13:8; cf. 1 Thess. 5:3); the coming of the new age (1 Enoch 62:4) or the messiah (1QH 3:7–10); they are a fitting metaphor here for the universally shared pain that looks forward to new life (cf. John 16:21–22). Paul does not romanticize nature, nor does he treat it with contempt. The world's futility and "decay" (i.e., its vulnerability to the ravages of time), two of its most characteristic marks to Hellenistic thinking, are not the result of anything it has done; there is no "fall" of creation. Rather, they are part of the created order and fall under God's own "expectation that the creation itself will be set free" to share in the glorious liberty of God's children (Rom. 8:20–21), so bearing their own testimony to God's transcending future (→Eschatology; Regeneration).

Second, against any pious illusions about being "children of God," vv. 23–25 reassert that it is "not only creation but also the very ones who have the Spirit as a first fruits" (a harvest metaphor for the advance portion that serves as surety for what is to follow) who participate in this urgent longing. The gift of the Spirit is not a partial resurrection, or a certificate of exemption from the world's sufferings. As surety, it confirms the gap between present and future, but at the same time sustains the expectation and turns it into a certain hope. (As v. 24 demonstrates, "hope" in Paul's Letters means both the act of expecting and the reality hoped for; →Hope.) Hope is not a poor substitute for possession, but enhances it. As certainty about God's future, it makes meaningful connection between God's salvation and the miserable realities of the present world. What can be seen in this life remains changeable and transitory, and bears the marks of death (2 Cor. 4:16–18 is Paul's own best commentary). To identify God's end with that would be to defraud faith. Instead, hope is what gives faith patience and enables it to endure in its reliance on God (v. 25).

Third, "in the same way, the Spirit also stands by to assist us in our weakness" (v. 26). The imagery is that of a heavenly court (cf. vv. 33–34), in which the "inexpressible yearnings" of both creation and community are taken up and presented on their behalf to God. Paul is drawing on a tradition that perceives God's Spirit as an advocate or defender for God's people; it appears also in the "Paraclete" sayings of the Gospel of John (→Paraclete) and in sayings in the synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke) that promise the Spirit's aid to the beleaguered community in times of persecution and trial (Mark 13:11; Matt. 10:19–20; Luke 21:15). Human beings are not left to their own resources, even to the inadequacies of their praying, to bear the burdens of this time, for the Spirit's intercession is authorized by God himself, "the searcher of human hearts" (Ps. 7:9; Jer. 17:10; cf. Ps. 139:1). Apart from this context, the assertion of v. 28 must sound superficial; in this context, it summarizes what has gone before. The ultimate assurance that "all [these] things" eventually do lead to the good that God wills lies in his unfailing assistance to "those who love him," which Paul at once defines as those whom God has called into this new relationship (cf. 1 Cor. 2:9; 8:3). A final rhetorical sequence of clauses stresses this divine purpose. Into it Paul inserts (v. 29b) another reminder of the Son: the branding mark of his life's pattern, in which glory and salvation come only by way of the cross, is what restores to human life the "image" the Creator had first willed to impress upon it (Gen. 1:27; cf. Phil. 3:21; 2 Cor. 4:4; →Image of God).

8:31–39, Justification as Vindication by the Love of God in Christ. Finally Paul returns to the love of God, which 5:5–8 has identified as the ultimate basis for hope and for that kind of confidence in God that has integrity. But he does not name love until v. 35. What God's sacrifice of his own Son (the language echoes Abraham's "not sparing" Isaac, Gen. 22:16) proves first is that God is "for us" rather than "against us." That does not mean that he is "on our side" (JB) on every human issue. But it is the very heart of Paul's teaching on justification.

The love of God does not mean a transmutation of earthly life into heavenly. It leaves history intact, with its choices, for which people and nations must still answer to God (cf. 2 Cor. 5:10). Human beings still have blood on their hands, often in the name of religion. But the ultimate accuser in the heavenly court is now the one who has taken their side in Christ Jesus. Paul is back at his starting point in 3:23–24. The rest of this section unfolds that assurance with the help of two carefully constructed rhetorical lists: one (v. 35) a sevenfold recapitulation of Paul's own personal hardships as a paradigm of the Christian life, the other (vv. 38–39) a tenfold catalogue of transpersonal powers that seem to threaten God's intent. In between, v. 36 (unfortunately often passed over in the liturgical use of this passage) makes the first appeal for confirmation to the OT since chap. 4. Ps. 44:22, originally a cry to God lamenting the assaults of Israel's enemies, now universalized as an apocalyptic truism that God's faithful are always exposed to violent death, becomes Scripture's own reminder that tribulation is a sure mark of belonging to God. The love of the Christ (v. 35) is in the last analysis the love of the eternal and omnipotent God himself (v. 39); that is the meaning for this life of calling Jesus of Nazareth, crucified and raised, "Christ Jesus our Lord."

9:1–11:36

The Faithfulness of God

In 3:1–8, Paul had anticipated two serious objections to his argument. His exposition of the justification of the unrighteous in subsequent chapters has answered the second objection: that Paul is denying the realities of sin and human accountability, ignoring the moral consequences of God's graciousness, and casting doubt on God's own integrity. But the first objection remains unfinished business still clamoring for attention. Paul's early insistence on God's impartiality (2:6–29) had provoked the question, "Does the Jew have any 'advantage,' any privilege that others do not also have?" (3:1). In replying affirmatively, Paul pointed to the "direct utterances" entrusted by God to the Jews, referred cryptically to the faithfulness of God that does not depend on human fidelity, and then switched the emphasis to God's truth and righteousness. Even that answer he seemed to take back in 3:9, although from 1:16 on he has always been careful not to obliterate the distinction between Jew and non-Jew (1:16; 2:9–10; 3:1, 30; 4:11–12).

However, far from going away, the question has in the meantime only become more acute. On Paul's own terms, the gospel of God's gracious initiative for the deliverance of all in the death of Jesus has put Jew and non-Jew on the same footing before God (3:22b–23, 30) and even provided the non-Jew with equal access to what Paul located at the very core of Jewish identity, God's promise to Abraham and Abraham's trust in that promise (chap. 4). Favoritism can never be claimed from God, as though God were the patron of one client people alone, for that would violate Judaism's central creed that God is one (3:29–30).

But what then becomes of God's faithfulness, that very reliability on which human trust, beginning with Abraham's, can alone depend? What about those "direct utterances" and God's calling of a people as his own, for which again Abraham is the prototype? Has God broken faith with his word, and with himself? What is at stake is not only the reality and future of Israel; it is above all a question about the God who has acted in Jesus Christ. That is why the argument of chaps. 1–8 is unfinished. In this connection God's "faithfulness" has several levels of meaning. His trustworthiness is his power to do what he has promised (as in 4:20–21). But it involves also his constancy, the changelessness of his purpose. And another side of his reliability is the consistency with which he deals with different groups of people, i.e., the very impartiality that raised the question in the first place. In the end, these are all aspects of God's righteousness.

These are the questions Paul addresses in the next three chapters. After a brief introduction, he proceeds in three major steps, though each section has some clear subdivisions.

9:1–5, Personal Introduction: The "Advantages" of Israel. In these intimate opening remarks, it is not at first apparent what Paul is talking about. He is affirming under oath his deeply pained concern for the Jewish people in whom his own natural and historical roots are set. He makes no charges; there is not a syllable of reproach or blame. Yet, in a manner reminiscent of Moses' impossible offer of his own life to atone for the worshipers of the golden calf (Exod. 32:31–32), Paul entertains the fleeting thought of being accursed and cut off from Christ, something just declared impossible (8:35, 39), in their place—as if they are under a ban or spell. But he turns that thought aside (until 9:31–32) and instead enumerates all the "advantages" (3:1) of the "Israelites." This new name replaces "the Jew(s)" in these three chapters (except 9:24 and 10:12, where Paul needs the pairing of Jew and non-Jew) and is a calculated recall of Judaism's roots in the patriarchal history (Gen. 32:28; →Israel: The Idea of Israel). The list itself rehearses the major tokens of the Jewish people's covenant relationship with God, the earthly branding marks of God's election—not the least of which is being the cradle of the Messiah. The thought moves Paul to a Jewish formula of thanksgiving and praise to "the God who is over all" (v. 5b) and who is the real subject of chaps. 9-11. (Although some translations punctuate so as to make the formula refer to Christ, this fits neither the context nor Paul's Christology; cf. 1 Cor. 15:28.)

9:6-29, Israel's Election as God's Free Initiative to Create a People. In this first major section Paul reviews certain aspects of election in the patriarchal story in order to refute the suggestion that God's word has failed (v. 6). The first reason it has not is that God's past activity has been completely consistent with his justification of the unrighteous. Put another way, several of the points Paul has made in chaps. 1-4 about the standing of human beings before God in his future judgment he now confirms by turning 180 degrees to look at Israel's past history. It is most important to note that throughout this first section it is God's nature and activity that are being described; there is absolutely no attack on the Judaism of Paul's own time or censure of Israel in the past. This review embraces three points.

First, in vv. 6-13, in a remarkable resumption of his earlier redefinition of the authentic Jew (2:28-29) and of the authentic Abraham (cf. commentary above on 4:9-12), Paul now redefines Israel in such a way as to distinguish the "children of God" and "of the promise" (v. 8) from the simply physical posterity of Abraham. One should take some care in interpreting Paul. He is not trying to make room for believing Gentiles among Abraham's children (as he was in 4:9-12), much less suggesting a "spiritualized" definition of the Jewish people as a pretext for substituting the church for Israel (that would reduce vv. 1-3 to posturing). Nor is he dismissing the earthly and historic continuity of the Jewish people as inauthentic; he is not abstracting an "essential" Israel from its history. Rather, in that history itself, as every Jew would agree, the descendants of Abraham through Ishmael (Gen. 25:12-18; cf. Jub. 15:28-30; 20:11-13; → Ishmaelites) and through Esau (Gen. 36:1-8; → Edom) were not included in "Israel." (For debate in Paul's time about the identity of the true Israel, → Israel: Apocalyptic Judaism.) Historical Israel itself is determined by "promise" rather than by "flesh" (these terms are functioning here exactly as "spirit" and "letter" did in 2:29). Of course Isaac and Ishmael, one born to Abraham's wife Sarah and the other to his maidservant Hagar, were not equals. So to make the point clear, Paul comes down one generation to the twin sons of Rebecca (OT, Rebekah), "conceived from the same conjugal act with one man, Isaac" (v. 10). Here the determination of authentic Israel takes place "when they were not yet born and when they had not yet done anything good or bad, in order that God's elective intention might remain unchanged (i.e., consistent), dependent not on works but on the one who calls" (vv. 11-12a). The point is clinched, in rabbinic fashion, with one text from the law and one from the prophets (vv. 12b-13). Election, which means the calling into being of a people, exactly like the justification of the unrighteous, is God's free act, a gift, not something due (4:4); it results from the perduring intention of God that operates "by election" (v. 11b). This is Abraham's God "who gives life to the dead and calls into being the things that are not" (4:17).

Second, vv. 14-24 reflect on "But Esau I hated." The last OT text cited in v. 13 from Mal. 1:2-3 creates a new problem. One may soften the language (since Hebrew has no comparative adverbs, there are OT texts in which "to hate" simply means "to love less": Gen. 29:30-31; Deut. 21:15; cf. Luke 14:26), but there is no doubt about God's deliberate aversion in that context in Malachi and throughout Israel's history. That raises the issue of "injustice," the negative form of favoritism, on God's part. At first Paul seems merely to continue his preceding line when he adds the two counterpoised figures of Moses and Pharaoh. Verse 16 is a manifest reinforcement of v. 11: "So it all depends not on the person who wills, nor on the person who exerts himself, but on the God who shows mercy." But v. 17 shows that Paul's shift to (Moses and) Pharaoh introduces a new dimension: God is not guided by random or arbitrary whim but by a clear purpose to assert his power and presence in human affairs. In that connection Paul introduces the image of the potter and his clay. Many readers, taking the side of the questioners in v. 19 and thinking only of the passive plasticity of the clay in the potter's hands, have taken offense at what they regard as this picture of an impersonal, unfeeling, and despotic God. It is imperative to consult the prophetic sources from which Paul is drawing this reply (Jer. 18:6; Isa. 29:16; but esp. Isa. 45:9-13). The point is not the power of the potter but his "right" (v. 21, RSV) to fashion each vessel for a function and to determine the use of each. A machine stamping out identical pots is "impersonal." In Isaiah 45, the context concerns God's "raising up in righteousness" (v. 13) his "anointed," the Persian emperor Cyrus. The even more ludicrous parallel to the clay calling the potter to account is the helpless newborn infant holding its parents answerable for the procreative act that called it into being, as personal a caricature as one could wish. But the potter's example fits Paul's needs better than the infant's because, as vv. 21-23 make quite clear, his point is God's intention to fashion different instruments and use them in different ways—a latitude so far not yet achieved by human reproduction. Neither rigid determinism nor arbitrary caprice, but creative and purposive divine freedom lie at the heart of Paul's understanding of election (→ Election; Predestination). Corroboration for this comes in the difficult vv. 22–23. Paul's syntax is severely elliptical; v. 24 also is not a complete sentence, but it is clearly the goal toward which vv. 22–23 move. God is not simply like a potter. The purpose clauses with which both verses begin are parallel: God wishes to make himself known, first by showing his wrath and "what he can do" (a striking phrase; cf. its opposite in 8:3) by patiently enduring, i.e., by not destroying, "vessels of wrath fashioned for destruction," and then by making known "the wealth of his glory" on "vessels of mercy" prepared for that use. "Vessel" in Greek normally also means an "instrument" or piece of gear in the hands of someone (Paul himself is a "chosen instrument," lit., a "vessel of election," for God in Acts 9:15). The harshness of this language results from combining terms from the imagery of the potter with God's wrath and mercy. Paul does not identify the "vessels of wrath designed for destruction" with Jews and the "vessels of mercy" with Gentiles, much less Christians. Such a correlation can be produced only by bringing elements of chap. 11, which is a different argument, up into chap. 9. These phrases refer to figures in Israel's own history, Pharaoh and Moses respectively. Verses 22–23 thus reproduce in inverted order the juxtaposition of vv. 15–17 in order to reach toward the goal of v. 24, God's intent to create "us" as a people "not only from Jews but also from Gentiles," both of whom are included under "vessels of mercy." This reappearance of the word pair "Jew and Gentile" and the confessional "us," both totally new elements in chap. 9, brings Paul back to the main track of his exposition of God's righteousness. Thus the juxtaposition in vv. 22–23 is not contradictory but progressive, remarkably like the parallel revelation of God's wrath and his righteousness with which Paul began the whole letter in 1:17–18. These are two "sides" or "faces" of God, but they are never in equilibrium and do not result in a schizophrenic duality of purpose in God himself. The hardening of Pharaoh served the deliverance of Israel under Moses, just as the revelation of wrath serves the manifestation of God's righteousness, or the "increase" of sin by the law serves the aggrandizement of grace (5:20). There is no inconsistency between God's behavior in Israel's creation and the justification of the undeserving that creates a new people from both Jew and non-Jew.

Third, vv. 25–29 buttress v. 24 with scriptural warrants in reverse order, first for the non-Jews (from Hosea), then for the Jews (from Isaiah), but in such a way that each passage also applies to both groups. The Hosea text (vv. 25–26) is a lucid and forceful equation of calling and election with God's undeserved love; its application to the inclusion of the non-Jews in what was originally Israel's election drives home God's consistency in his covenant love on which all alike depend. The text from "Isaiah," actually from a variety of prophetic passages, returns to God's reliability in the election of authentic Israel. "Remnant" in v. 27, like "seed" in v. 29, refers to that authentic line of descent from Abraham described positively in vv. 6–13 (it is not used reductively; there is no "only" in the Greek of v. 27; see commentary below on 11:1–6). The emphasis falls on the last line, which sums up Paul's answer to the question of v. 6 whether "the word of God has failed": no, "the elect strain that is called in Isaac (v. 7) shall be saved; the Lord will carry out his word on the earth conclusively and with dispatch" (v. 28). A final quotation from Isaiah (v. 29) serves as a thanksgiving: apart from that constancy of God that has operated in Israel's election, we would (all) be like Sodom and Gomorrah, the OT prototypes of annihilation.

9:30–10:21, God's Faithfulness in the Apparent Breakdown of Election. As often before (4:1; 6:1, 15; 7:7; 8:31; 9:14), a new stage in Paul's reflection is opened with the rhetorical question, "What then shall we say?" This time, however, the words that follow are Paul's own answer and not an erroneous deduction he aims to refute. Verses 30b–33 leave behind the preceding account of God's role in the story of Israel's election and focus on the present status of that complex plot. Now for the first time Paul's readers get a clear glimpse of the reason for his pain in 9:2. For present circumstances are a baffling inversion of everything any participant in that story would have expected. In the language of the racecourse, Gentiles who were not even trying to reach God's righteousness have arrived at that goal on the proper terms of trust in God; Israel, on the other hand, pursuing a law that held out the promise of righteousness, has failed to reach even that law. By referring to the Mosaic law here not as a possession distinguishing Jew from Gentile (cf. 2:14, 20) but as Israel's unattained goal, Paul must have in mind something like that "law of faith" that precludes boasting in 3:27 (cf. commentary above on 3:27–31), the Mosaic law as presuming trust in God for its authentic obedience (2:25–29). Of course Paul is contrasting the acceptance of "God's gospel" (1:1) among his Gentile converts and the resistance his preaching has encountered among his own people. But beneath those surface reactions lies a deeper enigma. Something has gone seriously wrong (9:32), because Israel's pursuit of the goal was not carried out in trust but on the supposition that righteousness can come from performance of deeds enjoined by the law (i.e., in violation of the basic axiom under which Paul had begun his whole description of justification, 3:20). "The one who trusts in him [God] will not be put to shame.” That assurance had been laid down by God as a foundation stone in Zion (Isa. 28:16), but it has become a rock of stumbling, as the Lord of hosts said he would himself become to those who refuse his message (Isa. 8:14), and Israel has stumbled on that rock (Rom. 9:32). This is Paul’s own people, and this is the reason for his anguish.

On the basis of Ps. 118:22, Christianity after Paul developed a complex tapestry of OT “stone” passages to apply to Christ (1 Pet. 2:6–8; Matt. 21:42; Mark 12:10; Luke 20:17; Acts 4:11; Eph. 2:20; cf. Luke 2:34), so Paul’s later readers have understandably assumed that the “stone” of v. 33 refers to Christ. But there is no use of Psalm 118 here and no preparation for such a direct allusion. Instead, Paul seems to understand the second line of the quotation, to which he returns in 10:11, as the inscription on the stone or the “rock” itself (cf. the punctuation of Isa. 28:16, RSV). In any case, this v. 33 must count as one of the most remarkable of Paul’s OT quotations because of what it attributes to God: placing in the midst of his people a base of security that is at the same time an obstacle over which they will stumble (→ Stumbling Block). Such an obstacle confronts those who encounter it with alternatives; yet their reactions only disclose things about themselves over which they have no control. This figure of speech thus combines the same fatefulness and freedom that have appeared in Paul’s earlier analyses (Rom. 1:21–23; 5:12; 6:17; 8:12–14). God’s action is not unlike that law that was supposed to lead to life but in fact led to death, a result not outside God’s purpose (7:10, 13b), or God’s use of “an instrument of wrath” like Pharaoh on the way to disclosing his mercy in Moses. Such a perception of God recognizes in Israel’s history what Paul has come in other ways to see about God from his disclosure of his power and wisdom in the offensive message of a crucified Messiah (cf. Paul’s use of the figure of the stumbling block in 1 Cor. 1:18, 21–24).

The rest of this section (chap. 10) explores these two sides of the strange reversal of 9:30–31. First, leaving the Gentiles aside, Paul first (10:1–17) concentrates on Israel’s own responsibility for the current state of affairs. After a renewed personal testimony, he repeats (vv. 1–4) what has gone wrong, using the language of justification instead of his racecourse imagery; genuine zeal for God has been turned into disobedience and a pursuit of righteousness aborted into a search for “one’s own” rather than God’s (cf. Phil. 2:9). This diagnosis of Israel parallels precisely what Paul wrote about religious moralists in Rom. 2:1–5 and addressed to “the Jew” in 2:17–24. It should not have turned out so, for the real goal of the law as reached in Christ is to lead to righteousness for everyone who trusts in God (10:4; Paul’s Greek word “end,” like the English, can mean either “cessation” as in Luke 1:33, or “goal” as in Rom. 6:21–22; both Paul’s usage elsewhere and the racecourse motif here support the latter choice. But this is one of the most debated of Pauline texts). Verses 5–13 supply the scriptural backing. Here Paul follows an established rabbinic procedure for dealing with apparently contradictory biblical texts, as in Gal. 3:10–12. The law (“Moses,” Rom. 10:5) does indeed invite one to establish a “righteousness of one’s own” that will divide Jew from non-Jew and make life dependent on performance. On that invitation Israel “stumbled.” But the same law, when one reads Deut. 30:12–14 prefixed by Deut. 9:4, forbids presuming to do for oneself what God has already done (in Christ). The message about trusting in God, “which we preach,” is already located “near at hand” by Scripture, in the mouth by which human beings confess, and in the heart by which they rely upon, what God has done, and this is illustrated by two elementary Christian creeds (Rom. 10:9). That is how righteousness is attained and salvation is found, not in one’s own deeds. In the words of that foundation stone that God has himself placed in Zion (9:33), to which Paul now returns (10:11), “everyone who trusts in God will be vindicated.” Paul adds the word “everyone” to that text of Isa. 28:16. By what right? Because Joel 2:32 does just that (Rom. 10:13). Just as there was no distinction between Jew and Greek in the matter of sin’s power (3:22b), so there is no distinction between them before the riches of one and the same God, who is Lord of all (cf. 9:5b). As in many of Paul’s quotations from the OT, “Lord” stands for the name of God himself in 10:12 and does not refer separately to Christ (→ Tetragrammaton). But this fusing of the text from Deut. 30:12–14 with Paul’s own “message about faith which we preach” (v. 8b), so clearly carried out by his inserting explanatory comments into that text in vv. 6–8, is both result and confirmation of his perception of complete continuity and consistency between the God of Israel and the Father of Jesus Christ. To exhibit that consistency, which is God’s faithfulness, is Paul’s aim in these chapters. If not all have obeyed the good news (v. 16), all the conditions for its reception have been provided by God; the bearers of his message were hailed already in Isaiah’s time (vv. 14–15). Trust is created by that message and that message comes (now) through the preaching of what God has done in Christ (v. 17).

Second, in vv. 18–21, the Gentiles come back into view as Paul returns from Israel’s role to God’s in that enigmatic reversal of 9:30–33. Can it be that Israel did not hear or understand? The next three OT texts (10:18–20) indicate that it did indeed hear, as the earlier vv.

15–16 had confirmed, but that something else was going on. The second passage (v. 19, quoting Deut. 32:21) comes from the context of Israel's defection to idolatry in the wilderness (1 Cor. 10:7, 22 show that Paul read Deut. 32:21 in the light of Exod. 32:6 and is probably thinking of the golden calf; cf. commentary above on 9:3). It was Israel's known provocation of God that elicited his return threat to provoke them with a "nonpeople" and a "foolish nation." Paul understands that as applying now to the unforeseen success of the Gentiles in reaching the goal that Israel has missed (9:30), as is clear from his third citation in 10:20. In deliberately showing himself to people who were not even trying to find him, and who had no comprehension of God's purposes ("a nation devoid of understanding" is an ironic echo of a Jewish label for Gentiles, cf. 2:20), God was not only pursuing his justification of the undeserving; he was goading his own people and showing his attachment to them (this striking motif will be resumed in 11:11, 14). Was that a breakdown in God's election? On the contrary, as Isaiah said, God has never ceased to reach out to Israel, even in the midst of her defiance (10:21).

11:1–36, The Impartiality of God's Faithfulness. In this final chapter, Paul closes in on his goal, pulling the pieces together now in a series of concluding steps, for which he provides the familiar rhetorical markers.

11:1–10, A Remnant Continues. The last part of chap. 10 still leaves a question. God's word to Israel has not failed. Israel, descended through Jacob, yet defined by promise and not by the outward criterion of physical descent, called into being by the God who shows mercy (9:6–13, 16), is an actual people, not a fancy constructed out of future promises. If it has missed God's intent for it by a wide margin, and if God himself has had some hand in its doing so (9:31–33; 10:19), does it not follow that God has repudiated his own people? In reply, Paul uses the OT concept of the "remnant" (→ Remnant). Like many other religious terms, this notion can be nuanced in different ways. Sometimes it refers to all the residue of God's people surviving a time of judgment and catastrophe; it then is used to emphasize its continuity and miraculous preservation. Paul understood the term in this inclusive sense when quoting Isa. 10:22 in Rom. 9:27, namely as a synonym of "seed" in 9:29 (RSV: "children") and 9:8 (RSV: "descendants"). But "remnant" may also be used exclusively to identify an "elite" minority within a larger whole, distinguished by special fidelity or piety; the Qumran community understood itself as such a faithful remnant (→ Scrolls, The Dead Sea). That Paul uses it in an exclusive sense here is clear from his differentiating "the elect" and "the rest" (clearly not those included in the "remnant") in v. 7, and from the analogy he draws with the seven thousand in the days of Elijah (1 Kings 19:10, 14, 18). The difference in nuance is important. In chap. 9 Paul was distinguishing all of authentic Israel from that which was, even for Jewish perceptions, not Israel. Now he is drawing a distinction within Israel. In this meaning of "remnant," the promissory assurance that the preservation of a part gives for the future of the whole is the key. The "oracle" (v. 4, NEB) to Elijah was God's own pledge then, as it is to Paul now, that God has not abandoned his people (v. 2). Paul, however, goes out of his way (vv. 5–6) to emphasize that this continuity-providing remnant is "a matter of the election of grace" (cf. 9:11–12), the product of that undeserved creative love of God that produced a Jacob alongside of Esau, and not the result of one group's being any better or deserving than the rest of Israel. Who is that remnant? There is nothing in the text to suggest that Paul is thinking of Christians. The empirical evidence he adduces is simply his own person, not by virtue of his Christian faith, which he does not mention (that would make it a "work" in the sense of v. 6), but in his unassailable flesh and blood identity as an Israelite (v. 1), a part of Israel's whole (9:1–5). Undoubtedly Paul does not feel himself alone; he does not liken himself to Elijah in that respect. But it remains a fact that he does not appeal directly to Christ here for assurance about Israel's future but to the pledge of Israel's (and his) God. While he uses the distinction between Jew and non-Jew, he simply does not draw any lines anywhere in chaps. 9–11 between authentic Jews and authentic Christians (cf. 9:24), just as he perceives no split in himself—or in God.

A remnant of Israel, represented by Paul, did then arrive at that goal mentioned in 9:31, but (all) the rest did not. With two more texts (vv. 8–9), the first of them a complex mix of phrases from Deuteronomy and Isaiah, Paul not only documents the majority's lasting misunderstanding and blindness, but explains the painful reality of it as a deliberate deed of God. Such use of these passages belongs to a broad early Christian tradition of appeal to OT texts on God's causing blindness and misunderstanding in Israel, in order to explain the painful riddle of Jewish repudiation of the gospel (cf. the use of Isa. 6:9–11 in Matt. 13:14–15; Mark 4:12; Luke 8:10; John 12:40; Acts 28:26–27). Paul's point, however, is a continuation of Rom. 9:33 and 10:18–21: to show God's continuing presence and purpose with Israel, and so to refute the suggestion that he has abandoned it. This becomes clear in the next step.

11:11–16, The Part is Surety for the Whole. These verses should not be divided; they belong together in both thematic content and purpose.

Verse 13a ("I am talking to you Gentiles") does not mark a change of audience; that largely gentile Christian audience has been the same from 9:1 on. But Paul deliberately calls its attention to itself to accentuate these verses. If God is responsible for Israel's blindness, the question is still, has God become Israel's enemy and destroyer? "Have they faltered only finally to fall? Absolutely not! On the contrary, through their false step, salvation has been extended to the Gentiles in order to incite Israel to jealousy." Here is a double claim about God: first, that Israel's closure to God's righteousness (10:3) serves God's purpose to bestow his riches impartially upon all (10:12) and thus to extend his salvation to non-Jews; but second, that in that very action, by provoking them to anger over these outsiders (10:19), God's own "jealousy" or zeal for Israel, his untterrable possessive claim on it, and his faithfulness to it, is operating to awaken and recall it. Paul's own calling as an "apostle to the Gentiles" (cf. 1:5) is in service to this God, so that ultimately it coincides with his own deepest desire for his kinfolk, his "flesh" (v. 14), and one loyalty cannot be played off against the other. So the beneficiaries of God's hostile treatment of Israel are the non-Jews, and the beneficiary of God's reconciliation of the world is Israel. Verses 12 and 15 are parallel and play on linguistic contrast: if Israel's "diminution" enriches the world, what will its "plenitude" produce (v. 12)? If its "being spurned" causes reconciliation, what will its "being embraced" bring about (v. 15)? The above two claims about God are so fused in Paul's mind that both these verses are ambivalent; one cannot really tell whether in describing God's ultimate benefit, "life from the dead," he means its accrual to Jew or Gentile. The distinction has evaporated in the text. Both are equally indebted to the same life-giving God (cf. 4:12). And the part is surety for the whole: the remnant, for the indivisible whole of Israel; the Jew Paul, for his "flesh"; Israel, for God's whole creation. Significantly, Paul ends (v. 16) with two OT figures for the consecrating effect of the part upon the whole, the dedicatory cereal offering for the whole harvest (Num. 15:17–21; → Heave Offering) and the root and the branch (→ Branch). One might suppose that he has only the remnant and the whole of Israel in mind with these allusions, but the next verses, into which the second figure leads, demonstrate conclusively the universal scope of their application.

11:17–24, The Metaphor of the Olive Tree. Despite all the horticultural objections that have been raised about it, the theological point of Paul's metaphor of the olive tree is lucid and forceful (he concedes in v. 24 that it runs "contrary to nature"; → Olive). Directed to the non-Jews (v. 13), it makes clear, first, that salvation is available for them only in continuity with Israel's history and in dependence on Israel's God. The root is now Israel and the branches are the Jews and the rest of humankind. Everything Paul has said in Romans about God's justification of the unrighteous in Jesus Christ is empty unless this means a restored relationship to the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. It makes clear, second, that Jew and Gentile are alike utterly dependent on the creative freedom of this God to cut out and to graft in, to bestow life on his own terms where it is wholly undeserved, both "according to nature" and "contrary to nature" (v. 24). This leaves no room for either pride ("Do not become high-minded, but stand in awe," v. 20) or contempt ("God has the power to graft them back in," v. 33). God's freedom keeps the frontiers open for his mercy rather than closed; Paul is rejecting at every point that rigid determinism of conventional religion that divides humankind into the saved and the damned. And the illustration makes clear, third, that trust in this God is the issue for men and women, for Jew (v. 23) and for non-Jew (v. 20). The precipitous severity of God and his kindness are correlated to unbelief and faith. But it is God, in his goodness and righteousness, who determines these reversals; no one can manipulate him, and any attempt to do so is a violation of trust.

The chapter ends with three distinct conclusions.

11:25–27, Prophetic Conclusion. The first answers the question about Israel's destiny and ends chap. 11. Using the term "mystery" in a meaning shaped by the apocalyptic tradition to refer to God's ultimate purposes for his world, hidden from human perception but disclosed on God's own terms (cf. Dan. 2:27–28; 1 Enoch 9:6; 63:3; → Mystery: In the OT and Judaism), Paul takes the stand of a prophet. Part of Israel has been "hardened" for the sake of all non-Jewish peoples, but "in this way" (v. 26) all Israel will be saved. The end-time miracle will consist in the justification of God's own people as ungodly (4:4), when God will "remove ungodliness from Jacob." Paul's supporting text in vv. 26–27 is a remarkable combination of Isa. 27:9; 59:20; and Jer. 31:33. In this deliverance, the two sides of God's righteousness (Rom. 3:26) will again be evident: in not tolerating ungodliness, God is "himself righteous," but by bringing the Deliverer from Zion who will establish Israel's righteousness, God is also "the one who makes righteous those who are righteous by trust." Paul does not here call for Jewish conversion to Christianity or a separate Christian mission to the Jewish people. The mystery of Judaism's refusal of the gospel is an aspect of its misunderstanding of its own tradition and of the "near word" of Deuteronomy that called for faith (chap. 10), even its misunderstanding of God. But there is no break in the Jews' relationship to God, just as no Gentile is outside God's election love (9:25-26). From the very beginning of the Letter, Paul has set forth the meaning of Christ not as an alternative or rival to God for the affections and trust of human beings, but as God's way of restoring integrity to the relationship of all, both Jew and Greek, to himself. The final salvation of all Israel is God's own "mystery," but the certainty of it, and the terms on which it must take place, like those of all God's world, are disclosed in God's revelation of his righteousness in Jesus Christ (see commentary above on 3:21-26).

11:28-32, Logical Conclusion. To this certainty and these terms Paul returns in a second conclusion, crowning the whole of chaps. 9-11, in which he speaks as a rhetorician and teacher. The tightly structured dialectic summarizes his argument:

- A. "In relation to the gospel, they are [God's] enemies on your account;
- B. In relation to election, they are [his] beloved on account of the patriarchs.
- C. For the gifts and calling of God cannot be rescinded.
- A'. For just as you once disobeyed God but now have obtained mercy through their disobedience,
- B'. So they too now have disobeyed the mercy extended to you, in order that they might themselves also now be recipients of mercy.
- C'. For God has consigned all human beings to disobedience in order to bestow mercy on all."

Line C (v. 29) reaffirms God's election and his faithfulness to his promises, the point of chap. 9. Line C' (v. 32) reaffirms God's impartiality, the point made by Paul in chaps. 2-4 that raised the issue of Israel and required the writing of chaps. 9-11. The two are not in conflict. God's justification of the undeserving embraces all human beings on equal terms, but this "universalism" is one that confronts them all with both judgment and mercy (cf. 5:12-21).

11:33-36, Liturgical Conclusion. In this third conclusion, Paul takes the stance of the worshiper and uses an early Christian hymn. Its triadic structure is clear. Verse 33 is made up of three exclamatory lines: the first praises God's wealth, wisdom, and knowledge, three very Hellenistic religious categories; the other two repeat the exclamation in terms of the Hebraic notions of God's judgments and ways. Verse 34 consists of three rhetorical questions, all drawn from OT poetic and wisdom passages, that resume in inverse order the three concepts of the first line. The implied answer to each "Who?" is "No one but God himself!" Verse 36 concludes with a couplet: the first line is a profoundly Hellenistic formula for God's omnipotence and transcendence (cf. 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:16; Heb. 2:10); the last is a conventional biblical doxology. Such praise of the God who transcends human understanding can easily slip into resignation and despair (cf. 2 Apoc. Bar. 14:8-11). God remains beyond human manipulation. Still, authentic faith and obedience, and the undergirding hope of salvation, do not rest on God's withholding himself but on his making himself known, on his own terms, as a God who can be trusted. This is the God Paul praises at the conclusion of his argument.

The Community Exhortation

With 12:1 the nature and tone of the Letter shift unmistakably to ethical and practical exhortation. Romans shares with other NT Letters, not only those written by Paul, the tendency to gather such material at the end (cf. 1 Thess. 4-5; Phil. 4; Gal. 5-6; Col. 3-4; Eph. 4-6; even such documents as Hebrews and 1 Peter, which incorporate hortatory passages throughout, follow this pattern in their conclusions: Heb. 13 and 1 Pet. 5). This tendency of the Letters reflects both the influence of Jewish and Hellenistic sermon-like traditions on their composition and the personal experiences of their writers as leaders in their communities and participants in their worship assemblies, where such exhortation took place (and where Paul expects his Letters to be read). Thus it is not surprising to find Paul incorporating into these final chapters of Romans material that bears many marks of traditional catechetical instruction and shows clear parallels with other Letters, his own and others'. Yet Paul is never a slave to the conventions he follows, and it is important to reflect briefly on the inner connection between his use of this material and the argument of the first part of the Letter.

Romans is peculiarly instructive because the concluding exhortations of this Letter do not emerge from Paul's own personal familiarity with the church as its founder, nor are they a response to its appeals to him for guidance. The central argument itself has shown that no sharp separation is possible between Paul's "theology" and his "ethics." His exposition of the gospel as a revelation of God's righteousness, God's gracious initiative to restore integrity to the relationships of human beings to himself and to each other, has involved release from the patterns and condemnation of the past, the renewal of commitment, and the reordering of life in this world (cf. esp. commentary above on 6:1-7:6). That exposition can certainly gain now in both intelligibility and persuasiveness by the addition of concrete advice and counsel, but it is not the case that the truth of the argument depends on the exhortation or that the revelation of God's righteousness remains somehow defective or inconclusive until Paul's gospel is "applied" by its hearers to the practice of living. His position has clearly been that the human situation and the behavior it calls for have been defined by the death and resurrection of Christ, not the other way around. The "indicative" of his gospel entails and creates an "imperative" that the exhortations can now in one sense only elaborate and clarify. But it also does not follow, on the other hand, that these concluding chapters remain essentially dispensable embellishments to his argument and, because they utilize tradition, contain no proper concerns and reflections of Paul's own. A closer look at these chapters will refute such a conclusion, but the earlier argument itself prepares the way. For in it, and especially in the diagnosis of human religious failure that accompanies Paul's exposition of God's righteousness all along, Paul nowhere represents his readers as morally disengaged or indifferent. The fundamental malaise is a distortion that the religious zeal of morally serious people has introduced into their relationship to God; the symptom of sin's power is not sloth but the breeding of just those results that an active religious commitment is seeking to prevent (cf. 2:1-24; 7:7-25; 10:1-4; 11:17-24). The human problem is not lack of religion but religion that lacks trust (faith) and for that reason does not honor God as God or give thanks to him (1:21; 3:27-30; 9:32), that misunderstands and resists God (8:5-8; 10:3). This means that the point of chaps. 12-15 is quite different from what modern readers, looking for religious encouragement in a "secular" world, may be inclined to hear. The function of these chapters is not to incite or inspire "religious" behavior or supply a moral dimension to life, as though these were missing; the world of Paul and his readers is full of both. Rather, what his readers now need are guidelines to help discern and promote integrity in a religious life that has been distorted, corrections to religious motivations that will bring these into line with the righteousness of faith, criteria for conduct suitable to the imperatives enunciated earlier (e.g., in 6:11, 12-14; 8:12). The revelation of God's righteousness does not remain defective, but the shaping of human lives to its patterns remains incomplete, an unfinished goal of the apostle's calling (1:5), and as indispensable a part of his gospel as the still unived future conferred by the sharing of Christ's destiny (cf. commentary above on 6:1-11).

Basic Exhortations

The exhortations appear to fall into two groups: chaps. 12-13 contain elemental appeals not related to a community problem under debate; chaps. 14-15, specific overtures occasioned by the major issue that called forth the writing of Romans, the coexistence of Jews and non-Jews in one religious fellowship (Paul does not use the word "church" at all in Romans until chap. 16).

12:1-2, Transitional Introduction. Paul's opening words set the tone. "I appeal to you" (RSV) means much more than a request; a summons and an encouragement is now being extended, in a deliberate reprise of Paul's diagnosis of human disorder at the beginning of the Letter (see the concluding remark on 1:18-32 in commentary above). Embracing all human life under the metaphor of an archetypal cultic act, Paul urges his readers, on the basis of God's "compassion," to offer their "bodies," i.e., their selves as these are at their discretion for allegiance and action (cf. 6:12-13, 19), to God as a "sacrifice" that will be at once animated by the life God has bestowed, dedicated to his purposes, and acceptable to him. Approval by God is the ultimate sanction for every cultic action, but Paul adds another. Using a Stoic term for what is peculiarly human both in distinction from the animal or material world and in affiliation with the divine (and translated variously as "reasonable," KJV, or "spiritual," RSV), Paul declares such dedication of themselves to be the authentic worship appropriate to a reordered human life. Such reordering is to consist now of their distancing themselves from the patterns and priorities of "this [present] age" (the expression appears here for the first time in Romans; cf. Gal. 1:4; 1 Cor. 2:6-8; 3:18; 2 Cor. 4:4) for the sake of the renovation that the gospel provides (cf. Rom. 6:4; 7:6; the transformation language used by Paul for this change recalls Rom. 8:29; cf. 1 Cor. 15:49; 2 Cor. 3:18; Phil. 3:21). Its signal manifestation will be a renewed "mind" possessing once more the lost capacity to "discern what the will of God is" (v. 2; cf. 1:21) and so to distinguish good and evil. The absence of casuistry or legalism from these verses only enhances the urgency of this call to individual accountability to God.

12:3-8, The Use of Diverse Gifts in One Community. A close comparison of this passage with 1 Cor. 12:4-31, especially vv. 4-11, is instructive. Paul's Corinthian crisis had demonstrated the destructive effects wrought on the cohesion and harmony of a congregation when the religious standings of competitive individuals are linked to the inevitable variations in human talents and gifts. So Paul's first call is for a tempering of conceit in one's "mind-set" (cf. 8:5-8) in favor of a more sober self-assessment "according to the measuring standard of faith God has provided to each" (v. 3). It is faith, to which all have equal access, that puts all on the same footing before God (cf. 3:22, 27, 30). All members are, like the apostle himself, beneficiaries of the one graciousness of God ("the grace given," vv. 3 and 6, appears to be a distinctively Pauline formula; cf. Rom. 15:15; 1 Cor. 3:10; Gal. 2:9). But this one grace produces "different gifts" (v. 6) that so enable the exercise of diverse functions within the group that the gifts are identified only by listing the functions (vv. 6-8; unlike 1 Cor. 12:28, this list contains no ordered ranking, for Paul is no longer disputing the Corinthians' priorities). The one grace is God's; the various gifts are human faculties (despite the formulaic expression, it is not until after Paul's time, in Eph. 3:2, 7, 8, that these two are so identified that the grace becomes itself the possessed human gift). Unlike 1 Corinthians, nothing in Paul's language here connects these gifts with the Spirit or traces the creation of this diversity to the Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 12:11); what is retained from the Corinthian experience is the solution to the threat posed by pluralism and diversity but not the originating occasion for it in the Corinthians' glorification of ecstatic spiritual phenomena such as glossolalia (speaking in tongues). Corresponding to this relationship of the many gifts to the one grace from which they derive is the parallel relation of the many members to the "one body in Christ" (v. 5), in the service of which the many gifts are to be employed. As in 1 Corinthians this social metaphor, widely used in the ancient world, of the body as a complex organism of many members, is used to reconcile diversity and unity in the community, though Paul does not here use the expression "the body of Christ" (in Rom. 7:4 it denoted the solidarity of individuals with Christ in his destiny-creating role). Thus diversities are acknowledged but stripped of their divisive power by being subordinated to the interpretive norm of "faith." Each person is to exercise his or her own gift in recognition of its source and in a manner appropriate to its function for the whole; the gift itself has created the responsibility and supplies the norm for its right use.

12:9-21, Relations to Fellow Human Beings. Since in 1 Cor. 12:31 Paul turns from the variety of gifts to focus on love, v. 9a, "Let love be without dissimulation," has seemed to form a topic sentence for the next section. One may recognize a certain controlling position for this first admonition, but the section itself scarcely offers a coherent exposition of love comparable to 1 Corinthians 13. The unit provides instead, in both syntax and content, a clear example of traditional catechetical admonition: short injunctions arranged in no obvious pattern, at best in small groupings linked by key terms or catchwords (cf. 1 Thess. 5:12-22; Heb. 13:1-17). Verses 9-13 appear to focus on relationships within the community and vv. 14-21 on external ones, but even this distinction is tenuous. More illuminating is the sudden increase of echoes and reminiscences of identifiable traditions: of the Jesus tradition in v. 14 (Matt. 5:44), or vv. 17 and 21 (Matt. 5:39); of Deut. 32:35 in v. 19b; of Jewish wisdom traditions in v. 15 (Sir. 7:34), v. 16 (Prov. 3:7), v. 17 (Prov. 3:4, LXX), and v. 20 (Prov. 25:21-22). This helps interpret the difficult v. 20b: in a certain Egyptian ritual, a basin of burning charcoal carried on the head was a token of penitence (cf. 2 Esd. 16:53). Thus in vv. 17-21 a clear thematic unity emerges to be summed up in the last verse (which also resumes v. 9b): the tempering of violence and revenge in hostile human relationships is less an act of human love (v. 9a) than it is the fruit of a trust that has learned to rely on God's impartial love for all (cf. Matt. 5:43-48). Human relations are nourished by security, not anxiety; the issue for Paul throughout Romans has been to identify authentic security and confidence in place of its illusory perversions (cf. Rom. 5:1-11 and see commentary above on that passage).

13:1-7, Relations to Those in Authority.

Because of the many and controversial uses to which this section has been put since it was written, it is especially important to try to read it in its context in Romans and in Paul's world. A series of observations may be useful.

First, in this context the passage does not offer a comprehensive theoretical treatment of "the state" but simply guidance in relation to the specific and individual bearers of imperial authority, including the never popular collectors of taxes (v. 6); the last verse embraces a variety of civil obligations. That Christians would one day themselves exercise such authority is simply not envisaged. There is nothing specifically Christian about the appeal and no distinction is drawn between Christian and non-Christian members of the social order; that simply underscores one intent of the passage to urge on Paul's readers the fulfillment of their civil obligations, not just the pleasant ones and to forestall any reading of his earlier plea "not to be conformed to this present age" (12:2) as an exemption from them. Paul's language accords with this; the words "servant" (v. 4, twice) and "officers" (v. 6, JB) are standard secular terms for public functionaries and any religious connotation comes only from the attached possessive, "God's."

Second, the Greek verb used in the opening imperative belongs to the basic vocabulary of NT hortatory tradition; its root stem denotes "order" ("be subordinate to"), and it is used in this tradition to invite and summon participation in an order presumed to be hierarchical in nature, whether political (1 Pet. 2:13; Titus 3:1), or familial (of wives, Col. 3:18; Eph. 5:22, 24; 1 Pet. 3:1, 5; Titus 2:5; of household slaves, 1 Pet. 2:18; Titus 2:9). The verb is not a simple synonym for "obey"; it is never used in these NT codes of household obligations for the obedience of children to parents. Here in Rom. 13:1–2, Paul's own use of three additional Greek cognates derived from the same stem (translated "instituted," "rebels," and "institution" by the NEB) shows he is deliberately appropriating this denotation of "order," which earlier in Romans embraces the natural creation (8:20; cf. 1 Cor. 15:27–28). At the same time, Paul's use of this verb in 8:7 and 10:3 demonstrates that this subordination involves for him the recognition or acknowledgment that inspires voluntary submission. (Vivid corroboration is provided by 1 Cor. 16:15b–16, where his appeal to "be subject" is grounded in recognition of the role played by leaders, probably including women, who have dedicated or "submitted" themselves to ministry; this "order" within the religious community, 1 Cor. 14:32, 40, is closely related to its health and "peace," for God himself is not a God of anarchy, 1 Cor. 14:33.)

Third, this (necessarily) hierarchical conception of order has two implications that connect the passage with well-established traditions and so shed further light on its meaning. One is that all authority is derivative and ultimately dependent on God's authorization and sufferance, a deep-seated Jewish conviction documented in the OT prophets (Isa. 41:1–4; 45:1–3; Dan. 2:21), wisdom literature (Prov. 8:15; Sir. 10:4; 17:17; Wisd. of Sol. 6:1–3) and apocalyptic (1 Enoch 46:5; 2 Apoc. Bar. 82:9; cf. also Let. Arist. 196, 219, 224). This firm certainty, given its most vivid NT formulation in John 19:11, underlies both Rom. 13:1–7 and Revelation 13 (a passage that does not share Paul's present benign perspective on Roman imperial power and so is often too simply played off against Rom. 13). Contrary to the use often made of Rom. 13:1b to absolutize political authority, this perception binds all earthly power to God's ultimate sovereignty and thus limits and relativizes the former, just as the OT claim that the earth is the Lord's desacralizes the earth's seasons and fertility and prohibits their religious veneration (cf. 1 Cor. 10:26; Ps. 50:7–15; Hos. 2:8). Closely allied with this view of authority as derivative is the Hellenistic Jewish premise, plainly underlying vv. 3–4, that the purpose of civil authority is to reward and encourage good conduct as well as to punish and inhibit evil (cf. 1 Pet. 2:14; Let. Arist. 280, 291–92); the passage is thus informed less by a naive indulgence toward political power than by a traditional view of its noble ends that is neither contemptuous of authority as such nor extravagant in its esteem for it. This explains v. 5b, which introduces the sanction of conscience; these civil obligations are to be honored on the basis of one's prior cognizance of good and evil and one's own responsibility to the good. Beyond this, questions of illegitimate authority or the abuse of power are simply not raised; the passage shares with Mark 12:17; Matt. 22:21; Luke 20:25 a basic assent to the legitimacy of Roman power.

Fourth, this passage is distinguished from its parallels in 1 Pet. 2:13–14; 1 Tim. 2:1–2; Titus 3:1, first, by Paul's warning against resistance or "defiance of order" (v. 2) and second, by a striking emphasis on "fear" of authority (vv. 3a, 3b, 4). What is meant is a proper and deserved fear, since the authority itself is assumed to be legitimate, and the aim is to counsel a way to avoid such "fear," not to aggravate it. Just these distinctive features of the passage have invited later political use of it to force submission to the holders of power, but they actually show that Paul is interested in stabilizing the attitudes of religious subjects toward existing bearers of authority. In Paul's world the tendency of religious movements was to clothe imperial power with the absolutes of either the divine (→ Augustus; Rome: Augustus) or the demonic (cf. Rev. 13), to heighten fear, and especially in some Jewish circles to spill over into active political resistance (→ Zealot). While Paul may have thought to quiet some particular political tendency in Rome such as the "tumults" that led Claudius to expel the Jews from Rome shortly before (see above "Introduction: The Occasion and Purpose of Romans"), his overriding aim is to encourage the fulfillment of social obligations in a context of trust in God and recognition of his prevailing sovereignty and order. This is consistent with both Paul's preceding counsel against resorting to revenge (12:19–21) and his subsequent pointer to God's approaching salvation as reason for sobriety in daily conduct (13:12–13).

13:8–10, Love as the Fulfillment of the Mosaic Law. Verse 8a links this new paragraph both with the preceding, by repeating v. 7a in negative form, and with 12:9–13, by resuming its leading injunction to love. But the major contribution of this unit in the context of Romans as a whole lies in its interpretation of the law. The one continuing obligation of the Christian life that is never paid off is "the debt of mutual love" (v. 8a, JB). The reason for this is not that the law remains unfulfilled or only partially fulfilled (in all of Paul's argument in Romans with respect to justification and the law, the issue has never revolved upon the degree to which the law is fulfilled or not). Instead, the reason is simply the law's abiding claim: one who loves "the other person" (v. 8b), the "next person" in one's daily contact (v. 10, almost universally translated "neighbor"), "has fulfilled the law" (v. 8b)—a gnomic statement of principle that defines what it is that the Mosaic law truly requires in human relations and what brings it to its "fulfillment" (v. 10b). Human relations are in view; the four commandments Paul cites (in the order of the LXX in Deut. 5:17–18, as in Luke 18:20; James 2:11) are limited to the so-called "second table" of the Decalogue, those negative commands that shield human life from violation, but he makes clear that "any other [such] commandment" (v. 9) is included in the representation of these four. All are "summed up" in the command to love one's neighbor as oneself (Lev. 19:18; cf. Gal. 5:14). While similar attempts to summarize the law are found in contemporary Judaism (→ Commandment; Golden Rule), Paul's straightforward use of Lev. 19:18 as the summary seems to derive from the Jesus tradition (Matt. 22:34–40; Mark 12:28–34; Luke 10:25–28; cf. Matt. 7:12). On the other hand, there is no hint here of the "double commandment" of Jesus, which pairs love of neighbor to love of God. In Paul's Letters "love of God" is always God's own love; human love for God is mentioned only in Rom. 8:28; 1 Cor. 2:9; and 8:3, in all three instances only to be overshadowed by human debt to God's generosity and initiative. For Paul the more appropriate human response to God's love and compassion (Rom. 12:1) is honor and thanksgiving (1:21) and trust (4:20–21) in God on the one hand, and, on the other, this love toward neighbor that is nothing else than the reordering of human life in accordance with God's will (12:2). For this is the substance of the law, the never ending claim of God on human life embodied in God's "holy, just, and good commandment" (7:12) that Paul's gospel never undermines but only confirms (3:31b; cf. 8:4).

13:11–14, Living for God's Coming Day. A final section concludes these basic exhortations and forms a closing bracket to 12:1–2. Where Paul had begun by urging his readers to abandon the patterns of "this [present] age" (12:2), he now asks for conduct appropriate to God's certain and approaching salvation. This orientation to the future and a host of new images characteristic of NT catechetical and hortatory traditions give the section a unity and flavor of its own. The "day" of God's wrath and judgment (2:5, 16), often spoken of as "darkness" (beginning with the prophetic tradition; cf. Amos 5:18), is now the day of God's coming salvation and stands as the polar opposite to the darkness of this world. (It is usually referred to by Paul as "the day of the Lord" or "of Jesus Christ"; cf. 1 Cor. 1:8; 5:5; 2 Cor. 1:14; Phil. 1:6, 10; 2:16; 1 Thess. 5:2; contrast 2 Cor. 6:2.) Such religious use of the opposites "light" and "darkness" is so widespread in the ancient world that it cannot be identified with any one tradition; Paul's clear dualistic use here is reminiscent of 1 Thess. 5:4–8 (see also Eph. 5:7–14; John 3:19–21; 12:35–36). When this antithesis is linked to the verbal imagery of "throwing off" and "putting on" attire (sometimes martial) and to the moral contrasts between indecency and propriety and the ethical metaphors of drunkenness and sobriety, the result is a telling hortatory fusion of images deeply rooted in the Greek religious and moral world with a Jewish apocalyptic sense of temporal urgency (cf. Col. 3:8, 10, 12; Eph. 4:22, 24; 6:11, 13–17). The final imperative to "put on the Lord Jesus Christ" (v. 14a) locates this homiletic-didactic language in the setting of early Christian baptism (cf. Gal. 3:27); if baptism attests to the individual's identification with the life pattern of Jesus (Rom. 6:1–11), and this "image" is the destiny set for each by the Creator (8:29), the companion ethical catechism will consist at its heart in the appeal to "assume" and embrace that image and live by it. For that is where each person's future lies, not with "the flesh" and the "desires" it serves (v. 14b).

14:1–15:13

Specific Exhortations

This second set of appeals forms the final block of material in the Letter body of Romans. At this point and until he resumes some of the conventions of the Letter conclusion in 15:14–16:27, Paul no longer makes use of the Christian catechetical or even quasi-liturgical traditions so apparent in 12:1–13:14. The lively dialogical style of his earlier chapters is recaptured. His characteristic mode of citing OT Scripture, with an introductory formula to ground an argument instead of by mere allusion, reappears (14:11; 15:3; cf. also 12:19); the catena of quotations in 15:9–12 exactly imitates the sequences of 9:25–29 and 10:18–21. Earlier in the Letter, as the argument moved away from the relationship of Jew and Gentile and the deliberate appropriation of such Jewish traditions as those surrounding Abraham, the scriptural quotations themselves almost disappeared (the exceptions in 7:7 and 8:36 are all the more noteworthy); these citations return in thick abundance with the subject of Israel and the Gentiles in chaps. 9–11. It is scarcely accidental that the earlier pattern of biblical documentation should reassert itself just as Paul's exhortations now converge on the specific issue of solidarity of Jew and Gentile within the Christian community. Finally, whereas the basic exhortations of 12:1–13:1 contain only two references to Christ (12:5 and 13:14), this new division is replete with them. The second of those previous two, the concluding baptismal reminder of 13:14, supplies a leitmotiv for these specific exhortations, and Paul's climactic appeal in 15:7 finds its leading warrant in a solemn Christological dictum on the significance of Christ for both Jew and Gentile. In all these respects, the Paul of the main argument of Romans reemerges from his more comprehensive appeals to press his controlling preoccupation with the unity of Jew and Gentile, i.e., all human beings, before the saving power of God. This section, once again, falls naturally into three parts.

14:1-12, Jewish and Non-Jewish Observance Before an Impartial Lord. Paul's terminology bears careful observation. The person who is "weak in faith" (14:1) is one who does not "have the confidence to eat everything" (v. 2), but Paul does not put a premium on the degree of such confidence each one is able to demonstrate (he does not call anyone "strong" until 15:1; see commentary below on 15:1). Instead, it is apparent that differences of religious observance in matters of diet and holy days are under discussion because they occasion reciprocal disdain and contempt within the community (v. 3). The recurring tensions created between Jewish and gentile converts to the Christian movement by such differences in daily religious routines constitute a running theme through the NT (e.g., Mark 2:13-17, 18-20, 23-28 and parallels; Acts 10:9-16; 11:11-18; 15:6-11; Gal. 2:11-14), testimony to the long struggle to find effective bonds to transcend pluralistic practice. At first the issue in Romans 14 does not look like one created by this difference between Jew and non-Jew. Abstaining from meat and alcohol (vv. 2 and 21) are not themselves characteristic Jewish observances. They could become so because Jews (and Jewish Christians) would prefer abstinence to partaking of either in the urban settings of the empire in which both were regularly dedicated to pagan gods before being sold in the market (→ Food Offered to Idols). So one is tempted to read Romans 14 in the same terms as Paul's advice to the Corinthians (1 Cor. 8:1-13; 10:12-33). But closer reading demonstrates that Paul is modulating his Corinthian experience to fit the argument of Romans (cf. commentary above on 12:3-8). At every point here the issue is the redefinition of values (cf. 12:2), and never, as in 1 Corinthians, the use or abuse of Christian freedom (the words "freedom," "conscience," and "knowledge," so central to 1 Cor. 8 and 10, never occur in Rom. 14:1-15:13; cf. 15:14).

Paul's fundamental appeal is to "accept" (JB, NEB), to take to oneself and into one's own community, the person of contrasting, even opposite, religious practice (14:1 and 15:7); his desire is to break the cycle of mutual condemnation that regularly results from religious zeal when it is lacking in trust or faith (14:3-4). A person's "standing" (v. 4), that intangible worth so fatefully linked to public religious identity and usage, is determined by the Lord to whom each belongs—a direct practical application of what Paul wrote in 2:28-29. The confidence that counts is not the confidence to eat everything but the certainty that comes from integrity in each person's life-embracing relation to the Lord, whatever the practice that accompanies it, and it was to establish that integrity that Christ's death and resurrection took place (v. 9). Jew and Gentile stand on an equal footing before God, alike dependent upon his vindication of all human religious practice (v. 4b; cf. concluding remark on 7:13-25 in commentary above), alike beholden to his gift of life to all through their inclusion in Christ's own pattern of death and life (v. 9; cf. 4:25; 5:18; 6:10-11; 8:11; 2 Cor. 5:15), and alike accountable to the God they must all eventually recognize (vv. 10b-12; cf. 2:6; 3:4, 19).

14:13-23, A Definition of "Right" and "Wrong." In this paragraph Paul clarifies the issues raised by eating and drinking in a religious context. Verse 13 plays on different nuances of the verb "to judge": one sense is to assess the worth of a fellow human being; another is to arrive at the settling of one's own values, the criteria by which those assessments of others are made. What is at stake is what one holds to be "the good" (v. 16; cf. 12:2b) or "right" and "wrong" (vv. 20b, 21a, RSV). These, along with their equivalents in the ritual law of the OT, "clean" and "unclean," are measured first by what violates the personal integrity and religious conviction of the fellow human being "for whom Christ died" (vv. 13-16). In v. 15 sparing such "injury" (RSV) to the other is the specific form of "accepting" (14:1) the religiously different person; it is a concrete instance of "loving one's neighbor as oneself" (13:9). Verses 17-19 generalize this process of definition by appealing to more conventional qualities associated with the kingdom of God, to what is "well-pleasing" to God or passes the test of human experience, and to what contributes to the common good. But vv. 20-23 return to the narrower subject at hand. Freedom is not the issue. Conceding to the one side that food does not defile (v. 20b; cf. v. 14; Mark 7:19), Paul nevertheless restates his earlier test, whether an action violates or reverses "the work of God" (v. 20a; cf. 15b). It is wrong for one to eat when one really believes one should not (vv. 20c and 23a), and right to abstain when not to do so would strike at the sensibilities of others (v. 21). The foundation of right action in every case is a right relationship to God, of trust (vv. 22a and 23). In the only use Paul makes in his Letters of the common ancient beatitude form (Rom. 4:7-8 is an OT quotation; → Beatitudes), he pronounces that person blessed whose standing before God is not itself at stake in decisions about right and wrong (v. 22b), for whom that anxiety-producing link between diet and salvation has been subordinated to secure trust in God—a kind of ultimate practical application of the Letter's argument concerning justification.

15:1-13, Christ the Paradigm for Jew and Gentile. Those who are "strong" and secure in the sense just referred to, Paul goes on, have an obligation not simply to put up with the failings of the less strong but to support them (cf. Gal. 6:2). This is the only time Paul ever distinguishes some Christians from others as "strong" (a word not used in 1 Cor. 8-10; cf. 2 Cor. 13:9), and he includes himself among its referents. But he does so only to elucidate such "strength" with the model of Christ; Christ is the suffering righteous one of Ps. 69:9, who remained obedient while enduring the ultimate derision that could be carried out in the name of religion. (For the role of Ps. 69 in the passion narrative, cf. Mark 15:23, 36 and parallels; John 2:17; 15:25.) This is the Christ Paul's readers are to "put on" (13:14). Such commitment to "please" the other rather than oneself requires the endurance and encouraging support that come from God (v. 5a; cf. 5:3-5), that give life a dimension of hope, and that the Scriptures just quoted are intended to provide (v. 4).

In vv. 7-13, a passage strikingly resumptive of chaps. 9-11, the precipitating dietary occasion for friction between Jew and non-Jew vanishes completely before the vision of God's end-time purpose that they be joined in his praise. Once again, the vision is grounded in God's defining act in Christ (vv. 8-9), whose whole life was an act of "service": first to the Jews as a surety of God's truth and faithfulness (cf. 3:4), by confirming God's promises to the patriarchs; and then to the non-Jews, as a demonstration of God's mercy, by including them in the praise of Israel's God. That this "power of God that leads to salvation for everyone who relies on him, the Jew first and also the Greek" (1:16) should continue to fill and enrich the lives of his readers is the real substance of the petition with which Paul brings the body of his Letter to its close (v. 13).

15:14-16:27

Conclusion

15:14-33, Paul's Ministry and His Plans.

Resuming now the personal conversation with his readers that was broken off in 1:15, Paul speaks again of his desire to extend his work to Spain with the support and understanding of the Roman Christians. Since he was not the founder of the Roman community, both tact and the compulsions of his own self-understanding lead him to speak in vv. 14-21 of his own ministry to the Gentiles in order to explain his imposing himself on the Romans. Of special interest is the priestly metaphor in which he casts his role (v. 16); by his bringing them into the range of "God's agenda," the Gentiles are themselves Paul's "offering" to God, and so provide the grounds for his "self-esteem" (v. 17; cf. 11:13). Yet he will claim nothing apart from Christ's own action through him to bring about obedience among the Gentiles (vv. 18-19; cf. 1:5). Thus his work merges into Christ's own inclusion of the non-Jew in God's salvation (cf. 1:16). This explains why Paul lays such store by not interfering in the labors of other (Jewish-Christian?) missionaries, a policy that seems to go back to his agreement with Peter and the other apostles in Jerusalem (Gal. 2:7-8) and which he justifies by applying to himself words from the servant songs of Second Isaiah (v. 21; cf. 2 Cor. 10:15-16; Isa. 52:15b; Rom. 10:20; → Isaiah, The Book of: The Songs of the Servant of the Lord). Paradoxically, just this practice explains his turning to a congregation someone else has founded for help in extending his own mission into untraveled territory beyond (vv. 22-24). In the meantime, however, Paul has to make a last trip to Jerusalem to deliver the monetary offering to which he committed himself at that Jerusalem conference and which symbolized for him the realization of one community from both Jews and Gentiles, a central theme of his Letter (cf. 9:24; 15:8-12). Paul's plea to the Romans for their prayers in his support (vv. 30-33) betrays both the significance he attached to this trip and the anxiety he felt over its outcome.

16:1-27, Personal Greetings and Benediction.

The concluding chapter comprises several items more or less typical of conventional letter closings. Some of them raise questions about the original termination of Romans.

Verses 1-2 contain a recommendation of Phoebe, possibly as the bearer of Paul's Letter to Rome. (For such recommendations, cf. Acts 18:27; 1 Cor. 16:15-17.)

Verses 3-16 add personal greetings to a large number of acquaintances, of which twenty-six are identified by name. Since so many greetings in a Letter to a church Paul has not founded or visited are surprising, and since there is evidence that Romans did at some time circulate without chap. 16 (see below), it has been suspected that this chapter was originally sent as a separate recommendation of Phoebe to a church much better known to Paul, such as Ephesus. However, chap. 16 in its present form could not have comprised an independent letter. The first two persons named, Prisca and Aquila, are known to have been in Rome earlier (Acts 18:2–3); they and others known to Paul may have returned to Rome after the lifting of Claudius' ban (see above "Introduction: The Occasion and Purpose of Romans"). It would have served Paul's interests directly to name as many individual contacts in the Roman community as he possibly could, implicitly commending them to the rest as advocates for his cause.

Verses 17–20a warn against false teachers. Their tone contrasts sharply with 15:14–32. The language is Pauline, but the content is reminiscent of Paul's earlier references to opponents (2 Cor. 11:12–15; Phil. 3:18–19; Gal. 5:11; 6:17; Rom. 3:8). Paul may be hoping to inoculate his readers in advance against possible similar opposition in the future. Ironically, these verses can be taken to refer to some more real and present danger in Rome that Paul knew about only if chap. 15 was composed largely with the impending situation in Jerusalem in mind rather than some crisis in Rome, i.e., if Romans as a whole is best explained by the "Jerusalem crisis hypothesis" (see above "Introduction").

Verses 21–23 convey greetings from Paul's associates. Paul often adds general greetings from the place of writing (1 Cor. 16:19–20; 2 Cor. 13:13; Phil. 4:21), sometimes from named persons (1 Cor. 16:19; Philem. 23–24; cf. Col. 4:10–14). The names given in v. 21 are especially intriguing. Timothy is Paul's oft mentioned associate; Lucius (the Latin form of the Greek abbreviated name Luke) may be the Lucius of Cyrene of Acts 13:1; Jason may be the Thessalonian host of Acts 17:5–9; and Sosipater is very likely the Sopater of Beroea of Acts 20:4. Thus v. 21 may be a list of the delegates who are with Paul at the time of writing Romans, preparing for the trip to Jerusalem with the collection.

Verses 25–27 constitute a formal and liturgical doxology. Both content and style are more characteristic of letters written later by Paul's followers than of Paul in his undisputed Letters (Eph. 3:20–21; 1 Tim. 1:17; cf. Jude 24–25). Since v. 26 does contain echoes of Rom. 1:2, 5, this doxology may have been composed just for this Letter, as a more stately conclusion for public reading. This is the more likely to have occurred if Romans circulated in truncated versions without Paul's own conclusion. The evidence for this, in turn, is provided by the appearance of vv. 25–27 at different points in Greek mss., even though chaps. 15–16 or 16 still always follow in extant copies: after 14:23 (the majority of late mss.); after 15:33 (one important papyrus ms. of about A.D. 200 or 250); here at the end of chap. 16 (the strongest early attestation); and sometimes in more than one, or none, of these places. This evidence has encouraged some scholars to suspect that all of chap. 16 was originally addressed elsewhere (cf. commentary above on vv. 3–16), but the same evidence also suggests that both shorter versions of the Letter were produced intentionally at a later time in connection with its wider liturgical and public use.

Verse 20b, which also appears in many mss. at different places, sometimes more than once, is Paul's own benediction, originally located as v. 24 after v. 23.

INTRODUCTION

Literary Function and Form

Acts 18:1–18 provides some background information about the origin of the Christian community in Corinth. Coming from Athens Paul had met in Corinth the missionary pair Prisca and Aquila, who had been expelled from Rome under Claudius (A.D. 49). Paul joins them not only in their workshop as a leatherworker but also in their missionary endeavors. Although Paul stresses that he has baptized the household of Stephanas, the first Christian in Achaia, he does not say that the community originated with them. Rather the house-church of Prisca and Aquila was the originating center of the Corinthian community of Christians. According to Acts Paul remained in Corinth for one and a half years and was accused of violating the Jewish law of worship and was brought before the proconsul Gallio, probably in the fall of A.D. 51 or spring of 52. Apollos, an Alexandrian Jew who was instructed by Prisca and Aquila in Ephesus (Acts 18:24–28), continued the mission in Corinth after Paul's departure. (→Apollos; Chronology, New Testament; Gallio; Paul).

According to 1 Cor. 5:9 Paul is not writing to Corinth for the first time. He sends what we know as the First Letter of Paul to the Corinthians from Ephesus in part because his previous letter has been misunderstood and in part because new problems have arisen, about which the community had written to him. Although both letters preceding our canonical 1 Corinthians are lost, the passing reference to them allows us to understand this Letter as a part of an ongoing rhetorical discussion between Paul and the community in Corinth. We know from 2 Corinthians, however, that the community was not always a compliant partner in this exchange (see 2 Corinthians).

1 Corinthians conforms to the general structure of Pauline Letters. It begins with greetings followed by a thanksgiving (1:1–9) and ends with greetings (16:20–24) influenced by early Christian liturgical language. The main body of the Letter consists of Paul's response to written questions and oral information. Some scholars have sought to explain breaks, inconsistencies, and shifts in the Letter by supposing that a later editor compiled it from several sources.

However, the majority of scholars consider the Letter to be for the most part originally written as we have it now, although some suggest that, e.g., 11:2–16; chap. 13; and 14:34–35 are later additions. The authenticity of the Letter as a Letter of Paul's is undisputed. Most scholars put its probable date around A.D. 54.

Interpretational Approaches

The majority of exegetes no longer read the Letter as a doctrinal tractate but as a practical-theological response to historically particular issues. The Corinthian community appears to have been involved in much discussion and to have sought Paul's advice—and perhaps that of others—about moral sexual behavior, marriage, celibacy and divorce, slavery and litigations, right order and conduct of women and men, prophets and ecstasies in the communal assembly, the eating of food sacrificed to idols (→Food Offered to Idols), the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection of the dead.

An interpretation of 1 Corinthians as a practical-theological address is not possible without reconstructing its historical, social, and ecclesial "world." Since the Letter is part of an ongoing rhetorical dialogue, the interpretation of Paul's rhetoric as well as the reconstruction of its historical function depends as much on the historical-theological imagination of interpreters as on their exegetical, historical, and literary skills. Three major approaches to such an historical reconstruction can be distinguished, though they are not mutually exclusive.

The first school of interpretation surmises that underlying most of the difficulties in Corinth was a certain type of theological symbol and belief system or, better, spirituality. It probably claimed the original preaching of Prisca, Apollos, or even Paul himself as its inspiration and legitimation. This spirituality of the "strong" or of Paul's "opponents"—characterizations that never appear in the Letter—is qualified alternately as enlightened libertinism, spiritualistic asceticism, or unrestrained enthusiasm. The Corinthians who, like Paul, claim to be Spirit-empowered persons, are therefore understood as advocating incipient Gnosticism (→Gnosticism).

More recently scholars have stressed Jewish Hellenistic wisdom theology as the speculative theological context of the Corinthians' praxis.

The Corinthians believed that they possessed divine sophia (Gk., "wisdom") and therefore called themselves pneumatics, "spiritual persons." Since in Hellenistic thought spirit is considered to be a heavenly substance that endows persons with a new nature, the Corinthians could have claimed such "spiritual" status of perfection. Once transformed into a new being the spiritual person no longer belongs to the sphere of the "flesh" but to the heavenly realm.

This notion that the higher soul or mind is the true self that belongs to the heavenly sphere of the Spirit is believed to have led to the conviction that the body's domain is the "flesh," the corruptible, material, and mortal reality from which the true self must be liberated. This notion of salvation has implications not only for personal moral behavior but also for relationships to less spiritually endowed members of the community. The ability to speak in tongues might have been for them a clear sign of such spiritual endowment and may have caused them to consider other Christians as inferior because they could not speak the "tongues of angels" (→ Tongues, Speaking with).

Paul in turn is assumed to argue against such an individualistic and enthusiastic spirituality by underscoring a communal and eschatological perspective. Against the Corinthians' understanding of transformation and perfection in the Spirit, Paul points out that they have not yet achieved final salvation and resurrection. Against their illusory claims to have become immortal by partaking already now in the divine heavenly sphere of the Spirit, Paul insists that they are still under the power of sin and death and that the resurrection is not yet achieved in baptism but only in an event of the future. In the interim time Christians must live out the "already and not yet" under the symbol of the crucified Christ (→ Eschatology).

This first interpretative approach, however, can be criticized for concentrating too narrowly on ideological issues and for reading the text too much in terms of a later belief system. It thus focuses on individual anthropology rather than on ecclesiological self-understanding. It conceptualizes the Corinthian situation too much in terms of confessional strife between opposing theologies and contending groups (→ Flesh and Spirit; Wisdom).

The second approach therefore maintains that the problems addressed by Paul should be understood as arising from the interaction of the Corinthian Christians with their own culture and religion in which they are still deeply rooted, although they have consciously distanced themselves from it. Most of the difficulties in Corinth can be understood in terms of this interface between missionary community and pagan society. It is not necessary or even helpful for the reconstruction of the historical-pastoral context of 1 Corinthians to postulate an antagonistic front of spiritual enthusiasts or Gnostics as a unified theological opposition.

Located on a narrow peninsula, Corinth was a natural trading center between East and West. Its commercial growth gave birth to a flourishing industry that was essentially based on slavery. As a cosmopolitan city it is a good example for the urban character of Hellenistic society and for Roman colonialism. The citizens of Corinth were not only Romans and Greeks but also Jews and Orientals from Syria, Egypt, and Asia Minor. Each of these groups imported its own religious beliefs, customs, and rituals. Thus religious syncretism was widespread in Corinth but not more than in any other Hellenistic city of the time.

Corinth was called the city of Aphrodite; its temple of Apollo was most impressive in its monumental size, and the temple of Asclepius attracted many who sought healing. In the center of the city one could find temples of Hera, Octavia, Venus, Fortuna, Hermes, Heracles, and Poseidon. Oriental cults attracted many. In the second century the Latin novelist Apuleius describes an initiation rite of the Isis cult in Cenchreae, the seaport of Corinth. Just north of the Gulf of Corinth the Pythia and her prophets mediated divine revelation. Prophecy, speaking in tongues, and ecstasy were highly valued experiences of the time. Public feasts and private meals of associations and clubs were celebrated in the name of the gods. It was virtually impossible to avoid eating meat that had been sacrificed to the gods either at public festivals or at private business or funeral banquets in temple dining rooms and homes (→ Corinth).

The key symbol in Paul's response is that of the body: the body of the individual, the body of Jesus Christ, and the church as the body of Christ. Paul's concern with the body expresses his concern with the religious boundaries between the Christian community and its pagan society. Since segments of the missionary movement in the Greco-Roman cities had relinquished definite rituals and purity regulations, they had also relinquished an effective means to maintain their special identity as a religious group in a syncretistic religious environment. Paul's emphasis on the holiness of the Christian community as body of Christ and temple is an attempt to strengthen group identity in terms of sexual morality (see Galatians, The Letter of Paul to the).

A third interpretative emphasis seeks to elaborate not only the religious but also the sociohistorical context of 1 Corinthians in terms of the social organization and ecclesial self-understanding of the early Christian missionary movement. Traveling missionaries and house-churches were central for this movement, which depended on social mobility and patronage. Like Judaism and other oriental religions so the Christian gospel was spread by traveling business- and tradespeople like Prisca or Paul. Such traveling missionaries brought a variety of theological understandings to the churches in the Greco-Roman cities and fostered communication among them.

The house-church was the beginning of the local church in a certain city and district and became a crystallizing center for converts who still belonged to pagan households. The existence of house-churches presupposes that some citizens joined the Christian movement who were able to provide space and economic support for the ekklesia (Gk., "assembly," "church") in their houses. Such converts often came from the ranks of "god-fearers" already sympathetic to Judaism. The large number of women among these leading converts is astonishing (→ Church; Proselyte).

As Christianity spread in a city, several house-churches were founded and their interaction with each other could lead to tension and dissension especially at occasions when the whole ekklesia of a city assembled. The tensions in Corinth testify to this. They had their roots not only in the breaking down of ritual or religious boundaries between Jews and Gentiles, but also in the breaking down of established social boundaries between freeborn and slaves, or between different national or ethnic groups. Although some private associations and cultic groups also admitted poor people, slaves, persons with different ethnic backgrounds, or wives to membership, they generally were more socially homogeneous than the Christian house-churches, which admitted persons irrespective of their status in patriarchal household and society to full membership.

The experience of such socially mixed communities is sustained in the theological self-understanding of the Christian missionary movement. The pre-Pauline baptismal formula quoted in Gal. 3:28 proclaims that all social and religious status prerogatives and discriminations are abolished in the new kinship relations of God's children, the sisters and brothers in Christ. The house-church did not adopt the patriarchal status differences and dominance-submission relationships typical of the Greco-Roman patriarchal household (Lat. familia). The early Christian missionary movement was therefore not a well-integrated part of its patriarchal society but stood in tension with it. Since customary behavior rules no longer applied, the ekklesia-in-house had to find new ways and modes of living together. Many of the Corinthian problems reflect an attempt to practice such a new social-ecclesial self-understanding.

Significance of 1 Corinthians

1 Corinthians is a rich resource of historical and theological information about the early Christian missionary movement in the urban centers of the Greco-Roman world. It allows us a glimpse of a local community struggling to put into practice its theological and communal self-understanding. The reconstruction of this self-understanding and of the socioreligious context of the Letter, however, depends on one's interpretational emphasis and hermeneutic approach (→ Hermeneutics).

However, the significance of the Letter as a major source of our knowledge about the community of Corinth and the early Christian missionary movement is jeopardized when commentators value Paul's response over and above the theological self-understanding and practice of the community. In doing so, they risk dissolving the distinction between the rhetorical situation as construed by Paul and the actual historical situation in Corinth. Whereas exegetes today presuppose the canonical authority of Paul and therefore give priority to his theological authority and rhetorical response, such claims to authority for Paul cannot be maintained for the historical situation. Rather than seeing Paul as the sole authoritative pastor, the following commentary seeks to achieve a balance; value is set on the Corinthian community in order to be able to understand Paul as one partner, although in retrospect a very significant one, in the theological discourse of the early Christian missionary movement.

COMMENTARY

---

1:1-9

Opening

The introductions to all of Paul's Letters adopt the basic conventions of Greek letter writing. In each Letter—with the exception of Galatians—address or greeting is followed by a thanksgiving or blessing.

1:1-3, Greeting. This address reflects the conventional epistolary pattern, "A to B, greeting," but, as in all the Pauline Letters, the formula undergoes expansion. Paul mentions as co-sender of the letter Sosthenes, who might be the same as the ruler of the synagogue in Corinth mentioned in Acts 18:17. Sosthenes is introduced with the title "brother," which might characterize him as a missionary co-worker of Paul's. However, Paul underlines his own authority by stressing that he was called by the will of God to be an apostle of Jesus Christ.

The recipients of the Letter are more extensively characterized. They are the church (ekklesia, the "assembly" of decision-making citizens) of God in Corinth. In Jesus Christ they are, as those sanctified, separated from the world. Just as Paul is by divine call apostle, so they are made holy together with all those who call on the name of Jesus Christ who is the Kyrios (Gk., "Lord") of all Christians. Confession of Jesus as Kyrios and the call to holiness are common characteristics of all baptized wherever they live.

While a Greek correspondent would have concluded the address with a "greeting," and a Jewish writer would have wished peace, Paul combines both forms, but replaces the simple "greeting" (Gk. chairein) with the theological term "grace" (Gk. charis). Both, grace and peace, describe God's eschatological salvation available through Jesus Christ.

1:4-9, Thanksgiving. Paul's thanksgiving reflects the Christian standing and situation of his readers and anticipates some of the major topics of the Letter. It also functions as transition to the first major section, 1:10-4:21. God's grace is manifest in the giftedness of the community, which is rich in every respect, especially in speech and knowledge. The proclamation of Christ was confirmed among them so that they do not lack in any spiritual gift during the end-time waiting for the Parousia of Christ (→ Parousia).

The thanksgiving concludes with the promise that God will sustain the Corinthian Christians, strong and irreproachable, until the Judgment Day and with the assurance that the God who has called them into partnership or association with Jesus Christ is faithful and reliable.

1:10-4:21

Corinthian Self-Understanding and Pauline Authority

This section is crucial for the understanding of the whole Letter, since in a rhetorical discourse the problem or issue at stake is stated in the beginning. This section raises two issues: the question of the authority of different apostolic leaders and that of their preaching.

1:10-17

The Problem

Paul has heard from the associates of Chloe—who might also have been delegated to carry the official letter of the community—that divisions and disagreements exist in the community. It is Paul (v. 12) who interprets this to mean that different groups are claiming different apostles—Peter, Apollos, Paul—as their leaders. Exegetes are divided on whether there was also a "Christ group" in Corinth or whether Paul adds this fourth group as an ironic characterization of their claims.

If such a Christ group existed, they might have insisted on the sole authority of Christ and thereby relativized the authority of all the apostles. Or they could have stressed the political messiahship of Jesus, just as the Cephas group might have argued for the foundational character of Simon Peter and the Apollos group could have emphasized the eloquence and wisdom theology of Apollos. Paul's response that begins in v. 13 indicates that the first is more likely.

By insisting that Christ is not divided and by rejecting sharply all prerogatives that his own followers might have claimed on the grounds that he baptized them, Paul seems at first glance to confirm the position of the Christ group. However, he disparages their claims to stress the importance of his proclamation. He was sent by Christ to proclaim the gospel, but not with rhetorical skill lest the cross of Christ should be nullified. Whereas the Christ group might have insisted that they were independent of the apostles because they were baptized into the name of Christ, Paul reminds them that they are also dependent on him because he proclaimed to them the gospel of Christ's death and resurrection.

1:18-2:16

Discourse on Divine Wisdom

The discourse or homily on divine wisdom can be divided again into two corresponding sections, 1:18-2:5 and 2:6-16, which are related to each other as antitheses.

1:18-2:5, The Wisdom of God and the Wisdom of the World. This section is full of antithetical statements and revolves around the contrast between wisdom and folly or between the wisdom of this world and the wisdom of God. Its conceptual framework is Jewish wisdom theology rather than incipient Gnosticism.

In 1:18-25 Paul develops the message of Christ crucified in terms of wisdom theology. God has turned the wisdom of this world—which is pursued by the wise, the scribe, and the interpreter of this age—into folly because it did not enable them to know God and to understand the significance of the cross. For Greeks who seek philosophy and mysteries and for Jews who ask for messianic signs and miracles, the proclamation of Christ crucified is a scandal and folly. But for those who are called, be they Jews or Gentiles, the wisdom of this age is set aside and superseded by Christ, the Messiah, who is God's power and God's wisdom. This thesis is developed in two steps. At first glance this whole discourse on sophia (Gk., "wisdom") seems to interrupt Paul's defense of his authority, but the point of the following two subsections, which are the climax of the whole, indicates that this is not the case.

In 1:26-31 Paul elaborates the significance of the identification of Christ crucified with divine wisdom in terms of the Christian community. Whereas vv. 26-29 express the self-understanding of the community as the new creation, vv. 30-31 argue that God has called those who are nothing so that no one can boast before God. If anyone wants to boast they should boast in Christ, who has become for them wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.

✕ 1 Cor. 2:1-5 explains that Paul deliberately did not use eloquent words of human wisdom and rhetorical persuasion in Corinth. Here Paul sets up a strong contrast between one sort of authentication and another. He employs a technical rhetorical term ("demonstration," Gk. apodeixis) to show that his preaching in weakness is legitimated by God's power—a proof that is vastly superior to the proof of external manifestations such as eloquence. Although Paul ostensibly discredits oratory and rhetoric, he himself utilizes rhetorical convention to make his point.

2:6-16, Wisdom for the Perfect or Mature.

In vv. 6-16 Paul appears to shift gears suddenly when he speaks of a hidden wisdom that is revealed to the perfect or the Spirit-filled. Since he shifts here from the pronoun "I," used in the preceding and following sections, to "we," exegetes have suggested that this section is an insertion of preformed tradition that is non-Christian or an adaptation to the Gnostic language of his opponents. However, such an assumption is not justified, because the rhetoric of the whole section revolves around "I" (Paul), "you" (Corinthians), and "we" (apostles and missionaries). It is therefore Paul and not his "Gnostic" opponents who introduces the distinction between two classes of Christians for the sake of his argument in 3:1-17.

Verses 6-9 introduce the mystery of the hidden sophia of God. Paul's use of the expression "wisdom" shifts here from eloquence and the content of teaching to that of personified Sophia or Wisdom. In Jewish-Hellenistic wisdom literature the wise and perfect, in contrast to the foolish and babes, enjoyed the intimate relationship with divine Sophia who was the agent of creation and salvation. Paul identifies the divine figure of Sophia with Christ crucified. If the rulers of this world had recognized the Sophia-Christ they would not have crucified this Lord of Glory. These rulers can be understood either as the human religious or political powers responsible for Jesus' crucifixion, as supernatural demonic powers dominating the present world order, or as a combination of both. To underline this great mystery of Sophia, Paul concludes with a quotation from Scripture (v. 9), though it is not found in our present canon. God has prepared such treasures of Sophia as the human mind has never conceived of for those who love God.

This true meaning of Sophia was, however, revealed through the Spirit of God (2:10-16). Paul elaborates this with reference to common human experience. Just as only our self-consciousness is aware of our innermost truth, so only the divine Spirit knows the innermost reality of God, which appears to be identical with the mystery of Sophia. Therefore one cannot speak of such truth in words taught by human wisdom but only in words taught by the Spirit that comes from God. But only those who are pneumatics ("spirituals") can receive the gifts of the Spirit; unspiritual, immature persons cannot discern spiritual truth. Those who are pneumatics judge everything but they cannot be investigated and evaluated by anyone. The whole argument concludes with the assertion that Paul (and other apostles or Christians) are such pneumatics who have the mind of Christ.

Application to the Corinthian Situation

This section functions as proof in the rhetorical argument of 1:10-4:21. After a transitional introduction (vv. 1-4) follow the proofs that are structured in three parts: vv. 5-9 discuss Paul's relationship to Apollos and their work in Corinth; vv. 10-15 shift from the image of the community as a missionary field to that of the community as building; and vv. 16-17 appeal to the community to realize their holiness, which shifts the image from building to temple.

Verses 1-4 connect the preceding discourse on hidden Wisdom, divine Spirit, and pneumatics with the rhetorical problem that has occasioned Paul's response. Paul who commands a wisdom unknown to the Corinthians could not speak to them as to pneumatics because their divisions, jealousy, and strife prove that they not only were but still are immature babes in Christ who can only digest infant food. If they claim to belong to different apostles and leaders (1:12) then they behave in mere human (fleshly), not spiritual, ways.

The rhetorical questions that open the first subsection (3:5-9) underline the absurdity of the Corinthians' attempt to compare different apostles and teachers. Although Paul recognizes some distinction between himself and Apollos, he insists that his and Apollos' mission are directed toward the same goal. Paul who planted and Apollos who watered are equal because it is God who gives growth and will pay the wages. Paul and Apollos are God's servants and co-workers who were mediators of the community's faith. The Corinthians are as God's field or building, the objects of missionary work.

The shift from the image of field to that of building in v. 9b, moreover, implies a shift in emphasis in 3:10-15. While the previous section rejects any comparison between Paul and Apollos, this subsection insists that there must be consistency between Paul's original preaching, which laid the foundation, and any subsequent preaching, which must build upon Paul's proclamation of Jesus Christ. Paul drives home this point by bringing the situation of the Corinthian community into eschatological perspective. The fire of divine judgment will reveal whether such subsequent "construction" coheres with the foundation laid by Paul. Thus in a subtle way, Paul makes the work of other missionaries theologically dependent on his own.

The rhetorical introduction to vv. 16-17, "do you not know?" recalls previous instruction. The metaphor of the temple is here applied to the community as a whole and thus emphasizes the unity of the community. To continue quarrels and dissension would mean to destroy the temple of God.

The argument of Paul climaxes in the peroration or summation in 3:18-23. In vv. 18-20a the argument returns to the thematic statement on sophia/wisdom in 1:18-20, whereas vv. 21b-23 recapitulate the theme of boasting and party divisions. This subsection makes clear that both topics are intimately intertwined. Paul concludes with a well-known philosophic (Stoic) maxim: "All things belong to the wise" but reformulates it as "all things are yours." By reversing the "party slogans," he insists that Paul, Apollos, Cephas, world, life, death, present, and future belong to the Corinthians but that they in turn "are Christ's and Christ is God's." The same subordination of Christ to God is also found in 15:28.

4:1-21

Paul's Authority

The relationship of chap. 4 to 1:10-3:23 is difficult. The chapter is usually seen as an application or as an appendix to the introductory section. However, if this section is understood as an apologetic argument in defense of Paul, then chap. 4 can be seen as the climax of this argument. In v. 6 Paul himself seems to indicate this.

Verses 1-13 suggest that the Corinthian community had attempted to evaluate Paul. Verses 1-2 sum up the preceding argument and articulate the standards of how Paul and his co-missionaries should be regarded. They are characterized as assistants or secretaries of Christ and managers or stewards of God's mysteries, administrative titles used for offices in religious associations and in civic service. What is required of such administrators is that they be reliable or trustworthy.

However, Paul does not argue that this criterion should also be used for evaluating him and his work. He eschews any evaluation and control and warns the Corinthians not to judge him prematurely. The only competent board to judge him is the eschatological tribunal. Since judgment is the prerogative of God it cannot be presumed by the Corinthian community.

Verse 6 is difficult to understand but seems to make most sense if seen as a conclusion of vv. 1-5 as well as an introduction to the following subsection. Paul has deliberately applied the preceding argument to himself and Apollos so that through their example the Corinthians might learn their lesson not to pass judgment. Although it is almost impossible to know the meaning of the expression "Nothing beyond what is written," the overall intention is clear: the Corinthians should not become inflated with self-importance by favoring one apostle over the other.

The three rhetorical questions of v. 7 are followed by three ironical exclamations in v. 8a that are corrected in v. 8b. The image of the life of the apostle as a spectacle (v. 9) is elaborated in the ironic antitheses of vv. 10-13, which utilize the form of catalogs of adverse circumstances. Rather than develop theological arguments for his own position Paul seeks to undermine that of the Corinthians through sarcastic paradoxes, ironic exaggeration, and rhetorical insinuation. The Corinthians are pictured as being in full possession of riches, satisfaction, and ruling power, as wise, strong, and honored. In contrast to them, the apostles are likened to criminals sentenced to death, to fools for Christ's sake; they are weak and despised, hungry and thirsty, ill-clad, homeless, working with their own hands, reviled, persecuted, slandered, the refuse and scum of the world. To take these exaggerated and ironic antitheses as historical information on the actual situation in Corinth would mean seriously to misconstrue the rhetoric of Paul (→ Apostle).

In 4:14-21 Paul changes tone and argument. He insists that his purpose is not to shame the Corinthians but to admonish them. This adoption of a conciliatory attitude is possible because of a shift in argument. In the preceding section he had insisted that all apostles and missionaries were equally servants of Christ and God and that therefore the Corinthians should not choose one over the other. Now he argues that, although they may have a myriad of tutors or "schoolmasters" in Christ, they have only one spiritual father—Paul, who begot them, i.e., whose missionary work converted them.

The Corinthians should imitate Paul's example and his teaching. Timothy has been sent to them because he exhibits what it means to be a "faithful child" of Paul and is fit to remind them of his teachings. However, they should not mistake this to mean that Paul himself would not come or even suspect that he will not appear in person because he feels inferior to other teachers. To the contrary, Paul threatens, he might come sooner than they think. He will then find out whether those who are arrogant are not merely eloquent but have power as well. He grounds his judgment in the nature of the reign of God, which consists not in eloquence but in power. Paul's final rhetorical question underlines his claim to unique authority and power for punishing or rewarding his offspring. It is up to the Corinthians whether he will come with a rod or in love and gentleness.

5:1-7:40

How to Live the Baptismal Self-Understanding

It is debated whether chaps. 5-6 are the conclusion of the first part of the Letter responding to oral information or whether they are a transition to the second part in which Paul answers written inquiries. Chap. 7 is then understood as the opening of the second part of the Letter since there Paul explicitly addresses issues about which the Corinthians had written.

However, the three chapters not only form a thematic unity but might also be a response to a previous letter of Paul. While chaps. 5 and 6 explicitly correct a misunderstanding of this previous letter (5:9), 7:1-11:1 addresses questions that could have been occasioned by it. Scholars have suggested that 2 Cor. 6:14-7:1 might be a surviving fragment of the previous letter since it prohibits association with immoral persons (cf. 1 Cor. 5), likens the individual member of the community to the temple of God (cf. 1 Cor. 6), probably refers to intermarriage with unbelievers (cf. 1 Cor. 7), and raises the question of idols (cf. 1 Cor. 8-10).

Insiders and Outsiders

5:1-13, Association with Immoral Members. Verses 1-5 chastise the community for not expelling a man living with his stepmother (who probably was not a Christian because she is not criticized). Since such a marriage was forbidden not only by Jewish but also by Roman law, it is possible that the couple was not married but only cohabited. Paul considers this to be a case of gross immorality. Therefore, he argues, the Corinthians should be filled with a sense of sadness rather than pride about it. They should expel the man from the community as Paul has already done, even though he is absent from the community. Paul's frustration indicates that he could not intervene directly and expel the sinner on his own authority, because only the assembled community had the right to make this decision.

However, determining the meaning of v. 5 is difficult. Paul's concern is primarily for the purity of the community and not so much for the fate of the offender. Expelled from the church the offender will be subjected to the vicissitudes of life, to suffering and death, the domain of Satan, which he has to suffer by himself without communal support so that he may be saved at the last day. Paul's reasoning for this excommunication had a disastrous effect in later centuries when the church had the power to sentence sinners, heretics, and witches to torture and death to save their souls.

However, it must be asked why the Corinthians had not acted on their own, if the case was so clear-cut? Why were they proud of such immoral behavior that was offensive even to pagans? The attitude of the Corinthians becomes understandable when we recall that according to rabbinic teachings the proselyte is like a newborn child. This notion is reflected in 4:15, where Paul insists that he has begotten the Corinthians through the gospel. In 2 Cor. 5:17 Paul speaks of those "who are in Christ" as "a new creation."

Connected with this understanding of conversion was the Jewish belief that the convert's previous social relations no longer exist. Therefore, in principle the rules of incest and marriage no longer apply. However, to avoid public scandal the rabbis modified this principle to be applied only in accordance with pagan laws. If this is the theological context of the situation in Corinth, then it is understandable why the Corinthians not only tolerated this relationship but saw it as a realization of their new life in Christ to which the restrictions of Greco-Roman law no longer applied. Verses 6-8 allude to this belief but reinterpret it. Rather than being a sign of the new life and freedom, this scandalous practice is a remnant of the old age. This is illustrated in v. 6 by a proverb about leaven that is similar to the English saying, "A rotten apple spoils the whole barrel."

Verses 7-8 connect this proverbial saying with the Jewish Passover ritual. In the Jewish religion leaven is the symbol of all that is unclean and evil and therefore must scrupulously be removed from all houses before the Passover feast. Similarly the Corinthians must remove the leaven of sin so that they will be like the batch of unleavened dough that they actually are. Their feast has already begun because their paschal lamb, Christ, has already been slain. Therefore, they should cleanse their house from the old leaven of malice and evil to celebrate the feast with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. In sum, vv. 6-8 are a further theological justification for Paul's demand to expel the man living with his stepmother.

Verses 9-13 indicate that this case of immorality was based on a misunderstanding of an earlier letter that Paul had written to the community in Corinth. Just as 2 Cor. 6:14 insists, "Do not be mismatched with unbelievers. For what partnership have righteousness and iniquity?" so Paul had instructed the Corinthians, "Do not associate with immoral persons" (v. 9). The Corinthians had understood this to mean not to associate with non-Christians. The boundaries establishing Christian identity were drawn between those who were members of the community and those outside of it.

In vv. 10-11 Paul clarifies his position by explaining that he did not have in mind the immoral persons of this world, for then Christians would have to move out of the world. What he actually had meant was not to associate with immoral Christians. Paul derives his characterization of the immoral person in vv. 10-11 from the traditional catalog of vices that was commonplace in popular philosophy and had already been appropriated by Hellenistic Judaism. The recognition of the formal character of such lists of vices and virtues prohibits our reading them as referring to actual problems in Corinth. Such lists are used to typify universal moral values. Here the catalog of vices is used to illustrate Paul's point that the Corinthians should not associate or have any social interaction (not even to eat) with Christians who are publicly known for their moral failure.

Verses 12-13 refer to 5:1-5 and close the argument for expelling the immoral man from the community. Paul insists that neither he himself nor the community is competent to judge outsiders. It is God who will judge those who are outside, but it is the task of the community to pass judgment on those who are inside. Paul thus maintains the dualistic distinction between outsider and insider, but he extends it to members within the community. However, Paul does not appeal to any community leaders to pass such judgment. It is the whole community that is exhorted to exercise its authority of judgment and to exclude the wicked person from its midst (Deut. 17:7, Septuagint).

6:1-11, Call to Judgment and Lawsuits Before Outsiders. Again this section can be divided into two subsections. Verses 1-8 deal with lawsuits among Christians, while vv. 9-11 contain an expanded list of vices.

Verses 1-8 are linked to the preceding section through their focus on judging and judgment. The content of the section is clear. Christians who have legal disputes and grievances against each other are going before pagan courts rather than letting God's people settle the matter. Paul argues that the community should settle its own legal cases because, as they well know, the saints (i.e., Christians) will judge not only the world but also angels. On the whole it would be better not to have lawsuits at all. Rather than to do wrong and to rob one another they should prefer to suffer wrong and let themselves be defrauded.

While Paul's argument is clear, the matter under discussion is far from being evident. The topic of this section seems to interrupt Paul's elaborations on matters of sexuality and immorality that are taken up again in 6:12-20. If 6:1-11 is read in close connection with chap. 5 then Paul would be criticizing once more the hesitancy of the community to pass judgment on other Christians. If the passage is seen in light of 6:20-7:40 then it can be surmised that the Corinthian lawsuits were caused by legal problems connected with institutional marriage. Such legal disputes could pertain, for example, to questions of dowry, divorce settlements, or inheritance. The Corinthians might not have considered them as "religious" problems to be adjudicated by the community, since according to Roman law marriage was constituted by legal contract rather than religious rite.

Verses 9-11 contain primarily traditional materials. The catalog of vices is introduced and concluded with the traditional Christian eschatological formula "to inherit the reign of God" (cf. Gal. 5:21). The list of vices is broadly the same as the one in 5:11 but underlines the sins of sexual immorality by adding "adulterers" and by specifying both the effeminate male prostitute and his partner who hires him to satisfy sexual needs. The two terms used here for homosexuality, which are absent from the list in Galatians, specify a special form of pederasty that was generally disapproved of in Greco-Roman and Jewish literature.

However, Paul is not interested in the specific items on the list but rather clearly shows an interest in increasing them to have a cumulative effect. Whereas 5:10 has four items (the immoral, the greedy, robbers, idolaters), 5:11 adds two (revilers and drunkards) and 6:9 expands the list with four (adulterers, effeminate, homosexuals, thieves) for a total of ten vices. While it goes without saying that Paul disapproves of all these activities, in the context of the Letter he is clearly concerned with heterosexual sins and marriage difficulties.

Verse 11 concludes the section with a reference to the early Christian baptismal tradition. The traditional pattern "once . . . but now" describes baptism as the moment of change from a former life to a new existence. Before their baptism in the name of Jesus Christ some of the Corinthians practiced one or the other of these vices. But now by the Spirit of God they are cleansed from sin, dedicated to God, and put in right relation with God.

6:12-20, Glorify God in Your Bodies. This is a transitional section that concludes the argument of 5:1-6:11 and at the same time introduces the theme of 7:1-40. Both 6:12-20 and 7:1-40 articulate problems of holiness/purity and sexuality from the perspective of the male members of the community.

It is debated whether in this section Paul cites a general principle that he himself recognizes but modifies, or whether he quotes slogans or statements of the Corinthians against which he argues. If the former is the case, then Paul agrees with the general principle "I am allowed to do anything" or "I am free to do anything" but qualifies it in terms of his own theology. He applies this basic principle to two areas: food and prostitution. The body differs from the belly because it is destined for resurrection. If the latter is the case then Paul quotes at least three slogans: "I am free to do anything" (v. 12), "Foods are for the belly and the belly for foods but God will destroy both" (v. 13), and "Every sin which someone may commit is outside the body" (v. 18b). Paul then qualifies the first slogan in a twofold way: yes, all things are lawful, but not everything is good or of benefit to me; yes, but I shall not be ruled by anything or anyone. He also agrees with the second slogan but insists that the body is not to be used for sexual immorality but for serving the Kyrios who provides for the body. It is God who has raised Christ and who also will raise us.

Paul continues the argument with two rhetorical questions that are also a statement: you know that your bodies are members of Christ and therefore should never be made members of a prostitute. Similarly, you know that someone who joins himself to a prostitute becomes one flesh with her, whereas those who join themselves to the Resurrected One become one spirit with Christ.

Paul does not argue here that the believer's union with the body of Christ prohibits intercourse. He assumes rather, in order to make his point, that intercourse with a prostitute is wrong but that sex is permitted in marriage. Being incorporated into Christ in baptism makes one a member of the body of Christ, the church, and at the same time one spirit with the Resurrected One. However, it is not likely that Paul refers here to an actual problem in the Corinthian community. Rather it is safe to assume that he gives an extreme example to make his point.

Finally, Paul admonishes, "Have nothing to do with immorality." Over and against the third slogan he maintains that sins of sexual immorality are sins against one's own body. He again underlines this with a rhetorical question in diatribe style that is really an assertion: surely, you know that your bodies are a temple of the Holy Spirit. Paul understands the Christian community as the temple, more specifically the sanctuary, of the Holy Spirit (3:16), and the individual is seen as the constituent part of it. His primary concern is with the holiness and purity of the church, which is threatened with the defilement of sexual immorality.

The whole argument climaxes in the statement that the Corinthians do not belong to themselves but to God. They have been bought for God as slaves are bought by a slaveowner. Therefore their freedom is limited. Those who have been redeemed through the death of Christ must bring honor to God in and with their bodies.

In chaps. 5 and 6 Paul explains his teaching on the distinctiveness of the Christian community and the boundaries between the church, as the temple of the Spirit, and those who are outside of it. Whereas the Corinthians understood him to draw sharp boundaries in terms of membership, Paul explains that he does so in terms of impurity, which he practically identifies with sexual immorality. Just as Jewish moral traditions of the Diaspora, in order to underline the distinction between Israel and the nations, stressed that sexual immorality is the result of idolatry, so too Paul insists that holiness and purity in terms of sexual morality are the distinctive marks of the Christian community.

Problems Arising from the Baptismal Formula of Galatians 3:28

After having addressed issues arising from the misunderstanding of his previous teachings, Paul now responds to questions about which the Corinthians had written (v. 7a). The formula "now concerning . . ." also occurs in 7:25; 8:1, 4; 12:1; and 16:1, 12. It does not structure the Letter but indicates whenever Paul explicitly refers to matters about which the Corinthian community had inquired.

Although all problems in chap. 7 seem to refer to marriage and the relationship between the sexes, Paul's reference to circumcision/uncircumcision and to slave/free in 7:17-24 indicates that the early Christian baptismal formula quoted in Gal. 3:28 provides the underpinning of the whole section. If the third pair—no longer male and female—declares with reference to Gen. 1:27 that patriarchal marriage and the procreative relationship between the sexes are no longer constitutive for the new community in Christ, then the extensive discussion of issues related to marriage becomes understandable.

Should married Christians continue or abstain from sexual intercourse? Should unmarried people get married? What is to be done if one's marriage partner is an unbeliever, either Jew or pagan? What should women do who are virgins or widows? Should one remain in an oppressive marriage relationship? Such questions can be seen as practical problems arising from the attempt to live the social relationships professed at one's baptism, although Gal. 3:28c is never explicitly mentioned in chap. 7.

The first section (vv. 1-16) addresses the question of sexual relations in marriage and of a life free of marriage (7:1-9) on the one hand, and the problem of divorce (7:10-16) on the other.

7:1-9, Sexual Abstinence. It is debated whether the statement "it is advantageous or beneficial not to touch a woman" (formulated from a male perspective!) in 7:1b is a response of Paul to a Corinthian question, whether it is a Corinthian maxim that Paul quotes with approval, or whether it is a Corinthian slogan against which Paul argues. However, the argument in vv. 2-9 seems to indicate that Paul addresses here a Corinthian question by introducing qualifications. It is clear from the climax of the argument in vv. 7-9 that Paul himself lived a life of sexual asceticism and that he valued this "charisma" highly. However, he insists, marriage is a necessity if one cannot live the asexual life demanded by freedom from the marriage bond. Those who are tempted should not abstain from intercourse. Both partners have the mutual obligation to marital intercourse, except for some limited celibate periods set aside by mutual agreement for worship. As was the practice in other oriental cults, so also Paul recognizes temporary ritual chastity.

Exegetes have pointed out how Paul carefully repeats every injunction in 7:1-5 to make sure that husband and wife have equal conjugal obligations and rights. However, Paul stresses this interdependence only for sexual and not for all marriage relationships. Moreover, he sees marital intercourse only as a remedy for uncontrolled sexual passion. Finally, the argument does not take into account the unequal status of men and women in a patriarchal society.

7:10-16, Marriage and Divorce. While Paul counsels those who are not bound by marriage to remain free, he commands the married not to separate. However, despite this instruction of the Lord, wives—who are mentioned first and with more emphasis in 7:10-11—still have the possibility of freeing themselves from the marriage bond. If they do so, however, they must remain in this marriage-free state. They may return to their husbands but may not marry someone else.

A somewhat different problem is raised with respect to marriages between Christians and "unbelievers." In 6:12-20, Paul had asked, "Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ?" and insisted that therefore they should not be made members of a prostitute. Likewise, Christians in mixed marriages could have asked: "Can I as a 'member of Christ' continue to have sexual intercourse with someone who does not belong to the body of Christ? Do I thereby become conformed to my partner's pagan existence and lose my standing in Christ?" In addition, as we have seen in chap. 5, Jewish and Christian missionary theology held that converts have become a new creation. They were considered to be like newborn children. Therefore the Corinthians might have believed that baptism into Christ dissolved all previous marriage bonds.

In response to this problem Paul insists that because of the missionary situation (God has called us to peace), the decision to continue or not to continue the marriage relationship should be left to the unbelieving partner but not to the Christian. If the unbeliever wants to stay married the Christian partner can consider the marriage bond as reconstituted "by intercourse" and the children of such a marriage are holy and legitimate. However, Paul's insistence that because of missionary reasons the unbelieving partner had the final decision resulted in many more difficulties for women than for men, since men were entitled by law to control the religious practices of the members of their households. Insofar as Paul sacrifices the right of the Christian partner to determine her or his marital status, he made it impossible for Christian women to divorce their non-Christian husbands, a legal option that often resulted in greater religious and social freedom, especially for economically self-sufficient women.

7:17-24, Baptismal Calling and Its Social Consequences. Exegetes misread Paul's maxim in v. 17 when they translate it as an injunction to remain in the social state in which one was called. To the contrary, Paul clearly does not advise former Jews or Gentiles to remain in the religious and social situation and state in which they were when they became Christians. Rather he insists that the religious and physical sign of initiation into Judaism (circumcision) is no longer of any social or theological significance for Christians.

Similarly the advice to slaves cannot mean that they should remain in the social situation in which they were called. Although many exegetes understand 7:21 to mean that they should remain slaves if they have the possibility to become free, the injunction of v. 23, "You were bought with a price, do not become slaves of people," prohibits such an interpretation. Paul's advice in v. 21 seems best understood as: if you still must live in the bondage of slavery, with no possibility of being freed, even though you were called to freedom, do not worry about it. However, if you have the opportunity to be set free, by all means, use this possibility and live according to your calling to freedom. Those of you who were slaves when called are now freedwomen and freedmen of the Kyrios, just as those of you who were freeborn have now a master in Jesus Christ.

Both freeborn and slave women and men are equals in the Christian community because they have one Kyrios. Regardless of one's social status, however, the decisive thing is to continue in the calling to freedom that one has heard and entered into in baptism. Although Paul refers here only in passing to the first two pairs of the baptismal formula Gal. 3:28, these references indicate that the questions of the Corinthian community were related to their baptismal self-understanding.

7:25-40, Freedom from Marriage. Paul's theological advice with respect to marriage is basically similar to the advice given to slaves. It is quite possible to live a Christian life as a married person, if that was the state in which one lived when one became a Christian, although Paul himself prefers the marriage-free Christian life over the married state. This comes to the fore throughout the whole chapter but especially in his advice to the "unmarried," that is, to those who are unmarried or divorced as well as those who are engaged to be married. Engagement is probably the best explanation for the thorny problem of vv. 32-35. If sexual desire compels them, they should get married. However, it is better not to marry and to remain in the marriage-free state. If the unmarried and the widows cannot exercise self-control, they should marry in the church; but in Paul's opinion they would be happier if they were to remain free from the constraints of patriarchal marriage.

Although exegetes have much debated the meaning of "virgins" in vv. 36-38, they have seldom pointed out that Paul's advice to remain free from the marriage bond was against Augustan Roman marriage legislation. These laws levied sanctions and taxes on bachelors and required the widowed and divorced to remarry within a year if they were not over fifty years of age, and therefore entailed conflicts for the Christian community in its interaction with Greco-Roman society. However, Paul's theological argument, that those who marry are "divided" and not equally dedicated to Christian affairs, disqualified married people theologically as less engaged Christians and missionaries. It posited a rift between the married woman concerned with worldly affairs and how to please her husband, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the marriage-free woman who was concerned with the affairs of the Kyrios as to how to be holy in body and spirit. One can only wonder how Paul could have espoused such a theology, when he had Prisca as his friend and knew missionary couples who were counterexamples to his theological reasoning.

Limitations of Christian Freedom and Power

1 Cor. 8:1 introduces the main topic of the section 8:1-11:1. It refers to the argument made by the Corinthians for a Christian's freedom to eat food sacrificed to idols. The same topic is taken up again in chap. 10. However, while 8:1-13 and 10:23-11:1 speak of things sacrificed to idols, 10:1-22 seems to address idolatry and the sacramentality of the meat itself. It has therefore been conjectured that they belong to different Letters of Paul or that Paul himself changed his position on the question of eating sacrificial meat. However, it is more likely that in chap. 8 Paul takes up the arguments of the Corinthians and seeks to modify them, while in chap. 10 he explicates his own position. Some exegetes have also regarded chap. 9 as virtually unrelated to the discussion on meat sacrificed to idols. However, chap. 9 is best understood as a rhetorical digression supporting the overall argument of 8:1-11:1.

8:1-13

Concerning Food Sacrificed to Idols

The central question of chap. 8, whether Christians are permitted to eat food sacrificed to idols, is clearly stated in 8:1 and repeated in 8:4. For a newly converted Christian in Greco-Roman cities this was not so much a religious as a social problem, since meat offered for sale and served at family celebrations, at gatherings of private associations and clubs, or at public festivals had passed in one form or another through religious rites.

Opposite: Remains of the temple of Apollo in Corinth, with the Acrocorinth in the background. Paul's letters to the Corinthians were addressed to the first-century Christians in this city.

Because Jews believed that it was idolatrous to eat such meat, they obtained the privilege to slaughter their animals and sell their own meat to Jews. However, it was almost impossible for newly converted Christians who were not Jewish to avoid the social occasions at which such food was offered. Moreover, for many poor citizens the meat served at public feasts was probably the only meat available to them, since meat was very expensive.

Members of the Corinthian community seem to have argued that they could consume such sacrificial food, because they all had the religious insight and knowledge that an idol has no real existence because there is no God but one (v. 4). This is explicated in vv. 5-6: whatever divine heavenly or demonic beings may exist, for Christians there is only one God whom they recognize as the creator God and whom they serve. Moreover, Christians acknowledge only one Kyrios Jesus Christ who is the agent of creation and redemption. In other words, the Corinthians' authority to eat sacrificial food was not engendered by their contempt for the body or Gnostic enthusiasm, but it was rooted in their understanding of religious equality (we all have knowledge) and their monotheistic theology.

Paul's response in chap. 8 seeks to qualify these assertions in two ways. In vv. 1b-3 he contrasts their emancipatory theological knowledge, which according to him leads to an inflated self-understanding, with his own theological key concept agapē (Gk., "love") that builds up the community. What is important is not that one has achieved some religious insight and knowledge, but that one loves God and therefore is known by God.

More significant is Paul's second modification. In v. 7 he denies that all Christians have received such emancipatory knowledge of God. Some recently converted members of the community who have eaten such food all their lives believing in the gods to whom it was sacrificed might not have ceased to believe in the divine reality behind the sacrificial meat. They are "weak" in awareness and faith.

Paul agrees with the theological contention that the eating of such food is social and not religious. No religious advantage or disadvantage is engendered by eating or by abstaining from such food. However, such religious freedom to eat or not to eat sacrificial food must not be allowed to become a stumbling block to a "weak" member of the community who still believes in the numinous and sacral quality of such food. Such persons might be encouraged by the pneumatics' example to dine with friends in pagan temples and thereby act against their conscience. Thus unwittingly those with religious insight and theological knowledge might lead "weaker" Christians to sin by wounding their conscience and thereby sin against Christ. However, Paul does not refer to an actual group of so-called "weak" Christians but only seeks to draw out the possible implications and consequences of the Corinthians' theological praxis. To do so he must declare some members of the community as "weak" or deficient. According to Paul not all Christians have arrived at the emancipatory theological knowledge that monotheism denies the existence of all other gods.

In conclusion, Paul asserts that rather than offending other Christians he prefers not to eat meat at all. This last argument indicates that not the wealthier but the impoverished Christians who normally could not afford meat might have insisted that on theological grounds they could eat such meat at pagan festivities. Since he cannot counter their argument theologically, he denies that all members of the community have arrived at such theological insight and he presents a hypothetical case to illustrate his point. While Corinthian Christians insist that all have theological knowledge, freedom, and power, Paul argues that some have a weak theological consciousness and are lacking such knowledge, freedom, and authority. Therefore the Corinthians should follow his example and not eat meat at all rather than incur possible offense. However, whereas Paul and other well-to-do Christians might have had the means and possibility to obtain kosher meat, Paul's argument makes it impossible for poor Christians to participate in pagan festivals, the rare occasions when they could eat meat at all.

9:1-27

Apostolic Self-Limitation

The rhetorical digression 9:1-27 on the rights and freedom of an apostle is not so much a defense of Paul's conduct as it is an argument, using Paul as an example, for a restricted use of power and renunciation of rights in free service.

Verses 1-14 consist of a series of rhetorical questions that center around the example of Paul. Since they require an affirmative answer, the section does not represent a defense of Paul's apostleship, although many commentaries read it in this way. Rather, it is an elucidation of Paul's apostolic freedom and power for the purpose of stressing his freely chosen self-limitation.

The argument actually begins with 8:13, since chapter divisions are secondary, and the retorical questions in vv. 1–2 continue the theme of Paul's personal example. They indicate his apostolic freedom and experience and cite the Corinthians' as proof of his apostleship. Verse 3 is transitional and draws the parallel between "how Paul defends himself against his own critics" and the situation of the so-called "strong" in Corinth whose behavior has drawn criticism from some segments of the community.

Verses 4–14 then elaborate positively Paul's apostolic rights and claims. This section consists of three rhetorical questions that state the obvious. These questions present ten arguments for his rights to food and drink, to be accompanied by a woman missionary, not to have to work for his living, and to be supported by the community. Whereas in v. 7 Paul refers to the everyday examples of the soldier, the farmer, and the shepherd to argue for his right to financial aid, in vv. 9–10 he uses proof-texts from Scripture (Deut. 25:4; Sir. 6:19).

Verse 12a positively sets forth the purpose of the argument in vv. 4–14. After having established his rightful apostolic claims, Paul asserts that he has not made use of his rights but has put up with everything to avoid placing obstacles in the way of the gospel. The latter refers to a major theme in chaps. 8 and 10 that Christians should not put a stumbling block before other Christians (8:9) or scandalize them (8:13), but they should do everything not to be offensive (10:32). The rhetorical question "Do you not know?" in v. 13 assumes that the Corinthians will agree with Paul's claim that apostolic workers have a right to financial support.

Verses 15–18 return to v. 12b and discontinue the form of rhetorical questions in order to restate Paul's own practice. Paul insists that he does not write about his renunciation of apostolic rights to claim them now. Paul has never accepted financial support from the Corinthian community and he is not going to change this now. Rather his primary concern and boast remains the gospel of Christ and its unhindered path through the whole world. His "necessity" or "compulsion" as well as his freely chosen action both concern the overarching needs of his work for the gospel.

Verses 19–23 are rhetorically well crafted. The seven independent clauses are followed by dependent clauses, five of which contain the phrase "in order to win over," i.e., convert to the Christian message. These verses illustrate the principle underlying Paul's apostolic practice. He does everything "for the gospel's sake" (v. 23). Although Paul has freedom and authority he has become a slave to the needs of all persons and has accommodated himself to various groups for the sake of his missionary work. He does not defend his practice, but he presents it as a personal example that the Corinthians should imitate.

Verses 24–27 shift back to the use of analogy, which was prevalent in vv. 4–14. Just as athletes do, so also Christians must submit to strict training and discipline if they want to be victorious. In v. 26 Paul switches from the image of runners to that of boxers who harden their bodies and bring them under control by enduring hard blows and bruises in order not to be disqualified from the contest. Whereas some of the Corinthians understood their new life in the Spirit as one of empowerment and freedom, Paul uses the images of slavery and athletic endeavor to illustrate the great effort that is required, even from apostles, in order not to be "disqualified" or to place a stumbling block in the way of the gospel. This section functions as a transition to the argument in 10:1–13.

10:1–11:1

Warning Against a Relapse into Idolatry

This chapter continues to support Paul's argument in the form of examples. It begins with an epistolary adaptation of a homily on Israel in the wilderness (10:1–13), then draws out the implications for the issue at hand with reference to the Eucharist (10:14–22), and ends with a series of injunctions and rules that are introduced by Paul's modification of a Corinthian maxim (10:23–11:1).

10:1–13, The Example of Israel. 1 Cor. 10:1–13 forms a literary unit that is divided in half by the contrast between "all of the Israelites" who have experienced God's gift of salvation (10:1–5) and "some of them" who rebelled against God (10:6–11). The five positive and five negative examples are concluded with warnings against temptations (10:12–13). Some of the tensions of this section in its present context are best understood if we recognize that this homily was composed prior to its utilization by Paul. This traditional Exodus pattern—a list of God's salvific acts followed by a list of sins culminating in warnings to the contemporary audience—is found not only in various texts of the Hebrew Bible (esp. the Song of Moses in Deut. 32) and Jewish literature but also in NT writings such as Hebrews or Jude 5.

Chap. 10:1–5 is a midrashic (→ Midrash) elaboration of God's gracious acts for Israel connected with the Exodus and the sojourn in the desert. Similar elaborations of the Exodus miracles (the cloud-pillar, the Red Sea crossing, the manna, and the water from the rock) are also found in Psalms 78; 106; Neh. 9:9–21; Wisdom of Solomon 11–19; and apocalyptic literature. The clause "and the rock was Christ" is a Pauline addition, and the baptism into Moses is probably a Christian construction analogous to the baptism into Christ.

These five positive examples are followed in vv. 6–10 by five negative examples of the Exodus generation—craving evil things, idolatry, immorality, testing the Lord, and grumbling or malcontentedness—of which four are allusions to texts in Numbers. However, one of them, idolatry, is introduced as a direct quotation from Exod. 32:6. Since the question of idolatry is at the center of Paul's discussion in chap. 10, it is likely that Paul himself has added this scriptural reference.

10:14–22, Implications. The general warnings and prohibitions in vv. 12–13, which are the climax of the traditional homily, are specified by Paul in terms of idolatry or participation in pagan cultic events (v. 14). The exclusive religious maxim “avoid any worship of idols,” which was characteristic of Judaism and hard for pagans in the Greco-Roman world to understand, remained in force for Pauline Christianity. It is followed by an appeal to evaluate for themselves Paul's arguments supporting the prohibition of any participation in pagan cultic events (v. 15).

Paul supports this injunction in 10:16–21 with three examples of cultic meal associations (Gk. koinōnia): Christian sharing of the eucharistic meal (vv. 16–17), Jewish eating of what is sacrificed in the Temple (v. 18), and participation in pagan cultic meals (vv. 19–21). Verse 22 draws the conclusion for the whole section. The organizing key concept of the argument in 10:14–21 is that of koinōnia, which in Hellenistic and Jewish writings of the time has the basic meaning of a relationship in which two or more individuals have a joint interest in someone or something. It describes the relationship that individuals find in their worship of a god or gods whom they have in common. The common point of comparison in all three examples is the eating of a cultic meal that results in koinōnia.

Utilizing a pre-Pauline early Christian eucharistic formula in v. 16, Paul argues in vv. 17–22 that just as sacrifice and cultic meals, whether Jewish or pagan, establish a community of allegiance, so does the participation in the cup of the Kyrios and in the one bread establish a special religious worshipping community, the one body of Christ. The death of Christ established a new covenant relationship between God and Christians as well as among those in Christ. This is a relationship with mutual loyalties and obligations. Although the participation in pagan cultic meals does not establish a special relationship with the god of ■ cult, since idols do not have a real existence, it does establish such an alliance community with demons.

The conclusion drawn in v. 21 is unambiguous: the character of the Christian community is exclusive not because of some magical conflict but because Christian and pagan meals establish different communities of allegiance. Such an insistence on religious exclusivism was uncommon in Greco-Roman paganism. The two rhetorical questions in v. 22 assume a negative answer. They draw on Deut. 32:21, the Song of Moses, where God says, “They have moved me to jealousy with ‘no-gods’ and provoked me to anger with their vanities.”

Christians in Corinth seem to have felt that they could join in pagan cultic meals not only because these were highly social in character but also because they knew that idols were unreal (cf. 8:4–6). However, Paul's religious exclusivism demands that they not be involved in cultic meals associated with other religious communities. Christians must not participate in dinner parties given by their neighbors in a pagan shrine. His position allows for no compromise in the instance of quasi-religious meals in pagan cultic places.

10:23–11:1, Injunctions. After having insisted that eating at pagan sacrificial feasts is strictly forbidden, Paul returns in 10:23 to a Corinthian maxim “all things are permitted” (cf. 6:12) in order to qualify it. Then in v. 24 Paul introduces a maxim of his own: Christians should never look out only for their own interests, but they must always consider the good of others. Verses 25–27 discuss two special cases of permissible eating: Christians are allowed to eat meat sold in the markets (v. 25) as well as meat served by a host (v. 27). However, in vv. 28–30 Paul qualifies his permission by insisting that even in these cases the possible harm to others must be taken into account. In 10:31–11:1 Paul develops interrelated principles for eating in particular, and guidelines for Christian behavior in general. Persons who seek to “glorify God” will not cause others to stumble but act for others' benefit, rather than solely in their own self-interest. Paul's own attempts to “please everyone” and “not to seek his own advantage” are both an example that Christians should follow and a motive for action: “Imitate me just as I imitate Christ.”

11:2–14:40

Communal Worship and Spiritual Gifts

Interpreters debate whether chap. 11 begins a new section, whether this chapter concludes the preceding section, or whether it is an independent textual unit. This debate indicates that chap. 11 forms an important link between the preceding and the following parts of the Letter. Whereas 11:2-16 (A) points forward to the discussion of spiritual gifts and their exercise in chaps. 12 and 14 (A'), 11:17-34 (B) connects back to the discussion of the Lord's Supper in 10:14-22. The whole section 11:2-14:40 thus follows the A B A' pattern and is composed as a thematic inclusion that begins and ends with the discussion of women's behavior in the worship assembly of the community. It shows that women as well as men have received the gifts of the Spirit and pray, prophesy, and ask questions in the public assembly of the community. The contrast between 11:2 and 11:17 indicates that in 11:2-16 Paul is not referring to any particular abuse.

11:2-16

Women Prophets

We no longer are able to decide with certainty what custom or style Paul wants to introduce here. Generally exegetes have conjectured that Paul is insisting that the pneumatic women leaders wear the veil according to oriental custom. However, such an understanding cannot explain why it was dishonorable for men to wear a head covering, since Jewish priests were required to do so (Ezek. 44:18). Therefore, exegetes have more recently suggested that vv. 4 and 14 prohibit men to wear long hair (Ezek. 44:20), since this caused suspicion of effeminacy and homosexuality. If, however, the text does not prohibit a "head covering" for men but refers to hairstyle, then the same must be assumed for women. Women prophets and pneumatics are admonished to wear their hair bound up like a crown rather than unbound, since this was in Greco-Roman understanding a sign of frenzy and in Jewish understanding a sign of adultery (Num. 5:18). Disheveled hair was as disgraceful for a woman as for her head to be shaven. However, whatever custom or hairstyle Paul seeks to advocate, it must not be overlooked that he does not prohibit women from publicly praying and prophesying.

More problematic are the theological arguments that Paul adduces for his injunction. Verses 3-9 consist of a midrash on Gen. 2:18-23 followed by a concluding statement in v. 10 that refers to the presence of angels in the worship assembly. Verse 3 introduces a new theological understanding ("but I want you to know") that establishes a patriarchal (head) or ontological (source) chain of authority—God, Christ, man, woman—a descending hierarchy in which each preceding member stands above the following. Similarly, Paul can declare that man is created to be the image and glory of God, while woman is the glory of man and hair is the glory of woman (v. 15). However, the midrashic argument in vv. 7-9 does not deny woman the "image of God" status but focuses on "glory."

In vv. 11-12, Paul concedes that women and men are interdependent and that "in the Kyrios" women are not different from men. Therefore to make his point Paul resorts in vv. 13-15 to the philosophic argument "from nature" that was widely used for insisting on the subordination of freeborn women because of their "natural" differences. Finally, Paul concludes this mixture of biblical and philosophical arguments with an authoritarian assertion in v. 16, probably because he senses that his theological argument is not very convincing.

11:17-34

Divisions at the Eucharist

While Paul praises the community in Corinth for having kept the traditions with respect to public praying and prophesying of women and men, he severely reprimands their behavior at the eucharistic meal. He mentions first the divisions and groupings among them (vv. 17-19) and he goes on to criticize them for not eating "the supper of the Kyrios" when coming together. Instead of waiting for each other they eat their "own meal" so that one remains hungry and the other gets drunk (v. 21). This accusation is followed by two rhetorical questions in v. 22 and a quotation of early Christian eucharistic tradition in vv. 23-26.

Verses 17-23 clearly speak of social class distinctions. Those who humiliate the poor and despise the "ekklēsia of God" are sufficiently wealthy to own houses (vv. 22 and 34) where they can satisfy their hunger. The rhetorical question "Do you not have houses . . . ?" is best understood in the sense that Paul wants to insist that actual eating and drinking of a meal should take place in private homes and not in the ritual meal celebration of the community. In his critique of the Corinthian community Paul underlines the contrast between one's own selfish, individualistic meal and the "Lord's Supper," between one's own satisfaction and the hunger and thirst of the poor in the community. However, Paul's advice to "eat at home" does not overcome this opposition but transposes it into the division between ordinary, noncultic eating and drinking and ritual or sacramental eating and drinking, between an ordinary meal and the "Lord's Supper" (v. 34).

In quoting the tradition about the Last Supper of Jesus, Paul indicates that according to this tradition the actual meal, the eating and drinking together, was an integral part of the eucharistic celebration. The breaking of the bread and the sharing of the cup mark the beginning and end of a meal that is celebrated in remembrance of Jesus. Since the traditional material probably ended with v. 25, it is probably Paul who added a further sentence underlining the connection between the proclamation of Christ's death and his eschatological return (v. 26). Paul thus sounds an eschatological warning.

That the eschatological judgment is already upon some of the Corinthians is demonstrated by illness and death in the community. Those who eat and drink without discerning the body, i.e., the Christian community constituted by breaking the one bread (cf. 10:17; Rom. 12:5), expose themselves to judgment. The community gathered around the table of the Kyrios must overcome its divisions. Otherwise it makes itself guilty and answerable for profaning the life and death of its Lord (vv. 27-32). To achieve such unity Paul is prepared to sacrifice the actual sharing of a meal. He does so to preserve the ritual exchange of bread and wine as a cultic symbol of unity (vv. 33-34). In conclusion Paul writes that the "other things" brought to his attention are of minor importance, so that they can wait until after his arrival in Corinth (v. 34c).

12:1-31

The Gifts of the Spirit

After the introduction in 12:1-3 follows first a section on the variety of spiritual gifts (12:4-11) and then one on the one body of Christ (12:12-27). The concluding remarks in 12:28-31 return to the topic of the variety of gifts.

12:1-3, Introduction. In v. 1 Paul returns to the questions raised in the letter from the Corinthians. From vv. 2-3 it can be inferred that the Corinthians had asked how they should test pneumatists for the gifts of the Spirit. This was a very pressing question in early Christianity and various criteria are articulated in early Christian writings. Paul refers first to the Corinthians' religious experiences and spiritual impulses when they were still pagan (v. 2). Then in v. 3 he articulates a Christological criterion: no utterance inspired by the Spirit can curse Jesus. It is not very likely that either in synagogue worship or in Christian assemblies those inspired would have shouted curses against Jesus. Rather, it is more probable that Paul construes an extreme case in order to underline his positive criterion: every inspired word is identical with the Christian confession "Jesus is Kyrios."

12:4-11, 28-31, The Variety of Spiritual Gifts. Although there is only one positive criterion for testing those who claim the gifts of the Holy Spirit, Paul insists that there are many spiritual gifts. The section 12:4-11 is a thought unit that begins (v. 4) and ends (v. 11) with the assertion that the variety of gifts is inspired by one and the same Spirit. Paul seems not to be concerned primarily about the unity of the community but intends to stress the diversity and multiplicity of spiritual expressions and actions. Such a variety of spiritual endowment is given to everyone for the "common good" (v. 7).

This diversity of spiritual gifts is elaborated with the enumeration of the workings of the Spirit in vv. 8-10. Each of the three lists of spiritual gifts in 12:8-10; 12:28; and 12:29-30 varies, but in all three lists speaking in tongues and its interpretation come last. Since in the second list "apostles" comes first, Paul seems to put first what is most important to him and mentions the least important last. Paul does not disqualify and repudiate speaking in tongues but he ranks it as the lowest of spiritual endowments. His concluding admonition to seek the "higher gifts" indicates that he is interested in establishing a hierarchy of gifts (v. 31).

12:12-27, The Body of Christ. To underline that members of the community have different gifts and functions Paul introduces the fable of the body that was widespread in antiquity. He applies, however, the image of the one body with its many different members at first not to the church but to Christ. Since Paul understands the church to be "the body of Christ" (v. 27), he can speak of Christ as a corporate figure with many diverse members. Through baptism in the one Spirit Christians have become one body or corporation. In this one but spiritually diversified community religious and social status stratifications no longer exist. Jews and Greeks as well as slaves and free, they all have received the one Spirit. It is often observed that in v. 13 Paul does not quote the third pair of the pre-Pauline baptismal formula in Gal. 3:28 "neither male and female," and it is suggested that he omits it because of the problems women had caused in Corinth (cf. 11:2-16 and 14:33b-36). However, such an interpretation overlooks the fact that here Paul does not use the negative form of the baptismal confession but states it positively. To add "men and women" was either redundant or, if "neither male and female" in Gal. 3:28 is best understood as "husband and wife," outright wrong.

After having stressed the oneness of the Spirit and of the body of Christ, Paul in vv. 14-20 elaborates that the individual members of the community have their own proper function and that these functions are not the same or interchangeable. If it is true that not all members of the human body can be eyes or ears, then it is also true of the Christian community that it needs many diverse gifts but still remains one and the same body.

In vv. 21-27 Paul offers a somewhat different accent. Just as the different members of the body are interdependent and need each other so also do Christians. Those who have the gift of tongues, for instance, cannot say to those with the gift of prophecy that they have no need for them. Moreover, those members of the body who are considered to be weaker or to have a more dishonorable function were given by God special attention and honor. Therefore, the diverse members of the body of Christ should not be divided but should care for each other. Because of their organic interdependence, all members of the body suffer if one is injured just as all rejoice if one receives glory. It is clear from vv. 26 and 27 that Paul uses the image and analogy of the physical body and its members to hammer home that Christians are interdependent and constitute a synergetic community, the one body of Christ. They have received diverse gifts from the one Spirit and therefore have different functions. The whole argument ends effectively in vv. 29-30 with seven rhetorical questions, each one demanding a negative answer. Not only are there different gifts but also different functions and ministries that must be used for "the common good."

13:1-14:1a

In Praise of Agapē Love

This chapter is of high literary quality. It has a rhythmic prose structure consisting of three sections: vv. 1-3 contrast love with other spiritual gifts, vv. 4-7 spell out what love does, and vv. 8-13 elaborate the permanence of love. Since this "hymn to love" is very well composed, it might have been written separately and inserted as a rhetorical digression at this point.

1 Cor. 13:1-3 repeats three times the refrain, "If I have . . . but not love, I am . . ." This section contrasts love with the spiritual gifts of speaking in tongues, prophecy, knowledge of mysteries, miracle-working faith, almsgiving, and self-sacrifice to assert the superiority of love.

Verses 4-7 describe the workings of love in three steps. First, we have two positive descriptions of love as patient and kind. Paul then elaborates in eight negatives what love is not. It is not jealous, boastful, arrogant, rude, irritable, or resentful, nor does it insist on its own way or rejoice at wrong. Finally, v. 7 states five positive ways in which love acts. Love joins in rejoicing at truth, supports, believes, hopes, and endures all things.

1 Cor. 13:8-14:1a returns to the theme of the superiority of love but explicates the contrast between love and spiritual gifts as the contrast between permanence and transience. Whereas the spiritual gifts that are partial or incomplete will pass away when the complete wholeness comes, love will not. The contrast is between partial and complete, not between perfect and imperfect. Since the Greek word for "whole, perfect" also can mean "mature," the following reference to childhood-adulthood is an illustration of it. The spiritual gifts, valuable in themselves, will be left behind when the eschatological wholeness that is love arrives (v. 11). Such an eschatological tension is suggested by the contrast between now and then in v. 12. Mirrors or looking glasses were produced in Corinth. They were made of polished bronze or silver and therefore gave a dim, distorted reflection. Paul compares such an "imperfect reflection" with the face-to-face vision of divine reality that will do away with our present imperfect human way of knowing. In the interim time, however, when speaking in tongues and other prophetic gifts are incomplete, three gifts remain: faith, hope, and love, but love stands supreme as the most excellent gift. Therefore, the whole praise of agapē climaxes in the exhortation "make love your aim" (14:1a), which is at the same time a transition to the next section.

14:1b-40

Spiritual Gifts: Prophecy and Speaking in Tongues

With 14:1b Paul returns to the topic of the gifts of the Spirit (cf. 12:31). He does not want to be misunderstood in the sense that Christians ought not to strive for the gifts of the Spirit. After having lauded the primacy of love he gives now first place to prophecy. This emphasis on "seek to prophesy" functions as an inclusion (vv. 1b and 39) that holds the whole chapter together. The chapter can be divided into five subsections (14:1b-5, 6-12, 13-19, 20-25, 26-36), and it concludes with a summary statement in 14:37-40.

The first section, 14:1b-5, formulates communicability as a criterion for the evaluation of the spiritual gifts of speaking in tongues and prophecy. Although Paul wishes that all could speak in tongues, he values prophecy higher because it contributes more to the building up of the community. Those who speak in tongues have received this gift for their own spiritual uplift, whereas those who prophesy edify, comfort, and teach the whole assembly. Because of its communal, communicative character, Paul accords prophetic speaking first place.

After Paul has made his basic point in the preceding section he now illustrates it in 14:6-12 with three examples why speech must be intelligible. As a first example Paul points to himself, arguing that the Corinthians would not benefit if he were to speak in tongues only. Then he refers to musical instruments. Nobody will be able to recognize the tune that is played on the harp and the flute or to follow the call of the bugle if individual notes are not played distinctly. Finally, he uses foreign languages as an illustration. If people do not know each other's language they remain strangers. The whole section concludes with the exhortation to strive for those spiritual gifts that contribute to the building up of community.

Verses 13–19 explicate some consequences for those who speak in tongues. If someone speaks in tongues, that person should also pray for the gift of interpretation. Three conclusions are drawn for Christian praying and worship. First, prayer should not only be ecstatic but also should be fruitful for mind or reason. Further, the community is forced into the role of "the outsider" by such ecstatic prayer, because it does not know when to respond and ratify such prayer. Finally, Paul refers again to his own example. Although he speaks more in tongues than any of the Corinthians, he prefers to say five understandable words of instruction rather than thousands of words in tongues no one can understand.

The section 14:20–25 draws out the implications for the missionary situation. After an exhortation to be mature in intelligence but mere infants in wickedness, Paul quotes Scripture (Isa. 28:11–12) in support of his argument that tongues are ineffective as a means of missionary communication. Trance and ecstatic speech serve as a sign of spiritual endowment for unbelievers but not for those who have faith, whereas prophecy is proof of spiritual status for believers but not for unbelievers. Moreover, if all in the Christian assembly would speak in tongues and an unbelieving outsider would happen to come to their meeting, such a person would judge them to be frenzied soothsayers. Prophecy, to the contrary, is able to convict and judge such unbelieving outsiders as well as to lay their innermost thoughts open so that they will worship, recognizing God among the assembled community.

The general statement in v. 26 introduces a new section (14:26–36) in which Paul applies the insights articulated in the previous discussion to the Corinthian situation. It sums up in a general maxim Paul's instruction: everything in the ecclesial assembly should happen for edification. The whole section is clearly structured. It articulates rules for people who speak in tongues (vv. 27–28), prophets (vv. 29–33), and women or wives (vv. 34–36) that are similar in form. General sentences of regulation (vv. 27, 29, 34) are complemented by sentences that concretize them (vv. 28, 30, 35).

The last two regulations are structurally different insofar as they are expanded with supporting reasons for the regulation (vv. 31–32, 34a, 35b). Moreover, it is debated whether the general sentence in v. 29 is the heading for both, or whether it applies only to the second regulation. The third regulation ends with a double rhetorical question that at the same time concludes all three examples. Such a structural analysis indicates that vv. 34–36 are not a secondary interpolation of the post-Pauline school but structurally well integrated in its present context.

The first regulation (vv. 27–28) insists that speaking in tongues should be done in good order and be accompanied by interpretation. If no one is around to interpret then speakers in tongues "should be silent in the assembly" and use their gift privately for their own edification.

The second regulation (vv. 29–33) demands that not more than two or three prophets should speak at the same time and should let the others weigh their prophetic message. If another prophet receives a revelation then the first prophetic speaker "should be silent." Two reasons are given. First, prophetic speaking needs to be done in good order so that all can profit from it. Second, prophetic inspirations are to be controlled by the prophets because God is a God of peace and not of confusion.

The third regulation is the most debated because it is not quite clear what special case is in mind. Is silence demanded from all women in the assembly, does it apply to the special case of women glossolalists and prophets, or are women prevented from evaluating the prophets' message? Since the Greek term for woman can be translated as "woman" or as "wife" it is also not clear whether the regulation applies only to a special class of women. However, what is clear is that silence is demanded in a special case. Just as people who speak in tongues, women and men, and prophets, women and men, are told to be silent in certain circumstances, so wives are admonished to silence, for as v. 35 suggests, the regulation applies not to all women members of the community, or even to all women endowed with spiritual gifts, but to wives.

Moreover, the text does not refer to speaking in tongues, to prophetic speaking, or to critical evaluation, but to speaking in the ekklesia, the public assembly. Verse 34b is then best understood to express the Greco-Roman sentiment and legal regulations for the subordination of wives and against public speeches and demonstrations by matrons. Finally, the prohibition does not apply in general to any speaking of wives but only to their raising of questions and entering into discussions in the public assembly of the community. The concluding rhetorical questions in v. 36 indicate that Paul does not expect that this injunction will be accepted without protest by the Corinthian community, which knows of wives as leading Christian missionaries.

This is also evident from Paul's appeal to the authority of the Kyrios in v. 37 and his threat in v. 38. Verses 39–40 reiterate Paul's main point in chap. 14: the Corinthians should strive for the spiritual gift of prophecy and not prevent speaking in tongues. Paul's major concern is thereby decency and order.

15:1–57

About the Resurrection

A structural narrative analysis of 1 Cor. 15 indicates that it is a unit of thought held together in the form of an inclusion (vv. 1–2 and v. 58: "brothers [and sisters] in vain"). Verses 1–11 form the basis of the argumentation. Verses 12–34 address the argument of "some" in the community that there is no resurrection of the dead but a resurrection of living people only, whereas vv. 35–57 discuss the question in which form the dead are to be resurrected—a problem raised by "someone" whom Paul calls a fool.

15:1–11, Foundation of Paul's Argument.

In this section Paul seeks to establish that he is a member of the apostolic circle and shares in its authority. This argumentative unit, which forms an inclusion (vv. 1–2 and v. 11: preached/believed), can be divided into three sections.

First, in vv. 1–2 Paul draws attention to the gospel that he preached in Corinth, that they have received, by which they live, and through which they are saved if they hold firmly to it. However, Paul is uncertain whether their faith was genuine (v. 3).

Second, in vv. 3–8 Paul reiterates the gospel that he has preached to them by quoting (cf. 11:23) a traditional creedal formula in vv. 3b–5 that he expands in vv. 6–8. This traditional gospel stresses that Christ died, was buried, was raised, and was made visible or appeared. The statement that "he appeared" occurs actually or by implication six times. Whereas Paul rhetorically states that he is the last one of those who have experienced a resurrection appearance, the structure of the text marks Christ's appearance to Paul as the climax of the whole series. This is developed in the third unit (vv. 9–11). Paul rhetorically asserts that he is the least of the apostles. At the same time he makes clear that he is the most dedicated and hardest working of all the apostles. Yet, he plays this down by pointing to the grace of God. Paul thus seeks to show that he is a member of the apostolic "we-group" to whom the kerygma is entrusted (→ Kerygma).

15:12–34, The Argument of "Some." This segment proceeds in three steps. First, vv. 12–19 address the argument of some who say "There is no resurrection of the dead." They are contrasted with the apostles who proclaim Christ as raised from the dead. It is debated whether the "some" denied the resurrection of the dead as such or only the resurrection of those who have died before the Parousia (glorious return) of Christ. However, if there is no resurrection of the dead (v. 12) four conclusions must be drawn: (1) Christ has not been raised (vv. 13, 16); (2) Paul's preaching is misleading and nullified (vv. 14, 15); (3) the faith of the Corinthians is in vain, they are still in their sins and deserve pity (vv. 14, 17, 19); and (4) those who have died in Christ have perished (v. 18). Whereas in Corinth both the kerygma "Christ was raised" and the statement "There is no [general] resurrection from the dead" could be held alongside each other, Paul relates them as statements exclusive of each other by adding "from the dead" to the traditional kerygma.

Second, after having pointed out the fatal consequences of this opinion for the dead and the living, Paul positively develops what the resurrection of Christ means (vv. 20–28). Christ is the "first fruit of those who have fallen asleep." Christ's resurrection as the first in a whole series is constitutive for all those following (vv. 20–22). Verse 23 establishes the temporal order of the eschatological events that are elaborated in vv. 24–28: first, Christ's resurrection and enthronement, then the resurrection of the dead at his Parousia, and finally, after having overcome all domination and evil powers, Christ will give up reign and power to God who will be "all in all." The resurrection of Christ and that of the dead are not independent theological data but are integrated as an indissoluble causal and temporal whole in the salvific plan of God for the world.

Third, vv. 29–34 are a chain of argumentation that takes up a position similar to vv. 12–19. In four rhetorical questions Paul appeals to the affective side of his readers by pointing to the futility of their and his actions if there were no resurrection of the dead. The first two rhetorical questions refer to the practice of the Corinthians to undergo baptism vicariously for their dead in the hope of saving them (v. 29). More than thirty interpretations have been proposed to explain this practice, but none is satisfactory. Paul does not question the merits of it but refers to it to elucidate his point.

The last two rhetorical questions refer to the futility of Paul's missionary sufferings and underline once more the absurdity of Christian life-style and practice if the dead are not raised (vv. 30–32). The whole series of ad hominem arguments concludes with two very sharp admonitions: "do not be deceived" and "become sober and do not sin!"

15:35–57, The Argument of "Some One." Adopting the style of the diatribe discussion

Paul posits a fictitious objector. The whole argument proceeds in two steps.

First, vv. 35-49 are subdivided by "so" into a comparison or simile (vv. 36-41) and an application (vv. 42-49) that seeks to reply to the objection of "some one" who might argue that if the dead are raised then they must have bodies. How and with what kind of body will the dead be raised (v. 35)? Paul's response first reminds the readers of the differences and commonalities between the seed and plant. Many different plants come from seeds that look very much alike. There are many different kinds of "flesh" (v. 39), of "body" (v. 40a), and of "glory" (vv. 40b-41). Just as the "bare kernel" of wheat and other grain is contrasted with the "future body" (vv. 37-38), so the "earthly bodies or flesh" of humans, animals, birds, and fish are contrasted with the qualitatively different "heavenly bodies or glory" of sun, moon, and stars (vv. 39-41). We sow "the bare kernel" that dies, but it is made alive again by God in its "new body," the fruit.

Verses 42-44 apply this insight in four antithetical parallelisms to the "resurrection of the dead." The two verbs "sown" and "raised" that are repeated four times speak of two successive events. The present body, which is characterized as perishable, dishonorable, weak, and physical, will be changed into the resurrected body characterized as imperishable, glorious, powerful, and spiritual. This argument is bolstered by a reference to Scripture. According to Philo (a first-century Jewish writer), the "first Adam" was made in the image of God (Gen. 1:27), while the second was made of dust and endowed with a "living soul" (Gen. 2:7). Paul corrects this sequence—by stating that the "spiritual" Adam, Christ, did not come first but the one of dust—to adapt the text to his argument for successive, qualitatively different stages. Just as we participate in the nature and image of the first Adam made of dust, so will we share in the nature and image of the final Adam, the life-giving Spirit.

Second, vv. 50-58 emphasize the need for transformation. Whereas the preceding section consisted of antithetical statements, this concluding section begins with a direct address. Having shown that it is possible to conceive of a resurrection body Paul now declares that a body different from our present one is necessary for the resurrection status. Such a qualitatively different body is no longer subject to the power of death. Whereas in baptism believers have been freed from the power of sin and of the law, in the Parousia they will be freed from the power of death. Therefore, Paul breaks out into a thanksgiving to God who gives final victory over death through Jesus Christ. Paul ends this chapter with an admonition to the Corinthian Christians to be steadfast in the gospel (v. 58), undertaking the work of Christ in the knowledge that their labors are not futile.

16:1-24

Conclusion

This last portion of the Letter contains a mixture of information and exhortations as well as personal plans and greetings. It refers twice to issues raised by the community (vv. 1 and 12) and underlines the importance of Stephanas and his missionary co-workers. On the whole, this conclusion to the Letter permits us to glimpse the everyday life of a Christian community in the missionary movement of the first century A.D.

16:1-4, About the Collection. These instructions seek to organize the collection for the church in Jerusalem. The Corinthians ought to put aside something every week so that Paul, when he arrives, can send those who are elected and accredited by the community to bring the collection to Jerusalem. Only if the community considers it advisable will Paul accompany them. Paul seems to be very cautious, possibly to avoid the accusation that he might misuse some of the funds.

16:5-14, Travel Plans. Paul first elaborates his own travel plans (vv. 5-9). He intends to stay a longer time in Corinth but has to go first to Macedonia and Ephesus where he has many enemies. Then he reminds the community again (cf. 4:17) that Timothy will arrive before him and that they should respect him and put him at ease (vv. 10-11).

Verse 12, about Apollos, is the last explicit reference to an inquiry from Corinth. Paul concedes that he was not able to persuade Apollos to visit now. He will come when an opportunity arises. Verses 13-14 add an exhortation to be watchful, courageous, firm, strong, and to do everything in love.

16:15-19, The House of Stephanas. Paul is glad about the arrival of Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, who have come from Corinth. The household of Stephanas was the first converted in Achaia and they have devoted themselves to communal ministry. Paul seeks to underline their authority when he admonishes the Corinthians to "subordinate" themselves to them and every missionary co-worker of Paul.

16:20-24, Greetings. After having sent greetings from all the churches of Asia, from the missionary pair Aquila and Prisca (usually mentioned first!) and their house-church, and from all Christians (v. 20), Paul writes greetings with his own hand (v. 21) after having dictated the rest of the Letter. He admonishes the Corinthians to greet each other with a holy kiss (v. 20b) and concludes with a blessing (vv. 23–24). Before this final blessing he introduces two formulas derived from the earliest Christian liturgy: the anathema for anyone who does not love Christ or God and the Aramaic invocation maranatha, which can be rendered either as “Our Kyrios come” or “Our Kyrios has come.” Unusual in this Letter ending is the addition of “love” to the wish of grace. Thus Paul underlines once more his major concern.

Literary Form and Structure

2 Corinthians is generally similar in form and structure to the other Pauline Letters. After the opening address (1:1–2) and blessing (1:3–11), an extended central section takes up various matters of concern to the writer and his readers (1:12–13:10), and following this there are some concluding admonitions (13:11–13) and an apostolic benediction (13:14).

Certain peculiarities and difficulties become apparent, however, as soon as one attempts a more detailed structural analysis of the body of the letter. First, it is not immediately clear how the lengthy discussion of apostleship in 2:14–7:4 is related to the references to Paul's visit in Macedonia that precede and follow it in 2:12–13 and 7:5–7. Second, the form, style, and content of the admonitions in 6:14–7:1 are not easy to reconcile with the rest of the Letter or with other Pauline exhortations. Third, there is a certain redundancy in the discussion of the collection for the church in Jerusalem (chaps. 8 and 9). And finally, the expressions of frustration and the sometimes scathing rhetoric of 10:1–13:10 are quite unexpected after the expressions of confidence and the tactful, carefully reasoned remarks in chaps. 1–9.

These and related difficulties have led many interpreters to conclude that our canonical 2 Corinthians is actually a combination of materials drawn from two or more originally independent Pauline letters, put together by an early editor, who perhaps also added some non-Pauline material. Thus, some read chaps. 1–9 and chaps. 10–13 as two separate letters (e.g., Barrett, Furnish, Martin), while others find as many as five or six letters represented here (e.g., Betz, who identifies five: 1:1–2:13 + 7:5–16 + 13:11–14; 2:14–6:13 + 7:2–4; chap. 8; chap. 9; and 10:1–13:10). Although a few have argued that 6:14–7:1 is a fragment of yet another Pauline letter, the majority of scholars either leave it in place or else regard it as non-Pauline material inserted by a later editor. Some commentators, however (e.g., Hughes), believe that all of these so-called "partition theories" are unwarranted and unnecessary; and indeed there is no specific evidence that 2 Corinthians was known in the early church in any other form than the one we have. Nevertheless, as will become apparent below in the comments on various specific passages, many of the obscurities and difficulties of this Letter would be cleared up if in fact a very early editor of the apostle's letters is responsible for the form in which it was received into the church's canon.

That various literary genres and rhetorical styles have been identified within 2 Corinthians is not in itself an argument for its composite nature, but in certain instances it may lend support to one or another of the partition hypotheses. Thus, while 2 Corinthians as a whole certainly belongs to the epistolary genre (→ Letter), chaps. 8 and 9 have been identified more particularly as "administrative letters" (see Betz, esp. pp. 129–40) and 2:24–6:13 + 7:2–4 and chaps. 10–13 as "apologetic" letters (see Betz, p. 143). Various styles are also evident in 2 Corinthians. For example, the style in 2:14–7:16 as a whole tends to be that of a teacher, while that of chaps. 10–13 is emphatically disputatious (exhibiting such literary devices as irony, parody, and self-display, often used by Greco-Roman writers against their opponents); and at certain points the style is specifically expository, as in 3:7–18 where, in the course of his discussion, the apostle offers an interpretation of Exodus 34.

As dependent as Paul is on various rhetorical conventions of his day, his own sense of apostolic vocation and specifically his sense of apostolic responsibility for the Christians of Corinth have also influenced the form and style of 2 Corinthians (however many letters it represents). To understand Paul's apostolic concerns here, one must obtain as clear a picture as the evidence will allow of the circumstances that prompted him to write as he does and of the full extent of his Corinthian correspondence.

The Five Letters to Corinth

Despite the headings under which they have been handed down in the canon, "1 Corinthians" and "2 Corinthians" are not, respectively, the apostle's first and second letters to the Corinthian congregation. We know that our "1 Corinthians" is at least the second letter, because in 1 Cor. 5:9–11 Paul refers to an earlier communication he says had been misunderstood. This earlier letter, probably the first he wrote to the Corinthians, seems not to have survived, although a few interpreters have sought to identify 2 Cor. 6:14–7:1 as a fragment of it. There is no way of determining where it was sent from, but it must have been written sometime in the period between the conclusion of the apostle's first visit (A.D. 51 or 52) and the writing of 1 Corinthians (the First Letter of Paul to the; see 1 Corinthians, "Introduction"; → Corinthians).

In 2 Corinthians Paul refers to a letter he wrote "out of an exceedingly troubled, anguished heart . . . through many tears" (2 Cor. 2:4; cf. vv. 3, 9). A few interpreters continue to hold to the traditional view that this "tearful letter" is canonical 1 Corinthians, but a larger number believe that the difficulties with this identification are virtually insurmountable. Accordingly, many have argued that most of the tearful letter is preserved in chaps. 10–13 of 2 Corinthians, while others think it more likely that it has not survived at all, even in part.

How many letters did Paul write to Corinth beyond these three? The answer to this depends upon one's view of 2 Corinthians—whether it is a single letter or a composite of two or more and, if it is a composite, how many separate letters it represents. The analysis preferred in this commentary identifies parts of only two letters in 2 Corinthians, written in the following sequence: (1) chaps. 1–9 (or, perhaps, chaps. 1–8 with chap. 9 as a separate note) and (2) chaps. 10–13. One can better understand the occasion and purpose of each of these when they are set within the broader context of Paul's Corinthian ministry as a whole.

Paul's Corinthian Ministry

Various reconstructions of the course of Paul's Corinthian ministry are possible. The following outline of his dealings with the congregation prior to the writing of 2 Corinthians should be compared with different, but equally plausible reconstructions offered by other interpreters.

The apostle's initial visit to Corinth (1 Cor. 2:1–5), during at least part of which his associates Silvanus and Timothy were also present (2 Cor. 1:19), probably took place early in the year A.D. 50 or 51. By the time he departed—according to Acts 18:11, some eighteen months later—he had succeeded in establishing a congregation in this important city (→ Corinth).

The letter mentioned in 1 Cor. 5:9–11, written sometime after 51 or 52, counseled the congregation to tolerate no immorality in its midst; but at least some of the Corinthians misunderstood this to mean that they should separate themselves even from non-Christians. This may be designated Letter A.

In response to a letter from the Corinthians and to reports of troubles within their congregation, Paul sent Timothy, probably by way of Macedonia, to remind them of the gospel by and to which they had been converted (1 Cor. 4:17; 16:10–11). Our 1 Corinthians was apparently sent simultaneously (perhaps in 54 or 55), although the apostle expected that it would be received in advance of Timothy's arrival. In this letter, which would be Letter B, the apostle answers a number of questions posed by the Corinthians, offers additional instruction, and requests a warm welcome for Timothy.

Subsequent to Timothy's mission, Paul himself evidently paid a brief "emergency visit" to the congregation, although the evidence for this is only circumstantial. First, the references in 2 Cor. 12:14 and 13:1 to an impending "third" visit presume that Paul has been in Corinth on some occasion since the eighteen-month visit during which the church was founded. And second, the statement in 2 Cor. 2:1 that he had decided against paying the congregation "another sorrowful visit" presumes that one visit had in fact been "sorrowful." Since nothing that is said in 1 Corinthians suggests that Paul would have described his first visit this way, it is probable that a second visit is in view. From what is said in 2 Cor. 2:2–11 and then later in 7:12 it appears that this second visit was unpleasant because the apostle had been grievously offended by some fellow Christian.

One may plausibly suppose that the tearful letter (2 Cor. 2:4) was written in the wake of the traumatic experience of Paul's second visit. To judge from the remarks in 2 Cor. 2:2–11 and 7:5–12, in this letter Paul chastised the congregation for not supporting him and for not disciplining the person who had offended him. This would be Letter C.

The tearful letter may have been carried to Corinth by Titus, one of Paul's associates. In any event, Titus arrived in time to observe the effectiveness of that letter in moving the congregation to repent and to renew its allegiance to Paul and his gospel (2 Cor. 7:7).

Titus's subsequent report to Paul, delivered at a meeting somewhere in Macedonia, was a great relief to the apostle (2 Cor. 7:5–7, 13–16). It would appear from what is said in 2 Cor. 8:6, 16–24 that Titus was then sent to Corinth a second time, perhaps almost immediately, to further the cause of the Pauline collection for Jerusalem. In this instance he was accompanied by two others (whose names are not given).

Chapters 1–9

If one identifies chaps. 10–13 with the tearful letter mentioned in 2 Cor. 2:4, then chaps. 1–9 (or some portion of them) may be described as "a letter of reconciliation" written after the problems addressed in chaps. 10–13 had been successfully resolved. A number of interpreters hold to this view. Others, however, argue that chaps. 1–9 must have been written before chaps. 10–13. If this is the case, then chaps. 10–13 cannot be identified with the tearful letter, and the situation in Corinth must have deteriorated markedly after chaps. 1–9 were written.

The second of these two views is the one adopted in this commentary. Thus, chaps. 1–9 would constitute the apostle's fourth letter to Corinth, Letter D. It was occasioned by Titus's report that Paul's tearful letter of reprimand has been effective: the congregation now regrets that it had failed to support Paul in his confrontation with an offending brother and has taken strong disciplinary action against him. Cheered by this good news, the apostle writes to assure the Corinthians of his confidence in them and takes the opportunity to renew his earlier appeal (see 1 Cor. 16:1–4) that they make a contribution to the fund he has promised to collect for the Christians of Jerusalem (see Gal. 2:1–10).

It would appear, however, that Titus had also brought word about certain persons who, having intruded themselves into the Corinthian congregation, were seeking to undermine Paul's authority. Thus, Letter D is also, in part, Paul's response to insinuations that his apostleship is not completely legitimate and that he has not been entirely straightforward in his dealings with the Corinthians.

This letter was written from Macedonia (2 Cor. 7:5) and was probably delivered to the congregation by Titus on the occasion of his second visit (2 Cor. 8:16–17). It can be dated approximately to 55 or 56, some five years after the founding of the congregation.

Chapters 10–13

It is probable that these chapters, which represent the last of Paul's extant letters to Corinth—thus, Letter E—were also written in Macedonia, but some months after Letter D. During these months the anti-Pauline movement in the city must have made substantial headway, because in this letter the apostle does not hesitate to express his outrage at those who, in his view, would deceive and exploit his congregation. The Corinthians are urged to reject the false charges with which they have vilified Paul and the false claims with which they have tried to establish their own authority in place of his.

In this letter Paul indicates that he will soon be coming to Corinth again (his third visit, 2 Cor. 12:14; 13:1), and in anticipation of that he warns the congregation that he is prepared to deal harshly with any who have not heeded his appeals. The most striking feature of the letter is a lengthy section in which, writing as “a fool,” the apostle mocks the pretentious boasting of his opponents—he boasts not of his superior religious status and attainments as they do, but of his weakness and suffering (2 Cor. 11:1–12:13).

Paul's Letter to the Romans, probably written from Corinth, provides indirect evidence that Letter E had the desired results and that the apostle was generally well received when he visited Corinth for the third (and last) time. He informs the Romans that he is presently en route to Jerusalem with the collection, to which the Christians of Macedonia and Achaia have contributed (Rom. 15:25–26). Since Corinth was the capital city of Achaia, it would appear that the Corinthians were among the contributors to the fund. If so, then one must suppose that they had once again acknowledged the legitimacy of Paul's apostleship and their own status as a congregation under his direction.

Significance of the Letters

The two letters that constitute canonical 2 Corinthians are important both historically and theologically. Historically, they are major sources of our knowledge about one of Paul's most prominent congregations and about the challenges and issues he faced as a missionary and pastoral leader. They allow glimpses of how he was perceived by his harshest critics and, more directly, of how he wished to be perceived. They add greatly to our understanding of the importance he assigned to his collection for Jerusalem and to the administration of that, of the opposition with which he was frequently confronted, of how he dealt with controversy and of the way he employed the services of his co-workers Timothy and Titus.

Although “doctrinal” matters are not taken up for their own sake, these two letters are no less rich in theological insight than in historical information. Common to them both is Paul's insistence that his readers must understand apostleship and evaluate anyone who professes to be an apostle only with reference to the gospel. In reflecting on the meaning of that gospel, he is led to remark on such fundamental matters as the relationship of the new covenant to the old, the significance of Christ's death, the new creation, the Spirit, how God's power is manifest in weakness, and how the believer's life is both graced by God's love and claimed for obedience to God.

COMMENTARY

1:1–11

Letter Opening

Paul observes the ancient conventions of letter writing by opening with an address, followed by a paragraph complimenting his readers.

1:1-2, Address. The letter is being sent not only to the congregation in Corinth, but also to Christians who live elsewhere in Achaia, the Roman province of which Corinth was the capital. Timothy, apparently with Paul in Macedonia, is mentioned because he endorses what the letter contains, not because he participated in the actual writing of it.

1:3-11, Blessing. In his other Letters, Paul writes of his "thanksgiving" to God for the congregation he is addressing (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:4-9). While that element is not lacking here (2 Cor. 1:11), the emphasis is on God's having comforted both the apostle and the Corinthians in the midst of afflictions (v. 11). In particular, Paul expresses his gratitude at having been delivered from a life-threatening situation in Asia (vv. 8-11). The reference may be to some experience in Ephesus, the Asian capital (see 1 Cor. 15:32; 16:8-9; see Philipians, "Introduction").

1:12-13:10

Letter Body

If, as seems probable, 2 Corinthians is a composite of at least two originally independent letters, the body of the letter introduced by 1:1-11 would be much less extensive. According to one hypothesis (see Betz), it would include only 1:12-2:13 and 7:5-16; according to another (see Furnish), it would extend at least through chap. 8 and perhaps through chap. 9.

1:12-2:13

Assurances of Concern

There are at least some in Corinth who suspect that Paul has not dealt with their congregation in an entirely straightforward manner. The opening paragraphs are designed to allay these suspicions.

1:12-14, Introductory Plea. The apostle urges his readers to be open to his explanations of actions that may have seemed thoughtless, or worse. His own conscience is clear, for he is confident that he has been guided by God's grace, "not by any ordinary wisdom" (v. 12).

1:15-17, About the Visits. At the time he wrote 1 Corinthians, Paul was planning to spend the winter in Ephesus and then, after Pentecost, to go to Macedonia. From there he intended to proceed to Corinth and then, should it be necessary, to accompany the delegation that was to deliver the money his congregations had contributed for the Christians in Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:1-9). Apparently, however, he has twice changed his plans since then, to the consternation of some people in Corinth. The first change was to allow him two visits to Corinth, one before and another following his time in Macedonia (2 Cor. 1:15-16). But that plan too was somehow changed, so that now he must respond to suggestions that he is acting irresponsibly, and perhaps even opportunistically (1:17).

1:18-22, God's Faithfulness. Paul first defends the changes in his plans by reminding his readers of the faithfulness of the God whom he serves and that all of God's promises will ultimately be fulfilled in Jesus Christ. The Corinthians themselves affirm this whenever they join in the "Amen" of Christian worship (v. 20), and through the Spirit given at their baptism they have already experienced the reality of it (v. 22).

1:23-2:11, The "Sorrowful Visit." In particular, the Corinthians are to understand that Paul canceled a projected visit because he wanted to spare them another like the one that he describes here as "sorrowful" (2:1). What little can be known about that earlier (second) visit has to be pieced together from the present passage and the comments in 7:8-12. The apostle seems to have had some nasty encounter with a member of the congregation, an experience that was all the more painful for Paul because the congregation neither rallied to his support nor reprimanded the offending brother. Subsequently, rather than return to Corinth as planned, he sent a letter that had been written "through many tears" (2:3-4) and that caused the Corinthians, at last, to take disciplinary action (see 7:8-12; the letter is probably lost, although some would find the largest part of it preserved in chaps. 10-13). Now, having learned that his adversary has been banished from the congregation, Paul advises that he be forgiven and restored to fellowship (2:5-11); the apostle's interest is not in retaliation, but in reconciliation.

2:12-13, Coming to Macedonia. Paul wants the Corinthians to know that he is now in Macedonia because of his concern about them. So anxious was he for news from Corinth, that when Titus failed to arrive in Troas with a report from there, the apostle hurried on to meet him in Macedonia. Now their meeting has taken place, and it is from Titus that Paul has learned about the good effect of the tearful letter (2:3-4; 7:6-7). Many interpreters believe that 2:13 was followed originally by 7:5, since the meeting with Titus is also in view in 7:5-16 and the discussion in 2:14-7:4 seems to have a different focus.

2:14–5:19

Comments on Apostleship

Paul's concern here is evident, whether one reads his comments in the context of 2 Corinthians as a whole (believing it to be a single letter), in the context of chaps. 1–9 (believing these chapters to be a separate letter), or in the context of 2:14–7:4 only (believing this section to be a separate letter). He wants the Corinthians to understand what distinguishes the true apostle, a subject made all the more urgent because questions are being raised in Corinth about his own apostolic standing. (Since the theme of reconciliation is present in the appeal of 5:20 as well as in the affirmations of 5:18–19, most commentaries do not separate these verses, even for the purpose of analysis.)

2:14–3:6, Spreading the Gospel. A striking image for apostolic service is implicit in the exclamation of 2:14a, “Thanks be to God, who in Christ always puts us on display, . . .” In the Greek term translated by the last four words, Paul's readers would have recognized an allusion to the Roman “triumphs,” elaborate processions sponsored by the emperor to celebrate particularly important military victories. Since the ones “on display” were the prisoners of war, paraded in chains through the streets, it must be with them and not with their triumphant captors that one is to identify the apostles. The indignities and adversities that apostles experience serve to advance the gospel (vv. 14b–16), because through them the saving death of Jesus is given a presence in the world (see 4:7–12). Sharply contrasting views are held by those referred to in 2:17a and 3:1, would-be apostles who are compared to hucksters peddling their wares in the marketplace. Paul does not require the kind of testimonial letters they carry; there is no better evidence of the authenticity of his gospel and the legitimacy of his apostleship than the existence of a church in Corinth, established through his ministry (3:2–3). The “new” and “spiritual” covenant served by Paul's ministry (3:6; cf. Jer. 31:31–34) is the topic in 2 Cor. 3:7–18.

3:7–18, The Ministry of the New Covenant. The contrast between “the letter” that “kills” and “the Spirit” that “gives life” (3:6; cf. v. 3) is now developed (for the imagery, see esp. Exod. 31:18; Ezek. 11:19–20; 36:26–27). The story of Moses' descent from Mt. Sinai (Exod. 34:29–35) figures prominently here, and some interpreters hold that Paul is setting his reading of the passage over against that offered by those in Corinth who have challenged his apostolic credentials. His chief intention, however, is to explain why his is the ministry of a new covenant (2 Cor. 3:6). He identifies the old covenant (v. 14) with the law chiseled on the stone tablets that Moses received on Sinai (v. 7), and he characterizes it as leading to condemnation (v. 9). Those who serve the law are therefore engaged in a “ministry of death” (v. 7). This old covenant is replaced by the gospel of Christ (v. 14), which leads to life. Those who, like Paul, serve this gospel are engaged in “the ministry of the Spirit” (v. 7) and “of righteousness” (v. 9). In vv. 12–13 the covering that Moses placed over his face (see Exod. 34:33–35) is interpreted as evidence that the old covenant has been annulled, and in vv. 14–15 it becomes a metaphor for the spiritual blindness of those who remain bound to the law. When one “turns to the Lord” in faith, however, one is freed from the law, for “where the Spirit of the Lord is, is freedom” (vv. 16–17; cf. Rom. 7:6; 8:2–8, 14–16; Gal. 4:21–5:14). The “image” in whom the Lord's glory is brilliantly mirrored (2 Cor. 3:18a) is Christ (see 4:4), and it is into the new life bestowed in him that those who see with the eyes of faith “are being transformed” (v. 18b).

4:1–6, “Jesus Christ as Lord.” Paul's emphasis here on the candor and forthrightness with which he conducts his ministry (vv. 1–4) may be prompted by his concern about rival apostles in Corinth. They may have charged him with acting in underhanded ways, even misrepresenting the gospel; or he may be insinuating that they do. Moreover, unlike them he does not center his message on himself; rather, he preaches nothing but “Jesus Christ as Lord” (v. 5, echoing the early creedal affirmation, “Jesus is Lord,” Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 12:3; Phil. 2:10–11). Indeed, the Corinthians are to understand that Paul considers himself their “slave” (cf. 2 Cor. 1:24; 12:15), quite unlike his competitors whom he will later accuse of exploiting the congregation (11:20). The readers themselves can confirm this, for it is by Paul's preaching that the light of the gospel has dawned in their lives (v. 6, with an allusion to Gen. 1:3; cf. 2 Cor. 4:4).

4:7, A Treasure in Clay Pots. Like clay pots, those who bear the gospel treasure are fragile and vulnerable, that through them God's transcendent power might be evident. The truth of this must have been recently reinforced for Paul when, overcome with a sense of helplessness in the face of some mortal danger in Asia, he was led to a profound experience of God's power (see 1:8–11). This same paradox is involved in his understanding of the gospel itself, which he identifies with God's power for salvation (Rom. 1:16) as well as with Jesus' death on the cross (1 Cor. 1:17–2:5). While the world regards the cross as a sign of weakness, Paul can identify it with God's saving power, because he associates that power with God's love and interprets Jesus' death as the definitive instance of that love (Rom. 5:6-11; cf. 2 Cor. 5:14). These ideas underlie everything that Paul has to say about apostleship in 2 Corinthians.

4:8-15, Apostolic Tribulations. In support of the point in v. 7, Paul offers a list of typical apostolic tribulations (vv. 8-9; cf. 6:4c-5; 11:23b-29; 12:10; Rom. 8:35; 1 Cor. 4:9-13) he then interprets as manifestations of Jesus' death and resurrection life (2 Cor. 4:10-15). Through the sufferings visited upon the apostles as they spend themselves for others (vv. 12, 15; cf. 12:15), the saving power of selfless, serving love is made concretely present in the world. In vv. 13-14, quoting Scripture (Ps. 115:1 in the Septuagint [LXX] Greek version; cf. 116:10 in the English), Paul emphasizes the apostles' resolve to bring faith to expression whatever the personal costs, for theirs is a confidence founded in the power of God. This view of weakness and sufferings as integral to an authentic apostolic witness sets Paul far apart from his rivals, who regard these as signs of religious inferiority, brazenly (note 10:12; 11:21b) claiming apostolic authority for themselves by reason of ethnic origin (11:22), religious superiority (e.g., 10:10; 11:23a), and rhetorical skills (11:5-6).

4:16-5:1, Boldness Despite Mortality. Resuming the affirmation of 4:1 (see also 3:4, 12; 4:13), Paul declares that despite adversities (4:8-9) and the certainty of death (5:1), true apostles boldly continue their service of the gospel. The "outer person" is one's mortal existence, which inevitably passes away; the "inner person" is one's identity as a child of God, and that is constantly being reaffirmed (4:16). One need not suppose, as many interpreters have, that the apostle's recent brush with death in Asia (see 1:8) has caused him to abandon his earlier expectation that he would live until Christ's return (see 1 Thess. 4:15, 17). It is less likely that his remarks here are prompted by threats to his life than by threats to his apostolic standing in Corinth. In 2 Cor. 4:16-5:10 he seems to be responding to charges that if he were a legitimate apostle, he would not have to endure so many sufferings and hardships. Yet as he proceeds, he broadens his comments to apply to all believers: the whole community of faith may take heart in the confidence that the reality of God transcends what can be seen and experienced in this life (4:17-18), and that beyond the common human experience of death, there is life with God (5:1).

5:2-5, The Sighing of the Spirit. As in Rom. 8:18-27, with which these verses should be compared, the human longing for release from the burden of mortality is associated with the presence of the Spirit, God's "down payment" on the eternal life for which one is destined (2 Cor. 5:5). There is an awkward mixing of metaphors here as the image of a heavenly dwelling (5:1, 2) is replaced by the image of clothing (5:2-4), but both images point to the life with God that transcends mortal existence.

5:6-10, "At Home" with the Lord. As long as believers are "at home in the body" (bearing the burdens of mortal existence, vv. 2-4), they are in one sense "away from [their] home with the Lord" (v. 6). But when their conduct is guided by their faith in God's reality rather than by things or circumstances that have only the appearance of reality, they live in the confidence that even in this mortal life they belong to the Lord (vv. 7-9). Thus, believers are ultimately accountable to Christ for how they conduct themselves here and now (v. 10).

5:11-15, Living for Christ. The rivals to whom Paul had indirectly referred at the beginning of his discussion of apostleship (2:17; 3:1) are once again in view in vv. 11-13. They have commended themselves to the Corinthians by boasting of "what is outward" (public displays of ecstasy); Paul, however, wants his readers to consider only what his preaching of the gospel has meant for them (cf. 3:2-3). True apostles are not authenticated by their religious experiences, however impressive those may be, but by "what is within"—by their devotion to those to whom they have been sent with the gospel (v. 13). To support this point, Paul invokes a familiar creedal affirmation about Christ's death (vv. 14-15; cf. esp. 1 Cor. 15:3). The love bestowed in Christ's death "controls us" (RSV) in that it lays claim to the life of every human being (2 Cor. 5:14). Those who respond in faith "live no longer to themselves," but for Christ (v. 15). In accepting life as a gift, they have been delivered from preoccupation with their own needs and self-centered goals (cf. Rom. 6:5-11) and have been freed for the service of others (cf. Rom. 14:15-18).

5:16-19, The Ministry of Reconciliation. In charging that Paul does not have the appearance, skills, or social status and that he cannot claim the achievements or religious experiences of a true apostle, his critics have shown that they judge others "from a human point of view" (v. 16a, RSV), with reference to worldly standards. Paul rejects these standards, reminding his readers that he and they, as believers, no longer regard Christ as the world does (v. 16b). Indeed, those who are "in Christ" participate in a whole "new creation" (v. 17), a radically transformed order where Christ's love, instituted through the cross, is to govern all perception and every action (v. 14; cf. Gal. 6:14-15). The apostle closely associates this new creation with the reconciliation of the world and of all people to God (2 Cor. 5:18-19). Here he calls once more (cf. vv. 14-15) upon a traditional formulation (v. 19ab; cf. Eph. 2:13-16; Col. 1:19-20), his own interpretation of which is evident in 2 Cor. 5:18-19c. "The ministry of reconciliation" (v. 18) is to be understood as that for which Christ's love claims the whole believing community, and "the word of reconciliation" (v. 19c) is the gospel itself, God's saving power made present through the cross.

Appeals About Reconciliation

The comments about reconciliation in 5:18-19 lead directly to the appeal of 5:20, and many commentators treat 5:18-21 (or, more inclusively, 5:16-6:2) as a closely knit unit. However, the shift from exposition in 2:14-5:19 to appeals in 5:20-9:15 is important.

5:20-6:2, Be Reconciled to God. Because they can affirm the reality of God's reconciling love in Christ, believers are both obliged and enabled to "be reconciled to God" (5:20). Here as elsewhere in the Pauline Letters, the appeal is based upon a preceding affirmation. These two together, the indicative and the imperative, constitute the "word of reconciliation" (5:19c), which the apostles and all believers, like ambassadors, have been commissioned to bear. There is nothing conditional about God's love; it is present (6:1-2, quoting Isa. 49:8) whether one acknowledges and responds to it or not. But since love is not coercive (cf. 1 Cor. 13:5), apart from one's response its transforming power cannot have concrete effect. The statement that Christ was "made to be sin" so that others "might become the righteousness of God" (5:21) echoes traditional Christian teaching (cf., e.g., Rom. 8:3; Gal. 3:13; 1 Pet. 2:24) and assigns to Christ a role not unlike that accorded to the suffering servant of God in Isaiah 53 (see esp. Isa. 53:4-9).

6:3-10, An Apostolic Resumé. The self-recommendation in these verses (see v. 4) is intended to support the appeals of 5:20-6:2, but it is very different from the kind of self-recommendation for which Paul has criticized certain rival apostles (see esp. the commentary on 2:14-3:6 and 5:11-15). Although he reminds the Corinthians that his ministry has been conducted with integrity and knowledge and in the power of God (6:6-7), he claims for himself no heroic achievements or awesome religious experiences. Instead, he writes primarily of the sufferings and indignities that he has to bear in the course of his apostolic labors (vv. 4c-5, 8-10; cf. 4:8-9).

6:11-7:3, Be Reconciled to Your Apostle.

The appeals in 6:11-13 and 7:2-3 are related closely to those of 5:20-6:2, even though different words are used. If the Corinthians are truly open to the reconciling love of God, then they will surely want to be as accepting of the apostle from whom they have received "the word of reconciliation" as he is of them. The admonitions of 6:14-7:1, which charge Christians to separate themselves from "unbelievers" (6:14), are supported by a series of citations from Scripture in 6:16c-18; Lev. 26:12 (v. 16c); Isa. 52:11 (v. 17ab); Ezek. 20:34 (v. 17c); and 2 Sam. 7:14 (v. 18). These particular texts are not found elsewhere in Paul's Letters, the exclusivism that is urged in 6:14-7:1 is not typical of the apostle's thought (cf., e.g., 1 Cor. 5:9-10), the summary exhortation in 7:1 stands in tension with Paul's emphasis on the gift of righteousness, and there are numerous parallels between the teachings of these verses and those of the Jewish sectarian community at Qumran (→ Scrolls, The Dead Sea). It is possible, as many interpreters hold, that 6:14-7:1 were added by a later editor or, as others have suggested, that Paul himself has incorporated some preformulated material here. Whatever the case, these admonitions disrupt the primary appeals of 6:11-13 and 7:2-3, and it is difficult to understand why a later editor, or Paul himself, would have included them in this context.

Appeals About the Collection for Jerusalem

The apostle's extended expressions of confidence in his Corinthian congregation (7:4-16) help to support the preceding appeals about reconciliation (5:20-6:13; 7:2-3) and, even more importantly, prepare for subsequent appeals on behalf of his collection for the church in Jerusalem (chaps. 8 and 9).

7:4-16, Paul's Confidence in His Congregation.

Many interpreters regard 7:5 as the apostle's resumption of his comments about a meeting with Titus in Macedonia started but not finished in 2:12-13. If this is correct, then 7:4 should be read more closely with 7:2-3 than with 7:5. The alternative is to read 7:4 as the topic sentence for the expressions of confidence that dominate the remainder of chap. 7, since several of the key words in v. 4 recur in vv. 5-16, and taken together vv. 4 and 16 neatly frame the whole section. In vv. 5-7 Paul emphasizes that Titus's report from Corinth had brought him great comfort, and in vv. 8-13a he indicates that it is, specifically, the Corinthians' response to the tearful letter (2:3-4) that brings him joy (see 1:23-2:11 and the commentary). That letter has made them realize that the injury done to Paul by a member of their congregation affected them all, and it prompted them, finally, to discipline the wayward brother. While the letter may have seemed overly harsh to some, they should know that it was written not out of personal pique, but for the sake of the congregation—to allow it to rediscover the reality of its commitment to Paul and his gospel (vv. 12-13a). The comments about Titus's confidence in the Corinthians (vv. 13b-15) not only allow Paul to reiterate his own (v. 16), but also anticipate Titus's imminent return to the congregation on behalf of the Jerusalem fund (see 8:6, 16-21). This will only be Titus's second visit to Corinth, since prior to the visit from which he has just returned he knew the congregation only by reputation (v. 14).

8:1-6, Titus's Return. Paul's campaign for the Jerusalem fund had been initiated in Corinth sometime prior to the writing of 1 Corinthians (see 1 Cor. 16:1-4), but the Corinthians have still not fulfilled their obligation to it (see 2 Cor. 8:10)—evidently because of questions about Paul's authority and, in particular, because of suspicions about his motives (see esp. 12:14-18). In the wake of the apostle's tearful letter, however (see above on 7:4-16), Titus was able to reinstitute the collection project in Corinth, and he is now being sent back to complete it (v. 6). Clearly, Paul hopes that the Corinthians will be encouraged to cooperate when they realize that the churches of Macedonia (which would include those in Philippi and Thessalonica) have insisted on making generous contributions, despite their meagre resources (vv. 1-5).

8:7-15, A Matter of Equality. Alluding to the Macedonian contribution to his fund for Jerusalem, Paul urges the Corinthians to make good on the contribution that they themselves have long before pledged but never fulfilled (vv. 7-8). To support this appeal he reminds them of Christ: who "became poor though he was rich, so that you, by means of his poverty, might become rich" (v. 9). Here the apostle has rephrased a traditional affirmation present in another form in Phil. 2:6-11 (cf. 1 Tim. 3:16): the preexistent Christ laid aside what he could rightfully claim as his own and for the sake of others became incarnate and obedient unto death. It is not Christ's example that Paul would have the Corinthians ponder, as if their giving is to be guided by some ascetic principle (e.g., "Give up everything for others, as Christ has given up everything for you"); they are asked only to contribute insofar as they are able, out of their "surplus" (v. 14; cf. Mark 12:43-44). It is, rather, the principle of "equality" that is held before them (2 Cor. 8:13-15, with a citation [v. 15] of the Greek version of Exod. 16:18). They are to reflect on what it means to have been graced and claimed by Christ's love (see 5:14-15) and to have been drawn thereby into a "partnership" (8:4; RSV: a "taking part"; cf. Acts 4:36-37) of caring and sharing with all others for whom Christ died (see 1 Cor. 8:11; Rom. 14:15)—be they Jew or Gentile (→ Contribution for the Saints).

8:16-24, Commendation of Titus and the Brothers. The Corinthians are assured that Titus is returning to their congregation not just because Paul has urged him to (8:6), but because Titus himself is eager to see them again (vv. 16-17; see 7:13b-16). Accompanying him are two men whose names Paul does not provide and whose identities are probably beyond recovery (vv. 18-22, 23). One of them is referred to as "our brother" and is described in a way which suggests that he must be a regular and devoted member of Paul's apostolic entourage (v. 22). The first man Paul mentions, however, is clearly regarded as filling a more important role on this particular mission. Although he is widely known among the churches because of his "work for the gospel" (v. 18), he is evidently not one of Paul's associates; note "that brother" in v. 18 (RSV: "the brother") in contrast to "our brother" in v. 22. Moreover, he has been appointed by the churches, not by Paul himself, to oversee the administration of the collection for Jerusalem (v. 19). The Corinthians are to think of this brother as a kind of independent auditor, a person who will be able to certify that the funds that have been contributed for the saints in Jerusalem have not been misappropriated (vv. 20-21; see also 12:14-18 and commentary). It is not significant that the roles of the two brothers are no longer distinguished in v. 23, because the one concern in vv. 23-24 is to urge that all three men be warmly received in Corinth and that the congregation be responsive to their appeal for money.

9:1-5, A Further Appeal on Behalf of the Collection. Some interpreters believe that these verses introduce the subject of the collection for a second time (cf. 8:1-6), and that chaps. 8 and 9 must therefore represent two originally independent letters, chap. 8 directed to Christians in Corinth proper and chap. 9 intended for Christians elsewhere in the province of Achaia (see esp. Betz). However, it is also possible to read 9:1-5 as extending and supporting the commendations in 8:16-24 (note esp. vv. 3, 5); and the very general remarks in 9:6-15 can be viewed as a suitable conclusion for the whole of 8:1-9:5. In 9:1-4 Paul mentions the Macedonian churches for the second time in these two chapters (see 8:1–5), but now he refers to what they have been told about the Corinthians' commitment to the collection, not to their own generosity in contributing to it. One may presume that "the brothers" referred to in 9:3, 5 are the three men previously mentioned—Titus as well as his two unnamed companions (see 8:16–24). Paul trusts that by the time he himself gets to Corinth, this delegation will have in hand a contribution for Jerusalem and that the Corinthians will view it as a genuine gift (cf. 8:3), not as something that has been extorted from them (9:5).

9:6–10, On Giving Generously. In concluding his appeal on behalf of the collection for Jerusalem, the apostle emphasizes, first, that one can give generously because it is God who supplies the means. The conviction that one will reap what one sows (v. 6; cf. Gal. 6:7–9) pervades the wisdom tradition (e.g., Job 4:8; Prov. 11:18, 24; 22:8; Sir. 7:3), and the idea that "God loves a cheerful giver" (2 Cor. 9:7) derives from an addition to Prov. 22:8 that stands only in the Greek version ("God blesses a cheerful and giving man"). Although Paul assures the Corinthians that God will provide abundantly for their needs (2 Cor. 9:8), his point is not that God will enable them to attain the ancient (and modern) ideal of economic self-sufficiency. Rather, God will supply their needs so that they may in turn supply the needs of others. In v. 9 the Greek version of Ps. 112:9 is cited in support of this. If the apostle understands "his righteousness" as God's (rather than the righteousness of one who helps the needy), then he may be suggesting that every charitable act is an expression of that divine righteousness to which those who give aid are themselves eternally indebted. There are allusions to two further passages from the Greek Bible in v. 10 (Isa. 55:10; Hos. 10:12).

9:11–15, A Ministry of Praise. In v. 11 the underlying theme of vv. 6–10 is recapitulated and extended. Those who give generously are enriched by God so that they may give still more (v. 11a) with the consequence that their increasing generosity redounds to God's glory (v. 11b). From this it is clear that Paul's conception of charitable giving has not been shaped by his commitment to some general philanthropic ideal. It has been shaped instead by his conviction that every human being is ultimately dependent upon and accountable to God and that God is praised as the neighbor is affirmed and served in love (see, e.g., Rom. 15:2–6). Thus, the Corinthians should realize that contributing to the fund for Jerusalem is an important sign of their obedience to the gospel of Christ and that the thanksgivings of the beneficiaries are not really for their human benefactors, but for the greater glory of God (2 Cor. 9:12–13). The gift for which Paul gives thanks in a final acclamation of praise (v. 15) is "the surpassing grace of God," which will be in evidence when his congregation fulfills its pledge to the collection (v. 14), as he is now confident that it will.

Were Chapters 10–13 Originally a Separate Letter?

Many interpreters believe that chaps. 10–13 could not have been part of the same letter as chaps. 1–9. In particular, beginning with chap. 10 the generally confident and conciliatory tone of chaps. 1–9 (see esp. 7:4–16) gives way to anxious pleading, an often awkward defensiveness, and numerous sharp attacks on rival apostles who are perceived to be undermining Paul's Corinthian ministry. Moreover, while it is clear that Titus has made only one visit to the Corinthian congregation prior to the writing of chaps. 1–9 (see commentary on 7:4–16), he has evidently been there twice by the time chaps. 10–13 are written (see commentary on 12:14–18).

It is frequently held that the last four chapters of 2 Corinthians are to be identified with the tearful letter mentioned in 2:3–4, 9. This is an attractive hypothesis, not only because it relieves one of having to posit a letter of which no part remains, but also because certain remarks in chaps. 10–13 seem to correspond to several of the things that Paul says, in retrospect, about why he wrote the tearful letter. He says, e.g., that he had written it for the Corinthians' own good (2:3; see 13:2, 10), out of his love for their congregation (2:4; see 11:11; 12:15), and to win their obedience (2:9; see 10:6). If the tearful letter (or part of it) is preserved in chaps. 10–13, then these chapters would have been written prior to chaps. 1–9, and the conciliatory tone of chaps. 1–9 would reflect Paul's confidence that the issues that had prompted the writing of the tearful letter have been largely resolved.

The identification of chaps. 10–13 with the tearful letter is, however, extremely problematic. First, if, as the evidence seems to suggest, chaps. 1–9 were written before chaps. 10–13 (see commentary on 12:14–18), then chaps. 10–13 cannot possibly be identified with the letter mentioned in 2:4. But even if one allows that chaps. 10–13 could have been written before chaps. 1–9, other difficulties remain. Second, although a major concern in the tearful letter was the case of a Corinthian brother who had somehow offended Paul (2:3–11; 7:8–12), one reads nothing at all about this matter in chaps. 10–13. Third, when the apostle describes what his tearful letter has achieved (7:5–12), there is not even an indirect reference to the subject that dominates chaps. 10–13, the threat to the Corinthians' faith and to Paul's status that is posed by certain rival apostles. And finally, while the tearful letter had been written so that the apostle would not have to pay a personal visit to his congregation (1:23–2:4), chaps. 10–13 were written so that an impending visit would be more productive (10:2; 12:14, 20–21; 13:1–2, 10).

It is probable, then, that canonical 2 Corinthians is constituted of two originally separate letters, with chaps. 1–9 representing the earlier (Letter D) and chaps. 10–13 representing the later (Letter E). During the months that separated the writing of these two letters, the influence of the rival apostles over the Corinthian congregation must have greatly increased. This would explain why in chaps. 10–13 Paul seems to be almost at his wit's end in knowing how to deal with a congregation in which he had expressed a great deal of confidence not long before.

It is impossible to know exactly why, when, or by whom these two letters were combined, although it must have been sometime after Paul's death and probably by someone who wished to give the apostle's letters a broader distribution. The ending of Letter D and the beginning of Letter E seem not to have survived, either because they were lost before the two were combined, or because they were deleted as superfluous during the editorial process.

10:1–18

An Appeal for Obedience

The apostle plans to arrive in Corinth soon (e.g., 12:14), and everything in chaps. 10–13 is written in anticipation of that visit (13:10), including the comprehensive appeal of 10:1–6. This appeal is supported, first, by the apostle's insistence that he will not fail to deal with those who oppose him (vv. 2–6), and then, more extensively, by some remarks about his apostolic authority (vv. 7–11) and jurisdiction (vv. 12–18).

10:1–6, No Worldly War. Paul's appeal is issued on the basis of "the gentleness and kindness of Christ" (v. 1a). This is probably not a reference to Jesus' earthly character and conduct, but to the whole saving event of Christ's incarnation and obedience unto death, his becoming "poor" for the sake of others (cf. 8:9; Phil. 2:6–11). It is significant that the Corinthians are not summoned to be obedient to Paul or to some particular teaching. The appeal is for their "obedience to Christ" (2 Cor. 10:5), doubtless to be understood in the most fundamental sense as "faith's obedience" (Rom. 1:5) to the gospel (Rom. 10:16; cf. 15:18). Since Paul is aware of the accusation that he is more impressive in his letters than he is in person (2 Cor. 10:1b, alluding to the criticism that will be quoted in v. 10), he insists that he is not going to be intimidated by any who oppose him or who reject his appeal (vv. 2, 4b, 6). Their charge that he conducts his ministry "according to worldly standards" (v. 2) may be based on his continuing work as a craftsman in order to support himself (see 11:7–11), as well as on his reluctance to boast of special charismatic powers or religious experiences (see 5:11–13; 12:1–10). In responding to the charge, Paul makes use of several military images (vv. 3–6); this may suggest just how embattled he is feeling. Although his campaign for the gospel necessarily takes place "in the world," he maintains that he does not wage it "according to worldly standards" (v. 3). Indeed, because his campaign for the gospel is no worldly war, he must use unconventional "weapons"—weapons he is confident are powerful enough to bring victory (vv. 4, 5). The conviction that lies behind the affirmation of v. 3 is characteristically Pauline: believers can and must live out their faith "in the world" without surrendering to the world's values and claims (variously expressed in Rom. 12:1–2; 1 Cor. 7:29–31; Phil. 3:19–20).

10:7–11, The Question of Authority. Since Paul's critics in Corinth have challenged his apostolic status, he follows the appeal of vv. 1–6 with some comments about his authority, taking care to emphasize that it is a gift from the Lord and is to be used constructively, not as a means of intimidation (vv. 8–9). Two of the charges made against him by the rival apostles are simply denied. First, their vaunted relationship to Christ—perhaps they had known Jesus personally or claim to have had some extraordinary vision of the resurrected Lord—is in no way superior to his own (v. 7b). Second, it is completely untrue that his "demanding and impressive" letters are only bluff, for he will be quite able to translate his words into action when he is with them in person (vv. 10–11). He is probably perceived as "weak" because he seems to lack the charismatic powers about which his rivals boast (see 5:11–13) and perhaps also because he has not asked the Corinthians to underwrite his personal expenses, something to which legitimate apostles are entitled (see 11:7–11; 1 Cor. 9:3–18). His public speaking is regarded as "contemptible" and uninspired because it is not embellished with the rhetorical flourishes and adornments so much in vogue (cf. 2 Cor. 11:6).

10:12–18, The Question of Jurisdiction. Paul's defense of his apostolic authority continues here, but now he is more aggressive in bringing charges against his rivals. When he declares that he does not have the audacity to claim the same status as they (v. 12a), the irony is clear, for he regards them as “false apostles” who serve Satan rather than Christ (11:13–15)! Moreover, their pretentious flaunting of letters of recommendation (see 3:1b) shows their ignorance of the fact that only God’s recommendation really counts (vv. 12b, 17–18); one may compare what Paul says about the source of his apostolic authority in 3:4–6. (The scriptural quotation in v. 17 is a very free adaptation of the Greek version of Jer. 9:24.) Problems of translation cloud the exact meaning of 2 Cor. 10:13–16, but Paul’s general concern is clear. Christians who boast of a status and authority superior to his have appeared on the scene in Corinth, intruding themselves into the congregation that he has founded and seeking to take it over. Paul’s protest in vv. 13–14 reflects the principle that he applies to his own ministry (expressly stated in Rom. 15:20–21): apostles are commissioned to carry the gospel where it has not yet been preached, not where someone else has already laid a foundation. It also reflects his conviction that, as the “father” of the Corinthian congregation, he stands in a unique and continuing relationship to it (1 Cor. 4:14–16). Paul’s competitors must be disputing both of these points.

11:1–12:13 “Fool’s Speech”

The necessity to defend his apostolic status and authority has forced Paul into an awkward position, because he might be perceived to be doing the same kind of boasting for which he criticizes his rivals (e.g., 5:12; 11:12). That he is quite aware of this danger is evident from his remarks in 10:7–18 and especially from the self-consciousness with which he composes this part of his letter. The description of this as a “fool’s speech” derives from the apostle’s introduction of it as “a little bit of foolishness” (11:1) and from his comment at the end, “I have been a fool!” (12:11). He characterizes it this way partly because he knows that one should boast only of the Lord (10:17–18), but also because he boasts about things of which others would be ashamed. One may read 11:1–21a as an extended introduction to the speech, 11:21b–12:10 as the speech proper, and 12:11–13 as an epilogue.

11:1–4, The Endangered Bride. Paul begs his readers to put up with some foolish boasting (v. 1), which he justifies by emphasizing how concerned he is about them (vv. 2–4). Indicating that his care for them is akin to God’s concern for Israel, he depicts himself as a father (cf. 1 Cor. 4:14–15) and the Corinthians as his daughter who is being given in marriage (2 Cor. 11:2). Just as a Jewish father’s responsibility was to guard his daughter’s virginity between the time of her betrothal and the consummation of her marriage, so the apostle’s task is to keep his congregation from harm until the close of history when Christ returns to claim his own. (The church is also depicted as Christ’s bride in Eph. 5:23–32; Rev. 19:7–9; 21:2; but the idea that lies behind this passage is best seen in Phil. 1:9–11.) Specifically, the Corinthians are in danger of being seduced by persons who would lure them away from Paul’s gospel and thus from their original commitment to Christ (2 Cor. 11:3–4). There is perhaps an allusion in v. 3 to a Jewish legend that identified the serpent of Genesis 3 with Satan and implied a sexual seduction of Eve. From v. 4 one learns that Paul’s rivals have “come” to Corinth from elsewhere and that they are winning a following for a gospel that is different from his.

11:5–15, The False Apostles. Some interpreters (e.g., Barrett) argue that the ironic title “superapostles” (v. 5; see also 12:11) is used of the leaders of the church in Jerusalem, by whom Paul’s competitors claim to have been authorized for a ministry in Corinth. Others (e.g., Furnish) regard it as a reference to the rival apostles themselves, who pretentiously claim a status superior to Paul’s. It is certain that these rivals are the “false apostles” mentioned later, whom Paul further describes as Satan’s ministers disguised as ministers of Christ (vv. 13–15). The remark in v. 6 suggests that Paul’s style as a public speaker is being compared unfavorably with theirs, probably because it lacks the rhetorical ornamentation cultivated by popular orators; and this unadorned style is perhaps being used as evidence that he also lacks the special knowledge one should expect an apostle to have. Paul’s refusal to let the Corinthians help with his personal expenses (see 1 Cor. 9:12b, 15–18) has been offered as further evidence of his inferior status, and the apostle responds to this in 2 Cor. 11:7–11. His critics must have argued that if Paul’s apostleship were valid he would not demean himself by continuing to work as a common craftsman, since he knows that apostles are entitled to support by their churches (v. 7; see 1 Cor. 9:4–12a, 13–14). In response, Paul urges the Corinthians to regard his conduct as demonstrating a genuine concern not to burden them with his own needs (vv. 8–11).

11:16–21a, Tolerating Fools. The apostle continues to beg his readers’ indulgence for the boasting he is about to do (v. 16 repeats the plea of v. 1), concedes that it is foolish (v. 17), and explains that the circumstances have forced him to it (v. 18). But since the Corinthians, “being wise,” have already “put up with fools” (v. 19), even allowing themselves to be exploited by them (v. 20), they will surely grant Paul this favor. The targets of Paul’s sarcasm are his rivals and, even more directly, the congregation to which they have gained access. The further sarcastic gibe in v. 21a anticipates the strange theme of the apostle's boasting, his "weakness."

11:21b-33, Paul's Ministerial Credentials. As he begins his foolish boasting, the apostle insists that his ethnic and religious heritage is no less Jewish than that of his rivals (v. 22; cf. esp. Phil. 3:5), and that his credentials as a minister of Christ are in fact superior to theirs (2 Cor. 11:23a). To document the latter he provides a long list of the hardships and deprivations that he has suffered as an apostle (vv. 23b-29; cf. the similar catalogs in 4:8-9; 6:4c-5; 12:10; Rom. 8:35; 1 Cor. 4:9-13). It is important to notice, however, that he offers these as signs of his weakness (2 Cor. 11:29a, 30), not to boast of the courage and strength with which he has endured them. The same understanding of the apostolic office that he had enunciated in 4:7-15 is present here: in the apostle's sufferings the death and resurrection life of Jesus are made visible and thus the transcendent power of God is proclaimed. The "labor(s)" mentioned in vv. 23b, 27 refer to Paul's arduous work as a craftsman, as do the deprivations listed in v. 27. Some of the other tribulations he catalogs may correlate with events narrated in Acts, e.g., "imprisonments" (v. 23b; cf. Acts 16:23-40), "beatings" (vv. 23b, 24-25a; cf. Acts 16:22; cf. 1 Thess. 2:2), a stoning (v. 25b; cf. Acts 14:19), and "danger from Gentiles" (v. 26; cf. Acts 19:23-41). The account of Paul's narrow escape from Damascus (vv. 32-33) is also recounted in Acts 9:23-25, but in a significantly different context. In Acts, the story is offered as one of several illustrations of Paul's courage and ability to overcome adversity. Here, the apostle himself includes it as one more example of his weakness and vulnerability.

12:1-4, A Journey to Paradise. Turning to the subject of "visions and revelations granted by the Lord," the apostle reluctantly continues his foolish boasting (v. 1). That he refers to himself in the third person (vv. 2-4) suggests how uncomfortable he is talking about his own religious experiences. The specific subject of his boast is an ecstatic episode in which he had been transported to Paradise, which he locates in the third heaven. (This is not an account of Paul's apostolic call, or "conversion"; for this see esp. Gal. 1:15-16.) Numerous ancient reports of such experiences survive, but this one differs in that it provides little information about what happened and is not employed for any special edifying purpose. Whether the apostle's journey took place "in the body" or apart from it he does not know and seems not to care; there is no hint of anything that he may have seen; and what he heard he is not allowed to disclose. Paul's intention is evidently to caricature the private religious experiences of which his rivals boast, thus emphasizing that they are of no value for an apostle's proper work—which is to advance the gospel and to serve those who receive it (see 5:12-13).

12:5-10, An Oracle from the Lord. Here the apostle abandons the fool's role that he has been playing in 11:21b-12:4. He could boast, as his rivals do, of impressive religious connections, experiences, and achievements, but he chooses instead to speak only of his weaknesses (vv. 5-7a). Indeed, he regards the "thorn" that he bears in his flesh as a proper reminder that he should not be too elated by the ecstatic experiences that have been his (v. 7b). Paul nowhere specifies the nature of this satanic impediment, but it was probably some kind of physical ailment, not seriously disabling, but certainly bothersome enough to prompt him to pray for divine healing. When the Lord finally responded to his petitions for relief, however, it was not with a cure but with an oracle: "My grace is enough for you; for power is made fully present in weakness" (vv. 8-9a). What this oracle promises is not a cure, but that God's power will sustain the apostle in the midst of his weakness and misery. In this oracle the gospel itself is conveyed, the word of the cross (see 4:7-15 and commentary). Clearly then, "the power of Christ" to which Paul refers in his own comment on the oracle (vv. 9b) is the power of God's saving and sustaining love that is present in Christ's death. The hardship list of v. 10b recapitulates the much longer catalog in 11:23b-29, and the declaration, "When I am weak, then I am strong" (v. 10b, RSV) reiterates the message of the oracle in v. 9a; the power of the crucified Christ is disclosed in Paul's weaknesses, and in the adversities he bears as an apostle.

12:11-13, Epilogue. Looking back over the whole of 11:1-12:10, Paul emphasizes once more that this foolish boasting has been forced upon him by the "superapostles" (see 11:5 and commentary), and that he is in no respect inferior to them (v. 11). He too has performed the healings and other signs that the Corinthians have been led to expect of a true apostle (v. 12), although he does not belabor this point. From the way he refers to these in other Letters (notably Rom. 15:18-19; Gal. 3:1-5), it is clear that he regards his preaching of the gospel, not his performance of wondrous deeds, as the truly definitive evidence of apostleship. The remark in 2 Cor. 12:13 is made in view of the Corinthians' suspicion that Paul has not asked them for support because he did not have that right (see commentary on 11:7-11), and the irony of the remark and of the apostle's plea for pardon is explained by his conviction that his competitors have in fact exploited the congregation (11:20).

12:14–13:10

Disavowals and Warnings

The appeal for obedience that is introduced in 10:1–18 and supported by the fool's speech of 11:1–12:13 is now resumed and further supported. Paul makes a few additional remarks in his own defense and, in prospect of his impending third visit, urges the Corinthians to help make it a constructive one.

12:14–18, The Allegation of Fraud. During Paul's initial visit to Corinth a congregation had been founded, and on his second visit he had had a nasty confrontation with one of its members. Now that a third visit is at hand, he wants the Corinthians to know that he will continue to care for his own personal needs while he is with them (see 11:7–11); rather than claiming anything of theirs, he will give himself to them in love (vv. 14–15; cf. 5:14–15; 8:9). The charge of deceit to which the apostle refers in v. 16 probably grows out of the suspicion that at least some of the money that he is soliciting for Jerusalem (see chaps. 8, 9) will be kept back for himself. In rebuttal, Paul refers to the exemplary way that his two representatives, Titus and the unnamed "brother" of 8:22, had conducted themselves when in Corinth on behalf of the collection (vv. 17–18; the "famous" brother of 8:18–19 was not Paul's representative). Because it is probable that the visit by Titus anticipated in chap. 8 is the same one on which Paul looks back here in chap. 12, a number of interpreters conclude that chaps. 1–9 were written before chaps. 10–13.

12:19–21, About Improper Behavior. The apostle assures his readers that the present letter is written out of a genuine concern for them, not just to refute the charges of his critics (v. 19). Specifically, he is worried that he may find such immorality among them when he arrives that he will be reduced to mourning for their errant ways (vv. 20–21). He must also surely realize that if the present disorder continues, his apostolic authority and credibility will be further diminished.

13:1–4, Warning. On his second, unhappy visit to Corinth (see 2:1), Paul had apparently issued a warning to those who had brought him to grief; now, in a second warning, he assures the Corinthians that he will show no leniency toward anyone whom he may find still unrepentant when he visits for the third time (vv. 1–2). Paul is therefore confident that he has satisfied the scriptural rule about multiple "witnesses" (v. 1; see Deut. 19:15; Matt. 18:16), which Jews of his day understood to require the fair warning of wrongdoers. Since his readers, probably at the behest of the rival apostles, have asked for "proof" that Paul is really a spokesman for Christ, they will surely have it if he is forced to take disciplinary action when he comes (2 Cor. 13:3). The affirmation about Christ's death and resurrection in v. 4a, which is in accord with early creedal formulations (e.g., Rom. 1:4; 6:4; 1 Cor. 6:14; cf. Phil. 3:10), gives weight to the warning of vv. 2–3 and prompts the statement of v. 4b. Because one encounters in the apostle's weaknesses the death of Jesus, one also encounters there the resurrection power of God (cf. 12:9; see also 4:7–15 and commentary).

13:5–9, Admonition. Those Corinthians who have been persuaded that they ought to demand proof of Paul's apostleship (v. 3; cf. 10:7) should really be examining the authenticity of their own Christian existence (v. 5). If their faith passes the test, then Paul's apostleship will pass the test too (vv. 6–7), because it is through his ministry that they have been brought to the gospel ("the truth," v. 8) and nurtured in it. Thus, the apostle is able to rejoice in his weaknesses, insofar as the power of the cross that is disclosed in them finds expression in the faith and obedience of his congregation (v. 9).

13:10, The Purpose of the Letter. Paul has planned for the Corinthians' contribution to the Jerusalem fund to be ready for him when he arrives for his third visit (see 9:3–5). However, with that visit now at hand (12:14; 13:1), his relationship to the congregation has become so problematic that he must wonder whether the Corinthians will make any contribution at all. By writing this letter he hopes to improve the situation so that his forthcoming visit can be a constructive and productive one. (This purpose is in accord with the contents of chaps. 10–13, but not with those of chaps. 1–9; see "Introduction".) There is indirect evidence that this letter achieved its purpose. In Romans, probably written during his third visit to Corinth, Paul reports that the Christians of Macedonia and Achaia (of which Corinth was the provincial capital) "have chosen to make a generous contribution to the poor among God's holy people at Jerusalem" (15:25–26, NJB).

13:11–14

Letter Closing

If parts of two or more originally independent letters have been incorporated into 2 Corinans, then one cannot be completely sure which of them was concluded by these verses. (The numbering of these verses varies slightly among modern editions and translations, some of which count them as 11–13.)

13:11–13, Final Admonitions and Greetings.

The succinct appeals of v. 11 are comparable to those in Rom. 12:9–13; 1 Cor. 16:13–15; and 1 Thess. 5:12–22. Whether the kind of “holy kiss” mentioned in 2 Cor. 13:12 was already part of the church’s liturgy in Paul’s day is uncertain, but it is in any case a symbolic expression of the sense of Christian community that the apostle hopes his readers have not lost. “The saints” whose greetings he conveys (v. 13) are probably the members of the congregation in the particular Macedonian city from which he is writing (perhaps Thessalonica or Beroea).

13:14, Benediction. Because the benedictions that close the other Pauline Letters are shorter, some interpreters attribute this one to a later editor. Its contents, however, are thoroughly Pauline.

GALATIANS

WILLIAM BAIRD

INTRODUCTION

Among the writings of Paul, none is more important or more difficult than the Letter of Paul to the Galatians. This Letter presents important features of Paul's life and announces significant doctrines. Yet questions about the historical setting of the Letter cannot be answered with certainty. About two issues, however, interpreters can be confident: first, Paul is the author (1:1; 6:11); and second, the Letter is a unity, written in its present form as a single document.

Although the Letter is addressed to "the churches of Galatia," the exact location of these churches is disputed. The original kingdom of the Galatians was in the north-central area of Asia Minor, but in 25 B.C. the Romans reorganized this region to include in the province of Galatia areas to the south (→Galatia). According to the south Galatian or "province" theory, the churches addressed in Galatians are churches of this southern region—churches established during the so-called "first missionary journey" of Paul (Acts 13:4–14:28). Paul normally refers to regions according to their provincial designation (1 Cor. 16:19; 2 Cor. 8:1).

According to the north Galatian or "territorial" theory, the churches addressed in the Letter are churches in the original territory of Galatia. The Acts of the Apostles includes no account of a mission to this region, but Acts 16:6 may imply a trip to the northern territory. After describing a visit to Derbe and Lystra, the author notes that Paul and his companions traveled through "the Phrygian and Galatian regions." Thus, a visit to the region of Galatia appears to be distinguished from and later than the visit to the cities of the south. In Gal. 3:1, Paul addresses his readers as "foolish Galatians." Although this designation would be appropriate for the ethnic Galatians of the north, it scarcely fits the residents of the south (see Acts 14:11). Paul does not always refer to regions by their provincial name (Gal. 1:17). According to most scholars, the north Galatian theory is to be preferred.

As to the social and religious makeup of the Galatian churches, most of the members were Gentiles. Paul's mission is primarily directed toward non-Jews (1:16; 2:2, 7–9), and the issue of circumcision, crucial to the Letter, would hardly be a question for Jewish converts. When Paul implies that his readers had not known God (4:9), he probably refers to their previous life in paganism. Nevertheless, some of the Galatian Christians may have been Jews or persons who had had contact with the synagogue. This is suggested by the type of scriptural argument Paul employs in chaps. 3 and 4. As in other Pauline churches, members of the congregations were probably drawn from a variety of social and economic classes (see 3:28).

The date and place of writing are debated. Some suppose that Galatians was written early in Paul's career. Actually a very early date is excluded, since the Letter was not written until at least fourteen years after Paul's conversion (see 2:1). Those who favor an early date usually adopt the south Galatian theory and identify the Jerusalem visit of 2:1–10 with that of Acts 11:30. According to this view, the Jerusalem visit of Acts 15:4–29 took place after Galatians had been written. More likely, Acts 15 and Galatians 2 refer to the same event—the Jerusalem conference. Assuming the north Galatian theory and interpreting 4:13 to imply two visits to Galatia prior to the Letter, the second visit would have been the one mentioned in Acts 18:23 (the first, in Acts 16:6) where Paul is on the way to his Ephesian ministry. Paul's charge that the Galatians have "so quickly turned away" (1:6) suggests that not much time has elapsed since his last visit. Thus, Galatians was probably written from Ephesus in about A.D. 55.

In the Letter, Paul attacks a group that is troubling the Galatian churches (1:7; 5:12). He charges them with perverting the gospel (1:7–9) by insisting that the Galatians be circumcised (5:2; 6:12–13) and keep the law (3:2–5; 5:4–6). Concerning the identity of these troublemakers, three main theories have been advanced: first, they are Judaizers or Jewish Christians who believe gentile converts must keep the Jewish law; second, they are libertine spiritualists or Gnostics who advocate ethical license (→Gnosticism); third, there are two groups causing trouble in Galatia (Judaizers and libertines). Some variation of the first theory is probably best: the troublemakers are Jewish Christians who have invaded the Galatian churches from outside with the intention of correcting Paul's truncated gospel. They believe the people of God need an identity that is shaped according to Jewish rites and practices.

The purpose of Galatians is to counter the activity of these troublemakers. Paul's primary concern is to "re-present" "the truth of the gospel" (2:5, 14)—the good news that God has acted in Christ to redeem all people (4:4). This action conveys the Spirit that is received by faith and not by works of the law (3:2). The identity of the people of God is found in a new creation (6:15) that shatters the old distinctions—a new identity in Jesus Christ (3:28).

In general, Galatians conforms to the pattern of ancient letters (→ Epistle). It opens with a salutation (1:1-5) and ends with a conclusion written in the author's own hand (6:11-18). The conventional paragraph of thanksgiving ("I give thanks," 1 Cor. 1:4) is replaced by an expression of dismay and anathema ("I am amazed," 1:6). Recent research has attempted to analyze the body of Galatians according to patterns of classical rhetoric. However, Paul appears to use a variety of rhetorical expressions to develop the main lines of his message: an autobiographical narrative (1:11-2:21); his central argument (3:1-4:31); and a final exhortation and instruction (5:1-6:10).

1:1-10

Introduction to the Letter

1:1-5, Salutation. Paul opens his Letters according to the ancient pattern: the author introduces himself or herself; the recipients of the letter are named; and a greeting is expressed. Paul stresses his role as an "apostle" (see Rom. 1:1-6; → Apostle). The term refers to a person who has been sent with a commission. Paul clarifies his office by a double denial: he is not an apostle "from human beings" or "through a human being." Instead, his apostleship is "through Jesus Christ and God"; God is the source and Christ is the agent of his call (Gal. 1:15-16; 1 Cor. 1:1). About Christ, Paul adds a phrase from an early Christian confession: God "raised him from the dead." Paul also includes in his address the co-workers "who are with me."

The Letter is being sent "to the churches of Galatia"—the only Pauline Letter addressed to a group of congregations in a region larger than a single city. To them he sends his typical greeting, "grace and peace," which combines Greek and Hebrew expressions. This greeting is expanded to include another confessional statement about Christ: he is the one "who gave himself for our sins" (see Rom. 5:8; 1 Cor. 15:3) and "rescued us from the present evil age."

Paul believed the world was under the control of evil forces (2 Cor. 4:4; Rom. 8:38), but with the coming of Christ the new age had already dawned (→ Eschatology).

1:6-10, The Situation in Galatia. At this point, Paul would normally present a paragraph of thanksgiving (Rom. 1:8-15). Instead, he offers a statement of dismay: "I am astonished." Paul is astonished that the Galatians are so quickly deserting the one who called them, that is, God (see Gal. 5:8; Rom. 8:30; 1 Cor. 1:9). The Galatians are turning to another gospel (see 2 Cor. 11:4), although there is no other. The troublemakers are perverting the gospel by insisting that it include the demand to keep the law and be circumcised. However, to conceive of the gospel as a collection of rules and rites is not simply to distort it, it is to destroy it.

The problem is the gospel, not the preacher. Even if Paul himself (a divinely appointed apostle) or an angel (a messenger from heaven) should preach another gospel, let that one be "accursed"—a word that describes something dedicated to God for destruction (see Josh. 6:17). The true gospel is the one that Paul had preached and the Galatians received—the good news disclosed in Christ (Gal. 3:1). Although the gospel can be preached in a variety of ways (see 1 Cor. 1:23; 2 Cor. 4:5; Phil. 1:15-18), there is only one gospel.

Paul's concern is to please God, not people (1 Thess. 2:4-5). The troublemakers may suppose that his law-free gospel is trimmed to fit his hearers (see 1 Cor. 9:20-21). But as Paul says, "I do everything for the sake of the gospel" (1 Cor. 9:23). His loyalty to God is seen in his obedience; he is a slave of Christ (Rom. 1:1; Phil. 1:1).

1:11-2:21

An Autobiographical Narrative: Paul's Loyalty to the Gospel

1:11-17, The Gospel Received by Revelation. Paul's gospel is not a human gospel. He neither received it from a human being, nor was he taught it. Instead, he received the gospel through a revelation of Christ—a revelation whose content is Christ. Proof that God has acted is seen in the transformation of Paul. His former life was devoted to Judaism (see Phil. 3:4-6). He had been a persecutor of the church (see 1 Cor. 15:9). Paul's zeal led him to oppose the followers of Jesus as apostates who preached a crucified Messiah (1 Cor. 1:23). Moreover, Paul had advanced in Judaism beyond many of his own age among his people, since he was so zealous for the law and the traditions.

The source of Paul's gospel is God—"the one who had set me apart from my mother's womb." Before Paul could act, God had acted —an action by grace. This way of describing the revelation is reminiscent of the call of the prophets (Jer. 1:5) and indicates that Paul is primarily depicting a commission rather than a conversion. However, his reference to “my former life-style in Judaism” (Gal. 1:13) indicates that a conversion was involved. Paul’s sparse description stands in contrast to the detailed accounts of the Acts of the Apostles (9:3–9; 22:6–11; 26:12–18). Paul simply declares that God’s Son had been revealed to him (1 Cor. 9:1; 15:8). The purpose of this revelation was that Paul should preach Christ to the Gentiles; the revelation was also commission.

Immediately after the event, Paul did not confer with “flesh and blood,” that is, with any human being. In particular, he did not go to Jerusalem to consult with those who had previously been appointed apostles. Paul went away instead to Arabia, or Nabatea, the area to the south and east of Damascus. Although it is sometimes supposed that Paul went there to meditate, it is more likely that he began to preach (see 2 Cor. 11:32–33)—prior to any contact with the Jerusalem authorities.

1:18–24, A Brief Visit to Jerusalem. After three years, Paul did go to Jerusalem. He went on his own initiative for the purpose of making the acquaintance of Cephas. Cephas, the Aramaic for Peter (i.e., “rock”), was leader of the Jerusalem church. Paul stayed in Jerusalem only fifteen days and, while there, saw none of the other apostles except James. This is the same visit described in Acts 9:26–30. James is the brother of Jesus (Mark 6:3) who was later to become the leader of the church (Gal. 2:9, 12; see Acts 15:13; 21:18). Paul confirms the truth of his narrative by swearing an oath (see 1 Thess. 2:5; 2 Cor. 1:23; 11:31; Matt. 5:34).

Next, Paul travels to the regions of Syria and Cilicia. In Cilicia is Paul’s hometown, Tarsus (see Acts 9:30; 21:39; 22:3), and in Syria is Antioch where he carried on a ministry (Acts 11:26; 13:1–2; Gal. 2:11–14). In this period, Paul claims that he was still not known by sight to the churches in Judea. Nevertheless, they knew Paul by reputation. He quotes them as saying that the former persecutor is now preaching “the faith” (see 3:23). The words of the Judean believers imply that his radical transformation could only have been accomplished by the action of God. Consequently, the Judeans give praise to God because of Paul.

2:1–10, The Jerusalem Conference. After fourteen years, Paul again visits Jerusalem. This interval is most likely the time since Paul’s last visit (1:18–19), although it could be fourteen years since his conversion. The conference described here is the same as the one depicted in Acts 15:4–21. Paul says he made this trip “according to revelation,” that is, according to the will of God. In a private meeting with the leaders of the church, he presented the gospel that he had been preaching. When he says “lest I . . . had been running in vain” (Gal. 2:2) he does not intend to suggest that the Jerusalem leaders were to pass judgment on his gospel—the message that he had received by revelation (1:15–16). The gospel is not negotiable. The issue is the practice of the mission—the way the mission is functioning in the Pauline churches (see 1 Thess. 3:5). About this, the leaders of the church—as Paul shows in Gal. 2:11–21—could exercise a disruptive force. They, not the gospel, are being judged.

Along with Barnabas, Paul brought Titus, an uncircumcised Greek Christian. Titus was proof that a Gentile could be a member of the people of God without being circumcised. Into the conference slipped some “false Christians” (v. 4) who wanted to enslave Paul by demanding the circumcision of Titus. Paul resolutely refused, so that the “truth of the gospel” might be maintained for the Galatians (and other gentile converts). To turn a ritual into a demand is to destroy the gospel (see 1:7).

Next Paul summarizes the deliberations of the leaders. In v. 6 he describes them as “those who are reputed to be somebody” (see v. 2), and in v. 9 he calls them “pillars” of the church (see Rev. 3:12). Although these terms are not derogatory in themselves, they are given a disparaging meaning when Paul observes that the leaders’ reputation means nothing to him or to God (v. 6). These leaders demanded no additional requirements for Paul’s mission; they recognized that he had been entrusted with the gospel to the Gentiles just as Peter (or Cephas) had to the Jews. The reference to “the gospel to the uncircumcised” and the gospel “to the circumcised” does not imply two different gospels; the one gospel is preached to two different groups.

As sign of this agreement, the Jerusalem leaders extended to Paul and Barnabas the “right hand of fellowship” (v. 9)—a practice signifying friendship and accord. The leaders are named, with James first, probably because he had become the leader of the church in the city (see Acts 15:13–19) just as Cephas (Peter) had been the leader of the mission outside of Jerusalem (see Acts 9:32–43). Although they made no demands, the leaders did make a request: that Paul collect an offering for the economically deprived of the Jerusalem congregation—something he was eager to do (see 1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 8:1–9:15; Rom. 15:25–28).

2:11–21, Confrontation in Antioch. After the conference, Cephas (Peter) visited Antioch. Here a church had been founded where Gentiles had been accepted into the life of the Christian community (Acts 11:19–26; → Antioch). When Cephas arrived, he participated in the meals of the congregation—meals where Jewish and gentile converts ate together without regard to Jewish food laws. Later, when some emissaries of James arrived, Cephas withdrew, because he feared the partisans of circumcision. The latter are probably to be identified with the “false Christians” of Gal. 2:4, while the unnamed people from James were probably more moderate. They recognized the Jerusalem agreement, but believed the people of God needed an identity that would set them apart from the pagans. Following the lead of Cephas, the rest of the Jews of the Antioch church joined in his hypocrisy—a kind of playacting rather than honesty. Barnabas, Paul’s associate in gentile mission (Acts 13:1–14:18; 15:35–16:4), was “carried away,” too.

Paul opposed Cephas “to his face” (Gal. 2:11) in front of the church. According to Paul, Cephas and the others were not conforming to “the truth of the gospel.” Paul quotes his indictment of Cephas, but the extent of the quotation cannot be ascertained. Verse 14 is certainly part of the quotation, since Paul spoke directly to Cephas in second-person singular. When Paul said that Cephas lived like a Gentile, he referred to Cephas’s original conduct in Antioch. When Paul charged Cephas with compelling the Gentiles to live like Jews, he implied that Cephas’s withdrawal was equivalent to requiring the Gentiles to keep Jewish rules in order to participate in the community.

In vv. 15–17, Paul continues to address the Jews (and perhaps Cephas) as his use of “we” indicates. We, he says, are Jews by nature (born and reared as Jews) and not gentile sinners, that is, those who do not have the law (see Rom. 2:14; 1 Cor. 9:21). Yet we Jewish Christians know that a person is not brought into right relationship with God by “works of the law” but by faith in Christ. “From the works of the law, no one will be declared righteous” (a loose quotation of Ps. 143:2). When Paul says that the Jews, in being justified, are found to be sinners, he means that the fact that righteousness is by faith has the effect of putting Jews, like Gentiles, outside the law (Gal. 2:15). This action, which identifies the Jews as sinners, however, does not mean that Christ is a minister of sin, since the Jews (before faith) were already in actuality sinners in need of God’s grace (see Rom. 2:17–24).

In Gal. 2:18–21, Paul changes from “we” to “I.” To rebuild what he once destroyed would be to return to the works of the law. But Paul cannot do this, since he has died to the law (Rom. 7:1–4). This death has been accomplished by unity with Christ—a unity signified by baptism (Gal. 3:27; Rom. 6:3–10). Through faith, Paul has shared in the crucifixion and resurrection, so that the living Christ is present in him (see Phil. 1:21). In his old body (“in the flesh”), Paul has a new identity. He lives by faith in the Son of God who loved him (see Rom. 5:6–8; 2 Cor. 5:14) and gave himself as a redemptive sacrifice (see Rom. 3:24–25). This assertion of Paul confirms the grace of God—that redemption is a gift. But to claim that righteousness comes through the law is to make Christ’s death unnecessary.

3:1–4:31

Paul’s Argument: The Gospel Has Superseded the Law

3:1–5, An Appeal to the Experience of the Galatians. Paul begins his argument by reminding the Galatians of their original Christian experience. “Foolish Galatians,” he calls them (see Luke 24:25), for they have been hypnotized by the troublemakers (Gal. 1:6–9). Before their eyes, the crucified Christ was openly portrayed. Preaching the gospel is “re-presentation” of Christ (1:16; 1 Cor. 2:2).

About this experience Paul asks whether the Galatians received the Spirit by doing the law (“works of the law”) or by accepting the gospel (“the hearing of faith”; see Rom. 10:17). Paul assumes that the Spirit is the gift commonly received by believers (1 Cor. 2:12; → Holy Spirit, The). For Paul, the Spirit signifies the presence of the living Christ (Rom. 8:9–11). Thus, the Galatians began their experience with the Spirit, but they are ending in the flesh—seen in their interest in circumcision (see Rom. 2:28). To engage in this retrogression is to admit that all they have experienced adds up to nothing. Instead, their experience, evident in spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 12:8–11), should have proved that God had been at work—before the troublemakers arrived.

3:6–18, Arguments from Scripture. Paul begins by quoting Gen. 15:6. God promised Abraham that he would be the father of many descendants. In response, Abraham “had faith in God and it was counted to him for righteousness.” Abraham was declared to be right with God solely on the basis of faith. Interpreting the text, Paul concludes that it is through faith that people become descendants of Abraham. The argument is supported by a reference to Gen. 12:3 together with Gen. 18:18, which says that in Abraham all the nations (Gentiles) will be blessed. By faith people share the blessing of Abraham. In announcing this, Scripture preached the gospel beforehand in Abraham.

Gen. 12:3, however, notes that some people will be cursed. This suggests another text, Deut. 27:26, that pronounces a curse on all who do not keep all the commands. According to Paul’s argument in Gal. 2:16, one cannot be justified by works, and the law shows that those who fail to keep all the commandments are transgressors, under the curse that the law decrees. However, the law affirms a better way: "The person who is righteous by faith shall live" (Hab. 2:4; see Rom. 1:17), so that the notion that one can get right with God by works of the law is denied. Nevertheless, Scripture can be read from the viewpoint of works, not from the perspective "of faith" (Gal. 3:12). Paul illustrates this by citing Lev. 18:5, which says that those who keep the law "shall live" (v. 12). Yet, as Paul has argued in v. 10, it is impossible to keep the law, and those who fail to obey all its commands do not receive life.

Throughout this section Paul follows rabbinic methods of interpretation and in v. 13 makes use of a device whereby the appearance of the same word relates two texts. Thus the term "curse" in Deut. 27:26 recalls Deut. 21:23: "Cursed is everyone who hangs on a tree." For Paul, this text can be applied to Christ, who in his crucifixion is identified with sinful humanity (2 Cor. 5:21), becoming a curse for us. Christ, by this action, redeemed us from the curse that the law pronounced. Redemption is a deed whereby freedom (e.g., for a slave) is purchased at cost (Rom. 3:24; 1 Cor. 6:19–20; →Redemption). Through Christ's identification with us, we are identified with Abraham (see Gal. 3:16) so that we are not cursed, but share the blessing: the promise of the Spirit (v. 2).

Next (vv. 15–18) Paul argues from a human analogy. He notes that once a will has been ratified it cannot be changed. In the same way, the law that did not come until 430 years (Exod. 12:40) after the promise cannot nullify the covenant previously ratified by God. Focusing on a fine point, Paul observes that the promise was extended to Abraham's "offspring" (singular) not "offsprings" (plural). This suggests that the true descendant of Abraham is Christ. Thus the inheritance cannot be through the law, but through the promise.

3:19–29, The Giving of the Law and the Coming of Faith. Since the law cannot supersede the promise, for what purpose was it given? It was added "because of transgressions," that is, to increase trespasses (Rom. 5:20)—to show that sin is against the will of God (see Rom. 7:13). Moreover, the law was temporary (in force until the true offspring should come) and inferior—given by angels through an intermediary. The notion that the giving of the law took place in the presence of angels is suggested by the Greek version of Deut. 33:2 (see Acts 7:53; Heb. 2:2). The intermediary is Moses, and the presence of an intermediary shows that the revelation was not direct (God is one).

Is this inferior law against the promises? In spite of evidence to the contrary, Paul declares ■ resounding "No." The law serves a different purpose in the economy of God. It cannot do what the promise does: give life (see Rom. 7:10). Instead, the law imprisons people under the power of sin (Rom. 3:9) until the time when the promise may be received through faith.

Before Christ came (Gal. 4:4), the law functioned as the household slave who supervised the discipline of the child. But now that faith has come, we are no longer under this slave, but have become children of God through faith in Christ (4:5–7; Rom. 8:14)—full members in the household of God. Paul reminds the Galatians that they had been united with Christ (Gal. 2:20)—a unity signified by baptism (Rom. 6:3–7; 1 Cor. 12:13). Just as believers put on clothing after baptism, so they are clothed with Christ. This dramatic sign is (unlike circumcision that was for men only) open to all; it proves that the old distinctions have ceased to count. In Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek (religious discrimination; Rom. 3:22–23; 10:12), slave nor free (social discrimination; 1 Cor. 7:22; Philem. 16), male nor female (sex discrimination; see, however, 1 Cor. 11:2–16; 14:34–35). All are one in their new identity in Christ. Thus the believers belong to Christ (the one offspring) and inherit the promise spoken to Abraham.

4:1–11, Slavery and Adoption. To advance his argument, Paul takes up another analogy. A child, before becoming of age, is no better off than a slave in the household. Until the time appointed by the father, the child is under guardians and managers. Similarly, as long as we were children (before faith came; 3:23), we were enslaved to the elemental powers of the world. Paul, like many of his contemporaries, believed the world was under the control of evil forces (see 2 Cor. 4:4; Rom. 8:38). To be under their power meant to be slaves of sin (Gal. 3:22).

At the time appointed by God (see Rom. 5:6; 1 Cor. 10:11), God sent forth the Son of God. For Paul, the title "Son" stresses the close relationship between Christ and God (see Rom. 5:10; 8:32). Two things are said about the Son: first, he was born of woman, that is, identified with humanity (see Job 14:1; Matt. 11:11; Luke 7:28); second, he was born under the law, that is, identified with those under sin (Gal. 3:22). The sending of the Son has a dual purpose: to redeem or secure freedom for those under the law (3:13) and to make possible gentile adoption into the household of faith (see Rom. 8:14–17). Proof that these purposes have been accomplished is seen in the reception of the Spirit (Gal. 3:2) whereby the Galatians can cry "Abba"—an Aramaic term of direct address to God (see Mark 14:36; Rom. 8:15). Addressing God in this way shows that the Galatians are not slaves but heirs.

In Gal. 4:8, Paul refers again to the situation before faith—to the time when they did not know God (see 1 Thess. 1:9) and were enslaved to the false gods of pagan polytheism (1 Cor. 8:5; 10:20). Rather than knowing God (as an object; see Rom. 11:33-36), they "are known by God"; God had first known and chosen them (see Rom. 8:29-30; 1 Cor. 8:3; 13:12). In view of the resulting relationship with God, why, Paul asks, would the Galatians want to return to the previous situation—to slavery under the powerless and worthless elemental forces (Gal. 4:3)?

Thus Paul presents a startling argument: to submit to the law is to return to the situation of paganism. Apart from the gospel, Jews and Gentiles alike are under the power of sin (3:22). Evidence of this slavery can be seen in the Galatian concern to observe the rituals of the Jewish calendar—matters that are of no importance for the believer (see Rom. 14:5-6). Paul despairs, wondering if his ministry on behalf of the Galatians has been in vain.

4:12-20, Paul's Personal Appeal. Paul says, "Become as I am, as I became as you." He wants them to identify with his faithfulness to the gospel (see 1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1), just as he identified with them during his ministry (see 1 Thess. 2:8; 1 Cor. 9:21). Then the Galatians did Paul no wrong; rather, they graciously received him. Apparently Paul stopped in Galatia to recover from a physical malady. This illness is usually interpreted as the "thorn in the flesh" of 2 Cor. 12:7-10, and details from Galatians are used to identify the ailment. Whatever it was, the Galatians did not respond with scorn or loathing; they received Paul as a heavenly messenger, as Christ himself (see Gal. 3:1). At that time, they deserved a blessing, for they were ready to give Paul one of their most precious possessions: their eyes.

Now the situation has changed. Anticipating their response to this Letter, Paul asks, "Have I become your enemy by telling you the truth?" (see 2 Cor. 12:15). The troublemakers, on the other hand, try to exploit their relationship with the Galatians. They eagerly court the Galatians, but actually want to shut them out—out of the relation of friendship to Paul, out of participation in the community of promise. In his final appeal, Paul speaks as a loving mother (see 1 Thess. 2:7) who is suffering the pains of labor, awaiting their birth as mature Christians. Paul wishes he could be present in person so as to change his tone rather than use the harsh words of this Letter.

4:21-31, The Allegory of the Two Sons. Next, Paul presents a concluding argument from Scripture. He addresses the Galatians as "those who desire to be under the law" (see 3:23; 4:5), that is, to yield to the teaching of the troublemakers. Then he asks, "Do you hear what the law says?" To answer the question, he refers to narratives from Genesis (chaps. 16, 17, and 21) about the two sons of Abraham. One of these was Ishmael (whom Paul never names), the son of the slave woman Hagar. The other was Isaac, the son of the free woman Sarah (also unnamed). These sons are contrasted in the manner of their birth. The son of the slave was born "according to the flesh" (i.e., in the ordinary way), the son of the free woman, "through the promise" (see Gal. 3:16, 29).

Interpreting the story as an allegory, Paul says the women symbolize two covenants (→ Covenant). The slave woman, Hagar (the name is similar to Semitic words meaning "mountain"), represents the covenant at Sinai—the covenant of the law that is observed in "the present Jerusalem" (Gal. 4:25). The children of this covenant are born into slavery under the law (3:23; 5:1). The second covenant (see 1 Cor. 11:25; 2 Cor. 3:6) is represented by the heavenly Jerusalem (see Heb. 12:22; Rev. 3:12; 21:2) that embodies the freedom Christians already enjoy (see Phil. 3:20). According to Paul, this city is "our mother"—it stands for the new covenant whereby people become children of Abraham through faith (Gal. 3:7).

Paul expands the allegory (4:27) by quoting from Isa. 54:1. In its original setting this text contrasted the barren woman (the city of Jerusalem during the Exile) with the woman who has a husband (the city before the Exile) to show that after the return from exile Jerusalem would be more fruitful and joyful than ever. Paul identifies the barren woman as Sarah, the heavenly Jerusalem, the mother of Isaac. Thus, "you" (the gentile Christians of Galatia) are like Isaac, children of promise (see Gal. 3:29)—children not of the slave but of the free woman (4:31).

When Paul says the child of the flesh persecuted the child of the Spirit he may have in mind an interpretation of Gen. 21:9 whereby the child of Hagar taunts the child of Sarah. When he notes that "it is so now," Paul is thinking of Jewish persecution of Christians that he has known as both perpetrator (Gal. 1:13; 1 Cor. 15:9) and victim (2 Cor. 11:24). The quotation from Gen. 21:10 indicates that the troublemakers should be thrown out of the Galatian churches (see Gal. 1:8-9).

5:1-6:10

Final Exhortation and Instruction

5:1-12, Freedom and the Slavery of Circumcision. On the basis of the previous argument, Paul makes a final plea and presents additional instructions. He declares that Christ has set the Galatians free for the purpose of freedom. They should stand fast in their loyalty to the gospel and resist the efforts of the trouble-makers. They should not be enslaved again to the law, nor submit to the demand for circumcision. Although Paul has not mentioned it in his earlier argument, circumcision, which was noted in his narrative (2:3, 12), is clearly a major issue in the Galatian controversy.

If the Galatians have themselves circumcised, serious consequences would follow. For one, Christ would be of no benefit; if salvation requires this work of the law, Christ, who is the true ground of salvation, “died for nothing” (2:21). Also, those who receive circumcision are obligated to keep the whole law (see Rom. 2:25), that is, they put themselves under a requirement that cannot be fulfilled (Gal. 3:10; 6:13). Those who are seeking justification in this way are separated from Christ; they have fallen from grace (2:21; → Grace).

The true way to righteousness is through the Spirit, which the Galatians have received by faith (3:2). The Spirit is the down payment on life in the future (2 Cor. 1:22) and the basis for the hope of acquittal in the final judgment (see Rom. 2:5). From the perspective of faith in Christ, circumcision is a matter of indifference (Gal. 6:15; 1 Cor. 7:19). What matters is faith coming to expression in love—not a required ritual, but a way of life (see Gal. 5:14, 22).

The Galatians had once been on the right track (3:3)—they were running well (a metaphor from athletics, see 1 Cor. 9:24)—but someone got in their way. The persuasion to swerve from the truth of the gospel (Gal. 2:5, 14) did not come from God who called them (1:6), but from the troublemakers. Their influence has started to permeate the congregations, for, as a proverb says, “A little yeast spreads to the whole loaf” (1 Cor. 5:6); evil is contagious.

In spite of some defectors, Paul is confident that most of the Galatians will follow his admonition. As to the one troubling you (Paul is probably speaking hypothetically, not about a particular individual; see Gal. 1:9), such a one deserves condemnation rather than acquittal in the future judgment (see 1:8–9). Apparently, some have charged that Paul, as in his earlier zeal for the traditions (1:14), is still preaching circumcision (see 1 Cor. 9:20; Acts 16:3). Yet, if Paul were still advocating this Jewish ritual, why is he being persecuted by the Jews? (2 Cor. 11:24). He utters a harsh outburst against the agitators, “Would that those who are troubling you would castrate themselves.”

5:13–26, Freedom and the Discipline of the Spirit. After reminding the Galatians that they were called to freedom, Paul warns them not to let their liberty become a “base of operations” (a military term) for the flesh. Perhaps the troublemakers have charged that Paul’s message of freedom fosters immorality. As vv. 15 and 26 indicate, however, the trouble that they have instigated has resulted in behavioral problems within the Galatian congregations. To correct these, Paul urges his readers to serve one another through love. The whole law is fulfilled in one command: “love your neighbor” (Lev. 19:18; Rom. 13:9)—the true way to keep the law. Proof that the Galatians need the command is presented in 5:15: they are acting like wild animals.

Paul urges them to walk by the Spirit so that they will not fulfill the desire of the flesh. The term “walk” is used to describe a style of life. The desire of the flesh represents the effort to order life according to material things. Spirit and flesh are opposing powers, and the conflict between the two results in moral paralysis: “you are not able to do what you will” (v. 17; see Rom. 7:15–23). In contrast to the external demands of law, the discipline of the Spirit is inward—the discipline of freedom (see 2 Cor. 3:17).

In 5:19–23, Paul presents conventional ethical formulas: vice and virtue lists. Teachers of ethics in Paul’s day liked to enumerate features of bad and good conduct (see Rom. 1:29–31; 1 Cor. 6:9–10). Paul’s vice list (“the works of the flesh”) is not restricted to sexual immorality (the so-called “sins of the flesh”), but includes such “spiritual” evils as enmity, jealousy, anger, and selfishness. Paul had warned the Galatians about these evils before. People who do such things will not inherit the “kingdom” (see 1 Cor. 6:10)—a term that refers to participation in the future reign of God (see 1 Cor. 15:24, 50).

The fruit of the Spirit is spontaneous. Though Paul includes such typical Greek virtues as humility and self-control, items in his list have theological significance: “peace,” for example, depicts the new relationship that the believer has with God (Rom. 5:1). Love is the fundamental force of the entire ethic. Its deeds have nothing to do with law (Gal. 5:23); love cannot be commanded or judged by law. Those who belong to Christ can produce the fruit of the Spirit and avoid the works of the flesh because they have been crucified with Christ (2:20)—the old self has been put to death (see Rom. 6:5–6). Paul concludes with a statement of the indicative and the imperative. “If we live by the Spirit” (indicative), “let us walk by the Spirit” (imperative); Christians should live in response to the new being that they have received.

6:1–10, Practical Instruction to the Churches. After the heated controversy of the previous chapters, this advice seems ordinary. Yet, Paul wants to show that the mundane life of the church continues. Making use of familiar proverbs, he gives practical instruction on how Christians can live by the Spirit (5:25). If one of the members is caught in a trespass (perhaps a legal violation), those who live by the Spirit ought to restore that person to the community in an attitude of gentleness (one fruit of the Spirit; 5:23). Remember, Paul warns, every one of you (he uses the singular) is subject to temptation. Since all believers endure difficulties, they ought to "bear one another's burdens" (6:2). This sort of concern fulfills the law of Christ—the law of love (5:14) that has nothing to do with legal requirements (see 5:23).

Although believers are under obligation to others, they are also responsible for themselves. They must avoid arrogance (5:26), supposing that they are something when they are nothing (2 Cor. 12:11). Each one should examine one's own work to see if there is any ground for boasting (see Rom. 15:17). Everyone should carry one's own "load" (a word that can mean "cargo" or "weight"). At the same time, those who are taught should share provisions with those who teach the gospel (see 1 Cor. 9:4, 14).

In 6:7, Paul quotes a familiar proverb: "Whatever one sows, one will also reap." This saying is found in Greek and Jewish writings, but Paul gives it meaning in the context of his larger argument. To sow to the flesh means to do the works of the flesh (5:19–21); to reap corruption means to effect destruction and death (see Rom. 6:23; 8:13). To sow to the Spirit means to produce the fruit of the Spirit (5:22–23); to reap eternal life means to assure participation in the coming kingdom of God (5:21). This cause-and-effect relationship should encourage people not to grow weary in doing good, for at the proper time the outcome will be realized. In the time that remains, Christians should do good to all people (see Rom. 12:18), but especially to "the household of faith"—the members of the church.

Conclusion of the Letter

Paul normally dictated his letters and added the final greeting in his own hand (1 Cor. 16:21). The "large letters" may be for emphasis. Before concluding, Paul launches a final attack on the troublemakers. They want to make a good showing by forcing the Galatians to be circumcised. In the flesh of these Gentiles, the agitators think they can exhibit a basis for boasting in their own accomplishments. This action could also serve to protect them from zealous Jews. Apparently some Jews are persecuting their compatriots who are lax in their association with the uncircumcised (see Gal. 5:11). For all their devotion to the law, the troublemakers do not keep the commandments themselves (see 5:3).

In contrast, Paul intends never to boast in his own accomplishments, but solely in the cross of Christ. This is a strange sort of boasting, since the crucifixion is a scandal (5:11; 1 Cor. 1:23). Through crucifixion with Christ (Gal. 2:20), the world has been crucified to Paul; the world, which is a power over against God (1 Cor. 2:12; 3:19), has no hold on the apostle. At the same time, Paul has been crucified to the world; his old self, trapped in the flesh, has been put to death (Gal. 5:24).

In 6:15, Paul repeats the principle stated in 5:6: circumcision is a matter of indifference. Although neither circumcision nor uncircumcision counts for anything, what counts is the new creation (2 Cor. 5:17). This new being that the believers have received in Christ becomes a rule or standard for life—like the Spirit, a new indicative (see Gal. 5:25). Those who obey the indicative—who walk according to the rule—shall receive peace (Rom. 5:1) and mercy (Rom. 11:31–32). They are those who by faith have come to be a part of God's people—"the Israel of God" (Gal. 6:16).

In a final assertion of freedom, Paul exclaims, "Henceforth let no one trouble me!" Instead of the mark of circumcision, he bears the brand-marks of slavery to Jesus—the visible scars of persecution (2 Cor. 11:23–25). Paul's benediction is similar to those with which he concludes other Letters (see Phil. 4:23; Philem. 25). He hopes the Galatians will say "Amen" in response to the reading of the Letter.

EPHESIANS

INTRODUCTION

Transmission

The title "To the Ephesians" is first attested by Irenaeus, ca. A.D. 180. A generation earlier, however, Marcion had edited a collection of Paul's letters that used the title "To the Laodiceans" for Ephesians. Probably the famous heretic took the title from a still earlier edition that he used. It is likely, therefore, that the Letter of Paul to the Ephesians circulated separately as a "general letter" from Paul before it became part of a collection and was supplied with a title and later with a local address in the prescript (1:1).

Literary Genre

The Letter to the Ephesians contains remarkably few references to specific persons, places, events, or controversial issues. It might be destined for any group of gentile Christians who did not know Paul personally. The Letter praises God for his blessing in Christ, extols God's great power and rich mercy, and reminds former Gentiles of the privileges that God has granted to them as well as to the Jews, with whom they have been united. On this basis the addressees are admonished to live up to their calling and avoid gentile vices, but Ephesians does not contain deliberations about more or less advisable courses of action. The author does not engage in dialogue with the addressees or debate with opponents but unfolds themes with which the audience ought to be familiar. The style is both elevated and peculiar (see esp. 1:3–14).

Several scholars have suggested that in spite of the epistolary form Ephesians is best understood as a summary of Paul's teachings (perhaps a "testament"; → Testament [3]), as a theological treatise or a meditation upon the theme "Christ and the Church," as a baptismal homily, or as an introduction to Paul's collected letters. Not all of these suggestions are mutually exclusive. A letter might substitute for a public speech as well as for personal conversation, and in antiquity the art of letter writing could be considered part of the art of persuasion (rhetoric). The rhetoric of Ephesians is a variant of the demonstrative (or "epideictic") genre, which was used, for example, to praise the excellence of a god, an outstanding person, a virtue, or a city and its laws. Ephesians demonstrates the magnitude of God's benefactions. However, it does also have the purpose of a letter—to overcome distance and establish and cultivate contact between sender and addressees. As in 1 Thessalonians—where everything is much more specific—information and reminders are placed within a framework of thanksgiving and intercession, and a background section is followed by appeals. The addressees are asked to reciprocate the apostle's concern for them (Eph. 3:13; 6:19–20).

Setting

Taken at face value, Ephesians is a letter from Paul destined for one or several churches within the field of his mission to the Gentiles but not founded by the apostle himself. Being under arrest, he was not able to visit them, so he sent Tychicus, who was to supplement the letter with oral information (see 1:15–16; 3:1–2; 6:20–22). Apparently on the same mission, Tychicus was also to visit Colossae, accompanied by the runaway slave Onesimus (Col. 4:7–9). Most defenders of Pauline authenticity conclude that Ephesians is a circular letter, destined for Laodicea and Hierapolis, perhaps also for other churches that Tychicus was to visit. The complex relationship among Ephesians, Colossians, and the Letter to Philemon may then be explained by the assumption that the imprisoned apostle commissioned one of his assistants to write to Colossae and another to write a circular letter.

An increasing number of exegetes, Roman Catholics as well as Protestants, find it more likely that Ephesians is a pseudonymous letter, written some time after the death of Paul. The Letter presupposes a setting in which Christians who ought to have been mature were exposed to a variety of false doctrines (4:13–16). The admission of Gentiles on equal terms with the Jews is no longer a controversial issue but is presented as a revealed mystery of which Paul was the mediator (2:11–3:13). Scholars who agree on a post-Pauline origin still evaluate Ephesians in divergent ways, e.g., as a faithful reproduction of Paul's theology, as a partial distortion of his "theology of the cross," or as an inspired reinterpretation that legitimates the later development of the church and its orders. The following exposition presumes that the anonymous author was a personal disciple of Paul, possibly a Jew, who wrote a letter in Paul's name to make Paul present to Christians who were separated from the apostle in time rather than space. At a time when Christianity in Asia Minor was threatened by fragmentation and the Pauline heritage was in danger of being lost, Ephesians calls Christians back to the basis of their own existence, Paul's gospel and mission to the Gentiles, and their own baptism.

COMMENTARY

1:1-2

Salutation

Ephesians, like Romans, mentions only Paul as the sender. Otherwise the form of the salutation has a normal Pauline form except for the address. The early manuscripts do not mention any location; the insertion of "in Ephesus" before "and faithful/believers" is secondary and clumsy (see RSV note). A local address must either have been absent from the beginning or omitted before Ephesians was incorporated in any collection of the Pauline Letters. There is some evidence that Romans was converted into a general Letter by omission of "in Rome" in Rom. 1:7 and 15 and deletion of chaps. 15-16. In the case of Ephesians it is more likely that the desire to have a letter from Paul to all Christians may have provided a reason for the composition of the entire Letter. A letter that concludes with a wish of peace to "all who love our Lord Jesus" may well have begun with a salutation of "the saints who are also faithful."

1:3-14

Introductory Praise of God

Not only Ephesians but also 2 Corinthians and 1 Peter begin by a "benediction" that praises "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." In contemporary Judaism, regular prayers usually had the form of "benedictions" that opened and/or concluded with the formula, "Blessed (be) He" or "Blessed (be) Thou." Brief benedictions were also to be uttered on special occasions, e.g., at the reception of news or at happy encounters (thus already Gen. 24:27). This practice forms the background for the occasional use of a benediction at the opening of a letter (cf. 1 Kings 5:7; 2 Chron. 2:11-12). A blessing of this type may praise God for what he has done for the speaking person (2 Cor. 1:3-11, cf., e.g., 1 Sam. 25:32-34, 39). If God is praised for what he has done for the other person(s), the benediction serves as a solemn, originally courtly, form of congratulation (e.g., Gen. 14:20; 1 Kings 10:9; Ruth 4:14). In praising God, 1 Peter praises Christians happy in spite of their sufferings (1:3-12, cf. 3:14; 4:14). Ephesians praises God for what he has done "in Christ" for all Christians (Eph. 1:3-12), congratulating the gentile addressees who have become partakers of all God's blessings.

The theme of the benediction is that God is to be blessed because he has "blessed us with all kinds of spiritual blessings" (Eph. 1:3). The theme is unfolded in a long series of clauses and phrases attached to one another, sometimes loosely, in consecutive subordination, without any full stop in the Greek text. The text is a unified whole. God is the acting subject, Christ the mediator of God's action and of the benefits Christians have received and possess in Christ. The emphasis gradually shifts from the acts of God to the experience of believers, but there is no argument that moves straight forward. The progress is circular, moving backward and forward from God's benefactions in Christ to the eternal decision of God's will and to God's ultimate purpose. Transitions from one circuit to the next are marked by repetition of the formula "in Christ" or variants at the end or at the beginning of the subsections (1:3, 4-6, 7-10, 11-12, 13-14).

Not only Colossians and other Pauline Letters but also Jewish hymns and prayers provide parallels to the phraseology and some of the themes, but only to a minor degree to the style of the benediction. It has been suggested that the opening benedictions of Ephesians and 1 Peter were modeled upon benedictions used in connection with baptism. This may possibly apply to some parts of the text, but the author of Ephesians has composed the benediction and not quoted an already existing hymn.

1:3, Heavenly Blessings. The blessings for which God is praised are not earthly (as in Deut. 28:2-13) but "spiritual blessings in the heavenly heights." We may picture them as stored in heaven until they were bestowed in Christ. As the text proceeds it mentions various aspects of these blessings: adoption as God's sons (Eph. 1:5, cf. Gal. 4:5; 2 Cor. 6:18), rich grace, redemption and forgiveness through the death of Christ (Eph. 1:6-8, cf. Col. 1:14; Rom. 3:24-25), and also wisdom and insight, as God has revealed his secret plan for the entire universe (Eph. 1:8-10, cf. Dan. 2:20-23). In Christ the chosen ones have become God's own lot (Eph. 1:11-12; cf. JB, TEV). The combination of more or less familiar words and themes have a cumulative effect that evokes emotive as well as doctrinal associations.

1:4-6, Election in Christ. The correspondence between God's intention and action was a common theme (cf. Num. 23:19 and, e.g., Rom. 8:28-30). In Ephesians the idea of predestination is given a special form: already before the origins of the world God has in Christ chosen those whom he would bless in Christ (1:3-4, cf. 1:9; 3:12). This presupposes not only that Christ was in the beginning "with God" (John 1:1), but also that he was designated from the beginning to be the mediator of the blessings God had prepared for his chosen ones (cf. 1 Pet. 1:18-19; 2 Tim. 1:9-10). The correspondence between what God has decided and what he performs is restated in Eph. 1:5, 9-10, and in v. 11, where God is referred to as the one who performs all that his will has decided. The audience is to be assured that God, who in Christ has already done what he intended, will bring his action to completion.

1:7-12, Purpose and Consequences. The most comprehensive statement of God's purpose pertains to God's plan for "all things," the universe of heavenly powers and human beings (1:9-10). The main verb in v. 10 normally means to sum up or recapitulate a complex discourse in a brief summary (cf. Rom. 13:10). The verb may, however, have been taken to mean "to bring to a head" and associated with the metaphoric use of "head" (of a body; see 2 Esdras 12:17-18, NEB). The general idea in Eph. 1:9-10 is therefore likely to be that God's secret plan for "the fullness of time" was to bring the entire history of the universe to its completion in Christ, who is himself the supreme head (cf. 1:20-23; 4:15-16). By the unification of Gentiles and Israelites in the church, God has realized an essential part of this plan (cf. 2:11-22; 3:5-12).

In a similar way, God's final goal for his chosen ones is in line with what he has already done for them. God has chosen them "to be holy and without fault before him" (1:4, TEV; cf. 5:27; Col. 1:22). In Eph. 1:11-12 the Greek syntax is less than clear and translations vary. The unit may best be understood as a somewhat overloaded summary statement: "In Christ we have been singled out, as we were predestined (already before the completion of God's design for the universe) . . . , that—to the praise of God's glory—we should be the ones who have hope in Christ" (v. 10). The entire benediction concludes with two statements of goal and consequence. The first has been interpreted in several ways (see, e.g., KJV, RSV). As Ephesians often connects nearly synonymous words, the intended meaning may be that God's goal was "to redeem and secure us for himself." The ultimate goal is the praise of God's glory. Like God's grace and benefactions (v. 6) and the existence of a community that already has hope in Christ (v. 12), even the inclusion of Gentiles (v. 14) aims at the glorification of God.

1:13-14, The Seal of the Spirit. After the summary statement in vv. 11-12 the gentile addressees are reminded of what happened when they first heard the gospel and responded with faith: they were "sealed" with the Holy Spirit. At the time Ephesians was written, the gift of the Spirit appears to have become an integral part of baptismal theology and ritual, more than an actual experience as it was at the beginning of the Christian mission to the Gentiles (Acts 10:44-48; 15:7-9; Gal. 3:2, 5). Even in Ephesians, however, the "seal of the Spirit" is considered a stamp God has put on those who belong to him and are under his protection and a first installment of their inheritance (cf. 2 Cor. 1:21-22; Eph. 4:30). The gentile addressees are to be assured that God's promise pertains to them and that they have a full share in all of God's blessings in Christ.

The entire benediction performs what it says and praises God by rehearsing his benefactions. Striking a note of congratulation, it reminds the addressees of the many things for which they ought to praise God. Indirectly it also admonishes them to conduct their lives in such a way that God may be glorified by their existence. The benediction is an "exordium" or prologue to the Letter; a more precise statement of the theme is part of the intercession that follows (1:18-19).

1:15-2:22

Intercession, Theme, and Exposition

As in most Letters of Paul, an assertion of thanksgiving and prayer expresses the sender's appreciation of and concern for the addressees. The prayer report is elaborated in a way that prepares for the theme(s) and the main content of the Letter (cf. Rom. 1:9-17; Col. 1:9-12). In the characteristic style of Ephesians a beginning exposition is attached to the thematic formulations of Eph. 1:18-19.

1:15-16, Thanksgiving. As a consequence of the preceding praise of God the thanksgiving is brief and has an unusual form. Nearly all editors and translators accept the text of 1:15 in the majority of Greek manuscripts, according to which Paul gives thanks because he has heard about "the faith . . . and the love" of the addressees, as in Col. 1:4. The words "the love," however, are not present in the earliest and generally best manuscripts, text of which may be translated: "because I have heard about the faith that is yours, in the Lord Jesus, and that also pertains to all the saints." This would make sense in a letter that is destined for a general audience.

1:17-19, Intercession. The prayer for inspired wisdom and revealed knowledge combines several current phrases (see, e.g., Wisd. of Sol. 7:7). Three indirect questions specify the content of knowledge for which Paul is reported to pray and that the letter seeks to convey (Eph. 1:18–19). The call of God, which has given hope to Gentiles without hope, is the main theme (see 4:1, 4). The clauses in 18b and 19 state sub-themes that are treated in reverse order, the manifestation of God's sovereign might in Christ (1:20–23), his power at work among the believers (2:1–10), and the "glory of God's inheritance"—which Gentiles now share with "the saints" (2:11–22; 3:6). The prayer is not for esoteric revelations but for a deeper understanding of the common Christian faith.

1:20–23, The Enthronement of Christ. The resurrection and heavenly enthronement of Christ provide the evidence of God's might. The imagery is drawn from a common Christological use of Ps. 110:1 (i.e., use of the text to express and support the Christian understanding of Jesus, e.g., Rom. 8:34; Acts 2:32–35), combined with Ps. 8:6 (as in 1 Pet. 3:22). The language is hymnic and does not distinguish between the enthronement of Christ and the future subjection of his "enemies" and of "all things" (unlike 1 Cor. 15:22–28; Heb. 2:5–9; 10:12–13). Ephesians does, however, make another distinction. Christ is enthroned in the high heavens, above all known and unknown powers in the universe. They are subjected to him, and he is exalted as "head above all" (like God, 1 Chron. 29:11), but God has given him to the church, and it is the church, not the universe, that is the body and "fullness" of Christ, "who himself receives the entire fullness of God" (NEB) or "fills the universe in all its parts" (e.g., NEB note, KJV), as God does (Jer. 23:24, see also Eph. 4:9).

2:1–10, Made Alive with Christ. The text turns to the work of God's power among those who believe (cf. 1:19). In the Greek text the sentence that begins with "And you" (v. 1) is never completed. With "us" as the object, the intended sentence is resumed and expanded in 2:4–7, where the core is formulated in loose analogy with and dependence upon what is said about God's work in Christ (1:20): "But God . . . has made us (who were dead) alive and made us sit with him on thrones in the high heavens." The cause of the irregular syntax in vv. 1–3 is that the portrayal of former Gentiles as "dead in transgressions and sins" has been expanded into a generalized description of the human predicament apart from Christ. Together with later insertions and comments this contributes to a multifaceted set of contrasts: God's rich mercy and power to make the dead alive over against death in sins; heavenly seats of honor together with Christ instead of existence in the atmosphere below the moon, where the devil holds sway; evidence of God's superabundant grace in ages to come in contrast to conformity to the age of this world. Not only former Gentiles, but all who have a share in the salvation in Christ deserved wrath because of what they did, like those who are still outsiders—but God has loved them with great love.

The assertion that Christians have already been saved, raised, and enthroned with Christ goes beyond what Paul says (e.g. Rom. 5:9–10; 6:1–11); not even Colossians (2:11–14; 3:2–4) offers full parallels. Ephesians may draw upon the language of hymns that praised God as if his mighty work of salvation had already been completed. Appended comments, however, interpret the realized salvation in Pauline terms: "by grace, through faith . . . not because of works, lest anybody should boast" (Eph. 2:5b, 8–9). A contrast between two ways of life, in sins or in good works prepared by God, encloses the subsection and brings the prayer report to a delayed conclusion (2:2–3, 10; cf. Phil. 1:9–11; Col. 1:9–10).

The World and the Church

Popularized science of Hellenistic culture, especially astronomy, has left some traces upon the way in which Ephesians talks about the world or the universe ("all things," e.g., 1:10; 3:9). The "air" is the atmosphere between the earth and the lowest of the celestial spheres that surround it (2:2; 4:9). The symbolic reference to four immeasurable dimensions presupposes that the universe itself is spherical; its height reaches up to the zenith, its invisible depth down to the nadir (3:18). The spheres were generally supposed to be the habitat of powers (stars, subordinate gods, and demons—or, in Judaism, angels) who operated in nature and influenced events on earth. The use of abstract nouns to designate the cosmic powers is attested in some Pseudepigrapha and early Christian and Gnostic writings (→ Gnosticism; Pseudepigrapha). Ephesians shows no interest in their specific classes and functions (see 1:20; cf. Rom. 8:38–39; Col. 1:16). A phrase that rarely occurs outside Ephesians, "in the heavenly places" ("realms" or "heights") indicates their location in the universe (Eph. 3:10; 6:12). The same poetic circumlocution "in (the) heaven(s)" can, however, also be used about the heavenly throne of God and Christ outside the world of space and time (1:20; cf. 1:4; 2:6).

The explicit association of the cosmic powers with the devil is unusual but corresponds with a more general evaluation of "this world" as "darkness" (6:11–12; cf. 2:1–3; 4:17–19; 5:8–12). However, dualistic trends, i.e., the tendency to depict the whole universe as divided radically between good and evil powers, are counterbalanced by a strong emphasis upon the sovereignty of God, the Creator and Father of all (e.g. 3:9, 14–15; 4:6). Ephesians makes no attempt to explain the origins of evil but insists that God has proved his sovereign might by enthroning the risen Christ above the universe and all powers within it (1:19–22; 4:10). As Christ is the “head above all,” his body, the church, is like a world, a renewed universe whose organic cohesion and growth depends upon its relation to the heavenly head (1:22–23; 4:7–16; see also Col. 1:17–18; 2:10, 19). God’s eternal but secret design for his creation was put into effect when Christ unified Israelites and Gentiles in one body, and through the church the “richly variegated wisdom” of God’s governance was made known to the powers who acted as rulers over various segments of a divided world (Eph. 3:4–11; cf. 1:9–11; 2:14–18).

In the world the cosmic powers still act as hostile forces, allied with the devil. Christians have to stand firm and fight them (6:10–17). In union with Christ, however, they have already risen above the world in which they still face trials and tribulations. The cosmological imagery has in Ephesians become a vehicle to communicate Paul’s conviction that no power whatsoever can “separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord” (see Rom. 8:31–39). In the historical context it must also have had the same implications as the explicit warnings in Colossians (Col. 2:4–3:4): efforts to escape the world and ascend to heaven by means of ascetic practices and visionary experiences are both futile and unnecessary. By the grace of God the members of the church have already been freed from bondage and enthroned in heaven as associates of Christ. What matters is that they do not relapse into the vices that are still in full swing in the outside world but do those good works for which they have been created, and that they relate to one another in such a way that the body of Christ and all its members will grow up toward Christ, in truth and in love. (→ Angel; Church; Demon; Devil; Heaven; Power; Stars; World, the)

2:11–22, Reminder: Alienation and Reconciliation. As in 2:1–10 the former Gentiles are reminded of what they once were and what they now have become (cf. 5:8 and, e.g., Col. 1:21–22; Titus 3:3–7). The core sentence is v. 13: “But now, in Christ Jesus, you who once were far off have come near by the (atoning) blood of Christ.” The terms “far off” and “near” allude to Isa. 57:19 but are, as in Jewish usage, applied respectively to those who lack and those who have full legal and religious rights as the people of God. The opening and concluding sentences deal with the former and the present status of uncircumcised Gentiles (Eph. 2:11–12, 19–22). They were once foreigners with no share in the privileges of Israel (cf. Rom. 9:5), but now they are “fellow citizens of the saints,” not merely aliens with limited rights. A cluster of loaded metaphors, God’s city, household, building, and temple, center around the identification of Christ as the cornerstone and the apostles and prophets as the foundation laid in Zion (Isa. 28:16; cf. 1 Pet. 2:4–10). The upbuilding of the entire structure depends upon Christ in the same way as the growth of the body (Eph. 2:19; cf. 4:16; Col. 2:19).

A middle segment, Eph. 2:14–18, explains how Christ through his atoning death brought about the transfer from “far off” to “near by.” The text has a poetic flavor and alludes to the messenger of peace in Isa. 52:7 as well as to the peace for the far and the near in Isa. 57:19. Christ is himself identified with the peace he has brought and announced. This peace means unification of the Jewish and non-Jewish parts of humanity, creation of “one new human being,” reconciliation of both parts with one another and with God “in one body,” and free access to the Father “in one Spirit.”

Ephesians maintains that to overcome duality Christ abrogated “the law of commandments” and broke down the “dividing wall” of hostility. The metaphor may allude to a cosmic wall around God’s heavenly abode (e.g., 1 Enoch 14) but also to the wall that barred the access of foreigners to the Temple (see Acts 21:27–30; cf. Ezek. 44:20; 44:5–9). Ephesians, moreover, gives a negative twist to the notion that the commandments provided “walls” that protected the purity of Israel (Let. Arist. 139–42) and regards the Law as a set of rules for communal life and worship that alienated Gentiles and caused hostility but were unable to reconcile sinners with God. (For a somewhat similar view see Heb. 7:18–19; 9:1–10).

The reminder in Eph. 2:11–22 is, like the entire Letter, addressed to Christian Gentiles who have been united with the original heirs of God’s promise without becoming Jews (see 3:6). The text does, however, presuppose that both parts of humanity were in need of peace and reconciliation through the cross of Christ. The distinction between “the uncircumcision” (RSV, lit., “foreskin”) and circumcision “in the flesh, made by hands” (v. 11) has become obsolete as Christ has inaugurated a new age in which both parts have access to the Father in one Spirit and are built up to be the temple where God dwells in the Spirit. As Gentiles within the church in this context are regarded as representatives of the entire non-Jewish world, the Jews in the church may represent all Israel, as in Romans 11. Ephesians, however, never mentions the fact that some Jews rejected Christ, nor does it say anything about how the addressees relate, or ought to relate, to Jews in their own midst or in Jerusalem. The author's concern is, apparently, the roots and origin of the church in Israel more than the actual relationship between Christians and Jews.

3:1-21

Paul's Ministry and Intercession

3:1-13, Information About the Sender. In Ephesians this information is inserted between the beginning and the continuation of a renewed assertion of intercession (3:1, 14-21). The report tells no news; it is a retrospective summary that portrays Paul as mediator of the formerly hidden but now revealed mystery of Christ (cf. Col. 1:25-29; 2 Tim. 1:8-11; Rom. 16:25-27, and already 1 Cor. 2:6-16; 4:1). The first of two circular moves, from Paul to the mystery and back, draws attention to the special revelation granted to Paul and to his insight into the mystery that was revealed to "the holy apostles and prophets" (Eph. 3:2-7). The second move emphasizes that Paul, by the grace of God, became an active agent of revelation. His ministry to the Gentiles made the Creator's secret plan, to include the Gentiles as "fellow heirs" and members of the body of Christ, public knowledge, available to heavenly powers as well as to human beings (3:8-13, see also 2:11-22; 3:6). Several features of this stylized portrait are already present in the undisputed Letters of Paul (see 1 Cor. 1; 5:1-11; Gal. 1:11-16; 2:7-9). In a special way, however, it emphasizes that all gentile Christians owe their existence as members of the church to Paul's work as the agent of the revealed mystery of Christ.

3:14-19, The Intercession Resumed and Concluded. The prayer is that God through his Spirit will give strength at the inner center, that Christ may be present through faith, and love be a firm foundation, so that the believers have the disposition that is necessary if they are to obtain true knowledge and reach the ultimate goal. In Jewish tradition, the immeasurable vastness of the world often illustrated the limitations of human understanding (e.g., Job 11:7-10). God, however, might reveal all mysteries of the world to a man of God like Moses (e.g., 2 Apoc. Bar. 59:4-11). Ephesians uses comprehension of the dimensions of the universe as a rhetorical preamble to prepare for the climax of the prayer: "That you may have power . . . to know the love of Christ that surpasses knowledge" (Eph. 3:19, RSV).

3:20-21, Doxology. A formula celebrating God's glory brings the intercession and the whole first part of the Letter to an appropriate conclusion. The form "To him who is able to . . .

be glory" occurs also in Rom. 16:25-27 and Jude 24-25. In Ephesians God's immense power is a recurrent theme (see 1:11, 19).

4:1-16

Basic Appeal and Incentives

4:1-6, Worthy of the Calling. A polite but urgent appeal marks the transition to the second main part of the Letter (cf. Rom. 12:1; Philm. 8). The basic request, that those who are called by God should live up to their calling, corresponds to the thematic formulation in Eph. 1:18 and covers all the exhortations in 4:1-6:20. The first specification is that those who have received one common hope must conduct their lives and relate to one another in such a way that the given unity is preserved: "one Spirit and one body" (4:1-4). The very carefully arranged correlation of "one" and "all" in vv. 5-6 has antecedents in a common Greek tradition that could be adapted to Jewish monotheism and to Christian faith (see 1 Cor. 8:6; Heb. 2:10-11; Rom. 11:36). In the context of Ephesians the formula expounds the basis of the unity that has to be preserved. The appended description in Eph. 4:7-16 as well as echoes from the preceding (see esp. 2:14, 16, 18) confirm that the purpose of the exhortations is not merely to tell Christians what they ought to do but also, or even more, to motivate them to live up to their calling.

4:7-16, Unity in Diversity. The explanation supporting the appeal treats the theme of one body with many parts in a way that is both similar to and different from Rom. 12:3-8 and 1 Cor. 12:6-30. The ascended Christ is identified as the giver of diverse measures of grace. The quotation of and comments upon Ps. 68:18 in Eph. 4:8-11 presuppose an alteration of the text from "he took . . ." to "he gave gifts." The free rendering goes back to a Jewish tradition that applied the passage to Moses, who ascended to heaven (according to this tradition) to receive the Torah and give gifts. Ephesians combines a Christological interpretation of the passage with the representation of the ascended Christ as the supreme head. The "gifts" of Christ are not identified with spiritual gifts in general (in spite of v. 8) but with persons who were assigned to preach the gospel and/or to take care of the congregations. As a result, modern commentators have debated the extent to which Ephesians presupposes and legitimates an institutionalized ministry. In the context, however, the interest centers on the workers' common task, to build up the church and ward off all kinds of false teaching, so that the entire body of Christ and all its members may grow up in harmony and reach full maturity (vv. 12-16; see Short Essay "The World and the Church" above).

4:17-24*Two Ways of Life

A stern warning (vv. 17-19) and a positive reminder (vv. 20-24) introduce the series of negative and positive prescriptions in 4:25-30.

4:17-19, No Longer Like the Gentiles. The stereotyped, dark picture of Gentiles is reminiscent of Rom. 1:21-32, but it is used in a traditional way as a warning not to act as idolatrous people do (see, e.g., Lev. 19:1-4; 1 Pet. 1:14). Their ignorance of the true God has resulted in the loss of moral sensitivity and decency. In practice this led to a combination of what were considered typical pagan vices: impurity in contrast to holiness and unfair gain at the expense of others (not merely greed; see also 5:3-5).

4:20-24, The Old and the New Human Being.

The addressees should not relapse into their former way of life because they did "learn Christ" when they received the gospel and were instructed to "put off the old . . . and put on the new human being." The teaching is probably a summary of baptismal instruction (see Col. 3:9-11; Gal. 3:17-18; cf. Col. 2:11-12; Rom. 6:3-6). Familiarity with current interpretations of Genesis 1-3 and with Pauline teaching would enrich readers' understanding of the symbolism (see, e.g., Rom. 5:12-21; 8:29; 13:12, 14; 1 Cor. 15:44-49, 53-54). Ephesians, however, uses the reminder about the meaning of baptism in a hortatory context and insists that the initiation has to be followed up by an ongoing inner renewal (4:23; cf. 3:16-17).

4:25-5:20*Negative and Positive Admonitions

Diverse rules of conduct are loosely interconnected, as often in moral exhortations. Some formulations go back to the OT (e.g., Zech. 8:16; Ps. 4:4); many are taken over from catechetical instruction and/or from Colossians (e.g., Gal. 5:19-21; 1 Thess. 4:11; Col. 3:5-17; 4:5). Ephesians, however, tends to formulate the traditional topics after a pattern, main characteristics of which are use of second-person plural forms, coordination of negative and positive imperatives, and appended or inserted reasons for the warnings and recommendations (see Eph. 4:25-32; 5:3-12, 15-18). The sequence also shows careful composition. The first series of admonitions (4:25-32) is linked to the preceding reminder (vv. 20-24) and spells out what Christians should already know. They should be imitators of God, in whose image "the new human being" was created (5:1-2). The strict warnings in 5:3-14 elaborate the theme "no longer like the Gentiles" (4:17), and a final series (5:15-20) provides a gradual transition to the directives for wives and husbands.

Familiar precepts are reformulated to stimulate and motivate former Gentiles to behave as new and continuously renewed persons. Their words, actions, and reactions should not harm but benefit those who are fellow members of the one body. Christ's saving grace, love, and sacrifice provide the model for mutual forgiveness and love. Anger and pernicious speech may bedevil the fellowship; pagan immorality and self-interest contaminate the "children of light." The stern warnings against association with immoral outsiders may seem to recommend the kind of isolation that the Essenes practice (→ Essenes), but they are not meant to be strict rules of sectarian discipline (cf. 1 Cor. 5:9-10). Both the injunction to bring to light the shameful "works of darkness" and, in the present context, the quotation from an unknown source in Eph. 5:14 presuppose social contacts that may result in the conversion of outsiders. Among insiders and outsiders alike, Christians should not behave like ignorant pagans but be wise, able to discern what is the will of God (5:15-17; see also 5:10; Rom. 12:2; Col. 4:5-6). Sober but filled with the Spirit, they are to give thanks in their common worship and also, in continuation of Jewish custom, in daily life (see also Eph. 5:4; Col. 3:16-17; 1 Thess. 5:18).

5:21-6:9*Domestic Duties

As in the shorter and earlier code in Col. 3:18-4:1, the rules are arranged in three pairs: wives and husbands, children and fathers, slaves and masters—an order that can be traced back to Aristotle and that has left traces in many later treatments of what a good household should be like. The earliest Christian examples address each group separately (see also 1 Pet. 2:18-3:7).

5:21, Introductory Statement. In Ephesians the introductory formulation "subject to one another" (Eph. 5:21) further modifies the common tendency to make the master of the house responsible for the good order of the entire household.

5:22-33, Wives and Husbands. The extended treatment moves repeatedly back and forth from wives and husbands to the relationship between Christ and the church, which is seen as the model for human marriage in two ways: first, the husband is the head of his wife (cf. 1 Cor. 11:3) as Christ is the head of the church (see Eph. 1:22-23); second, Christ loved and gave himself up for the church, his bride (5:25-27; cf. Ezek. 16:8-14; 2 Cor. 11:2; Rev. 21:9). The two sets of metaphors are fused in Eph. 5:28-33 by means of a subtle combination of Gen. 2:24, "the two shall be one flesh," and the commandment of love in Lev. 19:18, which is paraphrased by "love their own bodies," "his own flesh," and "as himself." Christ's unification with the church, his bride and his body, is the "great mystery" contained in Gen. 2:24 (see also 2:23). The emphatic formula "I for my part" (Eph. 5:32, NEB) implies a contrast with another interpretation, most likely one arguing that union with Christ excluded human marriage—not only relations with a prostitute, as Paul argued in 1 Cor. 6:15–17. For early Christianity, celibacy or abstinence was the main alternative to the inherited household ethos that the disclosure of the "great mystery" in Ephesians both upholds and modifies.

6:1–4, Children and Parents. The Alexandrian Jewish author Philo had already connected the commandment to honor one's parents with general rules of household duties. The rule for fathers in Eph. 6:4 is the part of the code that most easily can be used to support authoritarian paternalism, but it may refer to "education" rather than strict "discipline."

6:5–9, Slaves and Masters. The presence of slaves in Christian households is not felt as a problem by the author, but Ephesians stresses that slaves and masters have reciprocal duties and the same impartial Lord in heaven. In comparison with Pauline texts like 1 Cor. 7:20–24, 29–31; Gal. 3:28; and Philemon, however, the household rules in Ephesians are evidence of an increasing closeness to generally accepted standards.

6:10–20 Final Exhortations

Exhortations to be strong, stand firm, and be awake, and to pray and make intercession, especially for the sender, conclude the main part of the letter (cf. 1 Cor. 16:13; Col. 4:2–3). The elaborated admonition to "put on the whole armor of God" resumes the theme of Eph. 4:24 in a new form. Most of the weapon metaphors go back to the OT (see Isa. 11:5; 59:16–17; Wisd. of Sol. 5:16; cf. Isa. 52:7), but they may have been used in catechetical traditions (see Rom. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:8). The "weapons" are not simply human virtues but rather effects of God's own might, which provides protection in the fight against the invisible powers that cause tribulations and temptations. Equipped with the "gospel of peace" and the "sword of the Spirit," Christians are also to engage actively in the cosmic battle.

6:21–24

Epistolary Conclusion

The commendation of Tychicus, who is to carry the letter and supplement it with oral reports, is formulated by analogy with Col. 4:7–9 but omits the reference to Onesimus. Wishes of peace and grace are Pauline variants of the customary greetings at the end of a letter. The formulation is unusual, however. Verse 23 seems to make "the grace" contingent upon the attitude of the addressees (cf. Gal. 6:16), perhaps an indication that the author feared that not all Christians would heed the reminders and admonitions of his "letter from Paul."

PHILIPPIANS

RONALD F. HOCK

INTRODUCTION

The city of Philippi in northeastern Macedonia was named for Philip II, king of Macedonia (359–336 B.C.) and father of Alexander the Great. By the second and first centuries B.C., however, Roman influence became dominant; the city was connected to Italy by the road known as the Via Egnatia, settled on several occasions with Roman veterans, and reorganized as a Roman colony (Colonia Julia Augusta Philippensis) complete with Roman gods and Roman law (→ Philippi).

About A.D. 50 the apostle Paul, accompanied by Silas and Timothy, left Asia Minor for Europe and landed at Neapolis, where they picked up the Via Egnatia and traveled on to Philippi (Acts 16:11–12). Acts has a vivid, if episodic, account of the founding of the Philippian church: conversations with Lydia, the purple dealer, at a Jewish prayer meeting outside the city led to her conversion and offer of hospitality (vv. 13–15); they encountered a prophetess, which led to a dispute with her masters and ended with the beating and imprisonment of Paul and Silas (vv. 16–24); there was an earthquake and resulting confusion at the prison, which led to the conversion of the jailor (vv. 25–34); the local authorities made a formal apology for having beaten Paul, a Roman citizen (vv. 35–39); and they departed from the city (v. 40).

Paul's Letters confirm few of these details, although the beating and imprisonment are alluded to in 1 Thess. 2:2 and Phil. 1:30. Paul's silence, however, does not invalidate the Acts account. Indeed, the many Roman features—the designation “colony” (Acts 16:12), the Roman terms for local authorities (vv. 20, 35), the prohibition of unapproved religions within the city (vv. 13, 21), the appeal to rights of Roman citizens (v. 37)—lend it considerable plausibility.

In the Letter of Paul to the Philippians there is a further echo of Roman custom that Acts does not mention. There was a special relationship between Paul and the Philippians, a relationship that existed, Paul says, “from the first day” (Phil. 1:5; 4:15). Paul describes it in language reminiscent of a Roman legal “partnership,” in which partners contributed toward some goal, in this case the advancement of the gospel (1:5, 7; 4:15). This partnership expressed itself in repeated, if irregular, gifts from the Philippians to Paul (4:10, 15).

Consequently, contact with the Philippian church continued after Paul's departure. In fact, shortly afterward the Philippians sent Paul gifts twice at Thessalonica (Phil. 4:16) and later at Corinth (2 Cor. 11:9). Added to these visits by Philippians are others by Paul or Timothy to Philippi (Acts 19:22; 20:1–4). Hence, we can suppose a lengthy and close relationship as background for the Letter to the Philippians, written when Paul is in prison (Phil. 1:7) and has received yet another gift (4:18).

Philippians belongs to that group of Letters including Romans, 1–2 Corinthians, Galatians, 1 Thessalonians, and Philemon whose Pauline authorship no one doubts. Within this group Philippians ranks fifth in length (1730 words).

Two issues in particular have been raised regarding Philippians: its literary integrity and its dating and placement. Some scholars, noting the sharp change in tone at 3:1–4:1, the delay in thanking the Philippians for their gift until 4:10–20, and a reference in the Letter of Polycarp (a second-century bishop of Smyrna) to letters of Paul to Philippi (Pol. Phil. 3:2) have proposed that the canonical Letter is a composite of two or three separate letters. This proposal, however, has convinced few scholars. Hence the following comments assume the Letter's literary integrity.

The second issue is much harder to decide. Traditionally, Philippians has been placed during Paul's Roman imprisonment in the early 60s (cf. Acts 28:14–31), suggested, no doubt, by references to the praetorian guard (Phil. 1:13) and the household of Caesar (4:22). Scholars, however, note that these references do not point exclusively to Rome and that a Roman imprisonment is problematic on other grounds. Consequently, they have proposed other locations, such as the imprisonment at Caesarea in Judea in the late 50s, known from Acts 23:33–26:32. Or, knowing that Paul was imprisoned in several other, if unspecified, places (2 Cor. 11:23), they have conjectured an Ephesian imprisonment in the mid-50s on the basis of Paul's reference to fighting with beasts at Ephesus (1 Cor. 15:32). Still, neither of these locations is without its problems, so that the matter is really at an impasse.

COMMENTARY

1:1–11

The Opening of the Letter

1:1–2, Salutation. Paul follows letter-writing conventions of his day when he opens this Letter with the names of senders and recipients (v. 1) as well as with his greetings (v. 2). The conventional formula, however, was brief: A to B, greetings. Paul expanded this formula, and though his expansion here is not as great as in Rom. 1:1–7 and Gal. 1:1–5, it is still distinctive. For example, Timothy appears as co-sender, not in itself peculiar, as he is listed in the salutations of 2 Corinthians, Philemon, and 1 Thessalonians, but in the first two he has a subordinate role as “brother” to Paul (2 Cor. 1:1; Philem. 1) and in the third he comes after Silvanus (1 Thess. 1:1). In the salutation of Philippians, however, Timothy alone is co-sender and is Paul’s equal, since both are “slaves of Christ Jesus” (1:1). Timothy’s unique status here accords with his close relationship to Paul as his “son” (2:22) and with his genuine concern for the Philippians (2:19–20). This concern had arisen from Timothy’s presence at the founding of the Philippian church (cf. Acts 16:1, 11–40) as well as from subsequent visits (cf. Acts 19:22; 20:1–4), and it explains Paul’s intention to send him in particular on a future visit (Phil. 2:19–24).

Paul’s use of the designation “slave” is also unusual (cf. Rom. 1:1). His usual self-designation is “apostle” (so Rom. 1:1; Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:1; Gal. 1:1), and its absence here is probably because Paul’s relations with the Philippians were such that he hardly had to assert his authority; by contrast, there were challenges to his apostleship at Corinth and in Galatia. In any case, the term “slave” is significant in that Paul elsewhere uses slave imagery of himself and Timothy (Phil. 2:22) and of the Philippians (2:12) and often speaks metaphorically of Jesus as “master” (2:11; cf. 1:2; 3:8, 20; 4:5, 23).

The description of the recipients is distinctive in that only here are certain “overseers” (Gk. episkopoi) and “aides” (diakonoi) referred to (1:1). Their precise role is difficult to determine, but they were no doubt leaders and perhaps had some role in the gift (see 4:10–20).

Finally, instead of the conventional “greetings” (cf. Acts 15:23) Paul expands: “Grace to you and peace from God, our father, and the master, Jesus Christ” (Phil. 1:2), a fixed formula in Paul (Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3; 2 Cor. 1:2; Philem. 3).

1:3–11, Thanksgiving. This section opens with “I give thanks to my God . . .” a formulaic expression that is typical of Paul’s Letters (Rom. 1:8; 1 Cor. 1:4; 1 Thess. 1:2; Philem. 4) and paralleled to some extent in ancient letters generally. This thanksgiving is noteworthy in several respects. For example, one phrase in Phil. 1:3 is ambiguous, capable of being rendered “whenever I remember you” or “whenever you remember me.” If the latter is correct, then we have an appropriately early, if veiled, note of thanks for the Philippians’ gift. One objection to the Letter’s integrity would thus be removed.

The remainder of the thanksgiving is clear enough, elaborating on Paul’s gratitude from several angles. Thus, besides the “when” of his thanksgiving (v. 3), there is also the “how”—his thanksgiving is made “with joy” (v. 4), an emotion that characterizes the tone of the Letter as a whole—and the “why,” namely, Paul’s formal partnership (v. 5). Accordingly, Paul’s pause to express his intense feelings for the Philippians—they are “in his heart” and he “yearns” to see them (vv. 7–8)—is understandable, particularly so in his own difficult circumstances of being “in chains” and having to defend himself (v. 7). Finally, Paul gives the content of his prayers: that the Philippians’ love for one another abound more and more, and especially in that knowledge that helps them to distinguish what is right and so makes them pure and blameless on the day of Christ that will redound to the glory and praise of God (vv. 9–11).

The Body of the Letter

1:12–26, Paul’s Circumstances. The words “I want you to know . . .” (v. 12) are a conventional formula for signaling the body of a letter and so point to the letter’s purpose. That purpose was to inform the Philippians of Paul’s circumstances as a prisoner. He does not at first speak about his personal prospects. Instead he dwells on the prospects for the gospel, and in this matter he has reason for joy (v. 18). His being a prisoner has turned out surprisingly for the advancement of the gospel (v. 12): first, Paul’s chains have made Christ known throughout the praetorian guard and beyond (v. 13), and second, his chains have emboldened other Christians to speak the word fearlessly (v. 14). Paul admits that not all these Christians are preaching out of the best motives (v. 15). In fact, some are doing so out of rivalry, supposing that they are thereby causing Paul’s chains to pinch even more (vv. 16–17). Nevertheless, Christ is being preached, making Paul joyful (v. 18).

Paul’s own prospects are less sure. He is confident of his own eventual salvation, but in the short run life and death seem equally possible as the outcome of his trial (v. 19). This uncertainty prompts Paul to reflect on the desirability of living or dying, and, as Paul himself admits, he is hard pressed to choose between the two (vv. 20-23). For Paul personally death is preferable because then he will be with Christ (v. 24), but for the Philippians his living seems to him to be more essential—even fated (v. 25). Hence Paul looks forward to living, even visiting the Philippians, and so to helping them in their advancement and joy in the faith (v. 25). The repetition of the word “advancement” (cf. v. 12) gives closure to this section, and the reference to joy (cf. v. 18) underscores the tone of the Letter which was set in 1:4.

1:27-2:18, The Philippian Situation. This section flows easily from the previous one, for already in 1:24 Paul began to turn his thoughts away from his own situation to that of the Philippians. And their lot is not an easy one either; they have not merely to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for Christ (v. 29). Accordingly, if they are going to live worthy of the gospel, they must, Paul says, stand firm and united (v. 27). This advice is couched in athletic imagery: they are to compete together with one soul (v. 27), not be startled by their opponents (v. 28), and see their lives as Christians as a contest (v. 29). The identity of the opponents (v. 28) is uncertain. They may be traveling Christian missionaries with a different understanding of the faith or, more likely, people at Philippi who are causing problems for the church.

In 2:1-4 Paul continues his call for unity, though now in the language of partnership (cf. 1:5: the Philippians are “to be of one mind,” 2:2). In addition, he counsels against factiousness and glory seeking and instead encourages humility or deference toward others (vv. 3-4), a quality especially evident in Christ, which prompts Paul to digress long enough to cite a hymnic tribute to Christ as once slave but now master (vv. 5-11).

2:6-11, The Christ Hymn

No passage of Philippians has attracted as much scholarly attention as this hymn. This attention is explained in part by the various lexical, grammatical, and exegetical problems in these verses but especially by the very importance of the hymn as one of the earliest witnesses to Christological reflection, i.e., reflection on the nature and mission of Jesus. The hymn was first recognized as such over sixty years ago, and scholars continue to debate such matters as the hymn’s author, structure, redaction, background, setting, and meaning.

Although some scholars still hold to Pauline authorship, the presence of non-Pauline words or emphases points to someone other than Paul, although it is uncertain whether that person was a Jewish Christian or one more influenced by Greco-Roman culture. Likewise, the structure of the hymn is uncertain; an original form of two (vv. 6-8, 9-11), three (vv. 6-7a, 7b-8, 9-11), or more stanzas has been proposed. Complicating the matter is the question of how much Paul may have modified the hymn. Thus the phrase “even death on a cross” (v. 8) is often regarded as an addition by Paul, and some scholars would add “those in heaven, on earth, and under the earth” (v. 10).

The conceptual background of the hymn is variously explained by looking to the OT (esp. the Suffering Servant of Isaiah), to intertestamental Jewish writings and their concern with wisdom and the righteous sufferer, or to redeemer figures of Gnostic speculations. This background debate is the most hotly contested and is far from decided.

On the matter of setting, however, scholars tend to agree that the hymn was regularly used in Christian liturgy. Indeed, we can picture the singers of the hymn bowing on cue at the phrase “at the name ‘Jesus’” (v. 10) as they confessed “Jesus Christ is Lord” (v. 11)—perhaps during baptism or at the Eucharist.

With all this uncertainty surrounding the hymn it is not surprising that its meaning is debated too, although at a general level it is clear that the author has taken the principal facts of the gospel, Christ’s death and resurrection (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3-5), and interpreted them in terms of humiliation (vv. 6-8) and exaltation (vv. 9-11), of being enslaved (v. 7) and made master (v. 11).

In its present context in Philippians the hymn serves several purposes. It serves Paul’s exhortation to humility (v. 3) by grounding it in Christ’s having humbled himself (v. 8), and it gives emphasis to the slave-master theme announced at 1:1-2.

---

In 2:12-18 Paul resumes his exhortation with an eye to the Philippians’ salvation (v. 12), their divine assistance in this (v. 13) and their harmonious conduct that sets them off from the world (v. 15); therefore, Paul will have reason to boast at the day of Christ (v. 16), which prompts again the theme of joy (vv. 17-18).

2:19-3:1a, Visits to the Philippians. Paul turns his thoughts from the day of Christ to the more immediate future and specifically to his plans to send Timothy (vv. 19-23), Epaphroditus (vv. 25-30), and perhaps himself (v. 24). Announcements of visits by Paul or his associates are typical of his Letters (e.g., Rom. 15:22-29; 1 Cor. 4:17-21).

Paul speaks of Timothy's visit first, but it is Epaphroditus who will leave first, as is clear from Paul's "hopes" of sending Timothy (Phil. 2:19, 23) but the "necessity" of sending Epaphroditus back (v. 25). Consequently, it was Epaphroditus who would have carried the letter to Philippi. What we know of him derives only from this Letter: he was a Philippian Christian who had been commissioned to deliver the gift to Paul (4:18). What made his return necessary was his distress that news had reached Philippi of his near fatal illness (vv. 26-27). Hence when he recovered, Paul hastily sent him back, though not without warm praise for having risked his life in completing his commission (vv. 28-30). His return will be another occasion for joy (vv. 28-29).

Timothy's visit will follow. Paul wants to know more about the situation at Philippi, and Timothy will report back, but Paul does not want to send him until he can say something specific about his own predicament as a prisoner (v. 23). In the meantime Paul prepares for that visit by lavishing on Timothy warm praise, especially for his genuine concern for the Philippians (vv. 20-22). Finally, Paul hints again at his own possible visit (v. 24; cf. 1:26, 27; 2:12).

3:1b-4:1, Paul's Warning and Theological Defense. At this point the tone and style shift abruptly from joy and exhortation to warning and theological argument. The shift has prompted some to suspect the Letter's integrity, but such abruptness is not uncommon (e.g., 1 Thess. 2:14-16).

The warning is brief: watch out for the dogs; watch out for evil workers; watch out for the program of mutilation (Phil. 3:2). The identity of these "dogs" is not clear, but their vaunting of Jewish credentials (cf. vv. 3-4) and the term "evil workers," which recalls a similar epithet in 2 Cor. 11:13, point to the same (or similar) groups of missionaries Paul had opposed at Corinth and in Galatia. The people are probably not identical to the "opponents" referred to earlier (cf. Phil. 1:28). In any case, this threat allows Paul to set out his own theology by means of assertion, differentiation, and qualification.

In 3:3-11 Paul first asserts that he and his followers represent the true circumcision (in contrast to physical circumcision, which he calls "mutilation" in v. 2), in that he advocates a spiritual worship and a boasting in Christ, not in the flesh (v. 3). Then he explains his views by differentiating them from those of the rival missionaries (vv. 4-11). Paul claims that he has not made a virtue out of necessity, as it were, since he also could boast "in the flesh," as the following biographical statements make clear: circumcised on the eighth day (cf. Gen. 17:12; Lev. 12:3), belonging to the people of Israel and the tribe of Benjamin (cf. Rom. 11:1), a Hebrew born of Hebrews (a difficult phrase, referring either to his pure ethnic stock or to his Jewish culture), a Pharisee according to law (cf. Gal. 1:14), a persecutor of the church out of zeal (cf. 1 Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13-14), and blameless in the eyes of the law (Phil. 3:4-6).

Precisely these sorts of boasts, Paul says, now count as nothing because of Christ. The imagery here is economic: what Paul once counted as "profit" or "gain" he now regards as "loss" (vv. 7-8). Indeed, only his master Christ now counts as "gain," so Paul's hope is only in that righteousness which comes from God through faith in Christ's death and resurrection and involves sharing that death and attaining resurrection from the dead (vv. 9-11).

In vv. 12-16 there are so many problems in the manuscript evidence, the words, and the grammar that the exact meaning is hard to determine. Nevertheless, it is clear that Paul is qualifying what he has just said: "Not that I have already received or am already perfect" (v. 12). Instead, using athletic imagery, he says that if he has not attained he is still pursuing the "prize" of the higher calling of God in Christ (v. 14), and that he expects the Philippians to have the same attitude (vv. 15-16).

This higher calling is then contrasted with the earthly things that occupy the thoughts of those whose god is the belly and who glory in their shame (v. 19). Just who these "enemies of the cross of Christ" (v. 18) are is again not clear. But since they apparently indulge the flesh rather than boast in it, they are probably not the missionaries of vv. 2-3; thus they represent a third group endangering the Philippians (1:28). In any case, Paul urges the Philippians to imitate him (v. 17), since their true country is not on earth but in heaven (v. 20). Christological and eschatological formulas follow (v. 21), and the section concludes on the familiar note of joy (4:1).

4:2-9, Specific Exhortations. The hortatory tone that Paul used in the closing verses of the last, largely theological, section (cf. 3:15-17; 4:1) is again dominant, although now the exhortation is intended for specific individuals. Two women, named Euodia and Syntyche, are urged to be of the same mind (v. 3). The nature of their dispute is lost to us, but the phrase "be of the same mind" recalls that of 2:2 ("be of one mind") and thus links up with the partnership theme (1:5). And Paul calls the women his "fellow athletes in the gospel" (4:3). Accordingly, he may be exhorting them to subordinate their personal disagreement to the broader interests of the partnership to advance the gospel (cf. 1:5). Paul then asks another individual, known only as "yokefellow," to intercede for him in this matter (4:3). The attempt to identify this person has led to many conjectures: Epaphroditus, Timothy, Silvanus, Luke, even Lydia. But we simply do not know.

In 4:4, however, the exhortations become general. There is the now familiar call to be joyful (v. 4). But especially noteworthy here is the rhetorically effective use of repetition and variation that make the concluding exhortation memorable: "Whatever is true, whatever is revered, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is amiable, whatever is reputable, if there is any virtue, if there is any praise—think about these things" (v. 8). These qualities are probably those Paul had in mind but did not specify earlier when he prayed for the Philippians to "approve what really matters" (1:10).

4:10–20, Paul's Thanks for the Philippians' Gift. Earlier in the Letter Paul had occasion to allude to the gift of the Philippians (esp. 2:30; cf. 1:3). Now, however, he takes up the matter directly. And what strikes readers beyond Paul's genuine gratitude is the delicacy of his wording. He alternates between assertion and qualification so as not to be misunderstood.

The section begins on a note of joy, the joy that the Philippians had at length revived their thoughts about him as evidenced by the gift (v. 10). But to avoid the appearance of criticizing them for not thinking about him more often, Paul adds the qualification "but you did not have any opportunity" to do so (v. 10). Then Paul hastens to avoid the counterimpression that he is dependent on them. He is, he claims, "self-sufficient," a term borrowed from popular philosophy (v. 11), for he is equally able to handle abundance and want (v. 12). But then to avoid slighting the gift Paul adds: "Nevertheless, you have done what is right in sharing my affliction" (v. 14).

At this point Paul expands on the gift and the Philippians' relationship with him. He recalls the partnership that he has with them alone in giving and receiving and refers specifically to earlier gifts at Thessalonica (vv. 15–16). But then comes another qualification: "Not that I am seeking the gift . . ." (v. 17). And finally there is a formal acknowledgment, couched first in the language of business: "I am in receipt of everything from you through Epaphroditus" (v. 18). Paul does not specify, but the gift presumably included food and clothing, perhaps writing materials. In any case the section closes with religious language as Paul then refers to the gift as a fragrant offering, an acceptable sacrifice (v. 18). A prayer for the Philippians' needs to be met (v. 19) and a doxology (v. 20) round out the section, and the body of the Letter.

The Closing of the Letter

4:21–22, Greetings. Typical of ancient letters generally and of Paul's Letters in particular are final greetings. The greetings in Romans are very extensive (Rom. 16:3–16), but they are clearly exceptional. Usually the exchange of greetings is brief, as here (see also 1 Cor. 16:19–21; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26–27; Philem. 23–24). Of special note are the greetings from the "household of Caesar" (Phil. 4:22), a phrase that refers not to the imperial family itself but to the slaves, freedmen, and other members of the emperor's staff, and not only in Rome but everywhere imperial administration was conducted. Specifically, those sending greetings may have had some connection with a Roman colony like Philippi or may have been the soldiers guarding Paul (cf. 1:13).

4:23, Final Prayer. This Letter closes on a liturgical note, as do all Paul's Letters. Indeed, the benediction here is identical to that in Philemon 25 (cf. Gal. 6:18; 1 Thess. 5:28).

J. CHRISTIAN BEKER

INTRODUCTION

Authorship

The church in Colossae was not founded by Paul but by Epaphras, a disciple of the apostle (1:7-8; 4:12-13). The Letter of Paul to the Colossians makes clear that the Colossians "have not seen my face" (2:1) and that Paul has only received reports about them from Epaphras (1:4, 7, 8). Colossae was a city in Asia Minor, located in the valley of the Lycus River. Originally an important trading center, it was soon overshadowed by its neighboring cities, Hierapolis and Laodicea (4:13, 15-16), and disappears from history after it was hit by an earthquake in ca. A.D. 60 (→ Colossae).

The Letter to the Colossians presents itself as a letter written by Paul while he was in prison (1:24; 4:3, 10, 18). However, the language and style of the Letter strongly suggest its post-Pauline origin. The peculiarities of language and style cannot simply be explained by appealing to the special situation that Paul faces in his debate with the Colossian heretics, especially because Paul's typical vocabulary is absent—terms such as "righteousness," "justification," "freedom," "law," "believe," and "justify," which are regularly used by him in polemical situations.

Colossians was most likely written by a pupil of Paul's who wanted to make sure that after Paul's death his apostolic authority and presence were continued in Paul's missionary territory in Asia Minor.

Thus he writes a Pauline letter, very much in the manner of Paul when he could not be personally present in his churches (1:9; 2:1; 4:7, 8, 18). The author shows acquaintance with some of Paul's letters, especially with Romans—cf. the similarity between Rom. 6:1-11 and Col. 2:11-13; 3:5-11—although Paul's Letter to Philemon is the only one on which the author is directly dependent (cf. the list of Paul's co-workers [Philem. 23, 24] in 4:10-17).

The Colossian Heresy

The Letter presupposes a crisis situation in the Colossian church. False Christian teachers have infiltrated the predominantly gentile Christian community and threaten to subvert its loyalty to Christ. The situation is formally analogous to that in Galatia, where Paul also had to insist on an exclusive commitment of the Galatians to "Christ alone" against Christian teachers who deemed it necessary to supplement the confession to Christ with obedience to the Jewish Torah. However, although both Galatians and Colossians focus on the exclusivity of Christ over against supplemental religious practices, the heretical front in the two Letters is quite dissimilar. To be sure, Colossians gives us no precise picture of the heretics' teaching. Still, references to it in 2:6-23 suggest a blending of various religious elements: asceticism and moral rigorism combine with features of esoteric rites similar to those practiced by mystery religions. This type of syncretism was characteristic of the Phrygian region of Asia Minor, where Colossae, Hierapolis, and Laodicea were located.

Scholars have traced Phrygian syncretism from the third century B.C. to the Christian movement called Montanism in the second century A.D. Its ascetic features are mentioned in 2:16, 18, 21-23: "food," "drink" (2:16); "self-abasement" (2:18); "do not handle, do not taste, do not touch" (2:21); and "rigor of devotion, self-abasement, severity to the body" (2:23). Moreover, asceticism is combined not only with "mystery" elements but also with other kinds of observance: "angel worship" (2:18); "visions" (2:18); "festival" (2:16); "new moon" (2:16); and "Sabbath" (2:16).

Thus, it seems likely that certain Jewish-Hellenistic features formed part of the syncretistic mix, although it is difficult to be precise on this point. There is no polemic against the Torah in Colossians. Moreover, the worship of angels (2:18) militates against a Jewish provenance of the Colossian heresy. The connections that have been made between Colossians and Qumran with respect to "angelic communion" are too speculative to be convincing. It is quite possible that the observance of the calendar is not due to Jewish practices, but to the influence of the moon-god, Men, who was popular in the Colossian region.

The Letter refers as well to "the elements of the world" (Gk. ta stoicheia tou kosmou; 2:8, 20). Although the precise meaning of this phrase is unclear, it certainly refers to an aspect of the Colossian heresy. Two possible interpretations suggest themselves: the author either lifts the term from the vocabulary of the heretics or he coins it himself as an antiheretical slogan.

COMMENTARY

1:1-8

Introduction

After a greeting in Paul's customary style (1:1-2), the thanksgiving clause (1:3-8) underscores two issues. First, the author gives thanks for the faithful reception of the gospel in the Colossian community as preached to them by Paul's disciple, Epaphras, and he stresses with a triadic formula the faith, love, and hope of the Colossians. Second, the author "Paul" emphasizes the worldwide impact of the gospel (1:6) so as to remind the local church about its ecumenical stature.

1:9-2:23

The Didactic Section

The paragraphs 1:9-2:5 form one sequential unit and constitute the foundation for the antiheretical polemic of 2:6-23. Thus 1:9 marks the beginning of the didactic section.

1:9-14, The Intercession and Thanksgiving.

The intercession (1:9-11) is intimately connected to the general thanksgiving (1:12-14) by means of a participial clause ("giving thanks," 1:12). The thanksgiving makes frequent use of traditional Christian material. It employs in both vv. 13 and 14 a liturgical baptismal formula (cf. the shift from "you" in v. 12 to "us" and "we" in vv. 13 and 14). Baptismal language is present as well in the opposition of the two dominions, "darkness" and "the kingdom"—a transfer caused by the punctual act of God's saving deliverance in Christ (as shown by the tense of the Gk. verbs in v. 13). Moreover, the unusual phrase "his beloved Son" (v. 13) is reminiscent of baptismal phraseology (Mark 1:11; cf. 9:7; 12:6; Eph. 1:6); so is the interpretation of "redemption" as "forgiveness of sins" (Col. 1:14; cf. Acts 2:38; 10:43, 47; Mark 1:4).

1:15-20, The Christ Hymn.

The author has used a Christian hymn known in the Colossian community in the service of his antiheretical polemic. (For similar early Christian poems about Jesus, cf. John 1:1-18 and Phil. 2:6-11.) The hymn consists of two strophes or stanzas (vv. 15-18a; vv. 18b-20) and celebrates Christ as the unique mediator of creation (vv. 15-18a) and of redemption (vv. 18b-20). The hymn strongly affirms the reality of the created world: the figure of wisdom—celebrated in Prov. 8:22-31 as the mediator of creation—is here transferred to Christ: "in him," "through him," and "for him," "all things" (or "the universe") "were created" (v. 16).

By tracing the manner in which the author edits the traditional hymn, we ascertain how he desires it to be understood. He not only inserts the words "the church" in v. 18a and the phrase "that in everything he might become preeminent" in v. 18b, but he also adds the words "by the blood of his cross" to the clause "making peace whether on earth or in heaven" in v. 20. By means of these insertions the author wants to correct the exclusive reference of the hymn to Christ's exaltation, as well as the purely cosmic meaning of the phrase "the head of the body" (v. 18). Therefore, the author stresses Christ not only as the head of the church (v. 18a) but also as the crucified savior (v. 20). Moreover, the insertion in v. 18 amends the static quality of the hymn by giving it a dynamic referent toward the historical future.

1:21-23, The New Status of Christians.

The author's interpretation of the Christ hymn must be understood not only in terms of these inserts into the hymn itself but also in terms of the framework in which he places the hymn. The author corrects not only the static character of the hymn but also supplements it with direct applications to the human plight and its need for salvation. He does so not only by referring to readers' baptisms and the forgiveness of their sins in 1:12-14 but also by reminding them of their new status in Christ (vv. 21-23).

1:24-2:5, Paul's Ministry.

This section celebrates not only the worldwide significance of Paul's apostolate but also his sufferings for the cause of the gospel. Verse 23 sets the stage for the subsequent paragraphs: "the gospel—which has been preached to every creature under heaven and of which I, Paul, became a minister." Paul's image is painted in universal colors just as "the gospel" (1:5) is for the author identical with the Pauline gospel. Paul is not only the apostle par excellence whose authority equals that of the gospel (vv. 23-29) but also the martyr who incarnates in his ministry "the afflictions of Christ" (v. 24) and who is now imprisoned for the sake of the gospel (1:23; 4:3, 10, 18; cf. Eph. 6:20).

2:6-23, The Antiheretical Polemic.

This unit constitutes the center of the Letter: the argument intertwines confessional statements with antiheretical polemic. The section must be subdivided into three paragraphs: first, a Christian imperative (vv. 6, 7); second, the indicative of God's victory in Christ (vv. 8-15); third, the futility of the heretical demands (vv. 16-23).

The key to the argument can be summarized as "Christ alone": Christ represents not only the total fullness of God, but also the all-sufficient fullness of life and salvation for Christians (v. 10; cf. vv. 11-15, 17, 19). The "Pauline" gospel does not proclaim a deficient Christology (an understanding of Jesus' identity)—as the heretics charge. Rather, the heretics' insistence on supplementing Christ with other divine agencies constitutes a betrayal of the triumph of Christ, because those supplements to the gospel honor, in fact, those angelic powers and principalities that Christ has annulled in his death and resurrection (v. 15). And if "Christ alone" is the exclusive basis of Christian life, the worship of powers in addition to Christ manifests a religious anxiety and uncertainty on the part of Christians that contradicts the joyful thanksgiving (1:11b, 12; 3:15) and knowledge and wisdom (1:10, 28; 2:3; 3:16) of Christian life.

Therefore, imperatives of exclusive commitment to Christ abound in this section (cf. vv. 6, 8, 16, 18; cf. also the question of v. 20). These imperatives are not legalistic demands for perfection. Rather these demands flow naturally from the pure gift of God's liberating act in Christ.

Thus, it is clear that the section 1:9-2:23 constitutes the basic didactic and thematic unit of the Letter. It consists of two interrelated parts: the Christian foundation for the anti-heretical argument (1:9-2:5) and the basic anti-heretical argument itself (2:6-23).

3:1-4:6

The Exhortation

Whereas the didactic section (1:9-2:23) focuses on "the presence of the reality of Christ," the theme of the following section (3:1-4:6) is "the reality of Christ in Christian life." This type of unit scholars often call parenthesis (a term in Greek rhetoric for moral advice and exhortation).

3:1-4, The Risen Christ and the Christian Life.

The unit opens with a transitional paragraph (3:1-4) that connects 1:9-2:23 with the more specific mandates of 3:5-4:6. The opening phrase "If then you have been raised with Christ" (3:1a) is parallel to the phrase "If with Christ you have died" (2:20; cf. its repetition in 3:3) and follows from it, so that it seems that 2:20-3:4 forms a coherent unit. Nevertheless, the exhortations of 3:1a-2 ("seek the things that are above" [v. 1a]; "set your mind on things that are above, not on things that are on earth" [v. 2], which will be explicated in 3:5-17, transcend with their general ethical thrust the specificity of the antiheretical polemic of 2:20-23. Therefore, it is preferable to view 3:1-4 as the beginning of a new section, which provides the Christological foundation for the imperatives of 3:1a, 2 and of 3:5-17.

The section 3:1-4 shows that—notwithstanding the Letter's emphasis on the already accomplished "risen" status of Christians with Christ (2:12; 3:1) and notwithstanding its exhortation "to seek the things that are above" (v. 1) and "to set your minds not on things that are on earth" (v. 2)—the author does not contemplate a spiritualistic flight from the world. Rather, he insists on Christian life within the boundaries and conditions of this world. Indeed, the household code of 3:18-4:1 emphasizes orderly relations of Christians in church and world—in marriage, family, and work. Moreover, although the author interprets the resurrection of Christians with Christ as an already accomplished fact (2:11-12; 3:1), the author points in 3:3-4 to Christian life as an historical pilgrimage and not as a static "heavenly" condition. The author stresses that the present life of Christians "in Christ" (2:10) is nevertheless a "hidden life" that must await its full manifestation at the Parousia, the end-time appearance of Christ when Christians will be joined to him in glory (v. 4).

3:5-17, Mandate for a New Morality. The unit 3:5-17 draws specific exhortations from the Christological indicatives of 3:1, 3, 4 and, therefore, fills out the content of v. 2 ("set your minds on things that are above, not on things that are on earth").

3:5-11, The Old Morality. Imperatives abound in this section (vv. 5, 8, 9, 12, 15 twice, 16; cf. also the participles that have the force of imperatives in vv. 13 twice, 14, 16 twice, 17). The author reminds his readers of the numerous sins associated with "the old nature" (v. 9) and points to the new reality of Christian life in which all people are equal in Christ (v. 11).

3:12-14, The New Morality. The author complements the essentially negative exhortations of 3:5-11 with a list of Christian virtues in 3:12-14, climaxing with his striking definition of love as "the bond of perfection" (v. 14).

He parallels the double series of five vices in vv. 5 and 8 (pagan sins of the past in v. 5; ecclesial sins as present temptations in v. 8) with a series of five virtues in v. 12—all of which, it should be noticed, refer to interhuman social relations.

3:15-17, The New Worship. The section closes with what reads like a Pauline Letter ending: a wish for peace, emphasizing communal worship and a Christian life-style, framed by a two-fold stress on thankfulness (vv. 15-17).

3:18-4:6, The Household Codes. The household code explicates the basic principle of 3:17: "And whatever you do, in word or deed, do everything in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him." In other words, the author has applied a household code—current in Hellenistic-Roman culture to regulate relations within the family between husbands, wives, children, and slaves—to the church as the new “house of God” (cf. the development of this notion in Eph. 2:19–20). The author adds an exhortation to the Colossians to pray for themselves and for the mission of the imprisoned apostle (4:2–6).

4:7–18

Final Greetings

The Letter ends with personal information to be communicated by the conveyors of the Letter, Tychicus and Onesimus (vv. 7–9), and with greetings of Paul's co-workers (vv. 10–18; a list of six names almost identical with the list of Philem. 23–24).

1 THESSALONIANS

P H E M E P E R K I N S

INTRODUCTION

The First Letter of Paul to the Thessalonians is probably the earliest of Paul's Letters (A.D. 50 or 51). Thessalonica was one of the two most important trading centers in Roman Greece. It had a harbor on the Thermic Gulf, lay near the midpoint of the Via Egnatia, and was the terminus of the road leading up to the Danube. Although it was the Roman capital of Macedonia, Thessalonica remained a free Greek city with its own council and coinage (→ Thessalonica).

Paul had founded the church there after preaching in Philippi (2:2). Acts 17:1–10 pictures a relatively brief mission in Thessalonica, which was centered in the Jewish community. Conflict led to rioting and accusations before the city officials, politarchs (Acts 17:6; a term peculiar to Thessalonica), that Paul was causing trouble by preaching another king than Caesar. 1 Thessalonians suggests Paul stayed in the city for a longer period of time, since he was able to practice his trade (2:9) and had received financial help from Philippi ninety-five miles away (Phil. 4:16). Paul writes to a church composed of gentile converts (1 Thess. 1:9–10; 2:14?), a fact that coincides with Paul's assertion that his mission was to the Gentiles (Gal. 2:9). If Acts is correct at least in reporting that Paul was suddenly forced out of the city, the concern evident in 1 Thess. 2:17–18 may be due to Paul's unexpected departure. Unable to return (due to health? cf. 2 Cor. 12:7), Paul sent Timothy north from Athens (1 Thess. 3:1–3). Timothy has rejoined Paul (at Corinth? cf. Acts 18:5) with a good report about the church. 1 Thessalonians is written in response. Paul does not refer to churches founded after Thessalonica, so it would appear that the Letter was written within some months of Paul's departure from Thessalonica.

1 Thessalonians follows the conventional pattern of Paul's Letters: (a) greetings, from the apostle and associates (1:1); (b) thanksgiving (1:2–10); (c) Letter body, with eschatological conclusion (2:1–3:13); (d) exhortations (4:1–5:24); (e) final blessing and greetings (5:25–28). The Letter's peculiar elements may be related to its setting. Paul does not identify himself with a formulaic phrase indicating his apostolic role and carries elements of thanksgiving through the body of the Letter (2:13; 3:7–10).

The text of 1 Thessalonians presents important variants in 2:7 and 3:2. In 1 Thess. 2:7 a number of early Greek manuscripts read nēpioi, "babes," in the phrase "we were babes among you." Others have the word ēpioi, "gentle," which only occurs elsewhere in the NT in 2 Tim. 2:24. Since Paul uses nēpioi elsewhere in his Letters, the reading ēpioi, "gentle," though less frequently attested would seem to be preferred. A reading with "gentle" also suits the imagery Paul is using in this verse. In 1 Thess. 3:2, Timothy is variously described as "God's fellow worker," "God's servant," and in an attempt to harmonize the divergent readings as "God's servant and our fellow worker." The expression "God's fellow servant," though less frequently attested than "God's servant" seems to be the one that causes the most difficulty and underlies the compound phrase. Paul does refer to himself and Apollos as "God's fellow workers" in 1 Cor. 3:9. Therefore, that reading may be preferred.

The most difficult textual question in 1 Thessalonians does not derive from divergent readings in the manuscripts but from the suggestions of modern scholars that 2:13–16 are a later interpolation into the Letter. The passage evokes thanksgiving for the Thessalonians' reception of Paul's preaching and then launches into a harsh condemnation of the "Jews" as Jesus killers, as enemies of God and God's prophets and apostles, and as experiencing God's wrath. Although Paul can speak of his own sufferings at the hands of both Jews and Gentiles (e.g., 2 Cor. 11:26; Rom. 15:31) and has just suffered at Philippi (1 Thess. 2:2), the vindictive tone of this passage is not characteristic of the apostle. Paul's earlier reference to the exemplary imitation of the apostle by the Thessalonians when they received the gospel message in affliction (1:6) has already treated the general subject of this passage. The harsh treatment of the "Jews" in this passage, some scholars argue, would be less surprising in a Christian writing after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (e.g., Matt. 21:33–46). Some scholars have argued for a non-Pauline interpolation here on the basis of computer analyses of the language of this section. They indicate that the section reflects an amalgamation of different Pauline expressions. Scholars who continue to treat this passage as part of the original Letter insist that it reflects Paul's response to a particular group of persecutors familiar to himself and the audience.

COMMENTARY

1:1-10

Greetings and Thanksgiving

1:1, Greetings. Paul includes his co-workers, Timothy and Silvanus, as senders of the Letter. Timothy has just returned from Thessalonica. Acts 17:4 mentions Silas (= Silvanus) as Paul's assistant in the Thessalonian mission. The greeting combines the conventional Greek expression "grace" with the Jewish "peace."

1:2-10, Thanksgiving. The expanded thanksgiving for the recipients is a Pauline innovation in the letter form, which commonly began with a more abbreviated and formal wish for the well-being of the recipient and sometimes mentioned that of the sender. Paul's thanksgivings often single out themes to be developed in the Letter. Here we find Paul emphasizing the faith, love, and hope of the Thessalonians (v. 3). That God has chosen them is evident not only in the success of Paul's preaching but also in their willingness to provide an example for other churches by rejoicing when their conversion entailed suffering. In that way they can claim to imitate both the apostle and the Lord (vv. 5-7). It may be that the Philippians who sent Paul aid at Philippi were responsible for spreading the story of the Thessalonians' conversion in the rest of Greece. Paul appears to have taught his converts that suffering was to be expected as a normal part of Christian life (e.g., Rom. 5:3; 12:12; Phil. 4:14). Since Christians know that they are "imitating" the apostle in suffering, suffering does not count against their conviction that they are beloved and chosen by God.

1 Thess. 1:9b-10 concludes the thanksgiving with an early creedal formula that expresses the meaning of conversion for gentile converts. They turn away from idols to the true God (cf. Gal. 4:9; 2 Cor. 3:16, in an OT citation; Acts 3:19; 9:35; 11:21), and they await Jesus' coming from heaven at the judgment. Because they have turned to serving the true God, the Thessalonians will not face the wrath of God, which would come against all those non-Jews who "do not know God" (cf. Rom. 1:18-32). Since this sentence is not Pauline in its phrasing, it was probably a formula that was commonly used in the early Christian mission to the Gentiles.

2:1-3:13

Paul's Ministry in Thessalonica

2:1-12, Paul's Example in Thessalonica.

Paul reminds his readers of the example he had set in preaching among them. He uses the imagery of a philosophic preacher, whose concern is to nurture the souls of human beings and turn them away from slavery to false opinions, values, and passions to the truth. Paul also wants to remind the Thessalonians that his mission was different from other popular preachers who might flatter and manipulate their audiences to make money from such preaching. Paul preaches the gospel he has been given by God in the face of great opposition and hardship (vv. 1-5).

Paul uses the images of a nurse (v. 7) and a father (vv. 11-12) to describe his work among the Thessalonians. These images were frequently used by philosophers of Paul's day to show how the true philosopher would vary his style of speech from harsh scolding to gentle encouragement and consolation as the needs of the audience changed. Paul has intensified these images in two ways. He describes himself as a gentle nurse taking care of her own children, not merely someone else's. Before he introduces the image of "father," Paul makes it clear that his love for the Thessalonians goes so far that he is willing to share not just the gospel but "our own selves." Paul shares himself by laboring at his trade rather than requiring the congregation to support him (vv. 8-9). Paul concludes with the kinds of speech he had used in encouraging the Thessalonians to live lives worthy of God (vv. 11-12). In addition to such preaching, Paul's own life and conduct, which is "holy, righteous, and blameless" (v. 10), is meant to be an example followed by his converts (e.g., 1:6).

2:13-16, Excursus on Persecution.

Some scholars think that this sharp condemnation of "the Jews" as Jesus killers and opponents of God was added to the Letter by a later disciple of Paul (see "Introduction" above). However, Paul does refer to his own efforts, before his conversion, to wipe out the followers of Jesus (Gal. 1:13; 1 Cor. 15:9). He distinguishes the "remnant," both Jewish and gentile believers, from the "vessels of wrath" upon whom the Lord's sentence will be like that against Sodom and Gomorrah (Rom. 9:22-29). He refers to the "remnant" that was not guilty of "killing the prophets" in Elijah's time (Rom. 11:3, citing 1 Kings 19:10). Paul also refers to Jewish unbelief making them "enemies of God" for the sake of the Gentiles who have come to believe (Rom. 11:28). Elsewhere Paul speaks of Judaizing Christians as "enemies of the cross of Christ" and predicts the destruction that awaits them (Phil. 3:18-19). In that context he contrasts such false believers with those to whom he writes. They are exhorted to imitate the apostle, who shares Christ's sufferings, so that they will share the same glorious transformation into Christ (Phil. 3:10-11, 17, 20-21). It is possible to see this section as an interruption in the train of thought of the Letter, perhaps provoked by a particular incident the Thessalonians had endured (1 Thess. 2:14).

The expression in 1 Thess. 2:16b is very close to one used in the conclusion to an account of the many sins of the Shechemites in T. Levi 6:11 (→Pseudepigrapha). It may have been an established expression for divine retribution against notorious sinners that did not require a reference to a specific event. Other scholars, who consider the rest of the section Pauline, think that this phrase was added by a later scribe, alluding to the destruction of Jerusalem.

2:17-20, Paul's Desire to See the Thessalonians. Paul returns to his account of the affectionate relationship between himself and the church. The Greek word aporphanizō, "made orphans" (RSV: "were bereft," v. 17), can refer to parents who have lost children or vice versa. Since Paul speaks of Satan as the cause of his chronic illness (2 Cor. 12:7), that may have been the reason he was unable to journey back to Thessalonica. Paul's concern for the well-being of the community is not merely grounded in affection, he also considers his churches to be the "evidence" that he has carried out the mission God gave him, which will be presented at the judgment (1 Thess. 2:19-20).

3:1-5, Timothy Is Sent to Thessalonica. Paul sends his trusted associate Timothy (cf. 1 Cor. 4:17; 16:10-11; Phil. 2:19-23) to strengthen and encourage the church. He is concerned that trials may have "disturbed" the community (1 Thess. 3:3). Rather than upset the church, the coming of such trials should confirm Paul's preaching, since he predicted that they would be the destiny of Christians. Nevertheless, they could have served as Satan's way of undermining their faith and destroying Paul's mission.

3:6-10, Timothy's Report on the Church. According to Acts 18:5, Timothy met Paul in Corinth. There he delivered a glowing report about the faith and love of the Thessalonians. They return Paul's feelings of affection. As a result Paul is comforted in his own afflictions (cf. Rom. 1:12; 2 Cor. 7:4, 13; Philem. 7).

3:11-13, Paul's Prayer for the Thessalonians. Paul expresses his thanksgiving and joy in prayer for his converts and expresses his hope of being reunited with them. While the previous section has emphasized their faith, these verses shift to love and holiness. The love that they have seen in the apostle is to extend not only to fellow Christians but to all people (v. 12). Love is the basis of that holiness which will make the Christians acceptable to God in the judgment (cf. love as fulfillment of the law in Gal. 5:14; Rom.

13:10). This emphasis on love and holiness (cf. 1 Thess. 2:10; 4:3, 7; 5:23) forms the transition to the hortatory part of the Letter.

4:1-12

Live a Life of Holiness

4:1-8, Holiness and Sexuality. 1 Thess 4:1-12 expands on themes taken from a tradition of interpreting the laws in Leviticus 17-26 in Hellenistic Judaism. Parallels to this material are found in 1 Pet. 1:1-2:3, 11-12. "Holiness" is an attribute that distinguishes the elect community from the world around it. Paul has already taught them that Christian life requires abandoning the sexual immorality and lust that Jewish moralists associated with the pagan world (e.g., Wisd. of Sol. 14-15). Paul uses the peculiar word skeuos (Gk., "vessel") in v. 4 to refer to the wife (cf. 1 Pet. 3:7). It is not clear whether the advice to "take a vessel in holiness and honor" simply means that Christians should marry (e.g., 1 Cor. 7:2) or whether it also refers to teaching about sexual conduct within marriage (e.g., 1 Cor. 7:3-5). Pagan moralists often insisted that even within marriage sexuality should remain subject to reason. Marriage was not to be an occasion for "lust." 1 Thess. 4:6 enjoins that no one wrong his brother "in this thing/business." If the context of the passage is still sexuality, then the offense would appear to be adultery. Other exegetes rely on the fact that the Greek word pragma can also mean "business" and that the verb for "defraud," pleonektein, also appears in commercial contexts. They argue that Paul has shifted to speak about relationships of the small traders at Thessalonica. (1 Cor. 6 combines issues of lawsuits between Christians and the sexual immorality of visiting prostitutes.)

4:9-12, Mutual Love. When Paul returns to the theme of mutual love, he encourages the Thessalonians to live a life of "quietness," "minding one's own affairs," following the apostle's example by working with their hands so as to command respect and depend on no one. Many of these themes can be traced in pagan moralists. Some of the social ideals of a group of mutual friends who live quietly and are not dependent on others were particularly evident in the Epicurean groups (→Epicureans). Along with the love that is to be directed to those outside the group (3:12), these verses show the early church seeking to map out its place in the social world of the Greco-Roman cities. But Christian love is not motivated by the utilitarian desire for a pleasant life expressed in Epicureanism. Instead, Paul coins the expression "theodidakτος" (Gk., "taught of God") to emphasize its divine origin.

4:13–5:11*The Coming of the Lord

4:13–18, Hope for the Dead. Paul now turns to the third virtue he mentioned in 1:3, hope. He adopts the philosophic idea of a “letter of consolation” to Christian use. Such writings often parallel the language of epitaphs. Death is described as sleep; the deceased has been snatched from the world of the living; grief should be moderated by the recognition that nothing from this world can touch the dead. At the same time, the living are reminded that they will soon join those who have died. A few scholars think that the persecutions mentioned in 1 Thessalonians led to the death of members of the community. The Thessalonians may have thought that the dead had lost the possibility of salvation when the Lord returns (v. 15).

Paul’s Christian “consolation” expands the basic belief that the Lord has been raised (v. 14; cf. 1:10) with an apocalyptic tradition derived from Jesus (vv. 16–17ab; cf. Dan. 7:13; Mark 13:26–27; Matt. 24:31; 1 Cor. 15:52). Paul’s formulation of this tradition reverses the pessimistic language of pagan epitaphs. They spoke of the dead being “snatched” from life. Paul speaks of the living being “snatched” to join the Lord and the deceased members of the community who have gone before them (1 Thess. 4:17). What Paul intends by this image is not clear: do the risen Christians then descend to earth with the Lord or are they taken into heaven? Elsewhere Paul speaks of those alive at the Parousia—the glorious return of Jesus—being instantaneously transformed (1 Cor. 15:51–53). Here, he may be thinking of the image of the crowd going out to welcome a royal dignitary at his “appearance” (Gk. parousia).

5:1–11, When Will the Day of the Lord Come?

Paul continues to remind the Thessalonians about the coming of the Lord with a collection of images that were common in early Christian apocalyptic literature. Although he believes that the Lord will return soon, the tradition of the Lord’s coming like a “thief in the night” (cf. Luke 12:39–40; Matt. 24:43; Rev. 3:3; 16:15; 2 Pet. 3:10) makes it impossible to calculate “when” the Lord is to return. The Day is as inevitable as labor pains (cf. Jer. 6:24; 22:23; Mic. 4:9; 1 Enoch 62:4; Mark 13:8) even though the people are thinking that all is peaceful and secure (cf. Jer. 6:14; 8:11; Ezek. 13:10; Mic. 3:9–11). The true Christian response is to always be “ready” (cf. Mark 13:32–35; Matt. 24:42–43). The contrast between “sons of light” and “sons of darkness” is used to distinguish those who lived according to God’s will from those who do not.

The image of putting on military armor comes from Isa. 59:17. There God puts on the breastplate of righteousness and the helmet of salvation as he is about to come in judgment (cf. Wisd. of Sol. 5:17–20). Paul has adapted this image to the three virtues: faith, love, and hope. The reminder that our destiny is to be “with the Lord” and the call to encourage one another (1 Thess. 4:9–11) pick up the conclusion to the previous section (4:17c–18).

5:12–28*Community Life

5:12–22, Relationships with Others. Paul now returns to the more general theme of the relationships that should characterize the “holiness” of a Christian community. Many of these themes will be repeated in other Pauline exhortations such as Rom. 12:3–18: respect leaders (1 Thess. 5:12–13a; Rom. 12:3–8); be at peace (1 Thess. 5:13b; Rom. 12:18); help the weak (1 Thess. 5:14b; Rom. 14:1); do not repay evil for evil but do good to all (1 Thess. 5:15; Rom. 12:17a); rejoice (1 Thess. 5:16; Rom. 12:12a); pray unceasingly, give thanks (1 Thess. 5:17–18; Rom. 12:12c; cf. Eph. 5:20); do not quench the Spirit (1 Thess. 5:19; Rom. 12:11b); do not despise prophecy but test it (1 Thess. 5:20–21a; prophecy as a gift in the church, Rom. 12:6); and hold to the good and avoid evil (1 Thess. 5:21b–22; Rom. 12:9b). The only unusual element in this exhortation is admonishing the ataktos (1 Thess. 5:14a). The Greek word appears in papyri with the sense of loafing around when one ought to be working. This verse would seem to repeat Paul’s admonition of 4:11 that Christians ought to work for their living and not be dependent upon others (e.g., wealthy patrons).

5:23–28, Final Prayer and Greetings. The Letter concludes with Paul’s final prayer that God will keep the community in holiness until the coming of the Lord (vv. 23–24). The Thessalonians are to reciprocate by praying for the apostle (v. 25). This Letter is to be read at the meetings of the community (vv. 26–27).

2 THESSALONIANS

P H E M E P E R K I N S

INTRODUCTION

The Second Letter of Paul to the Thessalonians is written to deal with two problems that have arisen in the church: first, misinterpretations of teachings that claim to be Pauline and yet insist that "the day of the Lord has come" (2:2), and second, the conduct of persons who reject Paul's teaching about working and living quietly (3:6-12). Both of these themes were addressed in the parenthesis of 1 Thessalonians (1 Thess. 4:13-5:11, on the day of the Lord; 4:11 and 5:14, on working and not living "idly"). In addition, the church continues to suffer tribulations (2 Thess. 1:5-10; cf. 1 Thess. 1:6; 2:14-16), which may contribute to the confusion about Paul's teaching.

Although 2 Thessalonians elaborates on themes from 1 Thessalonians and concludes with a sharp assertion of Pauline authenticity (3:17), a number of scholars doubt that Paul himself composed the Letter. When Paul refers to his own writing elsewhere, he does so in a disciplinary context (Gal. 6:11; 1 Cor. 16:21) or a contractual one (Philem. 19), not as a sign of authenticity. The opening greeting, 2 Thess. 1:1-2, is almost identical with 1 Thess. 1:1, something not found elsewhere in Paul's Letters. The insertion of teaching on tribulation and divine vengeance in the thanksgiving is peculiar (contrast its location in 1 Thess. 2:13-16). 2 Thessalonians treats faith and love in the thanksgiving but omits hope. The expression "steadfastness of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ" from 1 Thess. 1:3 appears to be rendered "steadfastness of Christ" in 2 Thess. 3:5. Comparing the two Letters, one also finds a dominant theme of the first, personal affection between the apostle and the church, missing from the second. The themes of imitation and holiness appear only briefly (2 Thess. 2:13; 3:7). Yet, they were repeated in the earlier exhortation. We have further evidence for a link between confusion over the coming of the Lord and misinterpretation of Pauline letters in 2 Pet. 3:15-17. There interpretation of Paul's letters is associated with interpretation of "other scriptures." 2 Thessalonians seems to reflect a somewhat earlier situation. People are making false claims about letters and other "words" said to come from the apostle, but Paul's letters do not yet form an independent group of authoritative writings. 2 Thessalonians is presented as an authoritative teaching of Paul in its own right.

There are three major textual variants in 2 Thessalonians. In many manuscripts 2 Thess. 2:3 reads "man of sin" instead of "man of lawlessness." That reading may have arisen out of an attempt to clarify the apocalyptic idea of rebellion against God implied in the expression "lawlessness." 2 Thess. 2:13 has variant readings attached to the expression "God chose you." Some manuscripts have "as first fruits"; others "from the beginning." Modern editors and translators remain divided over which reading is preferred. Either could be Pauline. Often "as first fruits" (= "first converts") is rejected because it does not make sense in the context. 2 Thess. 3:16 reads "in every way" in some manuscripts and "in every place" in others. Creating the parallel "time/place" by dropping a consonant would appear to account for the second reading.

COMMENTARY

1:1-12

Greetings and Thanksgiving

1:1-2, Greetings. 2 Thessalonians copies the greeting of 1 Thess. 1:1 with the substitution of "our" for "the" in the phrase "in God our Father" and a repetition of the modifying phrase from the first clause to bring the grace and peace clause into balance.

1:3-12, Thanksgiving. The thanksgiving consists in a single sentence, which can be divided into three sections: vv. 3-4, 5-10, and 11-12. Verses 3-4 give thanks for the growth of faith and love in persecution. The references to faith, love, and steadfastness recall 1 Thess. 1:3. The afflictions that made the community an example for all the churches in Macedonia and Achaia (1 Thess. 1:8-9) have become the content of the apostle's boast "in the churches" (v. 4).

Verses 5-10 describe God's judgment against persecutors. The author turns to an apocalyptic theology of divine vengeance to show that persecutions are a "sign" (RSV: "evidence") that those who suffer are actually God's elect. According to this view, afflictions suffered by the righteous blot out their transgressions. The righteous will not have to suffer at the judgment. Therefore Israel's afflictions are seen as a sign of God's election (e.g., Pss. Sol. 13:9-10; 2 Macc. 6:12-16; 2 Apoc. Bar. 13:3-10; 78:5). The present sufferings of the elect are immaterial compared to the judgment that awaits those who do not know God and those who are disobedient to the gospel when the Lord (= Jesus) comes to exercise divine judgment (2 Thess. 1:7-10). Presumably the second group, those disobedient to the gospel, refers to persons who persecute the Christians instead of being converted by their preaching (cf. Rom. 10:16). The first group is described using typical Jewish phrasing for Gentiles in contrast to Jews (e.g., Ps. 79:6; Jer. 10:25; Septuagint [LXX]) or Christians (1 Thess. 4:5). These verses echo OT judgment language (e.g., Isa. 2:10-11, 17, 20).

2 Thess. 2:11-12 contains a prayer for the Thessalonians. After the digression on divine punishment and reward, the author returns to a prayer that the congregation will be among the elect (cf. v. 5). The Lord is glorified by the present faithfulness of the community (cf. Isa. 66:5).

2:1-12

The Day of the Lord

2:1-2, False Teaching About the Parousia. 2 Thessalonians indicates that the source of confusion about the Parousia—the glorious return of Jesus—lies in prophetic oracles, words, or letters from Paul that are being used to support the claim that the Day of the Lord has come. If the letter being falsely interpreted was 1 Thessalonians, the false view would have to account for the fact that Christians had not been snatched up to be with the Lord (1 Thess. 4:17).

2:3-9, The Coming of the Lawless One.

2 Thessalonians appeals to an apocalyptic tradition about the last days to show that the claim the Day of the Lord has come is false. Apostasy is frequently listed as one of the evils of the end time (e.g., Jub. 23:14-21; 2 Esd. 5:1-12; 1 QpHab 2:1-3). Rebellion against God is epitomized in a mysterious figure, "the man of lawlessness, son of destruction" (2 Thess. 2:3), who may be a heavenly figure or a human being who is a satanic figure (cf. Zech. 3:1, Satan is opposed to God; "son of Gehenna" appears in Matt. 23:15; and the Essenes designate those dominated by the angel of darkness as "sons of the pit," 1 QS 9:16, 22; CD 6:15; 13:14). Satanic overtones of self-exaltation are attached to human rulers in Jer. 46:2-26; Ezek. 28:1-10; Dan. 11:21-45 (see also Rev. 13:1-18).

2 Thess. 2:5-7 breaks into the exposition of end-time events with the claim that Paul had taught the Thessalonians about the katechon (Gk.), the person or thing restraining the "man of lawlessness." The apocalyptic scenario of divine retribution introduced in 1:5-9 makes it likely that God's divine plan is the ultimate source of "restraint." However, since the "restrainer" operates while "lawlessness" is still at work in the present (perhaps in the persecution of the righteous? 2 Thess. 2:7), it is possible that the author has some present manifestation of evil in mind as well. The conditions attached to removal of the restraint in v. 7 are unclear.

Verses 8-9 return to describing the end time. Jesus' Parousia is a final battle in which the lawless one is destroyed (cf. 1 Cor. 15:24-28). But he is not destroyed until he has exercised the function of the false prophet of the end time and led many astray (cf. Mark 13:22; Matt. 24:24; Rev. 13:13-14).

2:10-12, Condemnation of the Unrighteous.

The apocalyptic revelation concludes with a final condemnation of unbelievers (vv. 10, 12, where "the truth" means the truth of the gospel; cf. 1:8, 10). Ultimately, even the delusion of the unbeliever is rooted in God's act, an appropriate punishment for those who have turned away from God (Rom. 1:24-28; 9:14-29).

2:13-17

Salvation for the Elect

2:13-14, Thanksgiving for God's Call. The return to a second thanksgiving echos 1 Thessalonians. Instead of "beloved by God" (1 Thess. 1:4), the author uses "beloved by the Lord" (2 Thess. 2:13). If the text originally read "from the beginning," the author is speaking of God's election as an act that takes place from the beginning of time (e.g., Gal. 1:15, on Paul's calling before he was born), not simply the beginning of Paul's ministry. God's election is not complete until the elect have received salvation.

2:15-17, Stand Fast in the Tradition. The exhortation to hold fast to true Pauline tradition is followed by a prayer similar to 1 Thess. 3:2b, 8, 11-13, but stripped of the personal references in 1 Thessalonians.

3:1-5

Prayer for Steadfastness

3:1-2, Prayer for the Apostle. The request for prayer on behalf of the apostle picks up 1 Thess. 5:25. But the picture of apostolic life as constant danger from evil persons has been drawn in general terms (cf. Isa. 25:4; Jer. 15:21) and lacks the concreteness of such references elsewhere in Paul (e.g., Phil. 1:24).

3:3-5, Prayer for the Thessalonians. Once again the author prays that the audience will remain steadfast in what they have been taught (cf. 2:17) and that the Lord will protect them from the attempts of Satan to destroy their faith (cf. 2:9; 1 Thess. 2:18; 3:5).

3:6-18

Instructions to the Community

3:6-12, Against Idle Persons. The author turns to the requirement that Christians imitate Paul (1 Thess. 1:6) to address the problem created by those who refuse to follow Paul's instructions to work, live in a quiet, peaceful way, and avoid "idleness" (1 Thess. 1:6; 2:7-9; 3:4; 4:10-12; 5:14). It appears that these people are burdening other Christians for their support (2 Thess. 3:8, 10; cf. Prov. 10:4).

3:13-15, Against Associating with the Idle. The author reaffirms Christian concern for "doing good" to others. But charity is not to include fellow Christians who will not live according to the rule established by the apostle. Some exegetes think that though these people are not excluded from the Christian community (cf. Matt. 18:15-17; 1 Cor. 5:3-5), they may have been barred from the community meals (see the temporary exclusion of a member of the Corinthian community in 2 Cor. 2:5-11).

3:16-18, Final Blessing. The final prayer and wish for peace (cf. 1 Thess. 5:23, 28) frames a reminder of the apostolic authority of the teaching contained in the Letter. Once again the personal element, greetings to the congregation (1 Thess. 5:26), is missing from 2 Thessalonians. Paul's presence to his churches is carried by the genuine apostolic teaching in his Letters.

1, 2 TIMOTHY AND TITUS

R A L P H P. M A R T I N

INTRODUCTION

The First and Second Letters to Timothy and the Letter to Titus are commonly referred to as the "Pastoral Letters" because they provide readers with insight into Paul's role—whether direct or (more likely) as understood by his followers—as pastor of pastors, a leader who provided for continuing leadership in the churches.

Authorship and Setting

The matters of authorship and setting are interwoven. The Letters are addressed to Paul's faithful travel companions, Timothy and Titus, who have been allotted special spheres of labor: Timothy to the Macedonian churches and Titus in the church at Corinth. It is not surprising that both men received, according to these Letters, positions of pastoral leadership in the Pauline churches, at Ephesus and Crete respectively, and that Paul would wish to write to them in a way that fitted their needs as church "officials," offering directives for the congregations on such matters as controlling, guiding, and instructing new members. False ideas had entered on the scene and are menacing, so the two pastors are called to be alert and active in repelling them.

Nevertheless, the question has been much debated whether Paul actually wrote these letters or whether a later writer employed Paul's name to give credibility and authority to what he put down in writing, presumably believing that he was representing the apostle's mind for a later generation. An intermediate position, much ventilated in recent decades, is that a member of Paul's school used Paul's fragmentary materials, especially to do with travel plans and personal matters (2 Tim. 3:10-11; 4:9-18), around which he wove these Letters to relate Paul's teaching, as he understood it, to a fresh set of circumstances that arose after Paul's martyrdom in A.D. 65.

Several reasons are offered by those who deny these Letters were written by Paul himself. First, some of the language, both in style and content, stands at odds with what we find in the accepted Letters of Paul. Other literary features are the heavy style, the insertion of hymnic and confessional passages (e.g., 1 Tim. 3:16; 2 Tim. 2:11-13), and the recital of ethical lists of virtues and vices (1 Tim. 1:9-10; 3:2-3; 6:11; Titus 1:7-8), along with the lengthy regulations given to control the selection and appointment of church leaders.

Conscious of these objections, some scholars (e.g., Kelly) have submitted that the differences in style and content, including the variations of titles ascribed to Christ and the heavy emphasis on ethical seriousness, can all be attributed to the use of a secretary whom Paul employed. Paul dictated the main themes to be inserted but left it to his amanuensis or secretary to fill out the Letter in the way he saw fit; hence the exceptional style and addition of non-Pauline language.

Second, the type of ministry outlined in these Letters, notably 1 Timothy 3, has been seen as pointing to a development of the Pauline model in a later decade, when the church moved to the pattern of a single leader in charge. On the other side, it has been argued that the model of ministry in these Letters is based on the OT Judaic pattern rather than the situation of a fully institutionalized church that we see in 1 Clement (A.D. 95) and Ignatius (ca. A.D. 110).

Third, the false teaching opposed by the writer has similarly been interpreted in different ways. The nineteenth-century Tübingen school—which proposed a theory of early Christian development based on continual conflict—confidently appealed to 1 Tim. 6:20 as a sign that the Pastorals were written to counteract the influence of Marcion (ca. A.D. 140), a teacher deemed heretical and who wrote a book titled Antitheses, "Contradictions"—the very term used in this text.

But it is extremely unlikely that the Pastorals are so late, since the false ideas are not those of the second century and share a more Jewish character (1 Tim. 1:4; cf. 4:7; Titus 3:9; 2 Tim. 4:4). Decisively, the persecutions envisioned in these Letters predate the imperial policy of hostility that may have begun as early as the emperor Domitian (ca. A.D. 90).

Message

The uncertainty of being able to locate these short letters in any given period makes interpretation hazardous. But certain broad conclusions are possible. These Letters reflect the beginnings of the "institutional church," with a growing organizational fixity and accommodation to this world's life. Hence the ethical admonitions are slanted, and orders of ministry, with rudimentary creeds and confessions, are part of the church's essence. The writer sends a clear signal via Timothy and Titus to the churches to remain faithful to the Pauline gospel in the face of gnosticizing (→ Gnosticism) threats, and this call is one of holding fast to the "deposit" of apostolic teaching. Yet there is also a sensed danger of formalism and a dead orthodoxy. So the writer recalls Paul's teaching and warns against mere creedalism (2 Tim. 3:5).

COMMENTARY

1 TIMOTHY

1:1-2, Greeting. Unlike the Pauline Letters (except Gal.) there is no thanksgiving. Paul's authority as an "apostle" is appealed to, and Timothy is called "my true child in faith" (similar to 1 Cor. 4:17).

1:3-7, Warnings against False Teachers. Paul's visit to Macedonia (a frequently mentioned area of the Pauline mission) and Timothy's base in Ephesus (like Paul's in 1 Cor. 16:8-9) are made the setting for an attack on "teachers of the law" (1 Tim. 1:7) whose influence is being felt in the Asian congregations in the writer's day. These people are guilty of "teaching a different doctrine" from the apostolic gospel. The teaching was evidently a type of Jewish Gnosticism brought over into the church, since the teachers are still regarded as associated with the Christian communities (see Dibelius). Their interest centered in a speculative treatment of the OT linked with an elaborate cosmological theory by which the origin of the universe was explained (see 4:7; Titus 1:14; 3:9).

1:8-11, Comment on the Law. The designation of the errorists as would-be "teachers of the law" leads to an interlude on the role of the law, presumably the Jewish moral code embodied in the Decalogue (Exod. 20:2-17). Building on Paul's statement in Rom. 7:16 that the law is good, the argument moves in a new direction and equates law keeping with acceptable social behavior. The negative aspect is that the moral law curbs immoral practices, recited from some current vice list, typical of those commonly condemned by pagan moral philosophers as well as by Jewish and Christian writers (e.g., Rom. 1:29-30). The standard in this text is Paul's gospel entrusted to him (1 Tim. 1:11; 2 Tim. 1:11-14). The reference to "sound [lit., healthy, wholesome] teaching" paves the way for later texts in these letters that make a lot of this idea (2 Tim. 4:3; Titus 1:9; 2:1; cf. 1 Tim. 6:3; 2 Tim. 1:13; Titus 1:13; 2:8).

1:12-17, Paul's Life Story in Review. In autobiographical language (as in Gal. 1:13-16; 1 Cor. 15:9-11) but with the colors painted in more sombre shades (cf. Phil. 3:5-11), the "conversion and call" of Saul of Tarsus are set forth. Formerly he was opposed to all Christians stood for and was their active enemy (cf. Acts 26:11). Now, thanks to God's mercy, he is a recipient of divine grace to forgive and remake his past ways. The explanation lies not only in such Pauline terms as "grace," "faith," "love" (1 Tim. 1:14) but in the concession that he acted out of "ignorance."

The introductory phrase, "The saying can be trusted" (v. 15), occurs five times in the pastoral Letters. Here it introduces a piece of teaching about Christ's saving activity, needed to account for Paul's experience of God's grace and pardon (v. 16). Such an autobiographical episode is based on Paul as "an illustration" of the gospel attached to his name. The fitting response to Paul's gospel is doxology (v. 17), patterned on Jewish prayer-speech. Hence "Amen" invites the readers' reaction of assent.

1:18-20, The Charge Renewed. "This command" (v. 18) looks back to vv. 3 and 5 where Timothy is counseled to check false teachers in Ephesus. They are named as Hymenaeus and Alexander, who are identified presumably because they were known to have been Paul's opponents in his day. It is possible that the latter person reappears in 2 Tim. 4:14, just as Hymenaeus does in 2 Tim. 2:17. Paul is said to have dealt drastically with them by consigning them to Satan, the great enemy of the church (cf. 1 Cor. 5:5 and the stories in Acts 5:1-11; 13:5-11). Some type of excommunication is in view but with a remedial purpose. The two uses of "faith" (v. 19) suggest they are guilty of a double fault: they have turned from active trust in God, to which Timothy is called as he seeks to keep his conscience clear, and they have departed ruinously from "the faith," the Pauline gospel. By contrast, some "prophetic word" uttered by a charismatically gifted person (1 Cor. 14:29-33) had pointed Paul to him (cf. Acts 13:1-3; see Barrett; see also Acts 16:1-3).

2:1-7, Instruction in Public Prayer. In the opening of chap. 2 we are possibly reading parts of an early manual of church order based on the rubric of 3:15 (similar to 1 Clem. 59-61). The repetition of "all" (in 1 Tim. 2:1, 4, 6) sounds a note of polemic against the exclusivist tendency among the gnosticizing opponents. "Kings" refers to the Roman emperors and their provincial officials, "all who are set over us" (cf. Rom. 13:1-7; 1 Pet. 2:13-14; Pol. Phil. 12:3). The desire is for good government, religious toleration and tranquil times (see 1 Clem. 61:1-3) to enable Christians to practice their religion and uphold high moral values. God's design has provided a universal gospel by the gift of Christ who "gave himself as a ransom [as in Mark 10:45] for all" (1 Tim. 2:6). The worldwide note goes back to Isa. 45:21, 22, an OT testimony that may be alluded to in a cryptic Greek expression (1 Tim. 2:6; lit., "the witness in its own times," i.e., fulfilling God's promises in his own good time; so NEB, Hanson). Of this saving plan Paul is the appointed exponent, with his mission to the non-Jewish world now a fact of history (see Rom. 15:15-29).

2:8-15, Women's Role. Public praying is recommended, in an echo of Mal. 1:11. The domestic code that gives guidance to the women members regarding hairstyle and dress is akin to 1 Pet. 3:3-5 but with a sharper point put on the need for "good deeds," a term found in Eph. 2:10. The writer's interest is in the practice of religion, where evidently the women were vulnerable to being led astray (see esp. 1 Tim. 5:3-16; 2 Tim. 3:6-9). This background (also to be seen in 1 Cor. 14:34-35) may account for the apparent antifeminist tones of the following section. Women are cautioned not to aspire to be teachers because, first, they are open to being led astray, as Eve was; here Jewish ideas are pressed into service, as in 2 Cor. 11:2, 3; and second, their salvation lies in honoring the place the code gives them as homemakers and mothers. The text places a high value on marriage and procreation against a Gnostic low regard for both (1 Tim. 4:3; Irenaeus Against Heresies 1.24.2: "marriage and bearing children are of Satan"). There is some evidence of a women's prophetic movement in Asia, which these Letters seek to check (see MacDonald).

3:1-7, Credentials for Overseers. Another "faithful saying" prefaces the double profile that follows. First to be introduced are episkopoi (Gk.), lit. "overseers," who are usually equated with "elders," as in Acts 20:17, 28; Titus 1:6-9 with its parallel requirements; and 1 Pet. 5:1-2. The key idea is supervision, and qualifications for this "noble task" are listed. The three most significant are, first, blameless character, both inside (1 Tim. 3:2) and outside church life (v. 7); second, sound marriage and family life (vv. 2, 4-5: "the husband of one wife" is ambiguous, but it probably means fidelity within the married state); third, ability as a teacher (v. 2), implying maturity and experience (v. 6).

3:8-13, Credentials for Deacons. The other office mentioned is that of deacon, a general term meaning "every kind of service in the propagation of the gospel" (see Kelly); and Timothy himself is called a deacon in this way (4:6). The character references are parallel with the earlier list of 3:1-7 but with two important exceptions: first, there is a probationary time (v. 10) requiring the deacons to be tested as they prepare to be promoted (v. 13); second, it is not clear whether "their wives" (TEV; RSV has "the women," but the Greek has no article) refers to deacons' spouses (so also NEB, NIV) or, more likely with most commentators except Hanson, "women deacons" such as Phoebe (Rom. 16:1) or the women helpers of Paul at Philippi (Phil. 4:2-3). The introductory "in the same way" (1 Tim. 3:11) as in v. 8 leads us to expect a fresh category, i.e., deaconesses.

3:14-16, The Church as God's House and Its Head. Expanding a metaphor found in 1 Cor. 3:9 and 11, the teaching characterizes the church as "the pillar and mainstay of the truth," i.e., the bulwark of Pauline "orthodoxy." Then comes a hymnic confession, comprising three matching couplets to form a "song of the incarnation" (→ Incarnation) in six lines marked by both rhythm and rhyme in the original. Each couplet brings together the earthly and the heavenly and demonstrates how Christ is the great unifier who has reconciled the world in an achievement that is prolonged in the church's mission in history.

4:1-16, More Warnings and Encouragements. It is natural that, after a statement of "the secret of our religion" (3:16), the errors of false teachers should be exposed. Some church members have evidently fallen victim to a gnosticizing insistence that marriage is evil and abstinence from food is the way to perfection. The basis for this claim was a belief that Christians were already living a heavenly existence (2 Tim. 2:17-18) that denied sexual differences and refused bodily appetites. On the contrary, God's creation is good (Gen. 1:31) and food is his gift (Ps. 24:1, which may be the "word of God" of 1 Tim. 4:5) to be enjoyed (so 6:17; see 1 Cor. 10:23-32, highlighting thankfulness as our response that consecrates all workaday activity).

Timothy is now summoned to fulfill his office as a "noble servant of Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. 4:6). The idioms are athletic but also drawn from the calling of the Stoic ideal person, Christianized to promote "the practice of religion" (vv. 7-8). Genuine self-control is set over against the spurious regimen in 4:1-3; interpreters have noted links with Colossians 2:16-23. A fragment of "personal conversation" between Paul and the then youthful Timothy may be seen in 1 Tim. 4:12-16. It is an intensely warm paragraph with Paul's language evident in v. 12. Timothy's call to service is traced to a charisma (Gk., "gift") that came via the prophetic sign (see 1:18) and the approval of the elders whose hands were placed on him (cf. Num. 27:18-23) as a mark of either a transference of authority or a recognition that he was already gifted by the Spirit. Contrast 2 Tim. 1:6, which speaks only of Paul's imposition of hands.

The function Timothy discharges is that of an "apostolic and prophetic teacher" (to quote Mart. Pol. 16). Pastoral and liturgical responsibilities include the public reading of Scripture (1 Tim. 4:13); proclamation that seems to be tied to the exposition of scriptural words with a dash of "exhortation"; and teaching that emphasizes the catechetical training of believers. Timothy must also practice his faith in devoted living, so that his "progress" (v. 15) needs to outstrip the advance of false teachings (see 2 Tim. 2:16; 3:9). Only along the path of patient duty lies his and his hearers' "salvation."

5:1-6:2, Pastoral Duties. This is a lengthy section devoted to a recital of many-sided needs in the pastoral sphere. First, the "older man" (Gk. presbyteros) is a generic description, not used of a church officer. Such a one is to be treated respectfully by the younger leader (4:12). The "older women" (5:2) are to receive similar regard, while relations with the "younger women" are to be honorable.

Second, this leads on to the case of "widows" to whom more attention is given than to any other social group, mainly (we may infer) because they were a source of trouble. The problem may be explained by the survival needs of women who lacked support in days before welfare or Social Security. So the injunction to "honor" those genuinely bereft means "support financially" (v. 3) by enrolling them on this list (v. 9). But there is a lower age-limit in v. 9 (set at sixty years, which is when a person became "old" in antiquity) and a moral test (v. 10). Otherwise the widow is the responsibility of her family (vv. 4-8), and widows in their prime and who are sexually active should be counseled to marry (v. 11) and establish family life (v. 14; Titus 2:4-5) as a precaution against filling their idle days with tale-bearing pursuits, including the use of incantations and falling into prostitution (vv. 12-13, 15; see Hanson; MacDonald; → Women).

Believers must, where they can, help one another directly and not leave "the church" to assume the cost of the really needy.

Third, elders who exercise a leadership role, perhaps by presiding at the Eucharist, and who in particular are engaged in preaching and teaching merit special distinction (vv. 17-18). Citing Deut. 25:4 and a "saying of Jesus" taken from the Gospel tradition (Luke 10:7; Matt. 10:10), the rule is that such men are deserving of an honorarium or even a set salary.

Fourth, it is necessary also to exercise discipline among the leadership. Timothy is to address boldly those who are persistent sinners once he is satisfied that the charge is well supported (an OT precaution taken from Deut. 17:6, 19:15; cf. Matt. 18:16; 2 Cor. 13:1). He is to be wary of receiving them back into office (1 Tim. 5:21-22; this laying on of hands is a sign of readmission). Even if he errs in his disciplinary decisions, at God's judgment all will be put right (vv. 24-25). His motives should be "pure" (v. 22) but not based on a wrongheaded asceticism that forbade wine (v. 23) to be used medicinally to aid his weak constitution that would be aggravated by his having to deal with offenders (see 4:12).

Fifth, another troublesome area is the relation between masters and slaves in the congregation (6:1-2). Here (as in Titus 2:9, 10) the slaves have duties to perform while little is said of what the slave owners should do (cf. Col. 4:1; Eph. 6:9).

6:3-10, The Theme of Denunciation Renewed. A new factor is introduced with the caution that, first, the opponents are motivated by love of money (v. 5), presumably by charging gullible people for their teaching but maybe by embezzlement of church funds; and second, Timothy must steer clear of such practices (v. 11) since all life is transitory (v. 7) and he should be "content" (cf. Phil. 4:11) with the basic necessities of sustenance and shelter (1 Tim. 6:8). To forget this Christian teaching, which goes back to the gospel tradition (Matt. 6:25-33; Luke 12:22-31, "the sound words" of v. 3), is to be exposed to temptation that can lead to ruin, both material and spiritual (v. 9). The warning is confirmed by the moral commonplace that covetousness, here called "love of money," is evil.

6:11-16, Timothy's Calling. Timothy's pursuit is rather to be the virtues that make for the gaining of eternal life (vv. 11-12). The imagery is athletic as he is summoned to a "noble contest" (v. 12), which looks back to either the commencement of his Christian life at baptism when he made a "noble confession" (v. 12) or the ordination charge he received at the outset of his service. In creedal language, v. 13 recalls Jesus' own "noble confession" and dates his "witnessing" in "the time of Pontius Pilate" (cf. John 18:28-38). Similarly, the later Creed would locate this turning point of salvation history "under Pontius Pilate." The "command" (v. 14) is better understood as his ordination vow rather than a baptismal pledge. Timothy's fidelity is again contrasted to current ideas, namely, the imperial cult that claimed the Roman emperor as "sovereign lord" (as in Rev. 17:14; 19:16). On the contrary, only God is to be so honored (as in

1 Tim. 1:17), since God is immortal and majestic. Yet his nature is seen in our Lord Jesus Christ whose "appearing" is expected in his own time (2 Tim. 4:1, 8; Titus 2:13).

6:17-19, An Interlude. This short section emphasizes how fleeting is earthly wealth in contrast to the possession of "life indeed" (v. 19), i.e., eternal life.

6:20-21, Timothy's Final Recall. This is an epitome of the entire Letter, with its twin ideas: Timothy's task is to guard the deposit of Paul's teaching and not get sidetracked into the error at Ephesus that is no better than "empty noise" and vain disputation; those who have fallen for gnosticizing ideas, such as the men in 1:19-20, have lost their way (1:6).

2 TIMOTHY

1:1-2, Greeting. As with 1 Timothy, the names are placed first, with emphasis on Paul's role as a divinely authorized apostle entrusted with the message. Timothy is his "dear child," which has a warmer tone than 1 Tim. 1:1.

1:3-8, Timothy's Calling. Paul's ancestry (Rom. 9:3-5; Phil. 3:4-6) is given to recall Timothy's pedigree of Christian faith (Acts 16:1-3). Paul's close relationship is marked by his prayers, and Timothy's "tears" (see Acts 20:37) testify to a filial bond. This detail is added to stress how needful it is for Paul's gospel to be maintained in the church by those who have received "the gift" of ordained ministry in the Pauline succession (2 Tim. 1:6). Some expressive terms of exhortation are interesting: "stir up anew," lit., "fan into a flame" (v. 6); pastors like Timothy should not show a "cowardly spirit" (v. 7); like Paul (Rom. 1:16; Phil. 1:20) they should not be "ashamed" of (by disowning) the Lord or the apostolic message, even if it entails suffering for the gospel.

1:9-14, Patterns of Paul's Ministry. The theme is the gospel of Paul, of which he is praised as "herald, apostle, and teacher" (v. 11). The saving activity of God in election and his calling men and women in grace is celebrated (vv. 9-10; cf. Eph. 1:3-10). The focus of this piece of creedal statement is the "appearing," i.e., incarnation (see 1 Tim. 3:16) of his son, "our savior Christ Jesus." The salvific work is described in stately terms, e.g., rendering death ineffectual and casting light on "life and immortality," that is, immortal existence beyond death, which is a divine gift (1 Tim. 1:17; 6:16). Paul is known to have been loyal to this message leading to a martyr's death, but what God has entrusted to him has been preserved intact in the church of the writer's day and remains to be handed on (2 Tim. 1:14; 2:1-2).

1:15-18, Warnings and Example. But Paul's work is under attack. There has been a slide into gnosticizing error (2:16-18) in the Asian province (1:15). Yet all is not lost while there is the memory of Onesiphorus (also preserved in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla; this story tells how he acted as Paul's host at Iconium) and his sacrificial ministry (vv. 17-18) to encourage the followers of the great apostle.

2:1-7, Ministry: Responsibility and Rewards. Timothy is advised to ensure a succession of authentic teaching (vv. 1-2; cf. 1 Clem. 44) and is promised a just reward for his labors. That reward is probably to include a remuneration (based on 1 Cor. 9:7, echoed in 1 Tim. 5:17-18) as well as the prospect of an eternal inheritance (in 2 Tim. 2:10, "with eternal glory"). But there are qualifications to be met. The Christian minister is like a soldier on active service (vv. 3-4) and should avoid distraction (contrast Paul's waiver in 1 Cor. 9:12; 2 Cor. 12:13). The image of the athlete illustrates how rigorous training and self-discipline (as in 1 Tim. 4:7, 16) are needful. The working farmer is entitled to his first share of the harvest—a clear sign that some financial compensation for the ordained ministry is in view.

2:8-26, Ministry: Its Theme and a Call to Steadfastness. As often in the pastoral Letters, some practical advice is reinforced by a quotation of traditional material. The background here is Paul's fidelity to the gospel—drawn from Rom. 1:3-4 with its twin ideas of Jesus' messiahship ("the seed [family] of David") and resurrection (2 Tim. 2:8). Such loyalty was maintained at considerable cost (v. 9). So a "song of the martyrs" (vv. 11-13) is altogether appropriate. Couched in a series of "if . . . then" statements to form a quartet of hymnic lines, the verses are full of Paul's theology (patterned on Phil. 1:12-28; see Hanson) pressed into service for a new situation. The setting is the dismal situation of apostasy (in 1:15, shortly to be identified, 2:17-18). Readers are reminded that loyalty to one's baptismal profession (v. 11; Rom. 6:1-11; cf. Col. 2:20; 3:1) does not go unrewarded (Rom. 8:17; Pol. Phil. 5:2), even if unworthy church leaders abandon the Pauline faith (2 Tim. 2:12) and the believer's allegiance is sorely strained (v. 13).

So Timothy is to pass on this clarion call, to avoid mere "verbal disputes" (1 Tim. 6:4, 20) and to be a true Paulinist (2 Tim. 2:15, a worker unashamed of his job and Paul's gospel; Rom. 1:16). The term "worker" often has a bad sense in Paul: see 2 Cor. 11:13 and Phil. 3:2. Here its positive meaning is emphasized by reference to v. 6: the farmer who works hard by driving a straight plow. The opponents as "evil workers" are unmasked (vv. 16-17); here alone in these Letters is the alien teaching precisely identified (see Kelly). The writer exposes some kind of teaching regarding a baptismal resurrection, akin to 1 Cor. 4:8; 15:12, with the corollary that baptism ushered believers into a haven of spiritual existence that exempted them from moral restraints and canceled any future hope of resurrection. The best parallel verse is in the newly discovered Gnostic Treatise on Resurrection from the Nag Hammadi library (→ Nag Hammadi): "As the apostle said . . . we have suffered with him, and arisen with him and ascended into heaven with him. This is the spiritual resurrection which swallows . . . [the] resurrection of the flesh." On Hymenaeus, see 1 Tim. 1:20 for his excommunication. The second-century Acts of Paul associates this teaching with Demas and Hermogenes (see 2 Tim. 4:10 for the former name; 1:15 for the latter).

The antidote lies in the assurance that God's church will abide, even though some leaders defect and some members at Ephesus are seduced. The proof-text of Isa. 28:16 is joined to Num. 16:5 to indicate this confidence. Then comes a warning, based on Isa. 52:11, to steer clear of evil influences (2 Tim. 2:20-21) and to dedicate one's energies to more profitable exercises (vv. 22, 23). A final contrast is drawn between the true "servant of the Lord," mirrored in Timothy and the teachers, referred to in v. 16. Whether there is hope for them is uncertain, since v. 26 is a teaser and its meaning depends on how "held captive" by him and set free "to do his will" are related. The pronouns are different, but they can well refer to the devil. If so, the element of contingency in "perhaps God may give them a change of mind" underlines the pessimism. But the true Pauline remnant is secure (v. 19).

3:1-9, Last Days and Present Duties. The summons to "understand this" in the light of impending "hard times" (v. 1) is intended to put Timothy and—through him—the present readers on the alert. A set of powerful contrasts follows (vv. 2-5), fashioned according to the Jewish idea of a testamentary warning, i.e., the writer contemplates the immediate future in the light of his own demise (see 4:1-8). The vice list is based on Rom. 1:29-31, which is an indictment of pagan morals, but the style here is much more formal and intended to be remembered. The contrast "outward form of religion" versus "inward dynamic" (2 Tim. 3:5) shows how a lax spirit has invaded the church. There are leaders whom Timothy must identify and oppose (vv. 5-6a). Their baneful influence is seen in the fascination they exercise over "weak women" who have become exposed to male solicitation (v. 6b). The resistance shown to Paul's strict moral code (called "the knowledge of the truth," v. 7) is illustrated by what happened to Moses, whose authority was opposed by Egyptian magicians (Exod. 7-9). But the fate of the opponents at Ephesus will be just as certain as that of those in Egypt (2 Tim. 3:9). Timothy's stance as Paul's representative must be firm: "avoid such persons" (v. 5b).

3:10-17, Paul's Example and Influence. Timothy has much to encourage him in his stand. We note three factors. First, the tradition based on Acts 13-14 is evidently well known in the Asian churches. Strangely, the incidents of the apostle's sufferings and loyalty to the truth are taken from these sections of Acts that precede Paul's meeting with Timothy, yet the latter is intended to recall them (2 Tim. 3:10-11). The chief point, however, is that Paul, like the righteous psalmist (in Ps. 34:19), was rescued and saw the results of his courage. Second, all who remain firm must expect to encounter hostility, often coming from religious leaders like those who practice evil arts (2 Tim. 3:13). Third, the Pauline church rests on a firm foundation in "holy Scripture," which Paul had made his court of appeal (Rom. 15:4). Early influence on Timothy, traced back to his home life (see 2 Tim. 1:5), included a knowledge of the Greek OT, which is divinely authoritative chiefly because it leads to Christ and has become an indispensable tool in the equipment of Christian leaders (3:15-17). The allusion here to Scripture's authority is made polemically, i.e., in defense of Pauline "orthodoxy," which alone claims to understand its meaning over against "heretical" usage.

4:1-8, Paul's Testament Continued. The verb "I solemnly charge you" is a term commonly used of a "last will and testament," and here it has that flavor in the light of Paul's impending martyrdom (vv. 6-8). The invoking of divine names (v. 1) adds an extra seriousness, as does the eschatological reminder of Christ's "appearing" in final glory. In the light of such a setting, the appeal "proclaim the [Pauline] message" is reinforced, especially as Timothy's commission stands in opposition to the false teachers' work, now an evident reality that Paul is said to have foreseen. The opponents (of v. 3) trade on human love of novelty, called here "getting their ears tickled" (see 1 Tim. 1:4; Titus 1:14 for their "myths"). More seriously, Paul's gospel is under fire.

2 Tim. 4:6-8 is a noble statement celebrating Paul the martyr. The language draws on Phil. 2:12-30, especially 2:17 for the rare verb "to be offered up as a libation." Since such an offering to the gods often preceded a sea journey, commenced by the ship's weighing anchor, Spicq thinks that "my departure" has this reference; but in Phil. 1:23 the corresponding verb "to depart" is used, with no nautical allusion. The prospect of death looms large, and Paul's reward at the final day is a spur to faithful Christian service.

4:9-22, Personal Details. Various names are introduced to give Pauline reminiscences of colleagues in the Ephesian ministry (Acts 19, 20; Col. 4:7, 10-18; Philem. 24). There is one who left Paul's side to return home (Demas, 2 Tim. 4:9) and one who, in the tradition of Acts 15:37-39, had previously abandoned Paul and who now came back to his side (John Mark, 2 Tim. 4:11). Tychicus is a well-known apostolic colleague and courier of Paul (Col. 4:7; cf. Eph. 6:21; see also Titus 3:12), sent to Ephesus. References to Paul's clothing and the call for "scrolls," that is, the parchments (the OT in Greek; → Writing), add a lifelike touch to the narrative of his confinement. He has already been faced with the "preliminary inquiry" (2 Tim. 4:16) with no hope of acquittal. His rescue (v. 17) is traced to divine action in an idiom drawn from Ps. 22:22. The prospect, however, is ultimate martyrdom, to be celebrated with a doxology. The final greetings (2 Tim. 4:19-22) serve only to underscore the good standing of the great apostle whose legacy his followers want to preserve in the church.

TITUS

1:1-4, Greetings. This opening section of salutation in the name of Paul to his colleague Titus is the fullest and richest (in theological terms) of the three pastoral Letters. Above all, he and Titus share a "common faith," i.e., the faith of the universal church (Spicq), since Paul is the epitome of divine truth.

1:5-9, Credentials for Leaders. Titus, who had a special relationship to Corinth (see 2 Cor. 2:13; 7:6-16; 8:16-24; 12:18), is now settled at Crete, where Pauline Christianity is evidently established. There is need to consolidate the work by appointing church leaders ("elders" in Titus 1:5-6 are further described in vv. 7-9 under the title of "overseers," akin to 1 Tim. 3:1-7; see also 2 Tim. 2:24-26). These leaders are to have suitable qualifications, with pride of place in all the lists given to ability in teaching Paul's gospel (Titus 1:9). Personal habits (sobriety, not greed) and good family order are commended.

1:10-16, False Teachers To Be Opposed. Those who resist Paul's gospel are identified as Jewish Christian Gnosticians (see 1 Tim. 1:4-7), called "the circumcision" (Titus 1:10) and advocates of "Jewish myths" (v. 14), i.e., the notion of angelic intermediaries, like the ideas in Col. 2:8, 18, 22 (so Dibelius). Also, as at Colossae, there is a strong ascetic movement based on Jewish food laws (Titus 1:15), which this text rigorously opposes by adapting probably Paul's stand on the side of the "strong" in Rom. 14:20 (see Barrett) and at Corinth (1 Cor. 8) and maybe by reaching back to the gospel tradition (Mark 7:15, 19). The combined effect of error in doctrine (Titus 1:11) and an unhealthy rejection of God's provision in food has led to disturbance of Christian family life (v. 11; cf. 2 Tim. 3:6) and the presence of teachers who seek to get rich ("base gain," v. 11; "by their actions they disown the claim to know God," v. 16) by living off the congregation. Their greed, it is said, is a local trait, since Cretans are reported to be perverse, according to the poetic tag quoted from Epimenides, a Cretan teacher, about 500 B.C. The false claim that the tomb of Zeus was in Crete is known to (and condemned by) Callimachus, 305-240 B.C., who insists that the king of the gods cannot die.

2:1-10, A Social Code. In a way already followed in the Letters of Timothy (1 Tim. 3; 4; 5; 2 Tim. 2:22) the various members of the social order in the church are admonished. The difference is that here it is not office holders who are in view but diverse age and social groups, especially slaves (Titus 2:9-10; 3:1). The same virtues, however, are urged on professing believers, with chief emphasis placed on self-restraint (2:2, 4, 6) and respect for those in a "higher" social bracket. Self-control is seen in the call to temperance (v. 3) and submission (v. 5). Young wives are urged to be "good workers at home" in opposition to the tendency visible in 1 Tim. 5:13. Titus too is counseled to be a model leader (Titus 2:1, 7, 15), rich in "noble deeds" (as in 1 Tim. 4:11-12; 1 Pet. 5:1-5). The overall motive is to commend the Christian message and way of life to the pagan society (Titus 2:5, 10).

2:11-3:15, Final Instructions. It is helpful to consider first the two sections 2:11-14; 3:4-7, which are probably drawn from a baptismal liturgy that celebrates the new life in the church, thanks to the saving acts of God in Jesus Christ by the Spirit (an implicit trinitarian statement). The opening verb (in 2:11) marks this fragment as an "appearance" theology, which is picked up at 3:4: "the kindness of God . . . appeared." See 1 Tim. 3:16 for a similar idiom. God's grace moves believers to renounce their former impiety (Titus 3:3) and live a wholesome life (2:12; the adverbs here may well sum up in a nutshell the moral ethos of the pastoral Letters). Christians reflect on God's deliverance from evil (2:14) and their entrance on a purified life-style, marked by "good deeds" (2:14; see Eph. 2:10).

The language of Titus 2:13 is notoriously difficult, but some recent scholars have adopted an older suggestion made by F. J. A. Hort: "glory" is explained by what follows, i.e., the appearing in God's glory is in the person of the savior Christ Jesus (as in 2 Cor. 4:6 in the Pauline tradition; see Hanson for details). The turning point in human experience is located at baptism (Titus 3:5), which marked a rebirth and a renewal by the Spirit (the idiom is more Johannine—John 3:3–7—than Pauline, in spite of the "justification" language). The baptismal reminder is evidently drawing on a "mixed" tradition, including a (Johannine) polemic against the prevailing cult of emperor worship. A lot of the terms used are paralleled in Domitian's claim to be "lord and god," e.g., "appearing," "savior," "great God," "kindness," "philanthropy" (Titus 3:4).

Disturbances in congregational life are to be put down in an authoritative way (Titus 2:15; cf. 1 Cor. 7:6, but the peril of wrongheaded teaching may account for the shift). Yet Titus as a leader is to use discretion in handling obstinate "heretics," which is the Greek term used for persons who cause "divisions" (Titus 3:9–11). The setting is evidently a group in the church that is anti-Pauline (cf. 1 Tim. 1:4; 6:4; 2 Tim. 2:23).

By contrast, the author recalls the contact Paul had with well-known colleagues such as Tychicus (see commentary above on 2 Tim. 4:12) or Apollos (1 Cor., Acts) as well as lesser known names (Artemas, Zenas "the lawyer," who may have aided Paul in his encounter with the Roman authorities; they are otherwise quite unknown in the NT). These are the persons who represent the gospel as Paul's faithful helpers; and all "who love us in the faith" (Titus 3:15) are likewise added testimony to Paul's apostolic standing that needs to be asserted in the teeth of heretical teaching.

PHILEMON

NORMAN R. PETERSEN

INTRODUCTION

We do not know exactly when or where the Letter of Paul to Philemon was written or where Philemon lived (Colossae? see Col. 4:9, 12, 17), but the Letter itself presupposes a story that is basic for our understanding of it. This story consists of the events Paul refers to in the Letter: Philemon incurs a debt to Paul (his conversion? v. 19b); Paul is imprisoned (v. 9; cf. vv. 1, 10, 13, 23); the slave Onesimus runs away from his master Philemon and incurs a debt to him (v. 15; cf. vv. 11–13, 18–19a); Onesimus is converted by an imprisoned Paul (v. 10; cf. v. 13); Paul hears a report of Philemon's love and faith (vv. 4–7); Paul sends Onesimus back to Philemon (v. 12), and he sends a Letter of appeal to Philemon, guaranteeing repayment of Onesimus' debt but also calling in Philemon's debt to him (vv. 17–19); Onesimus and the Letter arrive at Philemon's house (implied); Philemon responds to Paul's appeal (vv. 20–21); and Philemon and the church that meets at his house anticipate a visit by Paul (v. 22).

At issue both in Paul's writing of the Letter and in the decision with which it confronts Philemon is the social and symbolic integrity of the new family of brothers and sisters, the church. Philemon is a master in the world and a brother in the church, and now his slave has become his brother. In Col. 3:22–4:1 and Eph. 6:5–9, Letters that Paul may not have written, the question such relations pose is viewed in terms of how masters and slaves in the church are to relate to one another; the answer is that masters must be just and slaves obedient. In his Letter to Philemon Paul does not offer this answer. Indeed, he seems to envision a different question: whether or not a brother can be a master to a brother not only in the church, but also in the world. Paul urges Philemon to receive Onesimus as he would receive Paul himself, his partner (v. 17), fellow worker (v. 1), and brother (vv. 7, 20), namely, as an equal, not as an inferior. Verses 16 and 21 suggest further that Paul envisions a change in their worldly statuses as well. Paul expects that Philemon will not only "obey" his appeal to receive Onesimus as a brother, but also do even more than Paul has explicitly asked, possibly even terminate their master-slave relationship by freeing Onesimus.

Because Paul has no legal right to demand this, and because he sees this relationship as a problem in the church, his desires and motives are couched in the most careful rhetoric. He begins (vv. 4–7) with praise for Philemon's demonstrations of faith and love and for refreshing the hearts of the saints, the members of his church. Paul too acts out of love when he declares that for love's sake he is appealing to Philemon rather than commanding him, as he has the authority in Christ to do (vv. 8–10). The situation requires (v. 8) an act by Philemon that Paul could command, but Paul chooses rather to appeal for Philemon's act of goodness as a matter of consent rather than of compulsion (v. 14). However, once Paul has indicated his authority in the matter, Philemon cannot forget it, and neither does Paul. In verse 21 he throws his previous caution to the winds and expresses his confidence not in Philemon's free consent, as though to an appeal, but in his obedience, as though to the command that Paul did not give.

That the matter at stake is significant enough for Paul both to choose his words carefully and then to shift his tone so dramatically is further reflected in his placing of the seemingly personal matter in a public light. The Letter is addressed to the whole congregation that meets in Philemon's house (vv. 1b–2 and the plural "you" in vv. 22b, 25), and Paul suggests that a half-dozen other fellow workers with him are aware of what is going on (vv. 1a, 23–24). In this way, Paul exerts considerable social pressure on Philemon in addition to his own apostolic influence.

The magnitude of the problem derives from the possibility that Philemon's failure to receive his brother as a brother would threaten the very essence of what it means to be a brother (or sister), which every believer is by virtue of having become a child or son of God at baptism ("son of God" is for Paul an asexual notion—there is no male or female; cf. Gal. 3:26–4:7; 1 Cor. 7). Philemon's failure to respond affirmatively to Paul's appeal would result not only in a breach in the social and symbolic fabric of the brother-and-sisterhood, but also in Philemon's demonstration that he is neither a brother nor a son of God. It is in this light that we must view Paul's announced visit, for he will have to treat Philemon's response in terms of its implications for the brotherhood.

COMMENTARY

1-3, Opening. The address (vv. 1-2) and greetings (v. 3) are typical of Paul's Letters, except that here he identifies himself as a prisoner of or for Jesus Christ (cf. vv. 9, 13). It is not known where he was imprisoned, but because Archippus, Epaphras, and Onesimus are elsewhere identified as residents of Colossae (Col. 4:9, 12, 17), this may be the place to which the Letter was sent. Philemon is the host of a house-church that, according to contemporary architectural patterns, would have been limited to fifteen to thirty members. The letter is addressed to the whole church, although Paul speaks almost exclusively to Philemon ("you" in vv. 22b and 25 is in the plural). "Fellow workers" and "fellow soldiers" represent a relationship of responsibility to and with Paul, either as associates in his travels, like Timothy, or as residential functionaries like Philemon and Stephanas (cf. 1 Cor. 16:15-18). "Brother" and "sister" (Philem. 1, 2, 7, 16, 20), on the other hand, are sibling identities all believers enjoy by virtue of their being "children" or "sons of God" the Father (v. 3), which they become initially at baptism (Rom. 8:12-17; Gal. 3:26-4:7) and fully at the imminent return of Christ, when they will enter into the kingdom of God. Similarly, "Lord" means "master," and therefore believers are also equals as slaves of God or Christ, whom God has appointed master of all believers (Rom. 6:15-23; 1 Cor. 1:2; 8:5-6; Phil. 2:1-22). These identifications are significant because they are the basis for Paul's dealings with the worldly master and slave, Philemon and Onesimus. In opposition to this worldly relationship Paul concentrates on the ultimate identity of all believers as children of God and, therefore, as brothers and sisters to one another. For Paul the very form of human existence is that of enslavement (to sin working through the mortal, perishable, and sexually inclined flesh), but for believers this form is in the process of being transformed into the imperishable and asexual form of the sons of God, of whom Christ is the firstborn (Rom. 8:12-30; 1 Cor. 15; 2 Cor. 3:17-5:10; Phil. 3:20-21). Although still in human form, the believer's status as a "slave" is through Christ's death transferred from sin to Christ himself as Lord or master (1 Cor. 6:19-20; 7:21-23; cf. Rom. 3:24; Gal. 3:13, where "redemption" is a purchase from enslavement). Consequently, if one is not a brother to a brother, one's status as a child of God is in jeopardy, both in the church and therefore also in the kingdom of God.

4-7, Thanksgiving. The brief thanksgiving is also typical of Paul's Letters. In them, he establishes a basis for his subsequent appeals or exhortations by referring to his past relationship with the addressees and including a statement of his knowledge about their faith and love. Here, the thanksgiving is structured as a chiasm, that is, ideas, words, phrases, or images are repeated, with variations, in reverse order, e.g., A B B' A'. He refers first to Philemon's love (A) and then to his faith (B; v. 5), and then continues by speaking further first of Philemon's acts of faith (B'; v. 6) and then of his acts of love (A'; v. 7) that have refreshed the hearts of the saints. The translation of v. 6 is difficult, but the knowledge Paul hopes Philemon's faith will promote consists of what it means to be a son of God and a slave of Christ (see commentary above on vv. 1-3). The thanksgiving therefore expresses approval of Philemon's past behavior in Christ, but it also provides a strategic lever for Paul to secure a continuation of that behavior.

8-22, Appeal. Following his thanksgivings Paul usually makes appeals for specific future behavior on the part of his addressees. These sections can be long or short, depending largely on the number of topics addressed (cf. 1 Thess. 4-6; 1 Cor. 1-16!). This Letter is distinctive because in vv. 8-10 Paul discloses that his language of appeal is a loving mask for his authority to command. His disclosure here is related both to his focus on acts of love in his thanksgiving and to his desire also to have Philemon act out of love rather than from his own position of authority over Onesimus. Paul's mode of relating to Philemon thus becomes a model for Philemon in his relationship with Onesimus. "Love" is that familial quality of relations that builds up those who are party to the relationship (cf. 1 Cor. 8:1b; 10:23-24; 13:4-7). Thus, in the only topic of this Letter, Paul says that "for love's sake" he appeals to Philemon concerning his (Paul's) child, Onesimus (vv. 9-10). However, it is only after considerable rhetorical delay that Paul finally gets to the point of his appeal: "receive him as you would receive me" (v. 17). Both the delay before the point and what follows it in vv. 18-22 must be appreciated if we are to understand just what this appeal entails. Two compositional aspects of the appeal section are in this respect significant.

The first is what appears to be another chiasm. In v. 8, Paul refers to his authority to command (A) Philemon in the matter at issue, but in vv. 9-10 he indicates his preference rather to make an appeal (B). Then, in v. 14 Philemon's response is described as one of consent (B') out of his own free will, as to an appeal, not one of compulsion or of necessity, as to a command. However, at the end of the appeal section in v. 21, Paul refers to Philemon's response as an act of obedience (A'), as though to a command. Related to this chiasmic unit is a sequence of terms that climax with the reference to obedience. Verse 8 indicates that there is but one fitting response (what is "required") to the problem. The problem is like a puzzle missing one piece, and only one will fit. If what is required is that Philemon be a brother to Onesimus (vv. 15-17), the absence of this "piece" is a threat to the brotherhood, the "puzzle." In v. 14, this missing piece is referred to as yet another act of goodness by Philemon. But in v. 21 it appears that Paul does not completely trust Philemon's choice of pieces, for here he speaks of his act as one of obedience. Despite the early rhetoric of appeal and consent, obedience is the last word. This strange shift is further reflected in the second compositional aspect of vv. 8-22.

Although no translation can fail to convey the turn in Paul's appeal when he takes stylus in hand (v. 19), none has fully captured the series of contrasts or alternative expressions represented in the Greek text of vv. 8-16. These serve to delay the appeal proper until v. 17. The series is as follows:

vv. 8-9a	bold enough to command	I prefer for love's sake to appeal
9b	old man/ambassador	a prisoner for Christ Jesus
10	my son	whom I fathered
11	formerly useless	now useful
12-13	whom I sent to you	whom I wanted to keep with me
14	not by necessity	but by free will
15	he was parted from you for a while	that you might have him forever
16a	not as a slave	but as a beloved brother
16b	especially to me	but how much more to you
16c	both in the flesh	and in the Lord

This series, and even more so the Greek grammatical constructions, show just how carefully Paul composed this part of his appeal. The list enables us to decide between "old man" and "ambassador" for the ambiguous word in v. 9b. "Old man" is not a proper contrast with "a prisoner for Christ Jesus," especially when "ambassador" is so closely related to Paul's authority to command and to his metaphorical fatherhood (see also 2 Cor. 5:20; Eph. 6:20; and the more common pairing of "Apostle and slave of Christ Jesus" in Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:1, 10). "Ambassador" is a metaphor for Paul's apostolic role, in which capacity he has the authority to command. More significant for the Letter and its appeal, however, is the rhetorical and compositional difference between vv. 8-16 and vv. 18-22.

After Paul expresses his appeal in v. 17, he adds the promissory note in v. 18, endorses the note, and then shifts his tone entirely, as though at that moment he decided that appealing was inadequate. Thus, having guaranteed payment of Onesimus' debt with his note he proceeds to call in Philemon's debt to him (v. 19b). Presumably, Paul converted (fathered) Philemon; hence Philemon owes him his self or life, i.e., his position as a son of God. Paul then emphatically declares that he wants some joy from Philemon in the Lord and, echoing the reference in v. 7 to Philemon's refreshing of the hearts of the saints, he summons Philemon to refresh his heart too (v. 20). But v. 21 also hearkens back to the command in v. 8, for now Paul expresses his confidence in Philemon's obedience—and more. Then, in a gesture that is now as much a stick as a carrot, Paul tells Philemon to prepare a room for him, because he hopes that through the church's prayers he will soon be able to visit them all (v. 22). This visit is ominous because it will bring a response to Philemon's handling of his debt to Paul. The price he will have to pay and the veiled point of Paul's appeal are identical.

In part, both the price and the point entail Philemon's receiving of his slave as a brother. But this begs the question of how Philemon can remain master over his newborn brother. That this question pervades the Letter is suggested by its cautious yet reckless rhetoric. And it is further suggested both by Paul's reference to Philemon doing "even more" than is "requested" of him, and by Paul's assertion that Onesimus is a brother "both in the flesh and in the Lord." Is the giving up of the worldly role of his brother's master a part of the price—and the appeal? Does Paul want him to free his slave? If not, Paul would have shaped his appeal differently, like the authors of Col. 3:22-4:1 and Eph. 6:5-9. Alternatively, if Philemon does not pay the price Paul expects, will he not pay another price in the loss of his status as a brother—and son of God? Philemon's choice is between being a master and being a son of God.

23-25, Close. The concluding greetings and blessings are again typical of Paul's Letters, although here the list of fellow workers sending their greetings also contributes to the pressure on Philemon for they are, as it were, witnesses.

THE GENERAL LETTERS TO THE CHURCHES

INTRODUCTION TO THE GENERAL LETTERS TO THE CHURCHES

---

P H E M E P E R K I N S

The Pauline Letters made the apostolic letter a mode of authoritative teaching in early Christianity. Of the remaining writings of the NT, some are genuine letters between two parties like 2 and 3 John. But a number of writings are not "letters" in that sense. They are sermons like Hebrews or general works of instruction like James or even heavenly revelations like Revelation. But the importance of the apostolic letter as a form of instruction is evident in these writings because they often include letterlike openings or closings, or employ themes that were developed in the Pauline letter tradition. For example, 2 Thess. 2:2 indicates that differences in interpreting apostolic teaching had to be resolved. A similar problem forms the "occasion" of writing in 2 Pet. 3:15–16. The author refers to the earlier "apostolic" letter 1 Peter (3:1). But 2 Peter is concerned with misinterpretation of Paul. This example shows that the authority of the Pauline Letters lies behind the writing of letters in the name of other apostles.

The importance of the "apostolic letter" was probably responsible for the inclusion in the canon of two brief letters from a teacher in the Johannine churches, who speaks of himself as "the elder" (2 John 1; 3 John 1). 1 John, a didactic treatise against a dissident group, is not cast as a "letter" at all. Nevertheless 1 John is commonly spoken of as a "letter." Some scholars think that it was sent along with 2 John, which contains specific instructions to exclude the dissidents from the community. Indirect influence of the letter genre may be detected in the emphasis upon writing to the addressees (e.g., 1 John 1:4; 2:12; 5:13).

Although the Pauline correspondence appears to have been the paradigm for apostolic letters, 2 and 3 John may be independent of its influence. A private letter, 3 John uses conventional formulas to express a wish for the "health" of the recipient (v. 2), while 2 John has a Christianized prayer for "grace, mercy, and peace" (v. 3). Its phrasing probably reflects the expectation that 2 John is to be read to the church as was the case with Pauline Letters. Both conclude with conventional expressions of the unsatisfactory character of written communication and the hope for a personal visit (2 John 12; 3 John 13–14). The Johannine Letters, like their Pauline counterparts, presuppose a situation in which churches sharing a common heritage are linked together by written communications from authoritative teachers in the tradition.

Previous page: Head of an angel; detail of a mosaic in the Church of St. Catherine, Sinai, sixth century.

Such letters were often carried by associates, whose faithfulness is attested by the author (3 John 12).

Unlike the Pauline tradition, the Johannine tradition appears to have kept the didactic treatise separate from the "letter." Paul had adapted the letter to serve as a vehicle of community instruction by substituting extensive thanksgivings for the conventional epistolary wishes for the health of the recipient. He cites from Scripture and traditional hymns and creeds and expands the body of the letter with theological and ethical instruction (→ Letter). Since the other writings in this group have used the "letter" as frame for didactic writing, the Pauline pattern appears to have been the decisive influence on their development. (See Introduction to the Pauline Letters.)

---

THE PAULINE PARADIGM

---

To see what the Pauline Letters have contributed to these works, we need to compare them with the pattern established in the Pauline letter tradition. The writings in this group lack the personal immediacy of the Pauline correspondence. Among the didactic works, only 1 Peter has all the parts of a typical letter: address and opening greeting (1:1–2); thanksgiving (1:3–9); body (1:10–5:11), which is divided into a theological reflection on Christian identity (1:10–2:10) and extensive ethical teaching (2:11–5:11); closing (5:12–14), which includes reference to a secretary and final greetings. These divisions correspond to the pattern established by the Pauline correspondence.

Another feature of Paul's Letters that survives only in the Petrine Letters is the use of "apostolic example" in exhortation. Paul links apostolic suffering with the example of Christ and calls upon his audience to "imitate" him (e.g., Phil. 3:12–17). 2 Peter, which is a "testament" (→ Testament), exhorts its readers to remember what they have learned after the author dies (1:12–15). 1 Pet. 5:1 links the author with the elders of the Christian community as a "fellow elder." 1 Peter emphasizes the example of the suffering of Christ as an example for Christians who must expect to suffer for their Christian faith (2:21–23; 3:17–18; 4:1–2, 13).

Although 1 and 2 Peter, James, and Jude are "pseudonymous" in the sense that they do not appear to have been composed by the apostles who are claimed as their author, they show none of the interest in expanding on the life or teaching of the fictive author that one finds elsewhere in pseudonymous writings (→ Apocryphal New Testament; Pseudepigrapha). 1, 2, 3 John and Revelation do not claim to be by a fictive author but were later all attributed to the apostle John (→ John the Apostle).

Address and Greeting

The Pauline address and greeting frequently attach the designation "apostle," often with further qualification, to the sender's name; other attributes may be attached to the naming of the addressees, and the greeting concludes by invoking grace and peace on the recipients. 1

Pet. 1:1–2 resembles this form. However, the addressees are not members of a specific community but the “exiles of the Diaspora in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia.” In other words, the Letter is a general one to Christians in Roman Asia Minor (see Color Map 12; → Provinces). Rev. 1:4 picks the seven churches in Asia as addressees. James 1:1 omits any specific geographical designation and simply refers to the “twelve tribes in the Diaspora.” It also uses a secular expression “greeting” rather than the “grace and peace” form. James has the title “servant/slave” instead of “apostle.” 2 Pet. 1:1 combines “apostle” and “servant” (also found in Rom. 1:1), but later 2 Peter speaks of the “apostles” as persons from the past (3:2). That Letter lacks any geographic designation. It is addressed to all believers. Jude 1 also speaks to all believers. The sender is identified as “servant” and as “brother of James.” Its greeting takes the form of a wish for “mercy, peace, and love.” Although not part of the epistolary introduction, Rev. 1:1 speaks of what is to follow as a revelation from God through Jesus, the revealing angel, and “his servant, John” to “his servants.” Thus the use of “servant” in these writings probably represents a common speech pattern in many of the churches of Asia Minor.

The greeting and address sections of these Letters do not create a fictive setting in which the “apostle” is presumed to be speaking. Instead, they show a desire to universalize apostolic teaching for all faithful believers. The situation is quite different in the nonepistolary treatise, 1 John. There the author seeks to establish himself and those who receive his teaching as the only legitimate heirs of a tradition that goes back to Jesus (1 John 1:1–5).

Thanksgiving

Most of the Pauline Letters contain a thanksgiving that echoes some of the themes in the Letter that follows. This part of the paradigm appears only in 1 Pet. 1:3–9. As in the Pauline examples, the thanksgiving concludes with a reference to the reward awaiting faithful Christians in the last days.

Body of the Letter

With the exception of 2 and 3 John, the “body” in each of these examples comprises material that has been cast as a didactic treatise, a sermonic exhortation, or an apocalypse. The personal references, requests, and commands typical of the letter are missing. Hebrews even claims to be a “discourse” (5:11; 6:1; 13:22). 2 Pet. 1:12–14 establishes what follows as the “testament” of the dying apostle. Rev. 1:1 speaks of the work as a “revelation” (→ Revelation). The “letter” forms a subsidiary section in which a heavenly message is directed from the Lord to the “angels” of the churches (Rev. 1:4–6; 1:9–3:22). These “messages” are prophetic warnings to the churches to remain faithful. The promises for those who are found faithful at the judgment are reflected in the visions of Revelation 19. Since Revelation uses symbolism from the letters later in the book, there is no reason to think that the epistolary section was ever independent of the apocalypse as a whole. The "letters" of Revelation are part of the "prophetic book" (22:6–19) and carry with them the aura of being "heavenly" letters rather than mere human communications. The nearest analogy to such a letter in the Pauline corpus is Galatians, which carries conditions of curse and blessing for its recipients.

In some cases the body of the Pauline Letter begins with a theological section, which is followed by exhortation directed to the community (e.g., Rom. 1–11; 12–15; Gal. 1–4; 5–6). Some of the treatises in this group follow a similar pattern. 1 Peter begins with a reflection on the significance of baptism for the new identity of Christians (1:10–2:10) and then turns to ethical instruction (2:11–5:11). Although most of the work is general exhortation, James concludes with rules for relationships within the community (5:12–20). A similar turn toward community rules is evident in the epilogue of 1 John (5:13–21). Similarly, Hebrews brings its discourse to a close with exhortation to the community (13:1–17). Jude 20–23 is a generalized example of such a conclusion.

Closing

The letter closing in the Pauline corpus includes a final benediction and greetings from the apostle and his associates (or the writer of the letter) to the addressees. Jude has a final doxology (vv. 24–25) but no greetings. A very brief expression of praise addressed to Christ concludes 2 Peter (3:18b). James lacks a formal closing. 1 Peter follows its doxology (5:11) with greetings from the writer of the letter, Silvanus (5:12), and an associate of the author, Mark (5:13). Both names could also refer to persons who had been part of the Pauline mission. A Mark is referred to in the conclusion of Philemon (v. 24; also Col. 4:10; → Mark). Silvanus (Silas) is mentioned as co-sender in 1 Thess. 1:1 (and 2 Thess. 1:1). He worked with Paul and Timothy at Corinth (2 Cor. 1:19) and is an important figure in the Pauline mission in Acts (15:22–41; 18:18; → Silas, Silvanus). Here these figures, presumably well known to the Christians in Asia Minor, are part of the church at Rome (the Babylon of 1 Pet. 5:13).

The claim that Hebrews is a letter rests solely on its conclusion. After a brief allusion to the possibility that the anonymous author might be "restored" to the addressees, which may be related to the travel plans at the conclusion of Pauline Letters (Heb. 13:18–19; cf. Philem. 22), a lengthy benediction (Heb. 13:20–21) is followed by a brief appeal and greetings (13:22–25). A familiar figure from the Pauline mission, Timothy, is mentioned as having been released (v. 23; → Timothy). The author links his return to the addressees with that of Timothy. The originating community is then identified vaguely as "those from Italy," perhaps referring to Christians outside Rome (v. 24). Although such allusions were later used to link this writing with Paul, the author views himself and his audience as members of a later generation (2:3–4). Some exegetes think that Heb. 13:22–25 was added to the discourse when it was copied for general circulation.

EXHORTATION

The occasion and content of each of these writings are treated in the commentaries in this volume. Here we turn to the type of moral exhortation found in these writings to see how it compares with patterns established in the Pauline tradition. Studies of the form and use of moral exhortation in Paul's Letters suggest seven areas of comparison: (1) indications of the tradition as one known to the audience; (2) type of material designated as known by the audience; (3) statements of general applicability such as expectations of suffering and the moralist's commonplace of "knowing and not doing"; (4) paradigms of virtue and vice; (5) indications of personal relationship such as teacher/student (father/son) or a sage about to die or depart; (6) refashioning of character through gaining control of passions or statements of motive for doing so; and (7) legitimation of a new "social world," a new vision of reality in which Christians live. This vision may be legitimated by appeal to the authority of law or Scripture or by contrast with other social groups.

Tradition as Known to the Audience

The addressees may be presumed to be familiar with the traditions of a writing either because they are generally accepted in the community, such as those from the OT, or have been previously taught by the author.

Hebrews warns its readers against "drifting away" (2:1). The moral commonplace of "babes" who still need milk, in contrast to the mature who can understand the more profound teaching of the writer, is another way of reminding the readers of what they should know (5:11-6:12). They are exhorted to persevere and to recover their initial enthusiasm (10:23-25, 32-39). The ethical exhortation in Hebrews reflects established community patterns, though the doctrinal reflections that explain the superiority of Christ the heavenly high priest seem to represent new teaching for the "mature."

1 John emphasizes the fact that both the doctrinal and ethical teaching of the author (1:1, 5; 2:7, 21-24; 3:11) correspond with what the community has known "from the beginning" (cf. 2 John 5). The dissidents are thus condemned as persons who have departed from the community and its tradition.

1 Peter opens with extensive allusions to the baptismal transformation of the recipients that is the basis of what is presumed to be known by the audience (1:18). 2 Peter has the author reminding the audience of what they have been taught (1:12-13; 3:1), teaching grounded in the revelation received at the transfiguration and in a true understanding of prophecy (1:16-21). As in 1 John, those who teach otherwise can only be destroying the tradition and themselves (2 Pet. 2:1-3, 10-21).

James joins proverblike sayings and discourse material in its exhortation. The proverbial form of much of the exhortation suggests that it is known to all persons as "wisdom." Questions used to introduce sayings perform a similar function (e.g., 2:5, 25; 3:12; 4:1, 4).

Jude enlists the audience in the struggle for a common faith (vv. 3, 5, 17) that could be perverted by the false teaching and passion-ridden life of those who neglect it (vv. 4, 6, 12–13, 15–16, 19).

Revelation also exhorts its audience to “remember” a faithfulness and love that was in danger of being lost (Rev. 2:5, 13, 19 [despite greater love in the present, the teaching of a false prophetess could destroy the community]; 3:1–3, 15).

Types of Tradition That Are “Known”

All of the NT authors invoke passages from the OT as traditional hortatory material. Jude introduces warnings from Jewish Pseudepigrapha (1 Enoch in vv. 6–15 and As. Mos. in v. 9). 2 Peter incorporates much of Jude in its apocalyptic affirmation of judgment, though the author may change the application of particular examples, omit particular parts of an example, or shift the order to coincide with the OT (cf. Jude 6–12 and 2 Pet. 2:1–17).

Other traditional material includes ethical and philosophic commonplaces from Hellenistic, Jewish, and popular philosophic preaching. Hebrews combines the fiery image of apocalyptic judgment with the platonizing vision of the true heavenly sanctuary in which nothing can be shaken (e.g., 12:18–29). The characterization of God in James 1:17 points toward a similar background, as do the references to the cycle of nature and the paradox of human ability to tame animals while unable to master passion in 3:6–8. 1 Pet. 2:18–3:7 represents Christian adaptation of the ethos of the “household code” (cf. Col. 3:18–4:1; Eph. 5:21–6:9). 2 Peter opens with a lengthy salutation cast in the terminology of Hellenistic moral teaching (1:3–11). The description of the true prophetic word inspired and properly understood through operations of the divine Spirit acting like a lamp or morning star of 2 Pet. 1:19–21 has parallels in Philo (On Noah's Work as a Planter 117; Change of Names 203; Who Is the Heir of Divine Things? 89; 259).

2 Peter adapted material from Jude without designating it as such. 2 Pet. 3:15–16 indicates that Paul's letters enjoyed authoritative status within the community. And 2 Pet. 3:1 shows that 1 Peter was also known to the addressees. Some exegetes find the references to the transfiguration (2 Pet. 1:16–18) an indication that written gospel traditions also belonged to the authoritative tradition of the community. 1 Pet. 3:18–22 speaks of the story of Jesus as the foundation for the Christian willingness to suffer. Hebrews also contains allusions to the story of Jesus' suffering and exaltation (5:7–9; 13:12–13). Although both authors could be dependent upon oral tradition, their way of speaking about Jesus' exemplary life suggests some underlying narrative account of Jesus' suffering and not merely a reference to formulas used in preaching. The testimony of “Spirit, water, and blood” in 1 John 5:6–8 may be linked to the addition of “blood and water” to that community's passion story in John 19:34–35.

James contains a number of parallels to sayings of Jesus, though they are never designated as such (e.g., James 1:5 and Matt. 7:7; James 1:17 and Matt. 7:11; James 2:5 and Matt. 5:3, 5; 11:5; James 2:8 and Matt.

22:39–40; James 4:3 and Matt. 7:7–8; James 12:39; 5:12 and Matt. 5:34–37). James never invokes Jesus in its exhortation.

General Moral Commonplaces

James employs the ethical commonplace of knowing and not doing (1:22–27; 2:14–17; 3:1, 13; 4:17). But by far the most pervasive commonplace in this group of writings is the need for Christians to endure or persevere. Endurance may be required because of sufferings to which the community is subjected as in 1 Peter (e.g., 1:5–9; 4:1–6, 12–13, 16–18; 5:6–10). But it is also the requirement of an ongoing life of holiness in this world (James 1:2–4, 12–15; 5:7–11; Heb. 12:1–10), which has to be revived when a community has lost its initial enthusiasm.

Paradigms of Virtue and Vice

We have already seen that 1 Peter and Hebrews use the suffering of Christ as an example for the Christian life. The “victory” sayings in Revelation (2:7, 11, 17, 26–28; 3:5, 12, 21) not only direct readers to the visions of final fulfillment at the end of the book; they also recall the opening vision of the glorious Son of man as the one who has conquered death (1:5, 17). OT figures are extensively used as examples in exhortation. They appear in all the writings of this group except 2 and 3 John, which are private letters (e.g., Heb. 11; James 2:21–25; 5:11; 1 Pet. 3:5–6; 2 Pet. 2:5–10; 1 John 3:12–15; Jude 5–7, 11; Rev. 2:14, 20).

Language of Personal Relationship

While asymmetrical relationships such as teacher/student or parent/child are the common pattern in hortatory discourse, these writings almost always use the language of parity, of common standing between the author and addressees. References to the addressees as “brothers” or “beloved” predominate. 1 John also employs the language of “children,” which had apparently become a common community designation in the Johannine churches (e.g., 3:1–2; 2:12–14, 18, 28). The father in relation to whom the Johannine Christians are “children” is God, not the author of the Letter (e.g., 1 John 2:21–25). The author of 1 Peter is a “fellow elder” to the elders of the community (5:1). 2 Peter writes to those who have received a “faith equal to ours” (1:1) and Jude to those who share a common faith and salvation (v. 3) and who also look back to the “predictions of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ” (v. 17). The prophet of Revelation is one who has shared with his fellow Christians suffering, the kingdom, and endurance (1:9). Thus, the primary relationship that governs exhortation in these writings is the mutual instruction of “beloved brothers,” “children of God,” partners in a common faith and hope. It is not grounded in a disparity of age, education, or office. Nor do we find even that “apostolic authority” that Paul sometimes invokes in his letters (e.g. 1 Cor. 4:14–21; 2 Cor. 13:10).

Refashioning Character

The persistent emphasis upon controlling the passions links Christian moral exhortation to the concern with reshaping the behavior and character of persons (e.g., James 4:1–12; 2 Pet. 1:4). The exhortations to mutual love also fall in this category (e.g., James 2:8–17; 4:11–12; 5:9; Heb. 13:1–2; 1 Pet. 4:8; 2 Pet. 1:7; 1 John 2:7–11; 3:11–18; 2 John 5; 3 John 5–6; Rev. 2:19). The most extensive imagery of reshaping character appears in 1 Peter, since the author stresses the radical transition from death, disobedience, slavery to passion, impurity, and the like to their opposites through the addressees' "rebirth" as Christians (e.g., 1:2–4, 14, 18–23; 4:6; 2:10).

Legitimizing a Social World

The emphasis on reversal in 1 Peter is correlated with the expectation that the mere fact of being identified as a Christian could lead to scorn, harassment, or persecution from neighbors or former associates. Christians must maintain exemplary conduct (e.g., 1 Pet. 2:12; 3:13–16; 4:3–5, 16). Opposition from outsiders may have helped to solidify the boundaries of the Christian community. Hebrews suggests that its audience had more enthusiasm in the early days that required suffering and sacrifice than it does at present (Heb. 10:32–39). It is not clear whether the Letter's doctrinal argument for the superiority of Christ's sacrifice over Jewish worship is also directed at legitimating its vision of Christian salvation against the influence of Christians maintaining close ties with Judaism (e.g., 13:9–16). James does not link the general "trials" suffered by Christians with any particular group. Discrepancies between wealth and poverty create problems within the community (e.g., James 1:9–11; 2:1–7; 4:13–17) as well as from without (2:6–7; 5:1–6).

1 John (also 2 John) and 2 Peter confront a different problem of legitimation: division within the Christian community. In 1 John, the author writes against the Christological teaching and ethical perfectionism of a dissident group that has separated itself from the communities to which his addressees belong (e.g., 2:18–25; 4:1–6). The love command that shapes the ethical tradition of the community is invoked to show that such persons must be "children of the devil" (1 John 3:1–10). Despite their claims, they have no share in the salvation that comes to those who remain in fellowship with the author. 2 Peter castigates as false prophets persons who deny the traditional preaching about the judgment (2:1–3; 3:1–5). They are still within the community to which he writes and make their case by appeal to Paul's letters. Although Jude 4 refers to some who have gained admission to the community and who would destroy the faith, the tract is so general in its condemnation that it may not have any particular group in mind. The concluding exhortation simply takes the division between "worldly people, devoid of Spirit" and Christians as an occasion to remind the audience not to weaken its efforts toward holiness (Jude 17–23).

Revelation suggests problems of legitimation that stem from pressures within and outside of the community. In addition to those who have lost their initial fervor, the letters refer to false prophets (Rev. 2:12–29) and condemn some who “claim to be Jews but are not” (2:9; 3:9). From outside, the churches face the possibility of persecution (1:9, the visionary has been exiled; 2:10, 13). The issue of wealth and accommodation to the mores of the larger society is raised in connection with the church at Laodicea (Rev. 3:15–18). Revelation 18 contains a condemnation of the wealth from the east on which Rome had built its empire. The visions of the beast suggest that some Christians stood to suffer economic loss and persecution because they would not participate in the social forms of ruler worship (Rev. 13:3, 8, 12, 16–17). Some scholars have suggested that these various pressures represent a single crisis: the possibility that Christians would accommodate their behavior to the larger pagan culture to avoid economic loss, persecution, and in some cases death. The intensity of the argument in Revelation against accommodation suggests that the false prophets may have provided a rationale for doing so. Traditions like 1 Pet. 2:13–17 circulated in Asia Minor. They taught Christians to be subject to human institutions and to honor the emperor. (1 Peter assumes that Christians will still face hostility from outsiders.) But Revelation sees such accommodation as a satanic plot that will lose the community its salvation.

With varying degrees of intensity the expectation of divine judgment plays an important role in legitimating the worldview of the churches. Christians find themselves a minority whose views are in opposition to the larger world. The expected reversal at the judgment is more than a reward for good behavior. It represents a “remaking” of the order of things according to the Christian vision. Consequently, while judgment language may simply serve to remind the audience to remain faithful in Hebrews and James, it plays an important role in reasserting the community of the persecuted Christian minority in 1 Peter and Revelation. For 1 John it provides an explanation for the divisions that have arisen within the church: they are manifestations of the “Antichrist.” Jude and 2 Peter suggest that “delay of the Parousia [the second coming of Christ]” is just as much a threat to the foundations of the community as persecution. In very different ways, then, these writings show us the churches of Asia Minor struggling to maintain their traditions and shape Christian identity at the end of the first century.

INTRODUCTION

The work known as the Letter to the Hebrews was not originally a letter; nor were its addressees likely to have been "Hebrews." Though often thought to be Paul, the identity of the author is unknown. The opinion that it was a Pauline composition was held in Alexandria from the second century on, although prominent figures such as Origen recognized difficulties with that attribution. His remark that "only God knows" who really wrote the piece is often cited. In the Latin West there were, at first, doubts about Pauline authorship. Tertullian, for instance, considered Barnabas the author. By the fourth century the Eastern opinion came to be accepted in the West, and Pauline authorship remained unquestioned until the Renaissance and Reformation, when stylistic considerations again caused doubts. Luther, and many scholars since, suggested Apollos as the author. Numerous other candidates have been advanced, including Prisca and Aquila, Silas, and Jude. None is satisfactory, and Origen's judgment is fully warranted.

The general range within which Hebrews was written runs from about A.D. 60 to about 95. The earlier date is suggested by the author's reference to himself and his community as second-generation Christians (2:3-4). The advanced state of the traditions used in the text, especially its Christology (the way it identifies Jesus), also presupposes some time for development. Few critics date Hebrews any earlier than 60. The upper end of the date range is often anchored in the use of Hebrews by 1 Clement. Although that use is at times doubted, it is obvious, especially in 1 Clement 36. That letter from the leadership of the Roman church to Corinth is normally dated to A.D. 95-96, although that date is hardly secure, and the work could have been written any time between A.D. 75 and 120. This provides an upper end for the date of Hebrews of about A.D. 110.

The range might be compressed further by internal considerations. Many critics argue that Hebrews was written prior to A.D. 70 because it refers to the Jewish temple worship as a present reality and does not mention the destruction of the Temple, but neither argument is probative. Both Jewish and Christian authors writing after 70 refer to the Temple in present terms. More important, Hebrews is not interested in the actual cult of the Herodian Temple but in the depiction of the cult of the desert tabernacle. The author uses that scriptural picture as part of his constructive Christology, not as an apologist or polemicist, and the basis of his argument is exegesis, not history.

The reference to Timothy in 13:23, if to Paul's collaborator, could push the upper end of the date range down to the midnineties, since it is unlikely that Timothy would have been alive, well, and ready to travel much later.

The genre of the work is problematic because it ends with standard epistolary formulas but lacks an initial address and greetings. Components of the text exhibit significant formal patterns useful for determining the overall genre. A section such as 3:1-4:13 is a virtually self-contained homily, with an introduction (3:1-6), citation of Scripture (3:7-11), exposition leading up to an exhortation (3:12-4:11), and conclusion with a rhetorical flourish (4:12-13). The same pattern prevails in 8:1-10:18. An introduction sets certain themes (8:1-6). A scriptural quotation introduces certain complementary notions (8:7-13). A complex comment on these themes follows (9:1-10:10). A reprise of the lesson, referring back to the scriptural text, concludes the section (10:11-18). Elements of this sermonlike pattern are found in other parts of the Letter as well, but they are most obvious in these chapters. The document as a whole is as much a scripturally based homily as are its component parts, and its self-description as a "word of exhortation" (13:22) is apt. The conclusion suggests that the exhortation was sent to a congregation at some distance from its author.

The designation of the addressees as "Hebrews" seems to be a later scribal inference based on the contents of the text. Many commentators, both patristic and modern, have followed the title's lead, assuming that, because of its concern with Jewish institutions and traditions, the work was addressed to Jews or to Jewish Christians. Identification of the addressees is correlated with hypotheses about the aims of the text. If written to Jews, Hebrews might be designed as an invitation to accept the Christian confession. If to Jewish Christians, it might aim to prevent a relapse to the ancestral religion. Both construals of the addressees and the aim of the work have been defended, but neither is persuasive. The obvious familiarity with Jewish institutions and exegetical traditions is indicative of the author's background but says little about his audience. Other Jewish Christians, such as Paul, address predominantly gentile communities, e.g., Galatia and Corinth, with sophisticated exegetical arguments and appeals to Jewish traditions. The intended audience of this text may also have been gentile.

While the ethnic origin of the intended readers is unclear, Hebrews does give some data about them. They had been Christians for some time (5:12) and, because of that commitment, had experienced persecution (10:32-34), which is expected to continue (12:3-13; 13:3). Part of Hebrews' function is to inspire the faithful endurance necessary to meet such threats. Of equal importance, the community seems to be undergoing a crisis of confidence. Some have been neglecting the community assembly (10:25). Such behavior may be a reaction to outside threats or even to the attractions of traditional Judaism, but it could equally well derive from a waning enthusiasm with complex causes. It is also not clear how well informed our author was about these causes. He senses, however, the possibility of apostasy and wants to prevent it by rekindling faith.

The attempt to rekindle the faith of a community faced with pressure from its environment and with internal fatigue is conducted in two ways. The author appeals directly to the addressees in a series of warnings (6:4-12; 10:26-31; 12:15-16) and exhortations. The thrust of these exhortations is summarized in 4:14-15. The addressees are urged to hold what they have, especially their "confession" of Christ. They are also called to movement of various kinds. At times the movement, based on cultic imagery, is one of approach to God (4:16; 10:19-22). At other times it is movement onward (6:1) or outward (11:15; 13:13) to the world in loving service. Such hortatory imagery is concretized in the appeals to specific virtues, especially to fidelity (chap. 11) and endurance (12:1-13).

The hortatory or parenetic program of Hebrews is grounded in Christological exposition. The author begins with traditional affirmations in chaps. 1 and 2, introduces in 5:6-10 an exegetical base for further reflection by his fresh interpretation of a text, then proceeds in the central expository section (7:1-10:18) to develop a new presentation of Christ's person and work. That presentation affirms both the heavenly character and full humanity of the Son. At the same time, it shows how his sacrificial death is existentially relevant for the addressees because it inaugurated a new covenantal relationship with God. It is the virtues of that covenant relationship that the addressees are called upon to display. They are assured that they can be faithful and hopeful, for Christ is their example and his exaltation is a surety for their own.

COMMENTARY

1:1-4

Exordium

The first four verses of Hebrews constitute a single complex or periodic sentence, a structure favored in artistic Greek prose. The sentence is embellished with many figures of speech, such as alliteration, assonance, and chiasm, which are characteristic of Hebrews' rhetorical artistry.

The function of an exordium is to encapsulate the major themes of a work, and these verses succeed admirably. Verses 1 and 2 highlight the theme of God's speech, and Hebrews will constantly revert to God's word in Scripture as the foundation and source of its theological reflection. At the same time, that scriptural word must be understood in the light of God's speech "in these last days," "through a Son," and belief in Christ regularly provides the framework for interpretation of scriptural texts. The contrast in these verses between prophets and Son also indicates the sort of argumentation dominating Hebrews that will regularly compare old and new divine dispensations and argue that the new is absolutely superior to the old.

While vv. 1-2 indicate something of the form of what is to come, v. 3 gives an important indication of its content. With its balanced clauses, participial style, and semitizing Greek, the verse has plausibly been identified as a fragment of a hymn celebrating Christ's preexistence, incarnation, and exaltation much like Phil. 2:6-11 or Col. 1:15-18. As in those hymns, the Christological pattern derives from the Jewish wisdom tradition, a derivation confirmed by the quotation of images ("effulgence of his glory and imprint of his being") drawn from Wisd. of Sol. 7:25. The hymn closes with an allusion ("he took a seat at the right hand") to Ps. 110:1, a key text for early Christian descriptions of the exaltation of Christ and an important text for the whole of Hebrews.

The imagery of the transitional Heb. 1:4, portraying Christ as superior to the angels and having a special name, is a standard part of exaltation scenes (Phil. 2:10-11; Eph. 1:20-22; 1 Pet. 3:22). Mention of the angels also serves as a sort of rubric superficially uniting the next two chapters.

1:5-2:18

Christ Exalted and Humiliated

The first major movement of the text reemphasizes traditional affirmations about Christ. It does so in two neatly balanced and formally distinct halves, separated by a brief exhortation.

1:5-14

A Scriptural Catena

Catenas ("chains") or florilegia ("bouquets") of scriptural texts testifying to a certain belief are known from first-century Jewish sources. Christians too apparently made such collections to support their belief that Jesus was the Messiah. Hebrews incorporates one such collection, perhaps with some modifications. Some of the texts cited here, such as Ps. 2:7 in Heb. 1:5 or Ps. 110:1 in Heb. 1:13, appear elsewhere as testimonies to Christ's exaltation. Others, such as Ps. 45:6-7 in Heb. 1:8-9 and Ps. 102:25-27 in Heb. 1:10-12, are unique to this collection. Many of these texts are originally royal psalms, celebrating the coronation (Pss. 2, 110) or the royal virtues (Ps. 45) of an Israelite king. Taken from context, they are understood to be oracles addressed to Christ. In the original catena, all of the texts were probably taken to refer to the exaltation. Our author apparently construed them within the framework of the Christology of the preexistent Christ, as the reference to the "introduction of the first-born into the world" in Heb. 1:6 suggests. However the catena's Christological story was construed, it functions as a whole to highlight the heavenly character of Christ, to the point that a scriptural address to God is understood of Christ (vv. 8-9). Because of his status as Son, Christ is superior to the angels.

2:1-4

A Parenetic Interlude

The first hortatory passage draws an a fortiori inference from Christ's superiority over the angels. If the message that they helped to deliver needed to be taken seriously, how much more so ought the addressees heed the message delivered by the Son. Elaborate theories about the aims of Hebrews have been unnecessarily developed on the basis of the comparison with angels. The comparison, based on the traditional exaltation schema, serves the immediate function of grounding this appeal to heed the salvific message, while, in the Christological development, it dramatically affirms the heavenly dimension of Christ. Apart from the allusion to angels at 2:16, which serves to structure the work, the angels largely disappear from the text.

2:5-18

Humiliation Before Exaltation

The second half of the first movement in the text strongly affirms the reality of the Son's incarnation. The argument proceeds in two segments, an exegesis of a psalm, then a more imagistic presentation of Christ's salvific action.

2:5-9, Exposition of Psalm 8:4-6. The psalm is superficially linked to the previous discussion of Christ and angels with the note (v. 5) that eschatological (end-time) sovereignty is granted to someone other than angels. The text is introduced with an indefinite allusion to its speaker, common in first-century exegetical works. The psalm originally celebrated the glorious status of human beings, made "little lower than the angels" and for that reason "crowned with honor and glory." Our author takes the "man" and "son of man" not as references to humanity generally, but as a cipher for Christ. Whether he did so on the basis of some "Son of man" or "New Adam" Christology is irrelevant. Then, in his exegetical comment (vv. 8b-9), he drives a wedge between what had originally been clauses in synonymous parallelism and takes the "subjection below angels" as a reference to Christ's incarnation and death, which preceded his "coronation" or exaltation.

2:10-18, Reflection on the Incarnation.

Another bit of probably traditional Christological speculation emphasizes both the reality of Christ's humanity and the salvific purpose of his Passion. The imagery throughout is striking. God, in drawing many of his children to heavenly glory, "perfects" the one who leads them on their way to salvation (v. 10). That perfection is achieved through suffering (v. 10) and through doing battle with the diabolical forces that hold sway over death (v. 14). Salvation involves, first of all, liberation from the fear of death (v. 15) by one who "grabs hold of" human beings (v. 16). Such imagery stems from Greco-Roman heroic myths describing the descent into Hades of figures such as Heracles, who released death's captives and led them back to life. These ancient myths were reinterpreted in philosophical and literary sources as paradigms of liberation from the fear of death. The early affirmation of Christ's exaltation has obviously been reinterpreted in an environment where such myths and their interpretations were current.

In this pericope, the author modifies the traditional mythologically tinged portrait of Christ's salvific action by suggesting that the incarnation has a specifically ecclesial focus and that salvation is the result of divine election, not simply the natural affinity of savior and saved hinted at in v. 11. In vv. 12-13, he cites Ps. 22:22 and Isa. 8:17-18 as sayings of the incarnate Christ, who thus professes his intent to announce God's name in the "midst of the assembly [or church]" and who displays his faith or trust in God along with "the children God has given" him.

The pericope, and the first major movement of Hebrews, concludes (vv. 17-18) with a summary about Jesus, using for the first time in the text the title of high priest. Within the NT this title is used of Christ only in Hebrews, but it was probably not our author's invention. Like virtually everything else in the first two chapters, it is probably part of the Christological tradition of the community addressed. The attributes of Christ as high priest, faithful and merciful (v. 17), as well as the portrait of his activity, aiding those who are undergoing the trials he himself had to face (v. 18), are also probably parts of a traditional portrait. A large part of the author's Christological creativity will consist in emphasizing a different dimension of Christ's priesthood.

3:1-5:10

Faith and the Merciful High Priest

The next major movement of Hebrews falls into two halves, each of which develops a motif drawn from the epithets of Christ in 2:17. The first segment (3:1-4:13) consists of a self-contained, exegetical homily warning against faithlessness. While chaps. 1 and 2 laid the groundwork for the doctrinal development of Hebrews, this homily prepares for the fuller parennetic treatment of faith in chap. 11. The second half of this movement (4:14-5:10) returns to the Christological theme, reinforcing the perspective of chap. 2 but introducing a new element, Ps. 110:4, which will form the basis of the subsequent Christological exposition.

3:1-11

Introduction and Scriptural Citation

The author introduces his homily with a comparison between Christ and Moses. As in the comparison between Christ and the angels, there is no hint of polemic. The comparison again shows the superlative status of Christ, even more faithful than the greatest hero of ancient Israel. At the same time, it prepares for the content of the exegetical homily, which will focus on the generation of Israelites led by Moses. The superiority of Christ to Moses is demonstrated from Scripture. The fact that Moses was "faithful" is derived from Num. 12:7, alluded to in Heb. 2:2. That text had spoken of Moses being faithful in God's "house" or "household." That term introduces an illustrative analogy (vv. 3-4) to the effect that a builder is greater than the house he constructs, and God is the builder of all. The last phrase evokes the Christology of the exordium without explicitly identifying Christ and God. The argument proceeds (v. 5) exegetically. According to Num. 12:7, Moses is a faithful "servant," clearly an honorific epithet. Hebrews, however, using a technique similar to that of 2:5-9, reverses the significance of the epithet and uses it to contrast Moses with Christ, who, as Son, is "over" not "in" God's house and is, therefore, superior to Moses, the servant.

Hebrews moves to parenthesis by playing (v. 6) on the term "house(hold)." The addressees are members of the house over which Christ presides, but that membership is conditional, dependent on maintaining "boldness" and "hope's boast." Both motifs will recur in later exhortations.

The homily will focus on Ps. 95:7-11, introduced, as are several other scriptural citations, with reference to the Holy Spirit (Heb. 3:7). The text (vv. 7-11) follows fairly closely the Septuagint (LXX) version of the psalm.

3:12-4:11

Exposition of Psalm 95

The exposition falls into three distinct segments, each of which cites a verse of the psalm and appeals to other scriptural texts or data for interpretive help. The first segment (3:12-19) warns against faithless disobedience. The second (4:1-5) redefines a key term in the psalm. The last (4:6-11) makes a parennetic application.

3:12-19, A Warning Example. The appeal to the Israelites of the desert generation as a warning example is common in Jewish homiletics and is paralleled in Paul's admonition in 1 Corinthians 10. The beginning (Heb. 3:12) and ending (v. 19) of this section indicate that the object of the warning is "faithlessness." The author urges his audience to actualize the psalm's call by encouraging one another (v. 13) in their own "today." The content of their encouragement follows after a parenthetical remark (v. 14) and consists in the call not to have hard hearts (v. 15).

The exposition initially hinges on several wordplays. Faithlessness (Gk. apistia) is linked first (v. 12) with "apostasy" (apostēnai). Then both are contrasted with what the addressed are parenthetically (v. 14) urged to maintain, their "initial reality" (hypostasis). That term, which appears here in 1:3, and in 11:1, is often mistranslated. The philosophical connotations, obvious in 1:3, are probably operative here as well, although somewhat paradoxically; for how can reality have a beginning? That seeming paradox is at the heart of the subtle conceptual play that our author will make in his central exposition (7:1-10:18).

The exposition proceeds (vv. 16-18) with a portrait of the failure of the Israelites drawn largely from Numbers 14, stressing the connection of sin (Heb. 3:17), disobedience (v. 18), and faithlessness (v. 19). The warning, however, remains on a general level. At the same time, the author notes the fact, implied by the psalm, that the desert generation, because of its failure, could not enter God's "rest" or "resting place."

4:1-5, The Nature of the Rest. On the presumption that the psalm is addressed to the "today" of the audience, its implicit promise of a "rest" must remain open (v. 1) and available for those who, unlike the ancient Israelites (v. 2), have faithfully heard God's word (v. 3). The next exegetical move is to explain how such a rest is possible. The move is necessary because the term "rest" in the psalm referred to the "resting place" of Canaan, the goal of the wandering Israelites. Hebrews interprets by use of an argument known in rabbinic exegesis as a gezera shawa (Heb.), wherein a word in one text is explained by its obvious meaning in another. The argument in vv. 3-5, which works only on the basis of the Greek OT, stipulates that the meaning of "rest" in Psalm 95 is given by the use of a similar word, "[God] rested," in Gen. 2:2. There "rest" refers to the place or state that God entered after completing the works of creation. The same heavenly "rest" awaits faithful Christians.

4:6-11, The Contemporary Call. The promise to obtain a share in God's "rest" was not fulfilled in the conquest of Canaan under Joshua. Otherwise, Hebrews argues, David, the presumed author of the psalm, would not have spoken in his day of a possibility of entering God's "rest." That possibility is now defined with the evocative term "Sabbath festivity" (v. 9) because it is a share in the condition of the primordial Sabbath. The exposition concludes with a summons to strive to participate in this heavenly salvation by avoiding the failure of the Exodus generation (v. 11).

A Rhapsody on God's Word

The homily had demonstrated the contemporary relevance of one segment of God's ancient speech. A rhetorical flourish highlights the point with vivid imagery. God's speech is compared to a sword that can pierce the innermost depths of the human person (v. 12). That piercing has a discerning or judgmental function and the note of judgment is reemphasized as the imagery shifts (v. 13). Before God's word nothing is hidden, but all is "naked and laid bare." This rare term probably evokes the image of a sacrificial victim whose neck is bared to the priest's knife. "God's word" here means God himself, by metonymy—as when we say "the White House" meaning the President or "the Throne" meaning the Queen. The flourish concludes on an ambiguous note, in a phrase meaning either "our discourse is about him" or "to him we have to render an account." Such ambiguity is typical of our author and the ominous note of the second sense prepares for some of his stern warnings.

4:14-16

Transitional Parenesis

The author draws implications from the preceding exposition, many themes of which find echoes here. At the same time he prepares for what follows. Particularly worthy of note are the two elements of the parenesis. The addressees are urged to "hold fast" to their confession, an element of which was, no doubt, the affirmation of "Jesus, the son of God" (v. 14). They are also urged to "approach," a term probably drawn from the cultic sphere, to the "throne," where they can find mercy and help from a sympathetic high priest (vv. 15-16).

5:1-10

The Sympathetic High Priest

5:1-4, High-Priestly Qualifications. The development of the high priest Christology proceeds with a brief reflection on the qualifications for ordinary human high priests. They serve as mediators between God and humanity by offering sacrifices for sins (5:1). They "moderate their emotions" toward those who sin in ignorance, since they themselves are beset with weakness (v. 2) and must offer sacrifices for themselves as well as the people (v. 3). Finally, they are "called by God," as was the first high priest, Aaron. These idealized qualifications are shaped by what the author knows of his true high priest and are designed to intimate both similarities and differences, many of which will become apparent only as the exposition develops.

5:5-10, Christ as High Priest. The author first (vv. 5-6) applies to Christ the notion of the divine election, noting that the one who called him Son, in the words of Ps. 2:7, also addressed to him Ps. 110:4, "You are a priest forever, according to the order of Melchizedek." Ps. 2:7, cited in Heb. 1:5, is a common early Christian exaltation text, as is the first verse of Psalm 110, cited in Heb. 1:13. Ps. 110:4, however, is not cited elsewhere in early Christian sources independent of Hebrews. Its use by our author is no doubt part of his creative reinterpretation of Christological traditions and is the foundation of the exposition in chap. 7.

The final verses of the pericope reemphasize the full humanity of the true high priest by virtue of which he can be the sympathetic heavenly intercessor. Heb. 5:7 portrays Christ in anguished prayer, being heard by God because of his "reverence," or "godly fear." The portrait is vaguely reminiscent of Gethsemane but cannot be a simple allusion to the Gospel accounts since there Christ's request that the "cup pass from him" is not granted. The portrait rather relies on qualities of pious prayer, as developed in the Psalms and in contemporary Jewish sources. Coupled with that portrait is a proverbial expression (v. 8), long familiar to the Greek tradition, that one learns from suffering. What Christ learns is obedience, not because he was disobedient, but because learning had a saving function. That function is vaguely intimated in the language of v. 9. Through his educative suffering, Christ was "perfected" as a "cause of eternal salvation." The central chapters will give these lapidary formulas more definite content. The pericope closes with the novel language of the "priesthood according to Melchizedek."

Preliminary Exhortation

The author dramatically delays the development of his novel Christological insights and turns to exhortation. He first challenges his addressees to follow his "difficult discourse" (5:11-6:3); then offers balanced words of warning and encouragement (6:4-12); and finally undergirds the encouragement with a reflection on the certainty of God's promises (6:13-19).

5:11-6:3

A Challenge to the Addressees

With provocative irony the author tells his addressees that they are not ready for his advanced teaching but are "sluggish in their hearing" (5:11). To push his point he deploys commonplace Hellenistic educational images (vv. 12-14), used with their normal metaphorical referents as a new metaphor for Christian doctrine. The addressees are like babes who can only take the milk of rudimentary education, here symbolizing basic exegesis (5:12) and elementary catechesis (6:1-2). They are not yet adults who can digest the solid food of ethical doctrine (5:13); they have not yet engaged in the rigorous athletic exercise of ethical discernment (5:14). That stage of advanced learning symbolizes the author's own "difficult discourse" (5:11).

The ironic quality of the challenge is apparent in the summons (6:1) not to rehearse basic Christian teaching, elements of which are enumerated in vv. 1-2, but to move on to "maturity." The author promises such movement "with God's assistance" (v. 3).

6:4-12

Warning and Encouragement

6:4-6, The Warning. The first of Hebrews' three major monitory passages is its most stern. A series of common images for religious experience recalls the conversion to a new life (vv. 4-5). These images contrast with the action of apostasy, depicted as crucifying and mocking the Son of God (v. 6). Our author declares the impossibility of "renewing unto repentance" those who have had the experience of the spirit and then fallen away. Many unconvincing attempts have been made to ameliorate the severity of the warning. Like many other early Christians, our author is a rigorist who does not maintain the possibility of repentance for apostasy. He does not, however, accuse his addressees of the sin but intimates that, if they do not "progress toward maturity," they could be heading toward danger.

6:7-8, An Illustration. Between warning and encouragement comes a brief agricultural image contrasting a fruitful field blessed by God (v. 7) with a field of thorns and thistles destined to be burned (v. 8). The images relate, in inverse or chiasmic order, to the hypothetical situation of apostates and his addressees. The fire to which the second field is destined is, at the level of the image, a farmer's clearing technique, but it conjures up ominous scenes of eschatological punishment.

6:9-12, Encouragement. The hypothetical character of the warning now becomes clear. The author believes that the positive part of his illustration, which "pertains to salvation," applies to his addressees (v. 9). He recalls, in a general way, their service and love (v. 10) and exhorts them to maintain their hope (v. 11). In chap. 10 he will give more details of their previous behavior. Now he simply notes that he encourages them so that they will not be what he had ironically called them at 5:11, "sluggish." Instead, they will display the faith and endurance of those who inherited the promises of old (v. 12).

God's Promise and Oath

The importance of hope and the certainty that grounds it has been a subordinate theme running through Hebrews. It achieves somewhat clearer profile in this brief scriptural meditation that supports the preceding word of encouragement. The argument relies on common Jewish traditions about the immutability of God's promises and the significance of his scriptural oaths. The whole pericope prepares for discussion in 7:20-25 of the oath that supports God's designation of a priest "according to the order of Melchizedek."

The reflection begins (vv. 13-14) with a reference to God's oath to Abraham in Gen. 22:16-17, then uses a human analogy to indicate the function of the oath, to provide extra certainty to human recipients of a promise (vv. 16-17). Encouraged by "two unchangeable things," presumably God's unspecified promise and his confirming oath, the addressees can hold on to hope (v. 18).

The whole parenetic pericope concludes, as it had begun in 5:11-14, with an oddly mixed metaphor. Hope is likened, as commonly in Greek literature, to an anchor (v. 19), but the anchor is not only an image of stability. It also "enters within the veil." The metaphor for hope is thus affected by the ultimate source on which hope is based, Jesus, the "forerunner." The abruptly introduced image of the veil, which separates the inner and outer sanctuaries of the tabernacle, prepares for the imagery that will dominate chaps. 8-10. The author picks up the thread of the Christological development with another allusion to Ps. 110:4.

The Exposition on Christ as High Priest

The central movement of Hebrews falls into two balanced segments. The first (7:1-28) explores the significance of Ps. 110:4 and ultimately reaffirms in a striking way the emphasis of Hebrews 1 on the heavenly quality of Christ. The second (8:1-10:19) both reaffirms the reality of the incarnation, as in chap. 2, and indicates how Christ's high-priestly act is, and must be, at once heavenly and earthly.

7:1-28

Christ and Melchizedek

Formally, the chapter constitutes an exegetical discussion of Ps. 110:4 based upon the only other OT text that mentions Melchizedek, Gen. 14:17-20. This exegesis, emphasizing the heavenly character of Christ's priesthood, may have been inspired by the abundant contemporary speculation on Melchizedek as a heavenly figure, examples of which are found in the Alexandrian Jewish writer Philo, at Qumran, and in Gnostic sources. Whatever the inspiration, Hebrews is quite restrained in its comments on Melchizedek, utilizing only what is necessary to make the Christological point.

7:1-3, Introduction. The exposition begins with a selective citation of Gen. 14:17-20 (Heb. 7:1-2a), followed by well-known, but erroneous, etymological interpretations of the name Melchizedek (→ Melchizedek) and of the city over which he ruled (v. 2). From the pregnant silence of Scripture is deduced Melchizedek's status as "fatherless, motherless, without genealogy" (v. 3). The most important deduction in this rhetorically elaborate series is the eternal character of Melchizedek's priesthood. The basic point of the whole chapter is that in designating Christ as "high priest according to the order of Melchizedek," Scripture affirms that he is the high priest of an eternal, spiritual order.

7:4-10, Melchizedek and the Levites. Before making the main Christological point, the author adduces an admittedly (v. 9) playful exegetical argument to demonstrate the superiority of Melchizedek and, by implication, Christ to the levitical priests (→ Levites) of the OT. His argument is based on the fact that the law (Num. 18:21) stipulates that priests who are descendants of Levi are to take tithes from the rest of the people (Heb. 7:5). Genesis 14 indicates that Melchizedek, who has no levitical genealogy, took a tithe from their ancestor. Moreover, Melchizedek blessed Abraham (Heb. 7:6), indicating, by virtue of a general principle formulated for the occasion (v. 7), that Melchizedek is superior to Abraham. By implication, Melchizedek received a tithe from the tithers through their ancestor (vv. 9-10) and is superior to them.

7:11-19, The Implications of a New Priest.

The argument becomes more serious as the author explores the implications of Ps. 110:4, taken as a promise of a new, nonlevitical priesthood. Some apologetic considerations may underlie the argument at this point. According to accepted Christian traditions, Jesus was a Judahite and therefore could not have been a priest because of the scriptural requirements of levitical descent (Heb. 7:13-14). Ps. 110:4, with its reference to a nonlevitical priest, might have been used to justify Christ's priestly title, but Hebrews does not make that simple point. Rather, the introduction of a nonlevitical priest must mean that the whole law is altered (Heb. 7:11-12). The "likeness of Melchizedek" indicates what this alteration involves (v. 15). As the argument from silence in v. 3 had suggested, Christ's priesthood does not have to do with the realm of flesh but with the "indissoluble life" of the spirit (v. 16). The failure of the law, which necessitated its change, is indicated in the note that it did not bring "perfection" (vv. 11, 19). Chaps. 8-10 will indicate what this perfection is and how it relates to the perfection attributed to Christ.

7:20–25, The Confirming Oath. The significance of the discussion at 6:13–17 now becomes apparent. Ps. 110:4 contains, besides its reference to an eternal priesthood, a case of God swearing, which further distinguishes the priesthood of Christ from that of the Levites (Heb. 7:20–21). The point is made only as a preparation for the characteristically abrupt introduction of a new theme, the “covenant” of which Jesus is the surety or guarantor (v. 22). Like the allusion to “perfection” in the previous pericope, this new theme will be developed in the following exposition. For the moment the author notes the difference between human priests who, by the law of fleshly succession, are continually replaced (v. 23) and the Son who lives forever as intercessor (vv. 24–25). The picture reaffirms a dimension of Christ’s heavenly priesthood that had appeared previously (2:17–18) and that was probably part of the Christological tradition.

7:26–28, Conclusion. A rhapsodic finale, formally similar to the remarks on God’s word (4:12–13) concludes this exposition. Verse 26 stresses the heavenly character of Christ. The remaining verses summarize the contrast that has developed through the chapter. The note that Christ does not need to sacrifice for himself as do ordinary high priests (v. 27) recalls the qualifications of high priests in 5:3. The contrast between the mortal priests whom the law appoints and the “Son perfected forever” appointed by the divine oath (v. 28) summarizes the major contrast of the previous pericope. These summary verses frame a reference, the first since the exordium, to Christ’s principal priestly act, his once-for-all self-sacrifice for sin, the subject of the following exposition.

8:1–10:18

Christ’s Sacrifice and the New Covenant

As noted in the Introduction, this section of Hebrews, much like 3:1–4:11, is in a homiletic form. At a superficial level, the exposition presents two biblical models for understanding Christ’s death. One is the action of the high priest on the Day of Atonement. Christ’s death is thus seen as the truly atoning sacrifice (→Atonement). At the same time, it is seen to be a covenant-inaugurating sacrifice. At a more formal level, the exposition develops not through detailed exegesis but by reflecting on certain key antitheses: earth-heaven, old-new, external-internal. The pericope will ultimately show how Christ’s sacrificial death is the meeting point wherein these oppositions are mediated and overcome.

8:1–6, Introduction: The Heavenly Tabernacle. The “summary” of what has been said (v. 1) alludes once again to Ps. 110:1. Christ, seated at God’s right hand, has been shown in the previous chapter to be a heavenly “liturgist.” He must, therefore, function in the “true” or heavenly temple (Heb. 8:2), and, like any high priest, he must have something to offer (v. 3). The distinction between earthly and heavenly sanctuaries is then highlighted. On earth, where Christ could not have been a priest (v. 4), the sacred ministers serve at what is only a “shadowy copy” of the true temple (v. 5a). The dichotomy between a heavenly realm of truth and a “shadowy” earthly copy employs platonic language, but the notion of a heavenly temple is a traditional Jewish one. It is based on ancient Near Eastern ideas that lie behind the scriptural verse, Exod. 25:40, cited in Heb. 8:5b. In Jewish apocalypses, such as 1 Enoch or 2 Esdras, there are frequent depictions of a heavenly or eschatological temple. Among more hellenized Jews such as Philo, the heavenly temple becomes a more “spiritual” reality. Indications of a similar understanding will emerge as the exposition proceeds. The introduction concludes with a reference to the theme of the covenant, hinted at in 7:22. The superiority of Christ’s liturgy is correlated with the superiority of the promises of the covenant of which he is mediator.

8:7–13, The Promised New Covenant. A lengthy quotation of Jer. 31:31–34, following the LXX fairly closely, performs two functions, much as the catena in chap. 1 both introduced a parennetic remark and served to develop the Christology. As the introductory and concluding verses (vv. 7, 13) suggest, the passage demonstrates that the old covenant was defective and in need of replacement. More importantly, it indicates what are the “greater promises” (v. 6) on which the new covenant is based. The author shows what he takes these promises to be by the repeated citation of part of the passage at the conclusion of the exposition (10:16–17). The new covenant is an interior one of the heart and mind, and under it sins are effectively forgiven.

9:1–10, The Old, Earthly Cult. The exposition develops in five balanced segments. The first describes the “regulations for worship and the worldly sanctuary” of the old covenant (v. 1). These topics are treated in inverse order. A brief inventory of the outer (v. 2) and inner (vv. 3–5) portions of the tabernacle is based principally on the accounts in Exodus 25–26. Some details have been modified, such as placement of an incense altar in the inner portion of the tabernacle (Heb. 9:4), a notion probably based on extrabiblical traditions. Less easily explained is the reversal of the conventional names for the outer and inner portions of the tabernacle found in some manuscripts and probably the original reading. Whatever the reason for it, our author regularly calls the inner portion not the “Holy of Holies” but simply the “Holies” (here regularly translated “sanctuary”).

The latter half of the pericope (vv. 6–10) focuses on the main “regulation for worship” on which the Christological portrait turns. As Leviticus 16 stipulates, entry into the sanctuary is reserved for the high priest alone, only once a year, on the Day of Atonement, when he sprinkles the “mercy seat” with the blood of sacrificial animals (Heb. 9:6–7). This arrangement is immediately (v. 8) taken to be indicative of the imperfection of the old cult in which access to the sanctuary where God dwells is blocked. Hebrews will later (10:19–20) note that with the new covenant direct access to God is made possible. For the moment the author notes that the old cult is simply a “parable” or symbol for the present (v. 9a). In its imperfection it is, however, a negative image of the present. In itself, the old cult consists of actions that cannot cleanse conscience (v. 9b), cannot, that is, touch the realm of the spirit because they only affect external things and are thus regulations dealing with the flesh (v. 10). The same implicit spirit-flesh dichotomy deployed in the critique of the law at 7:16 resurfaces and unites, while it interprets, the antitheses of heaven-earth, internal-external. The worldly cult and its regulations remain “until a time of correction” (v. 10), which is not some future event but the inauguration of a new covenant by Christ.

9:11–14, The New, Heavenly Cult. The second segment of the exposition describes the heavenly liturgy. Verse 11 sets the scene in the “more perfect” tabernacle “not of this creation.” Fanciful allegorical interpretations of this verse, applying it to Christ’s body—physical, glorified, sacramental, or ecclesiastical—are unwarranted. The author simply exploits the mythic picture of a heavenly temple to suggest that Christ’s exaltation, his “passage through the heavens” (4:14), was the point at which his sacrifice was consummated, just as the sacrifice of the Day of Atonement is consummated when the high priest sprinkles the blood on the mercy seat. Christ’s sacrifice, however, involved not animals’ blood but his own (v. 12). How such blood is sprinkled in heaven remains for the moment a mystery, but our author does indicate that he views all of this highly realistic imagery as a metaphor when he indicates that the sacrifice of Christ was effected “through eternal spirit” (v. 14). Unlike the sacrifices of the old, earthly cult, which only cleanse the flesh (v. 13), the sacrifice of the new, heavenly cult operates on the spiritual level, affecting “conscience” or the consciousness of sin (v. 14).

9:15–22, The New Covenant. The third and central segment of the exposition apparently interrupts the picture of the “heavenly liturgy,” but the interruption is a crucial move in the development of the exposition. The theme of a “promised inheritance” that has run through the text (1:14; 4:1; 6:12; 8:6) is now united with the notion of the covenant (v. 15; → Covenant). The connection is made through a wordplay on the Greek term diathēkē, which can mean both “will or testament” and “contract or covenant.” The first sense clearly operates in vv. 16–17, which argue that the death of a testator is necessary for a diathēkē to come into force. The facetious character of the argument becomes apparent as the author turns (v. 18) to the first diathēkē or covenant, which cannot be assimilated to the model of a will. The point of comparison is that the first covenant also involved a sacrifice and purificatory sprinkling of blood, as is demonstrated with allusions (Heb. 9:19, 21) to Exodus 24 and citation (Heb. 9:20) of Exod. 24:8. The pericope thus demonstrates that real bloodshed is a requirement for the inauguration of a covenant and that the covenant is the vehicle for the attainment of the divine promises.

9:23–28, The New, Heavenly Cult. The fourth segment of the exposition, thematically corresponding to the second, reverts to the realm where Christ’s sacrifice is seen to have been consummated, “heaven itself” (v. 24), a connection influenced by platonic designations of the ideal world. What is supposed to transpire in this realm is thus the ideal counterpart of the purification of cultic paraphernalia just described (9:13, 19–22). This heavenly cleansing, like the “tabernacle not of this creation,” has occasioned much scholarly speculation, but our author has already indicated the referent of the imagery. The spiritual realities cleansed by Christ’s sacrifice are the consciences of believers.

At this point no interpretation of the imagery of heavenly cleansing is offered. Instead, Hebrews insists on the uniqueness of Christ’s sacrifice, as opposed to the multiplicity of the old cultic sacrifices (vv. 25–26). The same antithesis of one and many that first appeared in the exordium reemerges and serves as another device to interpret the fundamental antitheses of the exposition.

The preference for unity over multiplicity is another platonic theme, but the unity involved here is not a metaphysical one. Rather, it is the uniqueness of an action that takes place “at the end of the ages” (v. 26) and that is but the first stage in an eschatological drama, the last act of which is yet to be played (v. 28). The glance at the eschaton (end) signals a shift in the basic antitheses to be effected in the next pericope. At the same time, it heralds an eschatological motif that will develop in the final chapters.

10:1-10, The New, Earthly-Heavenly Sacrifice. The fifth segment of the exposition formally balances the first, turning from heaven back to earth. Here the play on the antitheses in the exposition reaches its dramatic climax. The introductory verse gives a first indication of the decisive play. The law is said to be but a "shadow of the good things to come," that is, with the inauguration of the new covenant. It is not the "very image" of those realities. The reference to "shadow" recalls the description of the earthly sanctuary in 8:5, but it is here used within a temporal, not spatial dichotomy. The term "image" is used not in its most obvious sense of a copy, but in a technical philosophical usage attested among contemporary Platonists, in the sense of the ideal form. The author of Hebrews, however, uses this platonic term not of a metaphysical reality but of a historical event. The next remarks (vv. 2-4) repeat the familiar criticism of the "shadow" or old cult, which could not cleanse conscience. The multiplicity of its activity attests to its impotence and signals the fact that it could only recall sins (v. 3). Here a commonplace of Jewish homiletics is turned into a critique. The grounds for the inefficacy of the cult are again located in the unworthy means by which it attempts atonement (v. 4).

The latter half of the pericope returns to the sacrifice of the new order. The argument hinges on a scriptural citation, Ps. 40:6-8, which, like the texts cited in Heb. 2:12-13, is taken to be a word of Christ. The introduction to the citation (v. 5) significantly situates the utterance at the point where Christ "enters the cosmos." Hebrews has previously focused on the movement of Christ into the heavenly sanctuary and the realm of the spirit. Moreover, the cosmos, as the realm of the flesh, has previously been depicted as inimical to the realm of the spirit (9:1-10) where the true sacrifice takes place (9:11-14).

The original psalm had read "ears you have hollowed out for me." Hebrews, following the LXX, reads (v. 5), instead, "a body you have prepared for me." This is one of the two elements of the text on which the following interpretive comment focuses and the basis on which the "cosmos" is revalued. The second significant element appears at the end of the citation (v. 7) where the speaker says that he came, as the "scroll of the book" testifies, "to do your will, O God."

An interpretive comment sets up an opposition between the two modes of sacrifice mentioned in the psalm, the external "sacrifices, offerings, holocausts, and sin offerings," i.e., the whole old cultic system, on the one hand (v. 8), and "doing God's will" (v. 9) on the other. The note that the speaker abrogates the former and establishes the latter indicates how the author understands Christ's sacrifice and the imagery that he has been using to describe it. That sacrifice is an act of conformity to the will of God, hence, internal and spiritual. At the same time it is bodily, hence, earthly. Because it is both at once, it is the sort of act that can fittingly inaugurate the new covenant promised in Jeremiah. All of this is summarized in a solemnly triumphant finale (v. 10). "We are sanctified" and thereby receive one promise of the new covenant "by that will" of God to which Jesus Christ conformed himself in the "sacrifice of his body," which is the reality that casts its shadow backward on the law and which is absolutely "once-for-all," unique.

10:11-18, Concluding Flourish. As the earlier embedded homily concluded with a festive reflection on God's word (4:12-13), the central exposition concludes with a summary of the effects of Christ's sacrifice. The language of vv. 11 and 12 is familiar from the exposition and includes an allusion (vv. 12b-13) to Ps. 110:1, the first since Heb. 8:1. The reference to "subjection of the enemies" recalls the first citation of the text (1:13) and points again to the eschatological consummation of Christ's mission. But the most important inference to be drawn from the sacrifice relates to what has already been accomplished, the "perfection" of those who are being sanctified (v. 14). As the critique of the old cult at 10:1-2 indicated, "perfection," as applied to believers, refers to the cleansing of their conscience, the qualification which makes them fit to worship God in truth (9:14). The category thus functions rather like Paul's language of "justification." A second citation (vv. 16-17) of a portion of Jeremiah (Jer. 31:33-34) highlights the major themes of the exposition, an interior or spiritual covenant and effective forgiveness of sin. The concluding tag (Heb. 10:18) points once again to the abrogation of the old cultic order.

10:19-25

Transitional Parenesis

With language similar to the transitional parenesis of 4:14-16, the author begins to draw implications from his Christological exposition. His initial comment (vv. 19-21) restates the objective situation on which exhortation is based, that Christians have a "new and living way through the veil." That veil, an image from the tabernacle's design first met at 6:19, is here surprisingly equated with Christ's flesh. That paradoxical equation follows naturally from the revaluation of the cosmic and bodily spheres effected in 10:1-10. If flesh had been something barring access to God, Christ's flesh, offered on the cross, is the point at which access to God is made available. The following series of exhortations highlights the cardinal virtues of faith, hope, and love while making more specific recommendations to take baptism seriously (v. 22), to hold on to the confession (v. 23), and to persevere in fellowship (vv. 24-25), all in the eschatological perspective of the coming "day."

10:26-12:13

Exhortation to Faith and Endurance

The next major movement of Hebrews is parenthetic. Like the central expository section, it is introduced with a word of warning and encouragement (10:26-39). Then the addressees are urged to have faith in a lengthy encomium on that virtue (chap. 11). The list of exemplars of faith culminates in a portrait of Christ that also introduces an explicit call to endurance (12:1-13).

10:26-39

Preliminary Exhortation

10:26-31, A Renewed Warning. As in chap. 6, the author issues a stern warning against apostasy, grounded in the principle enunciated at 10:18, that there remains no sacrifice for sin after the death of Christ. To make the point the author uses an a fortiori argument like that of 2:1-4. The capital punishment for abrogating the Law of Moses, as stipulated in Deut. 17:6, provides the point of comparison with the situation of the addressees. How much more serious will be the situation of those who reject the new covenant (Heb. 10:29)? The warning concludes with scriptural verses and the author's own ominous epigrammatic remark (v. 31), all of which emphasize divine judgment.

10:32-39, New Encouragement. In Hebrews' parenthetic program encouragement regularly follows and complements warning. Here encouragement consists of a recollection of past persecution successfully endured. The author mentions the direct personal indignities and deprivations that his addressees experienced but calls special attention to the ways in which they offered mutual support in time of need (vv. 33-34). An important aim of the concluding parenthetic chapters is to reinforce such a sense of community.

The recollection leads to an explicit call for "boldness" (v. 35) based on "endurance" (v. 36) and "faith" (v. 39), the two virtues highlighted in what follows. Between the two is set a composite scriptural quotation. A phrase from Isa. 26:20 in the LXX, "yet a very little while," suggests again the eschatological perspective within which the parenthesis develops. The remark of Hab. 2:3-4, well known from Paul's discussion of faith (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11), that the righteous will live by faith, directly introduces the discussion of that virtue.

11:1-40

An Encomium on Faith

This famous chapter, although incorporating features of other genres, is best described as an encomium on faith, much like the encomium on wisdom in Wisdom of Solomon 10. Like that text, it relies on examples drawn from the history of Israel. These examples also serve as models of faith and help to define it. Faith emerges as a both cognitive and affective quality, belief in certain fundamental truths about and fidelity to God. Faith, moreover, is seen to be involved in the two sorts of behavior recommended in the parenthesis, steadfastness in the face of persecution and movement onward and outward to a heavenly goal.

11:1-7, Faith from Creation to Noah. The initial definition of faith (v. 1), formally paralleled in many philosophical texts, is condensed and evocative. It is the "reality of things hoped for" in the sense that through it hopes are attained. The term for "reality" is the same one used at 1:3 and 3:14 and has the same objective connotations. Faith is also the "proof of things unseen," that is, the quality by which humans are put in touch with the unseen realities of God and by which they attain things unseen in the present.

Using the figure called anaphora, in which successive clauses begin with the same element, examples of faith are now cataloged, beginning (v. 3) with the faith that believers have in creation and extending through the fidelity of the protomartyr Abel, Enoch, the propositional content of whose faith is specified (v. 6), and Noah who by his faith achieved deliverance.

11:8-12, The Faith of Abraham and Sarah. Attention is focused on the patriarchs, first because they accepted the status of aliens even within their promised land based upon their expectation of a divinely prepared "city" (vv. 7-10). Then Abraham, along with Sarah, is seen to have been enabled to achieve the impossible through faith (vv. 11-12).

11:13-16, A Reflection on the Patriarchs' Faith. The author interrupts the catalog to expand on the image of the patriarchs as "wandering people of God." What motivated their quest was the desire for a better, that is, heavenly homeland or divine "city," not simply a new earthly dwelling place. This reflection recalls the interpretation of the term "rest" from Psalm 95 in Heb. 4 and anticipates the image of the heavenly Jerusalem in 12:18-24.

11:17-22, Faith from Abraham to Joseph.

The historical catalog resumes with an allusion to the Aqedah (Heb.), the "binding of Isaac" in Genesis 22, taken to be an example of belief in the resurrection (vv. 17-18), and then the blessings bestowed by Isaac and Jacob on their descendants. These acts, like Joseph's request to have his bones buried in Israel, all attest the hopeful expectation that is part of faith.

11:23-31, Faith from Moses to the Conquest.

Both Moses' parents and Moses himself display fidelity to God in the face of royal opposition. Moses' faith leads him to accept persecution and, in a mysterious anticipation of chap. 12, "the reproach of Christ" (v. 26). Faith, founded in a vision of the unseen God (v. 27), also enabled Moses to depart from Egypt, as Abraham had departed from Haran. Similar salvific faith inspired his followers (vv. 29-31).

11:32-40, Later Examples of Faith. At this point Hebrews abandons the device of anaphora and conveys a sense of the abundance of examples of faith primarily by asyndeton or the avoidance of conjunctions. The names of some judges as well as David and Samuel introduce a list of their typical accomplishments (vv. 32-35a). There follows a list of persecutions endured (vv. 35b-38). The encomium concludes with a note that these examples of faith did not attain the promise now available to the addressees.

12:1-13

Christ, Faith, and Endurance

Another little homily, combining the virtues mentioned at 10:36-39, completes this parenthetic movement.

12:1-3, The Perfect Paradigm, Christ. The homily is introduced with a portrait of Christ the "athlete." The imagery is commonplace in Hellenistic and early Christian parenesis. Here the race that Christ and the addressees run in a stadium filled with the heroes of the past is a race of faith. Victory in the race is assured because Christ, the "leader (or inaugurator) and perfecter" of faith, has already run the course and won the prize through his endurance of the cross. The author calls his addressees to follow the example and imitate through endurance the faith of Christ.

12:4-13, Suffering and Education. The call to endure is supported by a reflection on the proverbial theme of educative suffering mentioned earlier (5:8) in connection with Christ. The theme is now (vv. 5-6) developed through citation of Prov. 3:11-12 and an exposition of its theme of beneficial paternal discipline. This theme was an old response of the wisdom tradition to the problem of theodicy (defending the justice of God in the face of evil); here it is used for parenetic ends. The homily concludes (Heb. 12:12-13), as it began, with athletic imagery and a call to brace for the race.

12:14-13:21

Life in View of the End

The final parenetic movement reinforces the eschatological perspectives of the text while emphasizing the implications to be drawn from Christ's sacrificial act.

12:14-29

Warning and Hope

12:14-17, A Final Warning. A shift from the athletic imagery of the homily appears in the call to pursue peace and sanctification (v. 14). This is followed by the last severe warning of the dangers of apostasy, consisting of a citation of Deut. 29:18 and an interpretation of that text's image of the "root of bitterness" in terms of the biblical character Esau, who lost his inheritance. The addressees should avoid making a similar mistake with their promised heavenly inheritance.

12:18-24, Earthly Sinai and Heavenly Zion. As earlier warnings had been followed by encouragement, the threat is balanced by a characterization of the addressees' situation in a set of contrasting images. A description (vv. 18-21) of the awesome theophany at Sinai inspired by Exodus 19 and appealing to Deut. 9:19 is juxtaposed with a picture of the "heavenly Jerusalem" (Heb. 12:22-24). The basic image, foreshadowed in the references to the city in chap. 11, is derived from Jewish apocalyptic traditions, but it is given particularly joyous connotations. The reference to the divine judge (v. 23) is balanced by the mention of the mediator of a new covenant, whose atoning blood cries out in a better fashion than that of Abel (v. 24).

12:25-29, The End in View. Words of warning and hope are again intermingled. On the one hand, it is impossible to escape the heavenly judge who will shake the foundations of created reality (vv. 25–26a). The addressees, on the other hand, can take consolation in that they already have possession of something unshakable, a “kingdom” through which they can offer fitting service to God, who is, as Deut. 4:24 intimates, “a consuming fire.”

13:1–21

Final Recommendations and Rhetorical Conclusion

The stylistic shift to specific recommendations has occasionally led to unnecessary theories that the chapter is a secondary addition. It appropriately concludes the text.

13:1–6, Loving Service. The author rapidly advocates rather common virtues of brotherly love, hospitality, charity to prisoners (recalling 10:34), chastity, simplicity, and reliance upon God, described in Ps. 118:6 (LXX) as the psalmist’s “helper.”

13:7–17, True Worship. Within the framework of appeals involving the community’s leaders (vv. 7, 17) comes a description of what true Christian worship involves. It is founded on the eternal Christ (v. 8) and modeled on his sacrifice, which differs radically from the old cult (vv. 9–11). Christ died a shameful death “outside the gate” to sanctify his people. Christians should follow his example, accepting reproach (v. 13) and offering only sacrifices of praise and good works (vv. 15–16). This rejection of cult in favor of loving service is a direct corollary of the revaluation of the “cosmos” in 10:1–10.

13:18–21, Finale. Personal requests, a benediction, praying for the addressees to be strengthened, and a doxology bring the text proper to its end.

13:22–25

Epistolary Conclusion

The final verses with their personal greetings and gracious farewell were probably appended to the work when it was actually sent to its addressees. There is no reason to suspect that anyone but the unknown author penned them.

JAMES

LUKE T. JOHNSON

INTRODUCTION

The Letter of James is moral exhortation in the form of a general letter, from whose contents we learn little about its intended readers. The greeting, "to the twelve tribes in the Diaspora" (1:1), could indicate a Jewish-Christian audience but need not. Likewise, the practices condemned and the attitudes enjoined do not allow the depiction of a specific community or its problems. Neither are we certain whether the author is James the brother of the Lord or a pseudepigrapher, whether the writing is among the earliest or latest in the NT collection.

The teaching of James is general rather than particular, traditional more than novel, moral rather than theological. The dominant mood of its verbs is the imperative. The goal of the writing is not so much right thinking as right acting. The fundamental contrast is between verbal profession and action; when James contrasts "faith" and "works" (2:14), he sets empty belief in opposition to lived practice.

James's perspective is theocentric rather than Christocentric. Jesus' name occurs only twice (1:1; 2:1), and the messianic convictions concerning Jesus' death and resurrection are lacking. On the other hand, James knows and makes use of Jesus' sayings (cf. 1:6; 2:8; 5:12).

His perspective is theocentric because explicit statements about the God who creates, calls, blesses, and judges support James's moral exhortations. His theological outlook is most clearly expressed in 3:13-4:10. He sees two measures for human behavior: the measure of God who creates all things and the measure of "the world" that resists God's claim on creation. James calls adherence to these measures "friendship." One can either be a "friend of the world" or a "friend of God" and act accordingly. James's specific interest is the "double-minded person" (1:8; 4:8), who wants to live by both measures at once, confessing commitment to God, but contradicting it in action. James exhorts his readers to action consonant with conviction.

James is remarkable for its positive appropriation of Torah, whose separate aspects it mediates to the messianic community (→ Torah). The short exhortations concerned with practical behavior resemble and incorporate elements of the wisdom tradition. Since wisdom is by nature cosmopolitan, James shows traces of Hellenistic moral philosophy as well as of the biblical books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. James also contemporizes the voice of the prophets. His attack on oppression echoes the accents of Isaiah and Amos (5:1-6). James also affirms the Law, calling it the "Law of Liberty" (2:12). He does not mean ritual observances but the moral teaching of Torah, summarized by the Decalogue and the "law of love" (Lev. 19:18; cf. 2:8-11). James elaborates this commandment in the light of Lev. 19:11-19 and Jesus' words.

The literary structure of James is not obvious. The only epistolary element is the greeting. Chap. 1 consists entirely of short commands and aphorisms with little apparent connectedness. These are followed by a series of short essays employing the lively oral style of Hellenistic teaching called the diatribe. The essays are in turn interspersed with other short commandments (cf. 4:11; 5:9, 12). Elaborate structural analyses are unconvincing, but neither is James simply a careless pastiche. The themes broached by way of aphorism in chap. 1 are elaborated in the essays, so that the opening exhortations serve as a prologue and table of contents.

James claims neither novelty nor depth. But no reader can mistake its lively voice or moral passion. Traditional teaching is given vibrancy in this exhortation to practical faith and active love.

COMMENTARY

1:2-27, Opening Exhortations. Without any real transition from the greeting, James launches a series of admonitions. Each takes the form of a second-person (1:2, 16, 19, 21, 22) or third-person (1:4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 13, 19) imperative. Some of the commands are accompanied by explanatory statements ("for"), which provide the exhortation's warrant (e.g., 1:6, 11, 13, 20, 24). This part of James strongly resembles such collections as Proverbs, especially since the instructions represent reminders of already well-understood norms (1:3, 20).

As in other collections of traditional wisdom, the discrete sayings lack obvious thematic connections. Attempts at contextual analysis are therefore hazardous. Thus, although "testing" appears both in 1:2 and in 1:12-14, it is not clear that the term means the same thing in both places. In 1:2, it refers to external testing, as in persecution; in 1:14, it seems to mean internal "temptation." The real thematic links are to be found not between these aphorisms themselves but between each of them and the later essays. The place to find a comment on the "endurance of testing" of 1:2, for example, is in 5:7-11.

Despite the disjointedness of the opening section, three of James's characteristic concerns emerge clearly. Each of them involves a contrast. The first contrast is between two measures, God and the world opposed to God. The outlook of the world is duplicitous and envious. In contrast, God gives with simplicity and without rebuke (1:5). God can be defined, in fact, as the giver of every good and perfect gift (1:17). Worldly desire conceives sin, and sin when it reaches term gives birth to death (1:15). In contrast, God gives genuine birth to humans by his word of truth and makes them the first fruits of his creatures (1:18). This "implanted word" is able, in turn, to save their souls, if they receive it in meekness (1:21).

The second contrast is between the attitudes and behavior consistent with each measure. To live by God's word of truth means putting aside anger in favor of meekness, since "anger does not accomplish God's righteousness" (1:20). It means regarding poverty and wealth in ways shocking to a world that uses them as the means of testing worth; before God, "the poor brother boasts in his exaltation, and the rich man in his humiliation" (1:9-10). It means being driven not by evil desires (1:14), but by the wisdom that comes from God in response to the prayer of faith (1:5-6). Most paradoxically, it means counting trials "all joy" (1:2)—an attitude available only to those whose Messiah had sanctified suffering and thereby transformed the norms for human worth.

The third and most characteristic contrast is between the sham religiosity of word or appearance and a devotion "pure and stainless before God," which is honest speech and care for the dispossessed (1:26). These are the attitudes and actions that keep one "unstained from the world" (1:27). For James, it is not the learning but the doing of wisdom that counts. His readers are to be "doers of the word and not hearers only" (1:22). Genuine blessedness comes from the "doing of a deed," which is the aim of all moral instruction (1:22-25). The double-minded person (1:8) who would profess without practicing is told emphatically to avoid self-deception (1:16). Unless religion involves effective action in the world, it is "useless" (1:26).

2:1-13, The Law of God's Kingdom. The first of James's essays extends to 2:26 but can conveniently be divided at 2:13. The literary conventions of the diatribe are used vigorously throughout the next three chapters. Note in this section the direct address to the reader (2:1, 5), the vivid imaginary dialogue (2:3), and rhetorical questions (2:4, 5, 6, 7). James sketches a situation in which readers fail to live by their convictions (2:1-7). He then develops more fully the measure by which they ought to live (2:8-13).

Since James writes for a general audience, it is unlikely that he criticizes the practice of a particular community when he describes an assembly in which rich and poor are treated so differently. In fact, the precise nature of the assembly itself is unclear. The word "gathering" (Gk. synagôgê, "synagogue") in 2:2 could refer to the Christian worship service. But James's subsequent argument suggests that this assembly is the occasion for community judicial decisions. We know that some Christian communities took over from Judaism the office of local presbyters who handled finances and settled internal disputes (cf. 1 Cor. 6:1-8; 1 Tim. 5:17-25). Whatever the social setting, James condemns the blatant discrimination practiced within it: members of the assembly give precedence to the rich and slight the poor (2:3).

James's objection has two bases. First, a bias toward the rich contradicts the original experience of the members of the Christian community. In their lives it was the rich who oppressed them by dragging them into court and who scorned their religion (2:6-7). By so doing, the rich acted consistently by their measure of reality. But James's readers had been given another measure. God had chosen the poor in the world's estimation to be "rich with respect to faith, and heirs of the kingdom" (2:5). How could an assembly gathered under God's rule act in accord with the world's measure?

James's second objection is that their "respect for appearances" has led them to betray their faith in Jesus Christ (2:1). He accuses them of being, as a result, judges with evil designs (2:4). His language deliberately evokes the ancient practice of community judgment in Israel (cf. Ruth 4:1-8); its constant principle was that decisions must be made "without partiality" (Deut. 1:17; Lev. 19:15; 1 Tim. 5:21). Judges were not to be swayed by appearances but by the merits of a case. But if the rich are given special places in the assembly simply because of their lordly appearance, the community is corrupting its judgment. That is plain enough. How is it also betraying its faith in Jesus?

It betrays faith first of all, because the very basis for the community's existence is God's choice of the poor, so that they are "rich in faith." The community should have the same preference for the poor that God has shown.

Their behavior betrays their loyalty to Jesus as well, since he had identified the love of neighbor as central to Torah: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (cf. Mark 12:30–31). James calls this the "royal law," or better, the "law of the kingdom" into which God has called them (2:8).

James finds that Torah itself provides specific guidelines for the fulfillment of the law of love, first in the Decalogue (2:11; cf. Rom. 13:8–10), but also in the prescriptions of Leviticus. Thus, James sees in Lev. 19:15, right before the commandment to love the neighbor, a prohibition of partiality in judgment. This is the first of several times that James uses all of Lev. 19:11–19 to articulate the meaning of love for the neighbor (4:11; 5:4, 9, 12, 19). When he says, therefore, that one does well to fulfill "the whole law" (2:10) and to do so "according to the scripture" (2:8), he is serious on both counts.

In 2:12–13, James gives a concise summary of his points and a transition to the next section: the law of love is one of "freedom" since it inhibits only harmful activity and enables authentic human existence; life according to its measure does not oppress but liberates others—thus there can be no discrimination on the basis of power or possessions; and finally, this way of life is according to God's measure, which is one of mercy, not condemnation.

2:14–26, Living Faith and Love. James's characteristic emphasis on behavior consistent with conviction (cf. 1:22, 26) is now made explicit. The "usefulness" of theory is always a moralist's concern. For James, the contrast is between a faith that is merely verbal and one that shows its "life" in action.

The diatribal style is again heavily used in this section, as James employs a fictional dialogue with an imagined interlocutor (2:18–23). The dialogue is propelled by rhetorical questions (2:14, 19, 20, 21), an apostrophe (2:20), and even a pun: faith without works (Gk. erga) is empty (Gk. argē).

James's argument begins with an example drawn from life (2:14–17). His point is simple: words without actions are futile. A needy brother or sister (2:15) cannot be helped either by a blessing or a benevolent attitude (2:16), but only by the concrete actions that incarnate them. Deeds rather than speech carry conviction. The example is framed in 2:14 and 2:17 by its specific application: faith without deeds is "dead."

The last phrase of 2:17, "faith simply by itself" provides an important clue to James's understanding. In the ensuing dialogue, he pillories one who equates faith with "right belief" as though it were simply confession or an assent of the intellect, rather than essentially a response to God made up of loyalty, trust, endurance, and obedience. Thus his response to a person who "has faith" of the confessional sort is ironic: "you do well" (2:19). In fact, such belief is meaningless, since it is compatible with a life hostile to God. Even demons confess truly that "God is One"—and shudder (2:19). For James, authentic faith is simply faith enacted.

In 1:25, James told his readers to gaze into the "perfect law of freedom" so they could learn to be "doers of the word." Now he draws from Torah the first two of his four exemplars, each of whom models some aspect of active faith in God (cf. also 5:11, 17). In Abraham's offering of his son Isaac (Gen. 22:9, 12), faith came to perfection in action (2:21). James does not say that deeds add something to a "saving" faith, but that Abraham's action was the intrinsic expression of faith itself, as essential to its life as the soul is to the body's (2:26). In a compressed formula, he asserts that "faith co-works the works," and it is faith itself that he says comes to maturity (2:22; cf. 1:4).

Like Paul in Gal. 3:6, James cites Gen. 15:6 to show that Abraham was declared righteous for his faith (2:23), but he adds his distinctive identification of those who live by God's measure: Abraham was called "friend of God" (cf. 4:4). And as James explicitly mentions the "sister" in need (2:15), so he adds the female example of Rahab, whose hospitality to Israel's spies enacted her implicit response of faith in Israel's God (2:25; cf. Josh. 2:9–13).

Some readers find James to be at odds with the Paul of Galatians. But Paul would surely agree that what matters is "faith being worked out by love" (Gal. 5:6). Their focuses, to be sure, are quite different. James is not debating the theological grounds for salvation. He advocates a "true religion," which he understands as effective action for others in the world.

Here is the deeper resonance to the choices of Abraham and Rahab as examples. In Jewish lore, they stand as models for hospitality. James began this discussion with a call to just such "acts of mercy" (2:13) as feeding, clothing, and sheltering the needy (2:16). These fit his definition of religion as "visiting orphans and widows in their affliction" (1:27). Only this kind of faith keeps one "unstained from the world."

3:1–12, The Control of Speech. There are two possible literary transitions to this essay on speech (the metonym for which is "the tongue"). The first is the mechanical word linkage provided by "body," which is found in 2:26 and twice more in 3:2–3. The second and more likely is the completion of James's definition of religion (1:26–27). In the previous essay he dealt with "visiting orphans and widows"; now he can address "controlling the tongue"

(cf. 1:26). The essay also picks up from the aphorism of 1:19: "Let everyone be quick to hear but slow to speak," and provides, in turn, a transition to James's discussion of true wisdom (3:13), for the connection between wisdom and taciturnity was, in the ancient world, truly proverbial (cf. Prov. 17:28; Sir. 5:13).

If in the previous sections James appeared as a close reader of Torah and his exhortations as midrashic (→ Midrash), here he shows his Hellenistic side. The miniature essay on the tongue (3:3–8) touches on many of the standard elements in the discussion of human speech by Greek moralists.

Thus, it is commonplace to assert the difficulty of controlling ("bridling") the tongue with the analogy of bridling a horse (3:3). The analogy also suggests the power of the tongue, since to control it is to guide a great beast. Another standard comparison: the tongue is to the body as a rudder is to a ship. So also the tongue can "boast of great things, though small." The boast is not challenged; James recognizes the power of speech. A third comparison follows, this time to a small fire that enflames a whole forest (3:5). James develops the image by declaring, "the tongue is a fire" (3:6), and spiraling hyperbolically to its being a "world of evil" and "lit from hell and igniting the whole cycle of becoming" (3:6). Finally, he repeats the impossibility of truly controlling speech. In contrast to the domestication of all creation, human speech itself remains "an evil upheaval, a cup of deadly poison" (3:7–8).

However lively in expression, such points can be found in Hellenistic discussions. James gives a special edge to the topic, however, by the way he frames it. In 3:1–2, he directs these remarks to those who would be teachers in the messianic community, cautioning them about that role, for "we shall receive a greater judgment" (3:1). If proper speech is difficult for anyone, it is a particular peril for those who make a profession of it. But if one does not fail in speech, then one is truly perfect (3:2; cf. 1:4). At the least, James gives eloquent witness to speech as the primary symbol of human existence.

Even more strikingly, he concludes the essay with his usual contrast between God's measure and that of the world, stressing the impossibility of living by both at once. He condemns the contradiction inherent in blessing God (in prayer) and also cursing humans (3:9). Such behavior is contradictory because humans are made "according to the image of God" (3:9). To combine such forms of speech is like trying to get both sweet and brackish water from the same source or figs from an olive tree; it's not done (3:10–11). As he did in 2:1–26, James links fidelity to God with loyalty to humans. Just as people should be "single-minded" in their adherence to God's word, so should their speech be "single-minded" toward each other.

3:13–4:10, Friendship with God. The heart of James's writing and the key to its understanding are found in 3:13–4:10. This self-contained literary unit brings together a number of themes adumbrated in chap. 1. It also provides the explicit conceptual framework that shapes James's teaching as a whole.

We meet here again the double-minded person (1:8; 4:8) contrasted to the simple and generous God (1:5; 17; 4:6); the reversal worked by God so that the proud are lowered and the humble are raised (1:9–10; 4:6–10); and a wisdom from God opposed to a wisdom against God (1:5; 3:15). In a word, James puts before his readers the choice between two measures and demands of them a choice: will it be God or the world?

The contemporary editions and translations that divide this section at 3:18 do so mistakenly, for 3:13–4:10 stands as a literary whole. In form, it is a call to conversion. James sets up an indictment in 3:13–4:6, to which a plea for repentance responds in 4:7–10.

The charge to repent is stylistically simple, consisting of ten imperatives, three of them accompanied by emphatic reassurances (4:7, 8, 10). These verses deliberately echo the language of repentance found in the prophets (e.g., LXX Hos. 5:5; Ezek. 36:25; Amos 9:5). The indictment is literally more complex, alternating rhetorical questions (3:13; 4:1, 2, 4, 5) and antithetical propositions (3:14–17; 4:2–3, 4, 6). Its climax is the apostrophe and rhetorical questions of 4:4–5.

Within this literary structure, James establishes thematic unity by using the conventional Hellenistic discussion of the vice of envy. Not only do terms for envy recur in 3:14, 16; 4:2; and climactically in 4:5, but many other expressions otherwise strangely combined make sense here because of their traditional association with that vice. Thus, envy is usually considered a misanthropic vice particularly given to bitterness and rivalry (3:14). It leads to social upheaval (3:16), wars (4:1), and above all murder (4:2). Why does envy have such associations? Because it is based on a perception of reality that equates having with being. Humans are therefore in competition for existence and worth. If one has more, then another must have less and be less. The logic of such competition leads to murder, the physical removal of rivals.

James places this analysis of envy within an explicitly religious framework. The perception generating envy is a wisdom "from below" (lit., "earthly," 3:15), which is essentially opposed to the "wisdom from above" (3:15). The source of each wisdom is clear. That from below fittingly comes from the devil (3:15; 4:7), for in the biblical tradition the devil represents envy (cf. Wisd. of Sol. 2:24). He operates in the realm of the human mind (Gk. psychē, 3:15). The wisdom from above comes from God, and operates in the spirit (Gk. pneuma) God made to dwell in humans (4:5). In contrast to the envious devil, God gives without rebuke (1:5), indeed overflows in generosity: "He gives more gift" (4:6).

Each measure has its appropriate behavioral expression. The wisdom from below leads to "lying against the truth" (3:14) and "every foul deed" (3:16). It can lead, in fact, to the distortion of religion itself, in a self-deception (cf. 1:26) that tries to manipulate even God in prayer (4:3).

In contrast, the wisdom from God leads to "noble behavior" (3:13), to peaceful and merciful attitudes, and to "good fruits" (3:17). As envy leads to wars and murder (4:1-2), so the "fruit of righteousness is sown in peace by those who do peace" (3:18).

James concludes his indictment by asserting the absolute incompatibility of these ways of life. One cannot be at the same time a "friend of the world" and "a friend of God" (4:4). In the Hellenistic language of friendship, to be friends meant having a spiritual affinity, a deeply shared unity, to be, in effect, "one soul." A "friend of the world" therefore is one who sees things by the measure of earthly wisdom. These James calls "adulterers," using Torah's term for those breaking covenant with God (cf. Hos. 3:1; Ezek. 16:38). They have established themselves as enemies of God (4:4).

James's specific target here as throughout the Letter is the double-minded person who wants to be "friends with everyone," to live by both measures at once. James's indictment demands of this person action consonant with knowledge: "do you not know?" (4:4). He demands a "cleansing of the hands and purifying of the heart," which means becoming single-minded rather than double-minded, living by God's standard rather than the world's.

In his final exhortations, James makes several remarkable statements concerning the relationship between God and human beings. By turning to God, the evil spirit can be resisted and made to flee (4:7); God can then be approached by humans. More surprisingly, God responds to such initiative and draws near (4:8). Indeed, God answers those who humble themselves before him, giving them gifts and "raising them up" (4:6, 7, 10; cf. 1:9).

4:11-17, Against Arrogance. After the coherence of the previous section, the final part of James again appears as disjointed. A freestanding commandment with its warrant (4:11-12) is followed by two condemnatory paragraphs (4:13-17; 5:1-6), each beginning with "come now" (4:13; 5:1). These attacks lead to positive instructions concerning external affliction (5:7-11) and internal edification (5:12-20).

Although it is not immediately evident how warnings against slander, heedlessness, and oppression should connect to James's call to conversion in 3:13-4:10, all three can be understood as manifestations of arrogance, the self-aggrandizing and hostile attitude that for James epitomizes the measure of the world opposed to God: "God resists the arrogant but gives gifts to the humble" (4:6; cf. Prov. 3:34).

The prohibition of 4:11 addresses once more the use of the tongue, a persistent preoccupation of the Letter (cf. 1:19, 26; 2:12, 16-17; 3:2, 9-10). Here James condemns slander. The Greek expression can mean any loud or boisterous speech, but in Scripture the term is associated with secret and hostile speech against another (cf. Pss. 50:20; 101:5; Wisd. of Sol. 1:11) and appears as such in NT vice lists (cf. Rom. 1:30; 2 Cor. 12:20).

By repeating the word "brother" three times in a single verse (4:11), James emphasizes the disruption caused the community by such malevolent speech. But in 4:12, his language shifts slightly: "Who are you to judge your neighbor?" The change of terms leads us to James's distinctive understanding of this vice. First, slander is an offense against the law of the kingdom (2:8), which is love for the neighbor. As we have observed, James reads Lev. 19:18 in its original context, and in Lev. 19:16 there is the clear prohibition of slander against the neighbor. James also uncovers the spiritual implications of slander. To speak against another maliciously and in secret always involves a negative judgment of the other, indeed a condemnation, that arrogantly assumes a superiority over the other.

James pushes beyond ethical churlishness to religious sin. The slanderer also asserts a superiority to the Law, which explicitly forbids slander, and in effect assumes the role of judge over the Law. In so doing, the slanderer asserts superiority to the Lawgiver and thus has become "not the doer of the Law but its judge" (4:11). James decisively crushes this pretension by reasserting faith's most fundamental conviction: there is only One Lawgiver and One Judge, and they are the same. James states the infinite distance between this Lord and human arrogance: only one of them is "able to give life and to destroy it."

That reminder provides the transition to the condemnation in 4:13-17. Arrogance is now expressed by the blithe and heedless confidence that human calculation can actually secure the future and that life consists in the "buying and getting" of business (4:13). James mocks such self-delusion. Humans cannot secure even their tomorrow, much less their "next year" (4:14).

The lives of humans are literally not in their own control. If they lived by God's measure, they would recognize the utter contingency of their existence and projects (cf. 1:9-11), for only by the will of God can they live or do anything at all (4:15). Their presumption that God is irrelevant to their life and has no claim on their world is evil boasting, a pride based only in empty arrogance (4:16).

The final line of this section (4:17) seems oddly placed. What does the sin of omission have to do with slander and pretension? Not much that is obvious, but James uses it as a transition to the next form of arrogance, which sins by the omission of elementary social justice: the oppression practiced by the rich (5:1-6).

5:1-11, Persecution and Patience. This section falls neatly into two corresponding parts. In 5:1-6, James prophetically condemns the rich who oppress and murder innocent people. In 5:7-11, he exhorts "the brethren" to attitudes appropriate for the context of persecution. The paragraphs are linked thematically by the judgment of God (5:1, 3, 7-8), which appears as a threat to the oppressors and a comfort to the oppressed.

Is James attacking wealthy members of the messianic community? It seems unlikely. That there were wealthier members among his readers seems probable from 1:9; 2:12; and even 4:13, but here the rich are the outsiders, who, according to 2:6, oppress members of the community and bring them to court.

James does not condemn wealth as such but the greed and injustice involved in creating it. The "measure of the world," which equates being and having, here finds perfect expression. The oppressors seek to become "more" by robbing workers of their fair wages (5:4). Such defrauding of the laborer is also explicitly condemned by Lev. 19:13, which James understands as an elaboration of the law of love. He adopts the voice of Amos and Isaiah in castigating these breakers of covenant. In 4:1-2 we saw that envy led to murder. The withholding of wages gradually kills, and James makes the accusation directly: "you have murdered the just man" (5:6).

Against the wisdom of the world, which legitimates the survival of the savage, James places the coming judgment of God. In his call to conversion, he had told the double-minded to "be miserable and cry out" as a sign of repentance (4:8-9). Here the same terms are used as signs of the punishment coming on the oppressors (5:1). The rich consider that they have secured their life, but instead they have "piled up treasure for the last days," by which James means a wealth of punishment. Their possessions will rot and rust as they will themselves

(5:3). In a vivid twist of sacrificial imagery, James calls them calves fattened for the day of slaughter (5:5). Because they have abused laws to do injustice, God will judge them, for he keeps covenant even when humans do not: "the cries of the laborers have reached the ears of the Lord of hosts" (5:4).

What attitudes should those who undergo oppression have? James exhorts them to patience. Instead of the usual term denoting "endurance," however, (as in 1:3-4), he twice uses an expression typically used in the Bible of judges: they are to be "long-suffering." James means by this that they are not to anticipate the judgment of God, either by violently resisting their oppressors (5:6) or (in a response natural among the oppressed) turning on each other with bitterness and reproach (5:9; cf. Lev. 19:18a).

Instead they are to "fix their hearts" on God, remaining faithful to the one who called them (5:8). They can in fact do this because the judgment of God is both certain and soon: "The judge is standing at the gates" (5:9). James's language here suggests that he means specifically the return of Jesus as judge (cf. 1 Thess. 3:13; 1 Cor. 15:23; Matt. 24:3).

As James proposed Abraham and Rahab as examples of faith active in deeds, so he presents Job as the paradigm of faith enduring affliction. Job represents "the prophets" who both suffered and showed long-suffering. James clearly implies that the "merciful and compassionate" God rewards such endurance: "You have seen the purpose of the Lord" (5:11).

5:12-20, Life in the Community. The Letter concludes with a number of separate exhortations whose organizing principle is life together in the church, with a specific focus on the sort of speech that should obtain in the messianic community. James thereby provides the positive ideal of speech, which he regards as essential to authentic religion (1:26).

He insists in the first place on plain speech without the taking of oaths (5:12). Here is one of the clearest instances of a commandment deriving from the sayings of Jesus (cf. Matt. 5:33-37) as well as from Torah (cf. Lev. 19:12). The phrase "lest you fall under judgment" indicates as well that such speaking is in fulfillment of the law of liberty (cf. also 2:12-13; 4:11; 5:9) and also connects this command to the discussion of the Lord's judgment in 5:7-11.

The messianic community is also one constituted by prayer. A paean to prayer in every circumstance, joyful or sorrowful, is found in 5:13-18. James's readers are thereby reminded that their lives are bound by more than mutual affection, above all by their shared relationship with God. The community is therefore to respond to threats of sickness or sin by gathering in prayer.

When someone is physically ill, the elders of the church come together in prayer for the sick person. When James adds, "The prayer of faith will save the sick person and the Lord will raise him up" (5:15), his language almost certainly recalls the healing stories of the synoptic tradition (cf., e.g., Mark 2:9; 3:3; 5:41). The community is threatened even more powerfully by the sins of its members. The confessing of sins, therefore, accompanied by prayers for each other, not only restores the deviant individual to spiritual health, but it also heals the community as such (5:16). To show the power of such prayer, James cites the last of his exemplars from Torah. The prophet Elijah, "though only a human being like us," accomplished wonders by the "prayer of faith" (5:17-18; see 1 Kings 17:1; 18:42-45).

James's final exhortation is not accidentally chosen. The community that lives by the word of truth (1:18) and has received with meekness the implanted word of God (1:21) must work together against individual and communal self-deception and deviation (5:19; cf. 1:13, 16, 23, 26; 2:20). Mutual correction and exhortation are therefore expressions of love for the neighbor (cf. Lev. 19:17). At the end, James exhorts all his readers to do for each other what he has been trying to do for them.

1 PETER

PAUL J. ACHTEMEIER

INTRODUCTION

The First Letter of Peter is addressed to Christians in five of the Roman provinces that occupied the area of modern Turkey. Its language reveals that its author was an educated person, acquainted with the theological terminology reflected in Paul's Letters, who knew the situation in Asia Minor in the last years of the first century A.D., some years after the traditional date for Peter's martyrdom in A.D. 64. For that reason, many scholars question its authorship by the disciple Peter. In addition, the names Silvanus (→ Silvanus; 5:12) and Mark (→ Mark; 5:13) are more closely associated in the NT with Paul (Mark: Philem. 24; 2 Tim. 4:11; Col. 4:10; Acts 12:25; 15:37–39; Silvanus: 2 Cor. 1:19; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1) than with Peter, as is the area to which the Letter is addressed. In the only first-person reference by the author to himself, the term used is "elder" (1 Pet. 5:1), a term not associated with Peter, and the additional reference to himself as "a witness of the sufferings of Christ" cannot refer to a historical situation, since Peter was not present at the crucifixion of Jesus, according to the unanimous tradition in the Gospels. Nor can the reference to Silvanus in 5:12 as one "through whom" the letter was written indicate a letter dictated to Silvanus by Peter, since the Greek phrase "by someone" refers to the person who delivered the letter, as in Acts 15:23, not the one who wrote it; reference to such a scribe takes a different form, as in Rom. 16:22. The reference to Mark as "my son" (1 Pet. 5:13) does not refer to physical relationship any more than does the reference to Silvanus as "faithful brother" (5:12). "The elect one in Babylon" (5:13; RSV: "She who is in Babylon, who is likewise chosen") refers not to Peter's wife but to the church from which the letter is being sent (the word for "church" in Greek is feminine in gender). None of these details therefore refers to the historical Peter's actual family situation.

The reference to Babylon is probably a cryptic name for Rome (→ Rome; see Rev. 18), continuing the metaphor of Christians as the chosen people now living as exiles in the world, as did the Jews when they were exiled to Babylon (see 1 Pet. 1:1; 2:11). Historic Babylon at this time was only a small, insignificant village; there is no indication that the historical Peter (→ Peter) ever visited it.

References to a situation of suffering (e.g., 1:6; 2:20; 3:14; 4:1, 12–13; 5:9) need not assume an official, empire-wide Roman persecution (→ Persecution) of Christians. The fact that Christians no longer participated in the many religious festivals celebrated in the Hellenistic world (see 4:4) is enough to account for the sporadic outbreaks of persecution suffered by followers of Christ that are reflected in this Letter. The fact that the readers' identification as Christians was enough to provoke suffering (4:16) indicates a time late in the first century A.D., by which time Roman authorities had discovered that Christians were not, as they had earlier assumed, a sect within Judaism.

The purpose of the Letter is to comfort Christians who, because of their new situation, are no longer acceptable to their cultural world. A number of metaphors are used to portray that situation: they are like exiles or aliens (1:1; 2:11), like slaves (2:18–25) or wives (3:1–6), who in that culture had few legal rights. Again, they are like newborn infants (2:2) who through baptism (1:2) have a new hope and a new inheritance (1:4); they are like priests in a new sanctuary (2:4–8), like stones in a new building (2:5), like a new people chosen by God (2:10). They are like workers setting about a task (1:13), like soldiers armed for conflict (4:1). In a variety of ways, therefore, the author seeks to encourage readers who, because of their new situation as believers, can no longer participate in their culture as they once did (4:3) and who must now suffer the same rejection Christ did (2:21) and for many of the same reasons (3:17–18; 4:1). Yet that new situation is of such surpassing value that the future recompense is worth the present, temporary discomfort (1:6; 4:7–8, 13–14; 5:10).

The dominant motif of 1 Peter is therefore the contrast between what the readers had once been and what they have now become because of their obedience to Christ. It is the author's message that the new situation is worth any suffering it may require.

In summary, 1 Peter is a general letter, probably written from Rome around the end of the first century, by follower(s) of the apostle Peter, who wished to convey to besieged gentile Christians in Asia Minor the encouragement and comfort contained in the gospel Peter preached during his years as a missionary to the Jews (Gal. 2:7–8). Couched in traditional theological terms familiar to its readers, the Letter sought to add the authority of the apostle Peter to the faith of those who lived in a traditionally Pauline missionary area.

COMMENTARY

PART ONE: 1:1-2:3

A New Person in Christ and
How to React

1:1-2

Salutation

This is the nuts and bolts of the Letter: from whom, to whom, and why. The form is common to the Hellenistic world: A to B, greetings, followed by a wish or a prayer for prosperity or good health. Typically for NT Letters—especially Paul's—this format is adapted to Christian use (→ Salutations). In a pun on the normal word for “greetings” (Gk. chairein), the author substitutes the word for “grace” (Gk. charis), and to it is added the word “peace” (Heb. shalom), rich in its connotations of order and wholeness. Those to whom the Letter is written are also addressed in analogy to OT terms: “exiles of the Diaspora” recalls the events that scattered Jews over the face of the inhabited Western world, forcing them to live in cultures alien to their religion (→ Exile; Diaspora). This use is clearly analogical, since those addressed are Gentiles, as the rest of the Letter makes clear. Yet their fate is not due to historical accident. They are what they are by the direct purpose of God: set aside by his Spirit to follow his Son and to be baptized into him. The similarity to Matt. 28:19—make disciples (here: obey); baptize (here: sprinkled with his blood) in the name of the Trinity (here: Father, Spirit, Jesus Christ)—shows the extent to which our author relies on familiar Christian tradition. Those addressed live in the northern half of Asia Minor; two of the “provinces” were also visited by Paul (Galatia, Asia). The names do not conform entirely to Roman provincial boundaries; by this time Pontus and Bithynia had become one province. The area intended is clear, however, as is the purpose: to address people of the northern half of Asia Minor who, by God's will, had become obedient to Jesus Christ. Given their situation, they will surely need God's grace and peace!

1:3-12

The Christian's New Situation

The author begins the body of the Letter with a summary of the points to be made in the remainder of the discussion. Hence this passage serves as an introduction to the entire Letter.

1:3-9, Newness in Christ. Newness in Christ describes the readers' situation, and the author now turns to address that point. The metaphors pile one upon another—their situation is so new only analogy can describe it. Their future is one so new for human beings that only a second birth can be compared to it, with its new life and its new inheritance (vv. 3-4). Their future is so precious only gold can be compared to it, though like gold they will be tested by fire (vv. 6-7). Their reaction to Christ is so solid and joyful that only the importance of the outcome of history itself can begin to do it justice (vv. 5, 8-9). Trusting in someone they have not seen; rejoicing in a future that contains fiery testing; loving someone who has placed them before an unknown future, helpless as babes—is that not irrational, even foolish? No, because such actions are based on Christ's victory over death (v. 3b) and the promise that God will guard and uphold them in that new life (v. 5) until they reach the promised salvation (v. 9). Here is the paradox of Christian existence: joy in the face of suffering; assurance of deliverance in the midst of persecution; complete reliance not on what is visible but on the unseen God. The rest of the Letter simply expounds those basic insights.

1:10-12, Long Ago Foretold. That the readers are not subject to the whims of fate or the accidental forces of history is clear from the fact that what is now happening was foretold long ago, thus demonstrating that God remains in control of events. But more, the time in which the readers live is the climax of history. OT prophets inquired about it, and even angels longed to catch a glimpse of it. That prophets could foresee the future was due to the presence with them of the Christ who has now been revealed (v. 11). Small wonder that those early Christians had little trouble finding a witness to Christ in the Hebrew Scriptures. The very spirit of Christ had been at work in them!

1:13-2:3

How to React

The gifts of God are never without corresponding responsibility; that is now the theme to which our author turns.

1:13-16, To New Life. Roll up the sleeves of your mind! No time now to sit. The task is clear: conform your life, once lived totally apart from God (v. 14), to the new situation in which you find yourself (v. 15). One must now be set aside—the meaning of “holy”—for God's purposes. One is to pattern one's behavior according to God's priorities (v. 16).

1:17-21, To Old Life. If one is to respond appropriately to the new life, one can do it only by abandoning the old one. Again, the metaphors tumble over one another. Like exiles whose own values are constantly threatened by the culture in which they are forced to live, Christians must hold fast to God's priorities (v. 17; see 1:1; 2:11; 4:3-4). Like captives freed because their ransom has been paid, Christians are free from the shackles that bound them to their old and futile ways (1:18; see 4:2, 6). Like people for whom a sacrifice has been made to God, and a most precious sacrifice—his own son—Christians who now know the goal of history (1:20) look to their own future with a confidence inspired by God's son risen from the dead (vv. 19, 21; see 1:3).

1:22-2:3, To the Christian Community.

New times demand new companions who share in the new situation. So with Christians. New creatures born of God's own creative word (see Gen. 1:1; John 1:1), Christians are to cling to one another as to members of their own family (1 Pet. 1:22). That is what the church is meant to be. That fellowship alone abides, though all else fails (vv. 24-25).

The author returns to the first metaphor: newborn babes (2:2; see 1:3). Abandoning the evil and futile practices of their former lives (2:1), Christians are now to seek, indeed yearn for, that living and abiding word of God that conveys his love and his kindness in the same way that a baby yearns for its mother's milk. That nourishment, that word, is what sustains the Christians in their new life; it alone sustains them, and it is all they need.

PART TWO: 2:4-3:12

A New People in Christ and How to React

The author turns, in this second major part of the Letter, to a consideration of how Christians as a group should react to their new life and their new situation. In the first part, that new life was considered from the perspective of the individual; here it is considered from the viewpoint of that new individual in a new community, namely, the community of fellow Christians. The transition from consideration of the new life from an individual to a communal perspective was begun in 1:22-2:3, which thus served both as a conclusion to the first part and an introduction to the second.

2:4-10

A New People, Strange to Others

Typically for our author, themes announced in the opening verses now receive further exposition. Both the newness (see 1:3; 2:2) and the resulting strangeness of Christ's new people (see 1:1, 17) are taken up again in these verses, and additional insights are given.

What was discussed in 2:1-3 under the metaphor of new birth is now considered under the metaphors of a new building (vv. 4-8) and a new people (vv. 9-10).

The whole of the author's discourse on a new people is woven from threads taken from the OT; Christ's spirit was already present with the writers of the OT, informing them about the future (see 1:10-11).

The theme of the verses is given in 2:4: Christ, though precious to God, is also rejected by some human beings. Christ is the living stone because he is risen from the dead; he is the cornerstone (see v. 6) for those who build their lives on trust in him, and in that way also share his risen life (v. 5a). The community is not passive, however, as a building is; its members are to be active in their Christian life, serving God as did the priests of old (v. 5b).

The enigma of the rejection of God's own cornerstone is considered in vv. 7-9. Our author is no ethereal optimist, giving sugarcoated palliatives and refusing to look facts in the face. People do reject Christ—his crucifixion alone demonstrates that fact—but that rejection does not diminish Christ, it diminishes those who reject him. Even the OT knew that would happen, as the next two quotations demonstrate. The stumbling, the rejection occurs because people do not accept God's creative word incarnate in Christ (cf. 1:2, where accepting Christ is identified as obedience). Yet just as obedience occurred in accordance with God's will, so does the disobedience (2:8b). One should not make too much of that statement, as though every individual's fate were sealed from the beginning. Rather, the statement grows out of the question whether those who oppose God can also thwart his gracious plan for the redemption of sinful humanity. Such is not the case, and the import of this phrase is that nothing occurs that is beyond the power and purview of God. God remains in control of his world, and even rejection of his Son cannot stay his primary purpose of salvation. The same problem is raised in Rom. 9:19-26 and is answered there and in 11:25-26: God's final goal is salvation for human beings. The presence in Rom. 9:33, and here in v. 6, of a quotation from Isa. 28:16 shows both authors are pursuing the same line of thought. The question apparently was a common one for early Christians. The emphasis in this passage is not on those who disobey, however. Rather, it is on those who obey, as 1 Pet. 2:9-10 makes clear. Here again, our author takes over a whole collection of phrases used to describe Israel as God's chosen people and applies them here to Christians whose fellowship now comprises both Jews and Gentiles. The emphasis is again on the contrast between then and now and, hence, on the newness of the Christians' present situation.

2:11-3:7

How to React to the World

So new is the Christians' situation, in fact, that they must learn a whole new set of reactions to the world with which they had once been so familiar. Those reactions are introduced (vv. 11-12) and discussed by means of three examples: the conduct of citizens, of slaves, and of wives and husbands.

2:11-12, Introduction. Once more, the metaphor of exiles and aliens occurs (see 1:1, 17), describing the relationship of Christians to their own culture: they are now strangers in the midst of what once was familiar. Viewed as evildoers, Christians must by their good conduct give the lie to such accusations.

2:13-17, As Good Citizens. To be a good citizen in the Roman Empire meant to obey its laws and the edicts of its rulers (see Rom. 13:1-7). Being good Christians means to live as decent citizens do. The need for Christians to abstain from unacceptable cultural practices (see 1 Pet. 4:3) will excite enough criticism; no need to make it worse with acts unbecoming decent folk. Christians must live in such a way that accusations against them are shown to be foolish chatter based on ignorance.

2:18-25, As Good Slaves. The same point is made using slaves as the example. Slaves, like Christians, undergo punishment; if it is undeserved and quietly borne, it has God's approval, but only then. Evil slaves, like evil Christians, only get what they deserve when they are punished. The pattern from which that kind of insight is derived is Jesus himself. His conduct during his Passion shows how Christians are to react in a similar situation of hostility. Once astray, they are now under the Shepherd's care and must act accordingly (v. 25).

3:1-7, As Good Wives and Husbands. The point is made again, now using wives as an example. Though legally subject to others (once father, now husband), good wives nevertheless even in such a situation lead exemplary lives. The good wife pays attention not to outward show but to inward virtue; similarly, Christians are to pay attention not to outward show but to their inward faith, so that as true children of Sarah they do what is right and do not let others terrify them into doing what is wrong (v. 6). The good husband shows tender concern for his wife; similarly, Christians are to show concern for one another so that God will listen to their petitions to him (v. 7). In this way, three classes of people (slaves, wives, husbands) among the many to be found within the Christian community (also masters, children, rich, and poor, to name a few) serve not only as the objects of ethical advice in their own right but also as examples of the way all Christians are to act within the potentially hostile culture that surrounds them.

3:8-12

How to React in the Christian Fellowship

Typically for our author, the conclusion of the previous passage (v. 7) introduces the next. In sentiments reminiscent of Paul (see Rom. 12:9-21), Christians are advised how they are to treat one another. Here the example is the Christian fellowship itself. All of the points implied in the three examples (citizen, slave, wife, and husband) are here made explicit in relation to the conduct of Christians toward one another. The vocation of the Christian is precisely to act in the ways outlined in earlier passages; that is the way to find favor with God (v. 9). It will occasion no surprise that our author finds confirmation from the OT, this time from Ps. 34:12-16: the spirit of Christ present to those authors (see 1 Pet. 1:10-12) led them to write things that are as valid now regarding Christ as they were then regarding Israel.

PART THREE: 3:13-5:14

A Fate of Suffering in Christ and How to React

Having advised his readers how to react individually to their new situation and then collectively, our author now once again makes explicit what has been implied to this point: the new life, because it follows the suffering Christ, will inevitably be one of suffering. Following a goodness so new that to those who oppose it it appears as evil, Christians prepare themselves for a new life now and for the new future still to come.

3:13-22

Christ's Fate Has Historic Importance

The universality of Christ's importance is now illustrated by the fact that not only for the living, but also for the dead Christ's example in suffering and his message of God's mercy are of ultimate significance.

3:13-17, Christ's Earthly Fate. Like a musician creating a symphony, our author resumes themes enunciated earlier (see 1:6; 2:12, 15, 19-20; 3:9) and continues to develop them. What happened to Christ is here presumed, rather than made explicit, and the implications of Christ's life for the Christian's life are then enunciated.

The bold affirmation that none will harm those zealous for what is right (v. 13) must immediately be modified in the light of reality. In fact, many—including Christ!—who are zealous for what is right do suffer (v. 14), yet in spite of that one is not to fear. Christ's lordship is all-important, and not even suffering is to deter the Christian from confessing it (v. 15a). One must always be ready to let others know why one does what one does in light of Christ's lordship (v. 15b), but it must never be done arrogantly or with condescension. Most important of all, Christians must never give others a justifiable reason to accuse them of evil. If Christians are innocent of the evil with which they are charged, that fact will come to light, and then those who think following Christ leads to evil will to their shame discover their error (v. 16). If suffering is inevitable, however, let it be wrongly afflicted despite one's good behavior, rather than rightly inflicted because of one's wrong behavior (v. 17).

Beneath the surface of this discussion lies the realization that human culture is so irreversibly opposed to God that it can only make a false judgment about the acts of those who seek to obey God by following Christ. That point will become explicit in 4:1-4, but it already plays its role in this discussion of the suffering inflicted on faithful Christians.

3:18-22, Christ's Supernatural Task. The reason for preferring unjust to just suffering lies in the fate of Christ; v. 18 makes that explicit. Yet Christ's death had more significance than for the living only; it had significance even for those who are lying in the bonds of death. Volumes have been written in the attempt to understand the exact nuances of v. 19 and the earlier traditions that may underlie the verse. Yet in this context of the meaning of Christ's fate, it seems to point to the fact that not even death prior to the appearance of Christ could separate the ungodly from Christ's proclamation of God's redemption and mercy. Such an understanding is confirmed in 4:6, which is a further commentary on this passage. Further, tradition held that those of Noah's generation were the most evil people who ever lived; after all, they caused God to flood the earth. Yet even they heard Christ's words of mercy!

And Noah? He and his companions in the ark were delivered from a sin-corrupted world into a renewed and cleansed creation by means of the waters of the flood (3:20). Similarly, Christians are delivered by the water of baptism from a sin-corrupted existence to a renewed and cleansed life in Christ (v. 21). That has been our author's point from the beginning (see 1:3-4). Baptismal water therefore symbolizes not a washing of bodily dirt but a spiritual cleansing through the power of Christ's victory over death (see Rom. 6:1-11 for a similar view of the meaning of baptism). It is to that victorious Christ that baptism links us, to that Christ who now rules over all creation by the authority of God himself. No wonder our author thinks temporary suffering is a small price to pay for so great a privilege.

A New Life Now and a New Time Coming

This passage, with its continuing discussion of the significance of Christ's sacrificial death, resumes the thought of 3:18. We find here the clearest statement in the Letter about the current situation of the readers in relation to their cultural environment. The verses also offer hope for a time when that painful relationship will end.

4:1-6, A New Life Now. What the new life Christians enjoy by reason of baptism into Christ means for their life among their former friends and within their culture is made clear in these verses. Where once Christians participated in the general activities of their surrounding culture (v. 3), they now no longer do so. They are, as Christians, like strangers in a strange land, in which they must live as cultural nonconformists in a time highly suspicious of any nonconformity. That is the situation that the metaphors of "exiles" and "aliens" are intended to illumine, just as are the metaphors of "slaves" and "wives." We are not to understand that the Christians were actually exiles or aliens in Asia Minor, any more than they were all actually slaves or women. The point is simply that because the Christians' new values did not permit them to participate in the social and religious customs of their culture as they once had, they would now have no more legal status or protection than that enjoyed by resident aliens or people exiled from their native lands (a common enough fate in the Roman world). For that reason they would also be hated, and that hatred would occasionally express itself in sporadic persecution (1:6 reflects the potential for persecutions to break out at any time; 4:12 reflects the actuality of persecutions that have broken out). But such persecutions were occasional and local and were based on cultural hostility rather than on some official, empire-wide persecution of all Christians everywhere.

Because such a Christian attitude of nonconformity was made necessary by the fate of Christ himself, such suffering meant deliverance from a life of enmity to God (sin) and hence was worth any price (vv. 1-2).

Suffering was, therefore, not a regrettable accident but a virtual necessity; until society itself was transformed, Christians could expect the same hostility to be directed against them that was directed against Christ. Yet the society that caused such suffering would also have to give account of itself before God for its rejection of the good news about Christ (v. 5), as will all, both living and dead, who have heard that good news (v. 6).

4:7-11, A New Time Coming. That time of accounting, and of the transforming of society, was not far off; of that our author was convinced (v. 7). Yet incredibly—and here is the key to why suffering was worth the cost—that new time coming could already be enjoyed now, in the Christian fellowship. The way Christians now acted and were to act toward one another was simply a foreshadowing of that time when all of society would be transformed by the visible rule of God. Mutual love (v. 8), ungrudging hospitality (v. 9), activity carried on for the benefit of others, as befits God's grace (vv. 10-11a)—that and more would be the order of the day in that new, transformed society. It was just that grace that Christ had revealed, and hence, in the end, all that was done would glorify that Christ and the God who sent him (v. 11b).

How to React in the World

The very different lives Christians live, not conformed to the world but transformed by Christ (see Rom. 12:2), inevitably provoke hostility and sporadic outbreaks of persecution against them. Yet that reaction of the world should not occasion surprise (1 Pet. 4:12) but rather rejoicing (v. 13)! Such suffering is part of the redemptive suffering of Christ; to be reproached for following him is to share in the grace his suffering occasioned (vv. 14, 16). But again the familiar warning: don't think just because you are a Christian, any suffering you must endure automatically displays such grace. If you suffer for evil acts, such suffering has nothing to do with Christ (v. 15; see 2:16, 20; 3:17).

There is another reason why suffering can be a source of rejoicing, however, and that is because our author is convinced that such suffering is the beginning of the final judgment, a judgment that will begin, just as did salvation, with the household of God (4:17). Thus, the apparent victory of non-Christians over the Christian fellowship should not cause those "victors" to rejoice but to reflect: if those who followed God's will are subject to such suffering, what will be the fate of those who did not follow his will (vv. 17-18)?

The result: those who suffer as Christians are not to succumb to the temptation to strike back or engage in compensatory evil. Rather, as did Christ, they are to entrust their fate to their creator (see 2:23), who will be faithful to his promise of redemption given in Christ (v. 19).

5:1-11

How to React in the Christian Fellowship

Following a pattern exhibited throughout the Letter, our author, having told his readers the nature of the new life they have assumed, now tells them how to react to that strange newness both in the world and in the Christian fellowship. To be at home in the new life means to be accepted into the Christian community that has accepted that new life and to be rejected by the society at large that has rejected it. That is the basic insight our author has been following in the whole Letter.

5:1-6, How Leaders and Followers Are to React. The author here identifies himself as a fellow "elder" (v. 1), but it is not clear whether that has a literal meaning (old man) or is symbolic (leader), since there is a reference to "younger people" in v. 5. While "elder" is a known early Christian title for leaders, "younger people" is not normally used as a synonym for "followers," i.e., those that are not leaders. Whatever one may decide on that issue, however, it is clear that elders do play a leadership role here (vv. 2-3), whether by virtue of age or bestowal of that office by the congregation.

The author further characterizes himself as a witness to the sufferings of Christ (v. 1), yet that may mean not so much the suffering Christ underwent as it means the suffering those undergo who belong to Christ. Since suffering here is coupled with the glory that is yet to come, a coupling we saw in 4:13 where it specifically referred to the suffering undergone by those who follow Christ, that is probably what is meant here. Thus the author means to say that he, like his readers, has both seen suffering and, as a member of the Christian community, has shared in the glory that will finally be made visible when the present age ends.

While separate advice is given to both "older" and "younger" Christians in this passage, the point is the same: they are not to be overbearing toward one another. They must wear humility like a garment, which is present wherever its wearer is (v. 5). While it is not explicit, it is likely that the example of Christ remains in the author's mind. Elders are to exercise their leadership with the same selflessness that characterized Christ's own life and death. Verse 6 serves as the climax of the advice to both old and young: live now in the humility being imposed on you by a hostile culture because you do God's will, because in due time God will transform his world, and then the whole of human society will reflect the way Christians now act toward one another and even toward those who persecuted them.

5:7–11, How Members Are to React. The author ends his Letter to his beleaguered readers with some final words on how members of the household of faith are to live their lives in their hostile world. They are to be under no illusions: their opposition is satanic and would, if it could, destroy them (v. 8). But because their confidence is in God, they need have no anxiety on that score. If God is for them, no opposition can be of ultimate significance (v. 7; cf. Rom. 8:31). Temptations to give in to the demands of their culture are therefore to be resisted, even when that means suffering, because such suffering is the universal badge of the true followers of Christ (1 Pet. 5:9). Yet more, such suffering is temporary, because God's plan for his world includes a final restoration in which Christ's followers will have a glorious part. With such a future in store, God will surely not abandon them in their present difficulties (v. 10). For that reason, the only proper response of those who follow Christ, whether or not they must undergo suffering, is one of praise to the God whose gracious and redemptive dominion over all his creation will finally be revealed (v. 11).

5:12–14

Closing Greetings

It was often the custom of people who wrote letters like this to conclude with a passage in their own handwriting (see Gal. 6:11–18; 1 Cor. 16:21–23; Col. 4:18; 2 Thess. 3:17–18; perhaps also Philem. 19). Whether that is the case here or not we are not told, but our author does conclude his Letter in the fashion typical for that time. Silvanus is the one who delivered rather than who wrote the letter (see the Introduction).

The author characterizes what is contained in the Letter as "God's true grace," something he has both declared and about which he has exhorted. Grace is thus both a gift and a responsibility, something reflected in this Letter that has regularly alternated declarations of God's grace with advice on the proper ways to respond to the new situation in which that grace has placed the follower of Christ. It is that grace, which includes both gift and responsibility, in which the readers are urged to stand fast. (On the likely symbolic rather than literal meaning of Babylon, see the Introduction.) Later tradition associated the Mark who wrote the Gospel bearing that name with Peter in Rome; verse 13b probably is an early form of that tradition. The Christian kiss was a regular form of showing familial intimacy among members of the household of faith (e.g., 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26). What could be a more appropriate ending to this Letter to the beleaguered followers of Christ than the wish for peace, both now in the midst of their suffering and in God's promised new world when all suffering will be a thing of the past.

2 PETER

RICHARD J. BAUCKHAM

INTRODUCTION

The structure of the Second Letter of Peter can be analyzed as follows:

- 1:1–2, Address and greeting
- T<sup>1</sup> 1:3–11, Theme: A summary of Peter's message
- T<sup>2</sup> 1:12–15, Occasion: Peter's testament
- A<sup>1</sup> 1:16–19, First apologetic section
- A<sup>2</sup> 1:20–21, Second apologetic section
- T<sup>3</sup> 2:1–3a, Peter's prediction of false teachers
- A<sup>3</sup> 2:3b–10a, Third apologetic section
- E<sup>1</sup> 2:10b–22, Denunciation of the opponents
- T<sup>4</sup> 3:1–4, Peter's prediction of scoffers
- A<sup>4</sup> 3:5–10, Fourth apologetic section
- E<sup>2</sup> 3:11–16, Exhortation
- 3:17–18, Conclusion

2 Peter belongs not only to the literary genre of letter but also to that of "testament" (→ Testament [3]). Four passages in particular (T<sup>1</sup>–T<sup>4</sup> above) are in testament style and identify 2 Peter as Peter's testament, in which, foreseeing his death, he makes provision for his teaching (1:3–11) to be remembered (1:12–15) and predicts the coming of false teachers after his death (2:1–3a; 3:1–4). Around these testamentary passages are arranged a series of apologetic passages (A<sup>1</sup>–A<sup>4</sup>) in which Peter's teaching is defended against the objections of the false teachers. Two exhortations (E<sup>1</sup>, E<sup>2</sup>) contrast the libertine behavior of the opponents (2:10b–22) with the holy conduct expected of the readers (3:11–16).

In Jewish usage the testament was a fictional genre, used to attribute material to OT figures. It is therefore likely that 2 Peter is also a pseudonymous work, attributed to Peter after his death. This presumption is confirmed by the fact that, whereas the testamentary passages predict the coming of the false teachers (2:1–3a; 3:1–4), in the apologetic passages they are referred to in the present tense (2:10b–22; 3:5, 9, 16). Clearly they are the author's contemporaries with whom he is conducting a current debate. His juxtaposition of future- and present-tense references to them conveys the message: these apostolic prophecies are now being fulfilled. But, in that case, his fiction is meant to be a transparent one.

These literary considerations and the probable date of 2 Peter (see commentary below on 3:1–4) make Petrine authorship very improbable. The real author's reason for writing a testament of Peter lies in his wish to defend the apostolic message in the postapostolic period against opponents who held that, in important respects, it was now discredited. He wished to claim no authority of his own but to vindicate the continuing normative authority of the apostles' teaching. His choice of Peter as pseudonym may imply that his letter was sent out by the Roman church, which remembered Peter as its most prestigious leader.

The two features of the opponents' teaching that dominate the author's debate with them are eschatological skepticism (i.e., skepticism about things expected to occur at "the end") and moral libertinism. Probably their aim was to free Christianity of elements derived from its Jewish background that were proving an embarrassment in a pagan cultural environment: its apocalyptic eschatology, which was alien to Hellenistic thinking and particularly problematic when the Parousia—the glorious return of Jesus—failed to occur (3:4), and its ethical rigorism, which made life difficult for Christians in the context of pagan society's greater permissiveness. Against them the author holds that the future hope for divine judgment and salvation and the ethical motivation it provides are essential features of normative apostolic teaching that must be maintained.

2 Peter faces the twin problems of Christianity's transition from a Jewish to a Hellenistic environment and from the apostolic to the post-apostolic age. In response it asserts the normativeness of apostolic teaching, not woodenly repeated, but interpreted for a new situation. Thus the Christian message undergoes in 2 Peter a significant degree of translation into Hellenistic cultural terms (see commentary below on 1:3–11), but at the same time the author resists an extreme hellenization, such as the opponents advocated, in which essential elements of the apostolic message were lost. To preserve the ethical demand and the future hope of the gospel, he reasserts the Jewish apocalyptic perspective of primitive Christianity. In its striking combination of Hellenistic religious language and apocalyptic eschatology, 2 Peter provides a model for the church's perennial task of retaining the gospel's essential content while giving it meaningful expression in new cultural contexts.

COMMENTARY

1:1-2, Address and Greeting. The address introduces at once a major concern of the Letter: to communicate apostolic teaching to a post-apostolic age. It compares the faith of the apostles ("ours") and that of the (postapostolic) readers to point out that the latter are at no disadvantage.

1:3-11, A Summary of Peter's Message.

This passage is a summary of Peter's definitive teaching as it is to be remembered after his death. It follows a standard sermon pattern in three parts: first, a reference to God's saving activity in the past (vv. 3-4); second, ethical exhortation, based on the first part and with the third in view (vv. 5-10); and third, the promise of eschatological salvation (v. 11). The main point is that Christians must confirm their calling through moral effort if they are to inherit the promises of eschatological salvation. This is therefore a positive statement of the two aspects of apostolic teaching—the future hope and the ethical motivation it provides—which the rest of 2 Peter is to defend against the eschatological skepticism and moral libertinism of the opponents.

Despite the insistence in vv. 5-10 that faith must have moral results and that Christ's promises have ethical conditions, the author is clear that salvation is not a human achievement. It is the grace of God that makes moral progress possible (vv. 3, 8), while final salvation will not be a quid pro quo but the lavish provision of the divine generosity (v. 11).

This passage is also notable for its translation of the apostolic message into the language of Hellenistic religion. The author is concerned with making contact with the moral ideals and religious aspirations of his cultural context but at the same time avoiding the loss of real Christian substance in which the extreme hellenization of the gospel by his opponents resulted. Hence, the Christian hope is stated in strongly Hellenistic terms in v. 4b, as escape from mortality through sharing the immortality of the gods, but this description is balanced by the more traditional one in v. 11 and especially by the cosmic eschatology of chap. 3. The author does not allow a merely individual and spiritual immortality to replace the apocalyptic hope for the triumph of God's righteousness in world history (cf. 3:13).

Hellenistic terminology is also prominent in the list of virtues in 1:5-7. But while in this way acknowledging that some of the ethical ideals of paganism are also Christian, the author gives them a decisively Christian context by means of the first and last items. Christian faith is the root from which all virtues grow, and Christian love is the crowning virtue to which all the others must contribute.

1:12-15, Peter's Testament. Echoing the standard language of the testament genre, the author presents 2 Peter as a testament written to provide a permanent reminder of Peter's teaching.

1:16-19, First Apologetic Section. Here the author begins his defense of Peter's teaching by replying to the first of the objections leveled against it by the opponents. The objection (implied by the denial of it in v. 16) was that when the apostles preached the future coming of Jesus as judge and king, their message was not based on divine revelation but was a "myth" in the sense of a human invention. The author has two replies to this charge. First, in vv. 16b-18, he appeals to the transfiguration, of which the apostles were eyewitnesses. He sees it as God's appointment of Jesus to be the messianic king of Psalm 2, proclaimed Son of God (Ps. 2:7) on the holy mountain (Ps. 2:6) with the task of subduing the world to God's rule (Ps. 2:8-9). Thus the apostles saw Jesus divinely appointed to the office that he will exercise at his coming in glory. Second, the apostles' preaching of the Parousia was also reliably based on OT prophecy (2 Pet. 1:19).

1:20-21, Second Apologetic Section. A second objection, which would undermine the author's appeal to OT prophecy, must now be met. The opponents denied the divine origin of the prophetic writings, claiming that although the prophets may have received signs, dreams, and visions, their prophecies were their own human interpretations of these, not God-given interpretations. (This is probably the view that is contradicted in the difficult v. 20b.) The author's reply insists on the divine inspiration of the prophets' words.

2:1-3a, Peter's Prediction of False Teachers. The author now introduces the opponents explicitly by means of Peter's prophecy of them. His principal accusation against them is that they disown their Master, Jesus, by flouting his moral authority. Evidently their teaching encouraged immoral behavior by denying eschatological judgment: ironically, they are thereby incurring judgment at the imminent Parousia (v. 1b).

2:3b-10a, Third Apologetic Section. The opponents scoffed at the idea of future judgment at the Parousia. Divine judgment never happens, they said. It must be taking time off or taking a nap (v. 3b). To refute this claim, the author cites well-known OT examples of divine judgment: the judgment of the fallen angels (following current Jewish exegesis of Gen. 6:1-6), the Flood, and the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

These instances establish the general rule that God punishes the wicked (2 Pet. 2:9b), but they are also typological prophecies of the judgment to come. Hence, the universal character of the Flood (v. 5) and the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 6) are mentioned, since they foreshadow the universal judgment by fire in the future (3:7, 10).

The examples also show that God delivers the righteous when he judges the wicked (2:9a), and so Noah and Lot are models of faithful Christians who will be delivered from the eschatological judgment. Both were committed to righteousness in situations ripe for judgment (the details in vv. 5, 7–8 derive from Jewish exegetical tradition). What enables such people to persist in righteousness is the hope for deliverance when God's righteousness prevails. In the same way, the hope of the Parousia should sustain 2 Peter's readers in the practice of righteousness.

In this passage, the author begins to use the Letter of Jude as a source (cf. Jude 6–8). He continues to do so down to 3:3 but adapts the material to meet the needs of argument against a different kind of false teaching.

2:10b–22, Denunciation of the Opponents. Here the author exposes the sins of his opponents with considerable rhetorical effect. They are not well-meaning Christians who fall into sin through ignorance and weakness; they are brazen, deliberate sinners who think themselves above moral constraints. They treat the powers of evil with contempt (v. 10b), heedless of the danger of falling into their grip. They openly indulge in all manner of sensuality and turn even the church's fellowship meals into occasions for self-indulgence, so that the author punningly calls these "love-feasts" (Gk. agapai) "deceits" (apatai; v. 13b; cf. Jude 12). But by means of two comparisons he shows the attitudes of the opponents to be sheer stupidity that will lead to their condemnation at the judgment they deny. He compares them with irrational animals, whose natural destiny is to be slaughtered (2 Pet. 2:12), and with the OT prophet Balaam, whose greed for financial reward blinded his judgment, so that he was foolish enough to think he could oppose God's will with impunity (vv. 15–16; cf. Num. 22). In his case even an irrational animal knew better!

The opponents were teachers who compounded their guilt by leading others astray, especially recent converts (2 Pet. 2:18), attracted by the potent promise of "freedom" (v. 19)—i.e., freedom from fear of divine judgment and hence from moral constraint. But the opponents cannot give the freedom they promise because they themselves are slaves to sin and its destructive power (v. 19b). Whereas real liberation comes through subjection to God's will, the freedom from divine authority of which the false teachers boast turns out to be mere subjection to evil. So, as teachers, they are like dry wells and quickly disappearing haze, which seem to offer refreshment but soon disappoint (v. 17a).

Verses 20–22 stress the seriousness of moral apostasy. Like the man in Jesus' story (Matt. 12:43–45), to which v. 20b alludes, Christians who return to the immorality of their pagan past are in a worse state than before their conversion, because then they sinned in ignorance, whereas now they sin against the light and with contempt for grace.

3:1–4, Peter's Prediction of Scoffers. By mentioning 1 Peter and echoing 2 Pet. 1:12–15, 3:1–2 return to testament style and introduce a second prediction by Peter, which portrays the opponents as skeptics who mock divine revelation. They claim that the prophecy of the Parousia, which had been expected within the lifetime of the first generation of Christians ("the fathers"), has proved illusory now that that generation has passed away (v. 4). This objection provides the best indication we have of the date of 2 Peter, since it probably reflects a problem that would have arisen about A.D. 80–90 but that seems to have been quickly forgotten and is never mentioned in the literature of the second century. But the eschatological skepticism of the opponents did not result solely from the non-fulfillment of the Parousia prophecy; the last phrase of v. 4 suggests that this only confirmed their rationalistic assumption that divine interventions in history do not happen.

3:5–10, Fourth Apologetic Section. The author makes two replies to the scoffers' objection in v. 4. The first (vv. 5–7) counters the rationalistic assumption in v. 4b by arguing that the continuance of the world as a stable habitation for humanity is not to be taken for granted but depends on the will of the Creator. The picture in vv. 5–6 is of the universe brought into existence out of the waters of chaos (Gen. 1:2, 6–7, 9) and then at the time of the Flood submerged again (cf. Gen. 7:11). Since there has been one universal judgment, by water, the prophecy of another, by fire, is credible (2 Pet. 3:7). The author envisages world history in three periods, divided by the two great cosmic cataclysms of the Flood (cf. 2:5) and the eschatological conflagration. But his interest in these is more moral than cosmological. It is the fire of divine judgment that will burn up the sky and expose the evil world to God's judgment (v. 10) so that the new world of righteousness may be established (v. 13). The ideas and imagery derive from Jewish apocalyptic, whose relevance the author is keen to assert against the extreme hellenization of the gospel by his opponents.

The second reply (vv. 8–9) meets the problem of the delay of the Parousia (v. 4a) with arguments already traditional in Jewish apocalyptic. In v. 8, God's eternal perspective on history is contrasted with the short-term expectations of human beings. To say that God is "late" in fulfilling his promises (v. 9) is to judge by impatient human standards. Moreover, the delay is no cause for complaint but a sign of God's grace by which he bears with sinners in hope of their repentance. But so that sinners should not be able to presume on God's forbearance, delaying repentance, the author then stresses that the Parousia will come unexpectedly, like a burglar at night (v. 10; cf. Matt. 24:43–44; 1 Thess. 5:2).

3:11–16, Exhortation. Just as the opponents' eschatological skepticism was the corollary of their libertinism, so the readers' hope of the Parousia should have as its corollary a life of righteousness. The key lies in v. 13: in the new world, unlike the present one, Righteousness (personified) will be at home. So those who hope to live there must become righteous (vv. 11, 14) and thus fulfill God's purpose in delaying the Parousia (v. 15a).

Since Paul's Letters to the churches to which 2 Peter was written were already being treated as Scripture (v. 16b), the author wishes to point out that his teaching is in harmony with Paul's. The opponents' misinterpretation of Paul (v. 16) could mean that they claimed Paul's support for their antinomian view of Christian freedom or that they held Paul's expectation of the Parousia to be disproved.

3:17–18, Conclusion. The testamentary convention—that Peter is forewarning of false teachers to come—reappears in this closing summary of the Letter's message.

INTRODUCTION

The First, Second, and Third Letters of John open a window on one period in the life of the Johannine community, Christian groups that earlier had produced the Gospel of John. Indeed, interpretation of these writings depends in large measure on reconstructing their historical context from the sparse clues they supply. A major question concerns the relationship between the Johannine Letters and the Gospel of John. While some interpreters argue that one or all of the Letters precede the composition of the Gospel of John, most Johannine scholars now date the Letters after the Gospel or late in the extended period of its composition. A date about A.D. 100 is therefore preferred for the Letters. The three Letters are also usually attributed to one author, who may or may not have been the final editor of the Gospel.

The principal factor in the setting of the Letters appears in 1 John 2:19—the Johannine community was split; some of its members had left it. 1 John was written to the remaining members of the community to encourage them to remain faithful and to warn them against the errors of the opponents who had left the community.

1 John neither begins nor ends like a letter, presumably because it was not sent to another town but intended to be read locally. It is also anonymous, though there is no convincing evidence for assigning it to any figure other than the “elder” (Gk. presbyteros) of 2 John 1 and 3 John 1 (→ Presbyter, Presbytery).

Apparently both the elder and his opponents held to a common tradition. 1 John offers an interpretation of this tradition and calls the community to hold to the teaching it had received, but it does not quote the Gospel of John or refer to the Beloved Disciple (→ Beloved Disciple). One explanation for the absence of such an appeal is that the opponents claimed these authorities also.

The issues in the debate between the elder and the opponents are suggested by emphases in the Letters themselves. Whereas the Gospel was written “in order that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God” (John 20:31), 1 John insists that one must confess that Jesus Christ has come in flesh (4:2). 2 John 7 identifies the deceivers as those who do not confess “Jesus Christ come [having come or coming] in flesh.” From this emphasis on the incarnation, we may assume that the opponents held to the divinity of the Christ but either denied or diminished the significance of his humanity. Their view may be an early indication of Docetism, the heresy that emerged in the second century claiming that Jesus only seemed to be human.

In response, the elder reaffirmed the importance of the confession that the Christ came in flesh. The allusion to “water and blood” (1 John 5:6) may also be a reassertion of the importance of the death of Jesus. The opponents evidently placed so much emphasis on the coming of Jesus as the heavenly revealer (a key motif in the Fourth Gospel) that his death was no longer important for salvation. The elder consequently reasserted the importance of the humanity of Jesus and the saving significance of his death.

Similar inferences yield other points of difference between the two factions. The elder appealed to the community’s hope for the future. Although both factions held that believers have crossed over from death into life (1 John 3:14), the elder contended that the future coming requires that believers purify themselves and be righteous (3:2, 7).

The ethical teachings of the Gospel of John do not include anything like the richness of the Sermon on the Mount. Consequently, the elder repeatedly called for observance of the new commandment, love for one another, and for living “just as” Jesus lived (1 John 2:6, 18, 27; 3:2, 3, 7, 12; 4:17; 2 John 4, 6; 3 John 2, 3). In the view of the elder, the opponents had violated this community ethic by leaving the community; they had shown that they did not love the brethren. Those who remained, he exhorted, should continue to be faithful both to the tradition they had received “from the beginning” and to the community ethic of love for one another.

2 John and 3 John were probably written at about the same time as 1 John, but they are letters to sister churches. 2 John is addressed to “the elect lady and her children,” while 3 John is addressed to Gaius, a member of a congregation that had received travelers sent by the elder. From these letters we gain further information regarding steps the elder was taking to prevent the dissension from spreading to other congregations in the constellation of Johannine churches.

The Johannine Letters continue to have value for both historical and theological reasons. Because they cast light on a chapter in the history of the J hannine community, the Letters allow us to read the Gospel of John with greater insight. They expose both the strengths and weaknesses of Johannine theology and record the problems to which that theology was vulnerable. As a collection and individually, the Letters also provide a tragic reflection on the hostility and distortions that are created by schisms and divisions within the church. Their greatest value, therefore, may be realized as a by-product of their original purpose: they may help the church to recognize the destructive effects of divisions within the Christian community.

COMMENTARY

1 JOHN

1:1-4

The Prologue: The Word of Life

The opening words of 1 John announce that "the word of life" has been manifest. The message of life is grounded in the life of Jesus, God's son, who revealed the nature of eternal life, that life of another aeon that God's children now share. The prologue, therefore, introduces many of the Letter's major concerns: the reality of the incarnation, the nature of the life revealed by Jesus, and the importance of participation in the community if one is to share in that life.

Numerous outlines with varying numbers of divisions have been suggested for 1 John. The structure followed here is based on the repetition of the statement "God is . . ." three times in the Letter: "God is light" (1:5), "He is righteous" (2:29), and "God is love" (4:8). 1 John then demands that these qualities must dominate the lives of believers, i.e., God's children, just as they were manifested by Jesus. Raymond E. Brown, in his definitive commentary on the Letters, proposes a structure that highlights the repetition of "This is the Gospel" (lit., "message") in 1:5 and 3:11. The structure of the Letter is all the more difficult to define in outline form because of its use of transitional verses and paragraphs that may be placed with either the preceding or the following verses (e.g., 2:28; 4:1-6).

1:5-2:27

Light Among God's Children

If God is light, then God's children must walk (or live) in light. The issue is not the nature of God but the opponents' claim that they had a unique relationship with God. In response, the elder charges that their claims are false because they do not live in purity (i.e., light) or practice love for other believers. Their departure from the community proves that they were not really a part of it. Since they do not belong to the people of God, they are of the world; they belong to darkness, evil, and falsehood.

1:5-2:2, The Incompatibility of Light and Sin.

Because there is no darkness in God, there can be no sin in God's people. This axiom, which the opponents would have accepted also, does not mean that believers cannot sin, however.

1 John 1:6-2:2 is composed of six "if, then" statements. Three expose the errors of the opponents by quoting their slogans, characterizing their way of life, and asserting the consequences of their inconsistency. Since the author three times repeats the formula, "if we say . . ." (vv. 6, 8, 10), the opponents and perhaps some who remained within the community were apparently making assertions like: "we have fellowship with him" (v. 6); "we have no sin" (v. 8); and "we have never sinned" (v. 10). Those who live in sin cannot claim fellowship with God, however, because he is light. Moreover, if we say we have no sin we deceive ourselves and make God a liar.

On the other hand, the other three conditional sentences (1:7, 9; 2:1-2) offer assurances for those who recognize the presence of sin in their lives and confess it to God. Jesus Christ is now an advocate before the Father for those who confess their sin (→ Paraclete). The importance of the death of Jesus as an expiation for sin is also reasserted, not only for the community but for the whole world (→ Expiation).

2:3-11, Love as a Test of Knowledge. Just as the previous section quotes the sayings of the opponents using the formula, "if we say . . .," three further claims are introduced in this section by means of the phrase, "the one who claims": "the one who claims, 'I know him'" (2:4); "the one who claims to abide in him" (2:6); and "the one who claims to be in the light" (2:9).

John 17:3 defines eternal life as knowing God. The notion that knowledge of God could bring a person salvation or deliverance from this world was prevalent in ancient religions. Undoubtedly both the elder and those who had left the community claimed that they knew God. The elder demands, however, that knowledge of God must be confirmed by how one lives and suggests two tests: keeping God's commandments (1 John 2:3) and living "just as" Jesus lived (2:6). These tests recall the new commandment, "that you love one another just as I loved you" (John 13:34). What love for a brother or sister requires is defined later (1 John 3:17–18). Here, love is associated with light. Hate—the only alternative to love in Johannine thought—is a sign that one is walking in darkness. And in God there is no darkness at all (1:5).

2:12–17, Conflict with the World. The presence of light in the Christian community that is surrounded by a world characterized by darkness points metaphorically to the conflict between the two. The elder, therefore, assures the community that it was already victorious and forbade any compromise with the world. Here, the world is used not in a neutral sense to designate the created order but as a reference to all that lies under the power of evil (5:19; → World, The).

Verses 12–14 express assurance of victory over evil in two poetic stanzas (12–13; 14). Three groups are addressed in each stanza: children, fathers, and young men. The change to the past tense in v. 14 is only a stylistic variation and does not refer to some previous communication. As C. H. Dodd notes, the assurances to each of the groups are equally true for all believers. The Johannine writings call all believers "children of God," and the terms "fathers" and "young men" probably derive from references such as Jer. 31:34 and Joel 2:28.

Since the world is irreconcilably opposed to the community of believers, the elder admonishes the faithful that they cannot love the world and love God also. One love comes from evil ("the world") and is passing away; the other comes from God and abides forever.

2:18–27, Conflict Within the Community. The conflict with the world had invaded the community, however. Some had left the community, and these the elder calls "antichrists" (→ Antichrist, The). The appearance of such foes signaled the arrival of the "last hour"—a term found only in 1 John 2:18 in the NT. The elder did not need to explain the circumstances of the schism because members of the community already knew about it. We may infer, however, that the dispute was primarily about how Jesus was to be understood, as outlined in the Introduction.

Three emphatic addresses, "(and) you" (2:20, 24, 27), provide the structure for this section. Since some of those who remained may have considered joining the other faction, the elder assures them, "you have an anointing," by which he probably meant the Holy Spirit. They know the truth already, but the Antichrist is the Liar, the one who denies the Christ. The opponents, however, had been a part of the community, so the issue must be a specific confession of Christ, as suggested by 1 John 4:2. Yet, the elder warns that those who do not confess the Son do not have the Father either. He appeals, therefore, for the community to abide in the tradition they had received from the beginning and not to depart from it, following those who had left the community. They already had the promise of eternal life. They did not need a new teaching; they needed only to abide in the teaching they had already received from the Holy Spirit through the tradition of the community.

Righteousness Among God's Children

Because the conflict with the world had entered the community, the Johannine Christians needed guidance in distinguishing their opponents. Three related sections follow: the first deals with the hope of the righteous (2:28–3:10), the second with the love command (3:11–24), and the third with tests of the two spirits (4:1–6). The conflict that had engulfed the community was no less than a conflict between the children of God and the children of the devil. The elder shared the common assumption that the child would be like the parent. The children of God will see God, but they must be righteous, even as God is righteous. While the children of the devil continue in sin and lawlessness, the Johannine Christians cannot sin because they have been born of God.

Maintaining the command to love others within the community was a crucial test of one's faith. Like Cain, the children of the devil had no love for their brothers or sisters and did not share with those in need.

A different spirit was working within each faction of the divided community. The elder, therefore, charges the faithful to test the spirits both by what they said and by who followed them.

2:28–3:10, The Hope of the Righteous. The anointing received by the faithful brings both assurance and the requirement of righteousness. Because God is righteous, all who are "born of him"—a favorite Johannine description for the gift of eternal life that reorients the lives of the faithful—must be righteous also. The elder reasserts the hope of the coming of God at the end of time (→ Parousia). Human life will reach its ultimate fulfillment when the faithful see God and find that they are like him. This hope, however, also requires that the faithful purify themselves so that they will be ready to see God (see Matt. 5:8).

In Johannine thought sin and righteousness are opposites, like light and darkness or truth and falsehood. Each characterizes a way of life. Sin, above all, is characterized not as immorality but as unbelief (see John 16:8-9). The believers, therefore, cannot sin. One of the enigmas of 1 John is the relationship between 3:6, 9 and 1:8, 10. The former verses indicate that the believer cannot sin, while the latter claim that one who denies sin is deceived and makes God a liar. The alternative in chap. 3, however, is between "doing sin" (3:4, 8, 9) and "doing righteousness" (3:7, 10). The elder recognizes that believers sin also (1 John 1:8, 10), but demands that the faithful lead lives characterized by righteousness. The child must—and inevitably will—be like the parent, according to the elder. Believers will be righteous, like God; and those who do not belong to the community of the faithful will be like their father, the devil (see John 8:44).

3:11-24, The Love of the Righteous. The clearest sign of sin is the lack of love. The opponents have shown that they do not love the community, the elder charges, because they departed from it. The Johannine love command is significantly more restricted than that of the Sermon on the Mount, which commands love for one's enemies (Matt. 5:44). The new commandment required love for "one another," which was interpreted to mean love for others within the Christian community.

Those who did not love their Christian brothers and sisters, the elder charges, were like Cain, who killed his brother. Those who live by this command, however, have already crossed over from death into life. Such love is therefore an essential quality of that life that God gives to his own. That love is most clearly manifest in Jesus' act of laying down his life for his own. Believers, therefore, ought to live "just as" Jesus did. Specifically, the love command requires that one who sees a brother or sister in need will share with the one in need. Love is not just a feeling, therefore; it is the way the faithful live.

1 John 3:19-21 is open to multiple interpretations. The elder's concern seems to be the confidence that believers may have now. Some interpreters take these verses as a warning that God's judgment will be even greater than our judgment on ourselves. The tone of the verses, however, is one of assurance rather than warning. Our hearts may know our shortcomings, but God knows all things. Moreover, the faithful may be confident before God because they keep his commands.

His commands, of course, are twofold: believe (John 14:1), and love one another (John 13:34; 15:12; 1 John 2:7-11; 3:11, 16-18; 4:7-21). Both the keeping of these commands and the presence of the Spirit confirm one's place within the new covenant.

4:1-6, The Two Spirits. The reference to the Spirit in 3:24 introduces the need to distinguish between the work of two spirits: the spirit of truth and the spirit of deception. 1 John extends the dualism of John's worldview by reference to the two spirits, but parallels can be found in the Qumran scrolls and elsewhere. By saying that false prophets have "gone out" into the world (4:1), the elder is probably alluding to those who had gone out from the community (2:19).

One test to distinguish truth from deception is that of content (see Deut. 13:1-5). The elder adds to the required confession the affirmation that Jesus Christ came "in flesh" (cf. John 20:31). The opponents who had gone out from the community apparently either denied that the divine Word could become human or else they diminished the significance of his humanity in their effort to exalt his divinity. This error led to the heresy known as Docetism, the view that Jesus only seemed to be human. In contrast, 1 John demands full recognition of Jesus' humanity.

The second test of the spirits is that of response. The children of God respond to the divine Spirit, while the world responds to the spirit of deception. It may be, therefore, that the opponents were actually winning more converts than were the faithful who remained with the elder.

4:7-5:12

Love Among God's Children

The twin commands to believe and to love one another are linked in 3:23. Now each is considered again in major sections that bring the themes of the Letter to their fullest expression. Earlier sections admonish the community that just as God is light (1:5) and righteous (2:29), so the people of God must be free from sin. This section develops the essential link between God's love and the love of Christians for one another. 1 John 4:7-21 ranks along with 1 Corinthians 13 as one of the finest statements in the NT on the experience and nature of divine love within the human community. As in other parts of the Letter, transitional units (e.g., 5:1-4; 5:13) form links with both the preceding and the following verses. 1 John 5:1-4 affirms that those who keep the love commandment have been born of God. They have both God's testimony and the life that God gives to his children (5:5-12).

4:7-21, The True Nature of Love. The love command was treated earlier in 2:7-11 and 3:11, 16-18. Now the elder delivers his climactic statement on the subject. The short, simple clauses of vv. 7-10 are almost poetic. Because love emanates from God's essential nature and because God's children live in response to their intimate relationship with him, love must characterize the Christian community. Again, the elder is not speaking of love in general, as though anyone who loves another human being belongs to God. He still has in mind the "new command" that Jesus' followers love one another.

Those who live by this community ethic demonstrate that they already share in that life of unending fellowship with God. Those who do not love (i.e., the opponents) show that they have not come to know God. Verse 9 echoes John 3:16, and 4:11-16a comments on each part of the verse. Love comes not from the best of the human spirit but from the character of God, and especially in God's sending his Son as an expiation for sin (2:2; 4:10). No one has seen God, but God's love is brought to its fulfillment and completion in the community of believers. Through the witness of the Beloved Disciple, the community has seen the Son and can bear witness to him through its confession.

The experience of the abiding presence of the Spirit confirms the community's knowledge of God. By living in response to God's self-revelation in Jesus, the community of believers experiences the fullness of God's love and the ultimate purpose of life. The fulfillment of God's love for us in our relationships with others results in a communion with God that not only brings his love to completion but also casts out fear of the future.

The beginning of v. 18 is marked variously in different manuscripts, but most translations place the beginning at "there is no fear in love" (RSV). One who knows God's love does not need to fear God's judgment. The elder may be responding to the charges of the opponents, who apparently dismissed the future judgment because they had already "crossed from death into life" (3:14). While reasserting the importance of the command to love, the elder maintains the reality of the future judgment also—but protects himself from the charge that he fears the judgment because he does not know God's love.

Returning to the command to love, the elder concludes this section by pointing again to the contradiction involved in saying that one loves God when one does not show love for brothers and sisters in the Christian community.

5:1-12, The True Nature of Faith. The verb "believe" reappears in 5:1 (see 3:23), introducing a section that describes how love leads to the victory of faith. The structure of this section is indicated by the three references to "the one who believes" (5:1, 5, 10) and the three pronouncements: "this is the victory" (5:4), "this is the testimony" (5:9, 11), and "this is the life" (5:11). By linking the twin commands, to believe and to love, to the content of true belief and the experience of that life that is God's gift, the elder brings his themes to a climax.

Previously, each use of the verb "to be born" referred to the believer; the same seems to be true in 5:1 also. The one who loves the parent loves the child. Although the child may be understood as a reference to either Jesus or the believer, the latter is more likely. 1 John 5:1 restates the principle behind 4:20: one cannot love God if one has no love for God's children.

Love of God requires keeping both of the Johannine commandments (believe, love). The community's faith is also its victory over the world because the world under the power of evil seeks to destroy both the community's faith and its ethic of love.

The victor, therefore, is the one who maintains the faith. The content of true faith is then specified: faith in Jesus, the son of God, who came through water and blood. The latter phrase is probably an affirmation of the true humanity of Jesus in both his incarnation and his death. Both were significant for the elder's understanding of salvation. The opponents, on the other hand, apparently diminished the significance of Jesus' death because of their emphasis on his role as the heavenly revealer. To the water and the blood, which were soon associated with baptism and the Lord's Supper, the elder added a third witness that confirms the first two: the Spirit.

An insertion at the end of v. 7, originating in Latin manuscripts from the fourth century, the so-called Johannine Comma, adds: "in heaven: Father, Word, and Holy Spirit; and these three are one; and there are three who testify on earth." This gloss, apparently motivated by early trinitarian debates, is not found in any Greek manuscript before the fifteenth century.

Through the water, the blood, and the Spirit, God has borne witness to his Son; and his testimony is greater than any human testimony. Just as the body of the Letter begins with an affirmation of the message the community had received (1:5), so it ends with a declaration of the testimony it has experienced (5:11). God's testimony, however, is received only by faith. Those who respond to his revelation in Jesus with authentic faith are given life in his Son.

5:13-21 The Epilogue

In the conclusion the elder restates his purpose for writing (5:13) and instructs the community regarding: the confidence they can have in prayer (vv. 14-15), whom to pray for (vv. 16-17), and the confidence they can have because of their faith (vv. 18-20). The Letter concludes with a warning about idolatry (v. 21).

Verse 13 is reminiscent of both 1:4 and the purpose statement in the Gospel (John 20:31). Since the Letter is addressed to believers, the emphasis is on knowing the life they already have. If the faithful recognize that they already have eternal life, they will not be swayed by the appeals made by the opponents.

The elder's faithful adherents can also have confidence in prayer. When believers are so responsive to the guidance of the spirit of truth that their prayers accord with God's will, God hears their prayers and grants their requests.

This general assurance regarding confidence in prayer leads to the troublesome question of prayer for one who is sinning. Again, the syntax is not altogether clear. Who gives life, the one who prays or God? Ultimately, of course, only God can give life. The distinction is not so much between types of sin as between persons for whom one should pray. Since sin was understood by the Johannine Christians fundamentally as unbelief (John 16:9), in the context of 1 John the deadly sin must be refusal to confess Jesus. Specifically, those who commit the deadly sin are those who refuse to confess Jesus having come in flesh (4:2), as the elder required. All sin threatens the life of God's children, and must be confessed (see 1:6–2:2), so one should pray for fellow Christians. Drawing a hard line, however, the elder forbids prayer for the opponents who withdrew from the community.

The Letter closes with a reminder of the certainties to which the faithful may cling. We know: the believer does not sin (see 3:6, 9) and Jesus Christ protects believers; we are God's, while the world is under the power of evil; and the son of God has come to reveal God to us and to give us eternal life. The closing warning against idolatry, while seemingly out of place, may be taken as a final warning against the false teachings of the community's opponents.

2 JOHN

This short Letter was probably written by the author of 1 John and about the same time as the longer Letter. Echoes of words and phrases from 1 John can be found in 2 John, but the sequence of the writing of the two Letters is debated. 1 John, which does not begin like a letter, was evidently written to the remnant of the central Johannine community. 2 and 3 John, which follow a more typical letter form, were written to churches or individuals in churches that were closely associated with the elder's congregation.

The elder does not identify the recipient by name, nor apparently is there any need to identify himself by name. The emphases on truth and love in the opening verses implicitly speak of faithfulness to the tradition received and defended by the elder and other followers of the Beloved Disciple.

The greeting, with the distinctive term "mercy," is similar to the greeting in 1 Tim. 1:2 and 2 Tim. 1:2. The elder rejoices at the faithfulness of fellow believers from the sister church and appeals for continued fraternal relations as they continue to practice the love required by the new commandment. The need for fraternal relations was all the more necessary since the deceivers (i.e., the elder's opponents) had gone out from the community. The error of their teaching was that they did not confess that Jesus Christ had come (or perhaps that he was coming) in flesh. The participle is in the present tense (lit., "coming"), but most interpreters hear v. 7 as an echo of 1 John 4:2.

The elder's real concern is that the false teaching and dissension that plagued his congregation not spread to the sister church. To prevent this from happening he lays down the principle that one who abides in the teaching of Christ (received through the Johannine school) has fellowship with God. One who departs from this teaching, or goes beyond it, should not be received by the church. By refusing to extend hospitality to those who spread false teaching, the church could protect itself from the opponents who had gone out from the elder's congregation.

The Letter closes with an expression of desire to visit the sister church and fraternal greetings from the "children" of their "elect sister."

3 JOHN

The primary difficulty in interpreting this short letter from the elder to Gaius, the beloved, is deciphering the relationships among the individuals who are named (Gaius, Diotrephes, Demetrius) and the elder. The elder did not have to explain these relationships to Gaius, so they remain unclear to later readers.

A plausible reconstruction of the situation yields the following picture. Diotrephes emerges as the leader of a church within the orbit of Johannine Christianity. His role may not yet have been formalized as that of a bishop, however, and nothing is said of his relationship to other churches. In an effort either to protect his authority or to protect the church from false teachings, Diotrephes had been rejecting the emissaries sent by the elder, speaking against them, and threatening to exclude from the church anyone who would receive them. Ironically, Diotrephes seems to have taken the same measures that the elder urged in 2 John as means for stopping the spread of the false teachings of the opponents. Perhaps because he could not tell one itinerant teacher or evangelist from another, Diotrephes forbade extending hospitality to any itinerant.

Gaius, however, had been cooperating with the elder and extending hospitality to those he sent. The elder wrote 3 John, therefore, to appeal for Gaius to continue to provide hospitality to the Johannine "brothers" and to warn him about Diotrephes. Whether Gaius was a member of the church over which Diotrephes had extended his authority is unclear.

The elder also commended Demetrius as one whose testimony was true. Indeed, it is likely that Demetrius was the bearer of this letter.

Like 2 John, the Letter closes with the hope that the elder will soon be able to visit the recipient. Greetings are sent from "the friends," which was evidently used along with "brothers" and "beloved" as a term of address for fellow Johannine Christians (see John 3:29; 11:11; 15:13-15).

INTRODUCTION

Form and Structure

The structure of the Letter of Jude can be analyzed as follows:

- 1–2, Address and greeting
- 3–4, Occasion and theme
  - A 3, The appeal to contend for the faith
  - B 4, The background to the appeal: The false teachers, their character and judgment
- 5–23, Body of the Letter
  - B' 5–19, The background: A commentary on four prophecies of the doom of the ungodly
    - 5–7, 8–10, 9, Three OT types and interpretation including Michael and the devil
    - 11, 12–13, Three more OT types and interpretation
    - 14–15, 16, The prophecy of Enoch and interpretation
    - 17–18, 19, The prophecy of the apostles and interpretation
  - A' 20–23, The appeal
- 24–25, Concluding doxology

It is important to notice that the initial statement of the theme of the Letter (vv. 3–4) contains two parts (A and B) that correspond, in reverse order, to the two parts of the body of the Letter (B' and A'). The main purpose of the Letter is the appeal "to contend for the faith" that is announced in v. 3 and spelled out in vv. 20–23. But v. 4 explains that this appeal is necessary because the readers are in danger of being misled by false teachers. The claim in v. 4 that these teachers are people whose ungodly behavior has already been condemned by God is then substantiated by the exegetical section (B'), which argues that these are the people to whom the scriptural types and judgments refer.

Section B' is a carefully composed piece of scriptural commentary, which resembles the commentaries on Scripture found among the Dead Sea Scrolls in two ways: its underlying assumption, that OT Scripture is prophetic of the last times in which the author and his readers live, and its exegetical method, which treats figures mentioned in Scripture as "types" that will be fulfilled when their counterparts appear at the end of days. It consists of a series of four main "texts" (vv. 5–7, 11, 14–15, 17–18) and comments on each (vv. 8–10, 12–13, 16, 19). The first two "texts" are in fact summary references to OT figures; the third and fourth are quotations not from the OT but from the apocryphal apocalypse known to us as 1 Enoch and from a prophecy of the apostles. But all are treated as texts on which commentary is given. In each case the transition from "text" to commentary is marked by a reference to "these men," indicating that Jude's opponents are the people to whom the "text" refers, and by a transition from the past or future tense to the present tense, indicating that the type or prophecy is now being fulfilled. In one case a secondary text is introduced to help the commentary on the main "text" (v. 9).

The Opponents

Jude's opponents were a group of itinerant charismatics. The one thing that is clear about their teaching is that they were antinomians, who understood the grace of God in Christ (v. 4) as a deliverance from all moral constraint. Evidently they claimed to have received this teaching in visions ("dreamings," v. 8) and saw themselves and their followers as the truly spiritual people (v. 19), free from external moral authority. Against them Jude insists on the seriousness of God's moral requirements, which will take effect in the judgment of willful transgressors at the Parousia (the glorious return of Christ).

Provenance and Authorship

Several features of the Letter indicate its origin in Palestinian Jewish Christianity. Jude, unlike most NT authors, habitually uses the OT in Hebrew rather than the Septuagint Greek. His exegetical methods, his apocalyptic outlook, and the high value he attaches to apocryphal works of Jewish apocalyptic origin are all characteristic of Jewish Christian circles in Palestine, which understood Jesus and the gospel in terms of Jewish apocalyptic expectations (→ Eschatology).

The character of the Letter is therefore entirely consistent with its attribution to Judas the brother of Jesus. There is no clear evidence of date, but an earlier rather than a later date is probable, and it may in fact be one of the earliest books in the NT. Its special value is that it offers a glimpse into those original Palestinian Christian circles in which Jesus' own blood relations were leaders.

COMMENTARY

1-2, Address and Greeting. James the brother of the Lord was the only man in the early church who could be called simply "James" without ambiguity. So by calling himself "brother of James," the author identifies himself as Judas the brother of Jesus (Mark 6:3).

3-4, Occasion and Theme. Jude's Letter is not the extended discussion of Christian salvation he had intended to write, but a more ad hoc response to the news that these churches have been "infiltrated" by a group of prophets who take Christian freedom to mean freedom from moral restraint. Jude says that by rejecting Christ's moral demands they are disowning him as Master. But such people are one of the prophesied dangers of the last times. Their immoral behavior and coming judgment have been prophesied, as Jude will show in vv. 5-19. In the face of such danger, Jude's readers need to fight for the gospel ("the faith") as it was taught them ("the saints") by the apostles who founded their churches: what this "fight" involves will be explained in vv. 20-23.

5-10, Three Old Testament Types. Three classic examples of those who incur divine judgment are given: the whole generation of Israel exterminated in the wilderness after the Exodus (Num. 14), the angels who left their heavenly position in order to mate with women (Gen. 6:1-4, as interpreted in the apocryphal account 1 Enoch 6-19), and the Sodomites, whose sin is here condemned not as homosexual rape but as an attempt at sexual relations with angels (Gen. 19:4-11). The point in the last two cases is the outrageous transgression of the moral order of creation. The particular point in the first case is that the Lord's own people, who have experienced salvation, are not immune from judgment if they repudiate his lordship.

Jude's opponents are like these types (v. 8) in that they indulge in sexual immorality, repudiating the Lord's commandments, and like the Sodomites insult angels ("the glorious ones"). Probably they disparaged the angels in their role as guardians of the moral order. Jude expands on this charge of slandering angels by contrasting their behavior with that of the archangel Michael in an apocryphal account of the burial of Moses (v. 9). In this story the devil accused Moses of murder. Michael, acting as advocate for Moses and in this role "disputing with the devil," knew that the charge was a slander but "did not presume to condemn the devil for slander." Instead he referred the matter to the divine Judge who alone has authority to rule on an accusation brought under the Law. By contrast the false teachers presume to reject, on their own authority, the charges that the angels, as spokesmen for the Law, bring against them. They do so because they claim to be above such accusations, subject to no moral authority. Given Jude's readers' knowledge of the story, v. 9 exposes the spiritual conceit of the opponents, whose attitude to the angels reveals a resistance to all moral authority, even God's.

11-13, Three More Old Testament Types. Jude's opponents are typified not just as people who practice immorality (as in vv. 5-10) but also as teachers and corruptors of others. The OT figures are recalled as portrayed in Jewish tradition: Cain, the first heretic; Balaam, the prophet who, in his greed for financial gain, gave the advice that led Israel into apostasy (Num. 25:1-4; 31:16); and Korah, the archetypal schismatic, who led others in contesting Moses' authority and the divine origin of certain laws.

Verse 12a should be translated, "These are the people who feast with you at your fellowship meals, without reverence, like dangerous reefs." It is in the context of the fellowship meals (Gk. agapē) that the false teachers deliver their prophetic oracles that entice people into immorality. Their proximity is therefore as dangerous as that of a reef to a ship. They claim to be shepherds of the flock, but the only people they actually look after are themselves, by requiring the church to support them.

The four metaphors from nature (vv. 12b-13) are examples of nature failing to follow the laws ordained for it. Apocalyptic writers expected such lawlessness in nature in the last days (cf. 1 Enoch 80:2-6); to Jude it suggests the lawlessness of the false teachers of the last days. The point of the first two metaphors is that, although the false teachers claim great value for their teaching, in fact they are of no benefit to anyone. Worse, they are positively harmful (like the filth cast up by the sea). Finally, like stars that go astray from their courses, misleading those who look to them for guidance, they will be extinguished in the underworld.

14-16, The Prophecy of Enoch. With its emphatic repetition of "ungodly," this text hammers home the message of the whole exegetical section (vv. 5-19): those who indulge in ungodly conduct, as the false teachers do, are those on whom judgment will fall at the Parousia. (By inserting "the Lord" into the quotation Jude refers it to the Lord Jesus.)

This quotation from the apocalypse of Enoch (1 Enoch 1:9), along with allusions elsewhere in his Letter, shows that Jude held it in high regard, as many Jews did. But since he pairs this quotation with another nonscriptural prophecy (v. 18), he need not have regarded it as part of the canon. The text and its application (v. 16) stress the arrogant words in which the false teachers reject God's will in order to follow their own.

17–19, The Prophecy of the Apostles. Jude complements Enoch's ancient prophecy with a modern one, which was part of the teaching his readers received from the apostles who founded their churches. Verse 19 indicates that the false teachers gathered an elitist faction who claimed the same kind of charismatic status as themselves. But their behavior is clearly inspired not by the Spirit but by their own natural instincts.

20–23, The Appeal. Here Jude reaches the main point of his Letter: given the danger posed by the false teachers, his readers are to "carry on the fight for the faith" (v. 3). Four injunctions summarize Christian living (vv. 20–21): first, the church's life must be built on the foundation of the gospel, with its moral imperative. Second, prayer in the Spirit exemplifies the true charismatic nature of the church. Third, readers must keep their place in God's love by obeying him. Fourth, they must live in hope of the Lord's coming to bring final salvation to those who remain faithful. In these ways they can resist the influence of antinomian teaching and stay on the path of positive Christian obedience.

Verses 22–23 explain how they are to behave toward the false teachers and those influenced by them. The text is very uncertain, but the general advice is clear: to exercise Christian love, but only in conjunction with great care to avoid the contaminating effect of the opponents' influence. But in his awareness of the danger they pose, Jude by no means gives up hope for their reclamation.

24–25, Closing Doxology. The first part of this magnificent doxology is in effect a confident prayer that God will preserve the readers from the spiritual disaster with which the false teaching threatens them and bring them to the destiny he intends for them, when they will be presented as perfect sacrifices in his heavenly temple. Jude's concern to combat the false teaching is finally aimed at this goal: that the church should be fit to be offered to God's glory.

DAVID E. AUNE

INTRODUCTION

Author and Date

The author of the Revelation to John says that his name is "John" (1:4, 9; 22:8), that he is a "servant" of God (1:1; an OT title of honor) and a "brother" of those he addresses (1:9). He was probably well known to them, making further identification unnecessary. When he describes Revelation as a "prophetic book" (1:3; 22:7, 10, 18, 19), he indirectly claims the status of a prophet. He may have belonged to a circle of prophets (cf. 22:9, 16). He was acquainted with the condition of each of the seven churches (cf. 2:1-3:20), possibly the result of an earlier itinerant prophetic ministry. The author's familiarity with the OT and the presence of numerous Semitisms make it certain that he was a Jewish Christian who may have been an apocalypticist before his conversion (→ Eschatology). There is a possibility that he was a refugee from Palestine in the aftermath of the first Jewish revolt (A.D. 66-73). After the middle of the second century it was widely believed that the apostle John, the son of Zebedee, wrote Revelation (Justin Dialogue 81.4; Irenaeus Against Heresies 4.20.11). Yet the author never calls himself an apostle and even refers to the twelve apostles as past founders (21:14). No internal evidence suggests any connection between the author and an apostle of the same name.

Since the late second century A.D., the prevailing opinion has been that Revelation was written toward the end of the reign of the Roman emperor Domitian (A.D. 81-96), i.e., ca. A.D. 95 (Irenaeus Against Heresies 5.30.3). Later Christian writers regarded Domitian as the sponsor of a major persecution of the church (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 3.17). However, there is no evidence that the Roman government officially persecuted Christians between A.D. 64 (the persecution under Nero) and A.D. 250 (the persecution under Decius). Nevertheless, other factors indicate that Revelation was written toward the end of the first century: first, the use of the code name "Babylon" (Rev. 17:5) as a reference to Rome would only be probable after A.D. 70; second, the twelve apostles are referred to as revered founders of the past (Rev. 21:14); third, Revelation refers to the rumors of Nero's return that circulated from

A.D. 68 to the end of the century (Rev. 13:3; 17:10-11).

Occasion and Purpose

John wrote to a group of seven Anatolian churches that were apparently experiencing persecution by Roman authorities. One Christian had already been publicly executed (2:13), possibly more (6:9-11; 20:4), and John expected that others probably would be (2:10; 6:11). Was the situation so grim or did John paint an overly pessimistic picture? Though there was no official Roman campaign against Christians between A.D. 64 and 250, sporadic persecutions certainly occurred. Following the Neronian persecution, being a Christian was tantamount to being part of a criminal conspiracy, and Christians (unlike other religious groups) were punished simply for being Christians (Tacitus Annals 15.44.5; Pliny Letters 10.96.2-3). Their crime was an unwillingness to worship any God but their own, an exclusiveness the Greeks labeled "atheism." The refusal to sacrifice to pagan gods and on behalf of deified emperors was perceived as a threat to the harmonious relationship between people and the gods. Whether Christians were persecuted or not depended on the zeal of the provincial governor and (perhaps more importantly) public opinion. The legal basis for charges against Christians in Roman law was simply a voluntary prosecutor (Lat. delator, "informer"), the charge of being a Christian, and a provincial governor willing to punish people on that charge.

One major purpose of Revelation, therefore, was to offer comfort and encouragement to persecuted Christians. John accomplished this in two ways: by revealing the blessed future state of Christians who are faithful to the testimony of Jesus even at the cost of their own lives and by assuring the readers of the inevitability and imminence of the divine punishment of their persecutors. John's revelatory message also condemned all types of cultural accommodation between Christians and their pagan environment.

Literary Form

Revelation is an "apocalypse," a type of revelatory literature consisting of an extended vision report mediated by a supernatural revealer and disclosing heavenly secrets or information about the end of the world. Many apocalypses originated within Judaism from ca. 200 B.C. to ca. A.D. 100 (→Apocalyptic Literature). Some of the literary features of apocalypses include pseudonymity, historical reviews presented as predictions of the future, reports of dreams or visions, bizarre imagery, dialogues between the revealer and the author, and an emphasis on the imminence of the end. Revelation, however, is not pseudonymous nor does it contain historical reviews.

Interpreting Revelation

Revelation is the book in the NT that modern Western readers find the most foreign. Ancient Jewish and Christian apocalyptic literature is highly symbolic; often the symbolism is bizarre. In Revelation, for example, the Lamb looks as though it has been killed and has seven horns and seven eyes (5:6); the beast from the sea has seven heads and ten horns (13:1). The contrast between such grotesque images and reality suggests that such visions have symbolic or mythopoetic significance. Yet apocalyptic language is not a code that can be broken down into a table of equivalents. The special genius of apocalyptic is its ability to universalize the harsh realities of particular historical situations by transposing them into a new key using archaic symbols of conflict and victory, suffering and vindication. Thus the beast from the sea represents Rome—yet more than Rome. More accurately it represents an antagonistic role in the cosmic drama currently played by Rome but previously played by others. Revelation is a literary classic, therefore, because it not only encapsulates human experience but it gives that experience a transcultural yet Christian significance.

Literary Analysis

The literary analysis of Revelation is problematic because of the juxtaposition of tightly organized sections of material with more loosely constructed “digressions.” The author favored the number seven (symbolizing completeness), which he used fifty-four times. He also used groupings of seven (heptads) as a structural device. Four extensive sections of Revelation are arranged in heptads: seven proclamations (2:1–3:20), seven seals (6:1–8:5), seven trumpets (8:8–11:18), and seven bowls (15:1–16:21). John also inserted three extensive sections of visions consisting of six digressions. The first two sections are 7:1–17 (the sealing of the 144,000), inserted between the opening of the sixth and seventh seals, and 10:1–11:14 (two digressions: John’s renewed commission; the two prophetic witnesses), inserted between the sixth and seventh trumpets.

These two insertions both expand the effects of the sixth set of plagues and delay the onset of the seventh. The third insertion, 12:1–14:20, consists of three digressions that introduce the major actors in the eschatological drama and concludes with the final judgment at the Parousia.

Revelation consists of two major sections framed by a prologue and an epilogue. The prologue is limited to 1:1–8, and 22:6–21 constitutes the epilogue. The two main sections of Revelation are strikingly unequal in size. The first section deals with Christ’s proclamations to the seven churches (2:1–3:20), introduced by John’s visionary commission (1:9–20). In turn, Rev. 1:9–3:21 introduces the main part of the work in 4:1–22:5. The structure of this main part of Revelation is the most problematic. One major problem is deciding whether various sections recapitulate or repeat the eschatological events narrated in later sections. For example, are the similarities between the plagues unleashed by the seven trumpets and seven bowls alternate ways of describing the same events? It is more likely that the author intends to create a unique chronological synthesis of eschatological events. Most of Revelation consists of a single extensive vision report (1:9–22:9). The author has imposed an artificial literary unity on many separate textual units by linking them together in an apparent chronological order using phrases such as “after these things” and (more frequently) “then I saw.” This technique fosters the impression that the visions are narrated in the order in which the author received them. Further, the author has used an “encompassing” technique, for the seventh seal encompasses the effects of the seven trumpets and seven bowls, while the seventh trumpet encompasses the effects of the seven bowls. That suggests that the author intended to present the complex events of the end (4:1–22:9) in chronological order (the only exception is the three digressions inserted between 11:18 and 15:1). However, this appearance of chronological order does not exclude the likelihood that the sources the author used (e.g., the trumpet and bowl visions) might in fact have described similar events using varied apocalyptic imagery. These considerations suggest the following outline for Revelation:

- 1:1–8, Prologue
- 1:9–20, John’s commissioning vision
- 2:1–3:22, Christ addresses the seven churches
  - 2:1–7, To Ephesus
  - 2:8–11, To Smyrna
  - 2:12–17, To Pergamum
  - 2:18–29, To Thyatira
  - 3:1–6, To Sardis
  - 3:7–13, To Philadelphia
  - 3:14–22, To Laodicea
- 4:1–22:9, From tribulation to glory

- 4:1-7:17, The first six seals
- 4:1-5:14, The heavenly throne room
- 6:1-17, The first six seals
- 7:1-17, First digression: The sealing of the 144,000
- 8:1-11:14, The seventh seal and the six trumpets
  - 8:1, The seventh seal
  - 8:2-5, The altar of incense
  - 8:6-9:21, The first six trumpets
  - 10:1-11, Second digression: The angel and the little scroll
  - 11:1-14, Third digression: The two prophetic witnesses
- 11:15-16:16, The seventh trumpet and the six bowls
  - 11:15-18, The seventh trumpet
  - 11:19-12:17, Fourth digression: Satan and the Messiah
  - 13:1-18, Fifth digression: The two beasts
  - 14:1-20, Sixth digression: Three visions of victory
  - 15:1-16:16, The first six bowls
- 16:17-19:10, The seventh bowl and the punishment of Babylon
  - 16:17-21, The seventh bowl
  - 17:1-18, The great harlot
  - 18:1-19:8, Reactions to Babylon's fall
  - 19:9-10, Conclusion
- 19:11-21:8, The judgment of God's adversaries
  - 19:11-20:3, The victorious Parousia
  - 20:4-6, The millennial kingdom
  - 20:7-15, The release and defeat of Satan
  - 21:1-8, The new heavens and the new earth
- 21:9-22:9, The new Jerusalem
- 22:6-21, Epilogue

for the entire book by giving the stages by which the revelation was mediated to John: God gave it to Jesus Christ who transmitted it through his angel to his servant John for the benefit of the servants of God, i.e., the seven churches. The mention of a single angel as the revelatory agent between Jesus Christ and John (cf. 22:6, 8) suggests that John had but one angelic tour guide responsible for mediating supernatural visions to him. Yet this fact is only mentioned in the prologue and epilogue and is contradicted by the main part of the book in which a variety of otherworldly beings guide John and speak to him. John's qualifications not only include the fact that he is a channel for divine revelation but also that he himself has faithfully borne witness to the word of God and to the testimony of Jesus (1:2b).

The first of seven beatitudes is placed here (v. 3; cf. 14:13; 16:15; 19:9; 20:6; 22:7, 14). John's preference for the number seven as both a symbolic number and an organizational principle suggests that the inclusion of precisely seven beatitudes, though unnumbered, is not accidental. This pronouncement of blessing upon readers and upon those who both hear and obey (repeated in 22:7) is probably based on the practice of beginning or concluding readings or presentations of the words of God with various "read and keep" or "hear and obey" formulas (Matt. 7:24, 26; John 12:47; Herm. Vis. 5:5; 2 Clem. 19:1-3). John intended his composition to be read aloud before Christian congregations (Rev. 1:3) and perhaps used an epistolary framework for that reason (cf. 1 Thess. 5:27; Col. 4:16). Since he calls his book "the words of this prophecy" (NIV), and the prophetic books of the OT followed the reading from the Torah in synagogues, John compares his book positively with the Hebrew Scriptures.

Revelation is the only Jewish or Christian apocalypse that is framed as a letter, with an epistolary prescript in 1:4-5a and a concluding postscript in 22:21. Hellenistic epistolary prescriptions typically consisted of three elements: the superscription (sender), the adscription (addressee), and the salutation. "Grace to you and peace" is a Christian salutation first appearing in Paul's letters (→ Letter; Salutations). The elaborate salutation in 1:4-5a is a Johannine expansion of the traditional salutation. The phrase "from him who is and who was and who is to come" (v. 4; cf. 1:8; 11:17; 16:5) alludes to the Septuagint (LXX) version of Exod. 3:14, in which the divine name "Yahweh" is interpreted to mean "the one who is." This name was familiar in Hellenistic Judaism in both Egypt and Anatolia, though in early Christian texts it is found only in Revelation. Just as Moses is told by God to tell the people that "the one who is" had sent him, so John legitimates his prophetic status and book by claiming that it was inspired by "the one who is."

COMMENTARY

1:1-8

Prologue

The prologue consists of six literary units clearly separate from the continuous narrative beginning in v. 9. The numerous thematic and verbal parallels between vv. 1-8 and the epilogue (22:6-21) suggest that these two sections frame the entire book. The first sentence in Revelation functions, like the initial sentences in many ancient books, as the author's own descriptive title (vv. 1-2). The term "revelation" in 1:1 refers not to the literary form of Revelation, but rather to the revelatory experience of the author. The title provides divine authority

The doxology of Rev. 1:5b-6 immediately follows the epistolary prescript of vv. 4-5a, an unusual epistolary pattern paralleled only in Galatians 1:3-4. Doxologies normally consist of three elements: "to whom / be the glory [Gk. doxa] / forever. Amen" (Rev. 4:9; 5:13b-14; 7:12). Each element can be variously expanded. Here "him" (God) is modified by several verbal forms describing in temporal sequence the redemptive action of God through Christ: he has loved us, freed us from our sins, and made us a kingdom, priests.

Rev. 1:7-8 is an example of an "amplified oracle," i.e., a prophetic saying appended to another one to expand or interpret it (for other examples cf. 13:9; 14:13; 16:15). Christian prophetic pronouncements could receive a responsive "amen" (1 Cor. 14:16) and were subject to evaluation and interpretation (1 Cor. 14:29). John's inclusion of these oracles underlines his prophetic ministry. Here the first oracle predicts the Parousia (Gk., "coming") of Christ as a cosmic event witnessed by everyone and anticipates the distress and fear of unbelievers about to experience judgment (cf. Rev. 19:11-16). The second oracle begins with the affirmative response "Even so. Amen" (1:7b), it is attributed to the "Lord God," and it contains three "I am" predications. First, the divine name "Alpha and Omega" (cf. "First and Last," 1:17) was drawn from Hellenistic revelatory magic where it abbreviated the seven Greek vowels, which were widely believed to constitute a name of the highest God. Second, "the one who is and who was and who is to come" combines Jewish and Hellenistic divine names. Third, "the Almighty" is borrowed from Judaism. In the highly stratified society of John's day, deities and rulers were accorded strings of extravagant titles. One of John's strategies for underlining the majesty and power of God and Christ in contrast to Satan and the earthly rulers in league with him is the use of titles of dignity drawn from various sources (cf. 1:17-18; 19:11-16).

John's Commissioning Vision

John's divine commission narrated in 1:9-20 introduces not only the proclamations to the seven churches dictated by the exalted Christ (2:1-3:22) but the main part of Revelation as well (4:1-22:5). This is a commission for a particular task (i.e., to write what he will see and hear), not an inaugural vision calling him to the prophetic vocation (cf. Exod. 3:1-12; Isa. 6:1-13; Ezek. 1:1-3:11; similar commands to write down the substance of revelatory visions are found in 2 Esd. 14; Herm. Vis. 2.4.3; 5.5-7; and Herm. Sim. 9.33.1). The purpose of this visionary commission to write is to provide divine legitimation for a controversial message.

The circumstances surrounding John's visionary experience are briefly recounted in Rev. 1:9-10. He received the vision on Patmos, a tiny island (five miles wide by eight miles long) in the Aegean Sea about sixty miles southwest of Ephesus. He was there "on account of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus," i.e., probably he had been sentenced to exile because he was a Christian (a view first mentioned ca. A.D. 190 by Clement of Alexandria, The Rich Man's Salvation 42), though there is no evidence that Patmos was a Roman penal colony. Exile (which had several voluntary and involuntary forms) was a relatively lenient form of punishment in Roman jurisprudence usually reserved for people of wealth and position (part of a pervasive legal double standard). The vision occurred on the "Lord's day" (probably Sunday, the Christian day of worship commemorating the Lord's resurrection) when John was suddenly "in the Spirit," i.e., in a trance (cf. Acts 11:5; 22:17). Prophecy was an activity often exercised in worship services (1 Cor. 14:26-33; Did. 10:7; Herm. Mand. 11).

The vision itself (Rev. 1:11-20) consists of an epiphany of the heavenly Christ appearing to John on earth, introduced (v. 11) and concluded (v. 19) by commands that John write what he sees (and hears) in a book for the seven churches. Supernatural commands to write the substance of a divine revelation, occasionally found in Judaism (cf. Isa. 30:8; 2 Esd. 14) are common in Greco-Roman literature (e.g., Aelius Aristides Orations 48.2; Callimachus Aetia 1.1.21-22; Plato Phaedo 4.60E-61B). After hearing a loud voice behind him commanding him to write (Rev. 1:11), John turns around. He first sees seven golden lampstands, and in their midst stood "one like a son of man" with white hair, eyes like fire, feet like polished bronze, and a voice like the roar of "rushing waters" (NIV). He held seven stars in his right hand, a sharp sword issued from his mouth, and his face shone as the sun. John responds in a manner typical for recipients of such vision reports: he falls down paralyzed with fear (Dan. 8:17; 10:9-11; 1 Enoch 14:14; 2 Enoch 1:7). The awesome figure urges John not to be afraid and identifies himself with a series of descriptive phrases indicating that he is none other than the exalted Christ. In Rev. 1:17b-18, he describes himself with several divine titles, refers to his death and resurrection, and claims to possess the keys to death and Hades. According to the ancient mythical view, both heaven and the underworld were linked to this world by doors or gates (cf. 4:1). In Hellenistic Anatolia, the ancient goddess Hekate was accorded universal sovereignty as mistress of the cosmos and was thought to possess the keys to Hades. John, therefore, portrays Christ as usurping the authority of Hekate as well as every other natural or supernatural authority.

The entire vision is a pastiche of language from Jewish epiphanies ("appearances" of divine beings on earth). John's main source of imagery for this epiphany is Dan. 10:5-14 (describing the angel Gabriel), supplemented by features from the description of God in Dan. 7:9 (hair white like wool) and from the mysterious figure in Dan. 7:13 ("one like a son of man"). In Jewish literature, similar epiphanic language is found in Joseph and Aseneth (Jos. Asen.) 14.8-11; Apoc. Zeph. 6:11-14. Similar descriptions of divine beings seen in epiphanies are found in Greek sources (Homer Iliad 8.41-44; 13.22-25; Callimachus Hymn to Apollo 2.3). The author uses various visual and verbal attributes from the vision in the descriptions of Christ that form the introduction to each of the seven letters, thereby linking Rev. 2:1-3:22 to the introductory commission vision. The entire scene has enough similarities to various OT epiphanies to make it entirely plausible to readers familiar with that background. The metaphorical character of what John sees is made obvious in v. 20, where the seven stars are interpreted as the seven angels of the churches and the seven lampstands as the seven churches themselves. The seven lampstands suggest the seven-branch golden menorah of the tabernacle and Temple (Exod. 25:31-40) seen in Zechariah's vision (Zech. 4:1-2), which today is the religious symbol of Judaism.

2:1-3:22

Christ Addresses the Seven Churches

The seven proclamations, written by John for their present context, have a strong emphasis on the behavior expected of the addressees and a specific relevance for each community's concrete situation. Often inaccurately characterized as letters, the seven proclamations are actually prophetic messages in the form of ancient royal or imperial edicts (public proclamations of laws or policies enacted by a ruler possessing the requisite authority), an appropriate form of expression for the exalted Christ who is depicted as both king and priest in John's vision (1:9-20). Each of the proclamations exhibits a similar structure: first, an introduction (containing the addressee, the phrase "thus says" [RSV: "the words of"]), and phrases identifying the sender); second, a central section introduced by "I know" and that includes recognition and praise for past behavior, censure, and admonitions for change; and third, a double conclusion with a call for vigilance and an exhortation to conquer.

No one knows why John wrote just to these seven churches, particularly when there were many other important Christian congregations in Asia Minor (e.g., Magnesia, Tralles, and Hierapolis). By the late second century the seven churches addressed by John were understood as symbolizing the universal church. According to the Muratorian Canon (the oldest list of NT books, ca. A.D. 180): "John also, though he wrote in the Apocalypse to seven churches, nevertheless speaks to them all." All seven were within one hundred miles of Ephesus in the Roman proconsular province of Asia and possibly formed a circuit for itinerant Christian prophets and teachers. After the fall of Jerusalem following the first Jewish revolt of A.D. 66-73, Anatolia had become one of the most important geographical centers of Christianity, with a population of perhaps eighty thousand Christians by the end of the century.

Each of the seven proclamations is addressed to the "angel" of that community. Since John elsewhere consistently uses the Greek term aggelos ("angel," "messenger") of supernatural beings subordinate to God, it is likely that the term has that meaning here. Various scholars have argued that the term "angel" actually refers to a local leader such as the bishop. Or, translated "messenger," it may refer to representatives John sent to the churches with copies of his circular apocalypse. Yet the idea that each church is represented in the heavenly world by an angelic figure who somehow personifies that church, though unparalleled, is apparently John's meaning.

2:1-7, To Ephesus. Ephesus was the most illustrious city of Asia Minor, a center of travel, trade, and commerce, and the seat of the Roman provincial governor. It had a population of ca. 225,000 and was a center of the imperial cult boasting four imperial temples. During the reign of Domitian, Ephesus became the "warden" (Gk. neokoros) of the imperial temple in Asia. Since the mid-first century, Ephesus had also been an important Christian center (Acts 18-20; 1 Cor. 15:32; 16:8). The Ephesian church receives a generally positive evaluation (Rev. 2:2-3). They have worked hard and have patiently endured persecution and ostracism, the focus of a great deal of late first-century Christian exhortation (cf. James 1:2-4; Pet. 1:6-7; 2:11-18). They are a pure church uncorrupted by false apostles whom they have tested and unmasked (Rev. 2:2). During this period the testing of itinerant

Opposite: The cosmic events described in Rev. 6:12-17 are portrayed on this illuminated manuscript page from The Morgan Beatus, Spain, mid-tenth century. apostles and prophets becomes a widespread necessity (Did. 11–13). In such an atmosphere the legitimacy of John's credentials was of critical importance. The term "apostle" (meaning "emissary") was applied to itinerant missionaries in early Christianity. Christian communities were scattered throughout the ancient world and linked by traveling Christians (including apostles, prophets, and teachers) dependent on local hospitality (3 John 5–8). Like other religious movements, Christianity had its share of charlatans (Herm. Man. 11.12; Did. 11.6). The Ephesians are particularly commended for opposing the Nicolaitans (see commentary below on Rev. 2:12–17), possibly identical with the "evil men" and false apostles of 2:2. The Nicolaitans are mentioned by several early Christian writers (Irenaeus Against Heresies 1.26.3; 3.11.1; Hippolytus Refutation of All Heresies 7.36.3) and improbably traced to Nicolas of Antioch (Acts 6:5). The Ephesians are faulted for abandoning the love they had at first (Rev. 2:5). They are exhorted to remember their previous condition and with that in mind to repent and behave as they once did. If they fail to do so, Christ threatens to "come" to them (not in the Parousia but in an act of temporal judgment; cf. 2:16) and blot their community out of existence. These remarks suggest that second-generation Christians may have developed a comfortable accommodation with the pagan world that John, an intolerant separatist, opposed.

One part of the two-part conclusion of each of the proclamations is the formula "He who has ears, let him hear / what the Spirit says to the churches" (v. 7a). In OT prophetic oracles, the recipients are frequently enjoined to "Hear the word of Yahweh!" (1 Kings 22:19; Amos 7:16; Jer. 42:15). The first part of this saying is found in various formulations seven times in the sayings of Jesus in the synoptic Gospels (e.g., Mark 4:9, 23). The formula was closely associated with the sayings of Jesus and thus an appropriate concluding refrain for prophetic messages from the heavenly Christ.

The reward for conquering (a military metaphor) mentioned in the second part of the conclusion (Rev. 2:7b) is the privilege of eating the fruit of the tree of life in the paradise of God (22:1, 19), a metaphor for eternal life (Gen. 3:22–24). The tree or plant of life, first mentioned in the OT in Gen. 2:9 (paired with the fatal tree of the knowledge of good and evil), was a familiar theme throughout the ancient Near East, particularly in early Judaism (T. Levi 18:10–11; 2 Esd. 8:52; 4 Bar. 9:16).

2:8–11, To Smyrna. Smyrna, a city with excellent harbor facilities, prosperous in both Hellenistic and Roman times, lay forty miles north of Ephesus, its major rival. Smyrna became a center for the imperial cult when, in competition with eleven other cities, it was granted the right to have a temple to Tiberius, Livia, and the senate in A.D. 29 (Tacitus Annals 4.55–56). A temple to dea Roma (Lat., "the goddess Rome") was dedicated before the mid-second century B.C. This community, which apparently had few if any wealthy members (Rev. 2:9), had experienced severe persecution as the apparent result of Jewish "slander." They are not real Jews, claims John, but a synagogue of Satan. This implies that Christians are the true Israel (a widespread Christian view; cf. Gal. 6:16; Phil. 3:3). The term "slander" here in all likelihood refers to the Jewish role in denouncing Christians to Roman authorities. Since Jews had a special status exempting them from certain cultic obligations, Jewish Christians could take advantage of those benefits by claiming to be Jews. In Bithynia, ca. A.D. 110, there is evidence that pagan delatores (Lat., "accusers" in criminal proceedings) denounced Christians to the authorities (Pliny Letters 10.96). The possibility that some Christians will soon be imprisoned (Rev. 2:10) indicates the seriousness of the situation. Roman prisons were used for just three reasons: to compel obedience to a magistrate's order, to confine the accused until trial, or for detainment until execution. Antipas has already been publicly executed (2:13), and he was probably not alone (6:9–11; 11:7; 20:4). The reward for faithfulness is the "crown (or more accurately, 'wreath') of life," a metaphor for eternal life (2:10b). In the Greek world, wreaths were used as prizes in athletic contests and were buried with the dead symbolizing their victories in life. The "wreath of life" is not drawn from military imagery, however, for neither the Greeks nor the Romans ever gave posthumous military decorations. In v. 11 the victorious Christian is promised exemption from the second death (see commentary below on 20:14).

2:12–17, To Pergamum. Pergamum, "the most renowned of Asia" (Pliny Natural History 5.126), was located sixty-eight miles north of Smyrna and had an estimated population of 120,000. Pergamum was the site of an enormous altar of Zeus now displayed in reconstructed form in the Pergamon Museum in East Berlin. As the site of the first and most important temple to the deified Augustus, Pergamum was an important center for the imperial cult. "Satan's throne" (v. 13) may refer to this center of imperial worship or, less likely, to the great altar of Zeus or possibly to the seat of judgment used by Roman magistrates. The Pergamene Christians are commended for their steadfastness in the face of persecution. Antipas, mentioned only here in early Christian literature, was very likely executed for failing to sacrifice to the gods on behalf of deified emperors. He is called "my faithful witness" (NIV); the Greek term for "witness" is martyrs, a term that shortly came to include the idea of dying for the faith. Nevertheless the church is censured for tolerating some who hold the teaching of Balaam involving eating food sacrificed to idols and practicing immorality. In early Judaism and early Christianity, heresy was not so much "heterodoxy" (deviant opinions or doctrines) as "heteropraxy" (deviate practices); idolatry and immorality were thought closely associated. Balaam was a non-Israelite diviner whose contact with Israel is described in Numbers 22-24 and who was regarded as instrumental in leading Israel into idolatrous and immoral practices (Num. 25:1-5; 31:16). In later Jewish tradition, Balaam is regarded as a paradigmatic false prophet (Philo Life of Moses 1.263-304; Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 4.126-30). The practice of eating food sacrificed to idols was problematic for both Jews and Christians. Ancients rarely ate meat, and when they did it was usually part of public or private religious celebrations in which the edible parts of sacrificial animals were eaten. Such meat was taboo for Jews (4 Macc. 5:2-3; m. 'Abod. Zar. 2.3), a prohibition often enforced by Jewish Christians (Acts 15:29), though Paul was equivocal on the subject (1 Cor. 8:4-13; 10:14-11:1). The Nicolaitans (Rev. 2:15), often thought to be Gnostics, are accused of teaching sexual immorality and eating meat offered to idols, both libertine practices. However, Gnostic texts encourage neither libertine sexual promiscuity nor the eating of sacrificial meat. The Pergamene Christians are urged to repent, otherwise Christ threatens to come to them in judgment (cf. 2:5). Those who conquer are promised hidden manna and a white stone with a new name inscribed on it. "Manna" (a Heb. term meaning "what is it?") was the name for miraculous "bread" supplied to the Israelites by God (Exod. 16:1-36; → Manna). Jews expected God to repeat that miracle in the last days (John 6:31-34; 2 Apoc. Bar. 29:8). Manna is therefore another metaphor for eternal life (as in John 6:49-51). The significance of the white stone is disputed.

2:18-29, To Thyatira. Thyatira was located forty-five miles southeast of Pergamum. The church is commended for its faith, service, and patient endurance like the Ephesian church (2:2-3). Unlike the latter, the Thyatirans' present spiritual condition is judged healthier than formerly (v. 19). Like the Pergamenes, they are denounced for tolerating heretics (vv. 20-23). An unnamed woman prophet nicknamed "Jezebel" teaches Christians to indulge in sexual promiscuity and eat sacrificial meat (see commentary above on 2:12-17). The similarity between "Jezebel's" program and that of the Nicolaitans (cf. 2:14-15) suggests that she is one of their local leaders. The statement "I gave her time to repent" (v. 21) probably refers to an earlier prophetic judgment speech delivered by John or a member of his prophetic circle. The threat that "Jezebel" and her circle will become sick and suffer tribulation and even death (vv. 22-23) is perhaps the kind of judgment implied in earlier references to the "coming" of Christ (2:5, 16). Physical illness among Christians could be construed as divine punishment for sin (1 Cor. 11:29-30). Jezebel is the name of the infamous foreign wife of king Ahab of Israel, whose checkered career is recounted in 1 Kings 16:28-19:3 and 2 Kings 9:22, 30-37. With a corps of 850 prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18:19), she opposed true prophets of Yahweh (1 Kings 18:4) and introduced "harlotries and sorceries" to Israel. The Thyatiran "Jezebel" possibly used her prophetic gift for legitimating the deviant practices of which she is accused in v. 20. Philo warned his readers against would-be prophets who might lead people to adopt pagan practices (Special Laws 1.315-16). Verses 24-25 specifically address those in the church who are not followers of "Jezebel" and who have not learned "the deep things of Satan," a possible reference to the "profound" teachings of "Jezebel." John may be parodying a motto of "Jezebel" by substituting the word "Satan" for "God" (cf. 1 Cor. 2:10). In Rev. 2:26-27, the one who conquers is promised a delegated share of Christ's sovereign rule (cf. 5:10; 20:4; 22:5; cf. 2 Tim. 2:12).

3:1-6, To Sardis. Sardis, forty miles southeast of Thyatira and forty-five miles east of Smyrna, was one of the more illustrious cities of ancient Anatolia and a major rival of Ephesus and Smyrna, boasting a temple to Augustus. The earthquake of A.D. 17 destroyed much of the Hellenistic city (Tacitus Annals 2.47), which was rebuilt with aid from the emperors Tiberius and Claudius. During the Imperial period, her population ranged between 60,000 and 100,000 inhabitants. Recent archaeological exploration has uncovered one of the largest ancient synagogues yet known, accommodating about 1,000 people, reflecting the presence of a large, wealthy, and influential Jewish community.

Christ is described as he "who has the seven spirits of God and the seven stars" (3:1, alluding to 1:16-20). The spirits represent angels (cf. 4:5; 5:6; 8:2), a metaphor derived from Zechariah 4. This church receives primarily censure; only a minority of Christians "have not soiled their garments" (Rev. 3:4). Christ knows their true spiritual condition. Though they appear hale and hearty to others, they are actually on the point of spiritual death (v. 1b). They are encouraged to wake up and change their ways before it is too late (v. 2). In the NT, watchfulness is an indispensable characteristic of the people of God in view of the imminence of the end (Mark 13:33–37; Matt. 25:13). If they fail to awake and repent, Christ threatens to come unexpectedly, like a thief (Rev. 3:3), an allusion to a saying of Jesus also preserved in Matt. 24:42–44 and Luke 12:39–40 (cf. Rev. 16:15). The saying has three distinctive motifs: the exhortation to watch, the metaphor of the thief (first occurring in 1 Thess. 5:2 and later in 2 Pet. 3:10) and the unexpected time of arrival. Only in Rev. 3:5 and 16:15 is the thief identified with Christ. Those who conquer will be rewarded with white garments (3:4b–5a), probably not so much an allusion to the flourishing local garment industry as a metaphor of ritual, moral, and spiritual purity. White garments were worn on religious festivals and when performing cultic acts such as sacrifice and by victorious Roman generals when celebrating triumphs in Rome. Further, their names will not be blotted out of the book of life, another metaphor for eternal life. Athens and other Greek cities had the custom of erasing from the rolls the names of citizens executed by the state (Dio Chrysostom Discourse 31.84–85; Xenophon Hellenica 2.3.51). Having one's name written in the book of life thus suggests heavenly citizenship (Heb. 12:23; cf. Phil. 3:20; 1 Pet. 1:17). The idea of a "book of life" (frequently mentioned; cf. Rev. 13:8; 17:8; 20:15; 21:27) from which one's name could be erased is common in Judaism (Exod. 32:32–33; Jub. 30:20–22; Jos. Asen. 15:4[3]). Christ's promise to confess the victorious Christian's name before the Father and his angels alludes to a saying of Jesus found in the Q tradition (Matt. 10:32 = Luke 12:8) and in Mark 8:38 = Luke 9:26, though John was probably dependent on oral rather than written tradition.

3:7–13, To Philadelphia. Philadelphia, located thirty miles southeast of Sardis, suffered extensive damage in the earthquake of A.D. 17 (Tacitus Annals 2.47.3–4), though lesser quakes occurred frequently (Strabo 12.8.18). Heavily dependent on viticulture because of a rich volcanic soil (Strabo 13.4.11), the city was radically affected by Domitian's edict of A.D. 92 ordering half the provincial vineyards cut down and replanted. Alluding to Isa. 22:22, Christ is designated as he "who has the key of David, who opens and no one shall shut, who shuts and no one opens" (Rev. 3:7), probably referring to his power to admit or bar people from the heavenly kingdom (cf. Matt. 16:19). The exalted Christ has set an "open door" before the Philadelphian Christians (Rev. 3:8), a metaphor referring to their "reserved seats" in the eschatological kingdom. The Christian community appears to be relatively small and poor, but it has nevertheless remained steadfast in its faith (v. 8). There was apparently a Jewish synagogue there (v. 9), and Philadelphian Christians had probably suffered from accusations by Jews before Roman authorities as in Smyrna (v. 9). Because they have kept the testimony of Jesus by patiently enduring persecution, they will be kept from "the hour of trial which is coming on the whole world" (v. 10). This refers to the coming eschatological period of tribulation (9:3–21) from which they will be protected (7:1–8; cf. the final petition in the Lord's Prayer, Matt. 6:13 = Luke 11:4). "Those who dwell upon the earth" (Rev. 3:10) are unbelievers (cf. 6:10; 8:13; 11:10; 13:8, 14; 17:8) who repeatedly refuse to repent in spite of the eschatological plagues unleashed by God (e.g., 9:20–21; 16:9, 11). Christ's promise to come soon (3:11) should be understood not as a coming in judgment (as in 2:5, 16; 3:3), but as the Parousia, in which he comes to deliver his people (14:14–16; 22:7, 20). Those who conquer will be made pillars in the temple of God (3:12), a feature suggesting that the new Jerusalem is a metaphor for the Christian community. Revelation is a book filled with graffiti; conquering Christians will have inscribed on them the names of God, the city of God, and the new Jerusalem (v. 12), varied metaphors indicating eschatological salvation. Reference to the new Jerusalem descending from heaven anticipates the more detailed description in 21:2–22:5.

3:14–22, To Laodicea. Laodicea, forty miles southeast of Philadelphia, was destroyed in an earthquake in A.D. 60 (Sib. Or. 5.290–91) and was subsequently rebuilt (Sib. Or. 4.107–8). An imperial temple was constructed after the quake. It was the most important city in the Lycus valley where two other cities also contained Christian communities, Hierapolis and Colossae (Col. 4:13). The region had a large Jewish population (Cicero Pro Flacco 28.68; Josephus Antiquities of the Jews 12.147–53). The community is condemned for being neither cold nor hot, but lukewarm (Rev. 3:15–16). This metaphor for ineffectiveness has been linked to the region's water supply. The "hot" springs of Hierapolis were famous for their medicinal properties, and the "cold" waters of Colossae were prized for their purity. The tepid waters of Laodicea, however, were both abundant and bad. Though the church thinks itself rich and lacking nothing, it is actually "wretched, pitiable, poor, blind and naked" (v. 17). To remedy this deplorable spiritual state, they require "gold" refined by the fires of testing and patient endurance, "white garments" of purity, and "eye salve" to restore their sight (v. 18). Laodicea was in fact the site of a medical school and a local pharmaceutical industry with a secret recipe for an effective eye salve. The famous metaphor of Christ standing at the door and knocking (v. 20) has been explained as an allusion to Song of Sg. 5:2 or a modified saying of Jesus (Luke 12:35-38; cf. Mark 13:33-37). Greco-Roman revelatory magic had a special procedure for enlisting the services of a pare-dros daimōn, "assisting divinity" (Gk.), that involved preparing a meal and sharing it with the god, a procedure parodied here where the risen Jesus alone controls the situation, not the practitioner. The victorious Christians will be able to sit with Christ upon his throne, just as he sat upon the throne of his Father (Rev. 3:21), another reference to sharing Christ's reign (cf. 2:26-27).

4:1-22:9

From Tribulation to Glory

A new stage of John's revelatory vision begins in 4:1, where the scene shifts from earth to heaven. Most of the following (4:1-19:10) focuses on the terrible eschatological tribulations that will occur before the Parousia.

4:1-7:17

The Six Seals

Even though the first major section of the main part of Revelation includes primarily 4:1-8:1, it cannot be strictly limited to this passage since the roll with seven seals contains the entire course of eschatological events through 22:9.

4:1-5:14, The Heavenly Throne Room. A heavenly throne room scene introduces each of the three heptads of seals, trumpets, and bowls (4:1-5:14; 8:1-5; 15:1-8), anchoring each series of events in the sovereignty of God, who controls history. This first throne room scene is the longest and most detailed. The author must orient readers to the inhabitants and activities that will be repeated or amplified in later scenes. John sees an open door in heaven and the voice that he heard behind him (1:10), i.e., the exalted Christ, invites him to "come up hither" where future events will be revealed to him. Just as ancient cosmology conceptualized a door or gates connecting earth with the underworld (cf. 1:18), the notion of a door separating earth from heaven was also common. The related motifs of the heavenly door, the invitation to enter, and a vision of the throne room of God constitute a commonplace in ancient revelatory literature (cf. 1 Enoch 14:8-25; T. Levi. 2:6; 5:1). At once, John is "in the Spirit" (Rev. 2:2; cf. 1:9), a trance-like state necessary for a visionary ascent to heaven. Immediately he finds himself present as an observer in the heavenly throne room. Throughout the ancient world, high gods (the Greek Zeus, the Roman Jupiter, the Babylonian Marduk, and the Israelite Yahweh) were conceptualized as great kings dwelling in magnificent heavenly palaces with innumerable supernatural courtiers. Occasionally OT prophets are depicted as making visionary ascents to the heavenly court where, by eavesdropping on the proceedings, they learn what will later transpire on earth (1 Kings 22:17-23; Isa. 6:1-7; Zech. 3:1-5; cf. Jer. 23:18). John's description, dependent on Ezek. 1:4-28, generally tallies with traditional Jewish conceptions of heaven. John first sees the magnificent throne of the God but avoids attempting to describe God himself (Rev. 4:3; cf. 22:4). The cosmic symbolism of the circle is reflected in the encircling rainbow "round" the throne (4:3), the four living creatures encircling the throne (v. 6), the circle of twenty-four elders (v. 4), all encircled by an innumerable multitude of angels (5:11). God, at the center of all, is the ultimate cosmic reality. The thunder and lightning emanating from the throne (v. 5) suggests the Sinai theophany (Exod. 19:16-18; 20:18-20; cf. Isa. 29:6). The four living creatures described in Rev. 4:6-8 (cf. Ezek. 1:5-25; Isa. 6:2), symbolize the omniscience of God. After Irenaeus (ca. A.D. 180) the four creatures came to symbolize the four Gospels (Mark is the lion, Luke the ox, Matthew the man, and John the eagle). The ensemble worn by twenty-four elders, white garments and gold wreaths, was customary for embassies and suppliants to Hellenistic kings and Roman emperors. The number twenty-four, found only here in Revelation, symbolizes the complete people of God (twelve Israelite tribes plus twelve apostles). The seven torches of fire (Rev. 4:5) are based on the menorah of the tabernacle and Temple (cf. Zech. 4:1-10), and the "sea of glass" (Rev. 4:6) may represent the transcendence of God, his separation from the created order.

Following the description of the serene magnificence of the throne room of God and the worship perpetually offered to God by heavenly beings (4:1-11), John's attention is drawn to a scroll with seven seals in the right hand of God (5:1), who is remarkably passive throughout the scene. A brief drama then unfolds in which someone is sought who is worthy to break the seals and open the scroll (vv. 2-4). One function of the heavenly council motif is the commissioning of an emissary (cf. Isa. 6:8: "Who can we send?"; 1 Kings 22:20: "Who will entice Ahab?"; cf. Rev. 5:2: "Who is worthy to open the scroll?"). John weeps when no one is found, dramatizing Israel's past messianic expectation. One of the elders tells John that the Lion of the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:9), the Root of David (Isa. 11:1, 10), i.e., the Messiah, has conquered and is therefore qualified (Rev. 5:5). Yet John sees not a lion but a lamb looking as though it had been slain (v. 6). The striking contrast between the two images suggests the contrast between the type of warrior messiah expected by first-century Judaism and Jesus' role as a suffering servant (cf. Matt.

11:2–6 = Luke 7:18–23). The term “lamb” (occurring twenty-nine times in Revelation) alludes to the sacrificial death of Jesus under the image of the Passover lamb (cf. 1 Cor. 5:7; 1 Pet. 1:19; John 1:29). What is the significance of the scroll and why is the Lamb alone able to open it? The scroll represents the final stage in God’s predetermined redemptive purpose for the world, to be realized between the exaltation of Christ, following his death and resurrection, and the final inauguration of the eternal reign of God; that is, it symbolizes the entire eschatological program narrated in Revelation. The antiphonal hymns of Rev. 5:9–14 celebrate the worthiness of the Lamb whose death has provided salvation for people of every nation. Though the Lamb has already been exalted to the throne of God and shares his rule, God’s plan remains incomplete unless he (the only qualified emissary of God) receives full power and authority (symbolized by the scroll) to achieve the final eschatological victory.

Hymns in Revelation

An important feature of the heavenly throne room ceremonial in Revelation is the presence of sixteen hymns or hymnlike compositions at various points in the narrative. These hymns are arranged as two single hymns (15:3–4; 12:10–12), and seven antiphonal units (4:8–11; 5:9–14; 7:9–12; 11:15–18; 16:5–7; 19:1–4, 5–8). John has not quoted or modified traditional Christian hymns but has composed them himself, making use of traditional Jewish and Christian liturgical elements (e.g., hallelujah, amen, the sanctus [4:8], doxologies [5:13; 7:10, 12; 19:1], and acclamations [4:11; 5:9, 12]). The OT occasionally mentions the heavenly liturgy sung to God by angelic beings (Isa. 6:3; Ps. 103:20), a conception elaborated in Jewish apocalypses and testaments (2 Enoch 18:8–9; T. Job 51:1–4; 52:12). Yet apart from the sanctus, such songs are rarely reproduced (cf. Apoc. Abr. 17:6–21). The Romans (borrowing Hellenistic kingship traditions) developed an elaborate imperial court ceremonial that included the singing of hymns and the shouting of acclamations to the emperor (Dio Cassius 59.24.5; Suetonius Nero 20.3). Alone among apocalyptic writers, John has combined Jewish traditions of the heavenly liturgy with aspects of Roman court ceremonial and used hymns as a narrative device to interpret the significance of eschatological events.

and bowl judgments. Most of the seals represent typical Jewish and early Christian conceptions of the final tribulations (cf. Mark 13:3–8, 24–27, and parallels). The opening of the first four seals sends out four horsemen (adapted from Zech. 1:8–11; 6:1–8), each inflicting a particular kind of judgment on humanity: irresistible conquest, war and bloodshed, famine, disease and death. With the opening of the fifth seal, John sees the souls of martyrs beneath the altar crying out for justice; they are told to wait until their number is completed (Rev. 6:9–11; cf. 7:1–8). The opening of the sixth seal is followed by a series of cosmic disturbances: a great earthquake (a phenomenon all too familiar to the province of Asia), a solar eclipse, the moon turns red, stars fall to earth (cf. Mark 13:24–25; Matt. 24:29), the sky vanishes, and every mountain and island is moved. These terrible catastrophes move unbelievers of every social station to fear the judgment of God and the Lamb, for, they say (Rev. 6:17), who can stand before the day of their wrath? While the last judgment appears to be inaugurated by the opening of the sixth seal, the eschatological program of Revelation still requires the trumpet and bowl plagues.

7:1–17, First Digression: The Sealing of the 144,000. The question of 6:17 provides an introduction to 7:1–17, a digression dealing with how the “servants of God” (7:3) will fare during the coming catastrophes. A twofold answer is provided in 7:1–17. First (vv. 1–8), the effects of the plagues on Christians are delayed while 144,000 servants of God (prospective martyrs) are sealed on their foreheads, 12,000 from each of the twelve tribes of Israel. This throng of 144,000 constitutes the martyr-witness cadre of the church (cf. 14:1; 15:1–2). Their sealing does not protect them against death at the hands of Roman authorities but against the plagues aimed at unbelievers. The motif of immunity derives from the tradition that the Exodus plagues harmed only Egyptians, not Israelites (Exod. 8:22; 9:4–7, 26; 10:23; Philo Life of Moses 1.143–46). Second (Rev. 7:9–17), John receives a visionary preview of an innumerable host (Gen. 15:5) representing all of the people of God (Rev. 7:9). Unlike the 144,000 martyrs, other Christians will perish in the “great tribulation” (v. 14) but will enjoy an eternal state of blessedness with the dawn of the everlasting kingdom (cf. 21:1–5).

8:1–11:14

The Seventh Seal and the Six Trumpets

8:1, The Seventh Seal. The opening of the seventh seal, unlike the first six, results in an anticlimactic period of silence in heaven, perhaps representing the primeval silence of the seventh day of creation. The sealed scroll has now been completely opened, and the remainder of Revelation follows the script it contains, beginning with the trumpet judgments.

8:2-5, The Altar of Incense. As in the other heptads, the opening scene is in heaven. An angel stands at the heavenly altar before the throne of God where the prayers of Christians (no doubt for deliverance and justice) are like smoke mingled with incense rising up before God. The censer filled with fire from the altar that the angel casts down to the earth symbolizes the punishment of humanity that will follow the blowing of each of the trumpets.

8:6-9:21, The First Six Trumpets. The narrative of the seven trumpet judgments, like that of the seven bowls of God's wrath (15:1-16:21), is an eschatological application of the ten plagues of Egypt (Exod. 7-12). Though the Egyptian plagues were a recurring theme in early Jewish literature, they are rarely interpreted eschatologically (an exception: Apoc. Abr. 30). The preliminary character of the judgments unleashed by the seven trumpets is obvious since only one-third of the targeted persons or things are affected. Two-thirds of the natural and human world thus survive for the final round of bowl tribulations. This pattern is unique in Jewish apocalypses and is the author's way of accommodating a trebling of the final punishments. The tribulations unleashed by the seven trumpets are as follows: (1) hail, fire, and blood fall; a third of the earth is burned (Rev. 8:7; cf. the seventh plague of Exod. 9:22-25 and the fourth and seventh bowls in Rev. 16:8-9, 19-21); (2) a great mountain pollutes the sea with blood, destroying a third of sea creatures and ships (Rev. 8:8-9; cf. first plague of Exod. 7:20-21 and the second bowl in Rev. 16:3); (3) a star named Wormwood (named for its poisonous effect, since no actual star had that name) falls on a third of the rivers and springs, poisoning them (Rev. 8:10-11; no model in Exod. 7-12 or counterpart in Rev. 15-16); (4) one-third of the sun, moon, and stars become darkened (Rev. 8:12; similar to the ninth plague of Exod. 10:21 and the fifth bowl-plague in Rev. 16:10); the final three trumpets form a group of three woes announced in 8:13 (cf. 9:12; 11:14); (5) the fifth trumpet causes a star to fall from heaven to earth (Satan, cf. 12:9), which releases a plague of locusts from the bottomless pit who harm only those lacking God's seal (9:1-12; cf. the eighth plague of locusts in Exod. 10:4-20; no counterpart in Rev. 15-16); (6) the four angels bound at the Euphrates River, symbolizing four nations, kill one-third of humankind (Rev. 9:13-19; similar to punishment of the sixth bowl in Rev. 16:12). John concludes by observing that the plagues did not cause unbelievers to repent of their idolatry and immorality (9:20-21). Does this mean that these punishments were intended to serve as a deterrent? Since John's narratives of the trumpet and bowl plagues do not mention repentance as their purpose, references to the failure of people to repent (9:20-21; 16:9, 11) may indicate that John has used Jewish sources that originally emphasized repentance. Of course, repentance was not the purpose of the original Exodus plagues even though Pharaoh's failure to repent is mentioned (Exod. 7:3-4a; 10:1). The failure to repent is a motif derived from Exod. 7-12.

10:1-11, Second Digression: The Angel and the Little Scroll. Following the sixth trumpet (9:13-21), John inserts two digressions (10:1-11; 11:1-14) that expand on the effects of the sixth trumpet (11:14 mentions that the second woe = sixth trumpet has passed) and dramatically delay the blowing of the seventh in 11:15-18 (just as 7:1-17 delays opening the seventh seal in 8:1). John sees a majestic angel whom he describes with imagery like that used to describe visions of God. The angel holds a small scroll, reminding us of the sealed scroll in chap. 5. The angel swears a powerful oath by the creator of heaven, earth, and the sea (and what is in them), which he enacts by touching all three elements (10:5-6). The substance of this oath is the prophecy that there will be no further delay but that when the seventh trumpet sounds the mystery of God predicted by the prophets will be fulfilled (v. 7). The term "mystery" is a technical apocalyptic term meaning divinely concealed information about the end of the age now disclosed to the inspired insight of a prophet or apocalypticist (1 Enoch 103:2; 1 QpHab 7:5; 1 Cor. 15:51; Rom. 11:25-26). When John takes the scroll from the angel (Rev. 10:8), he is told to eat it (v. 9). This prophetic symbolic action is modeled after Ezek. 2:8-3:3, where the episode dramatizes Ezekiel's prophetic call (Ezek. 1:1-3:27). The scroll symbolizes the prophetic word within Ezekiel (cf. Ezek. 3:1) and in Rev. 10:10-11. As soon as John has eaten the scroll he is told (v. 11), "You must again prophesy about many peoples and nations and tongues and kings." This renewed commission reveals John's prophetic consciousness, a commission primarily applicable to the impending judgments of the seven bowls that John will describe.

11:1-14, Third Digression: The Two Prophetic Witnesses. This section narrates the mission of two mysterious eschatological prophetic witnesses. Their ministry, logically following John's renewed prophetic commission in 10:8-11, dramatizes testimony borne by John and his prophetic colleagues. John has probably fused two earlier Jewish oracles (11:1–2 and vv. 3–13), connected only by the mention of the holy city (vv. 2, 8). In vv. 1–2, John is given a measuring stick and told to measure the temple of God, the altar, and the worshipers (a symbol of protection). Is John referring to a literal or a symbolic temple? Since the Herodian Temple was destroyed when Jerusalem fell in A.D. 70, vv. 1–2 may preserve an oracle uttered by a Jewish prophet in besieged Jerusalem late in the war, hoping that the Temple would be preserved (Josephus Jewish War 6.286). The temple and altar probably represent the people of God, while the outer court is the unbelieving world. This entire section is not a vision that John sees but a meditation on the theme of the two witnesses. The pagan domination over the holy city will be for forty-two months (Rev. 11:2); the prophetic witness will be active for 1,260 days (v. 3). Both figures are derived from the “time, two times, and half a time” (i.e., three and one-half years) of Dan. 7:25, symbolizing a limited period of time.

The second oracle (Rev. 11:3–13) focuses on the ministry of the two prophetic witnesses abruptly concluded by the appearance of an eschatological adversary. The passage begins with an allusion to the two olive trees and the two (instead of seven) lamps of Zech. 4:1–14; the olive trees represent Zerubbabel the claimant to the Davidic throne and Joshua the high priest (Zechariah based his hopes for the restoration of Judah on them). The description of the witnesses draws from traditional Jewish conceptions of Enoch, Elijah, and Moses, all taken up alive into heaven like the two witnesses (v. 12). They have the power to perform punitive miracles; they can destroy their opponents with fire and cause drought (like Elijah; cf. 2 Kings 1:9–16; 1 Kings 17:1) and smite the earth with plagues (like Moses; cf. Exod. 7–10). Strangely, the content of their message is not mentioned. They are often interpreted as Elijah and Moses (whose eschatological return was expected; cf. Mal. 4:5–6; Deut. 18:15–18, though not in tandem) or Enoch and Elijah (Apoc. Elijah 4:7–19). Yet they do not embody two specific eschatological figures (since they are identical in every respect) but represent the prophetic witness of the Christian church. The number two emphasizes the reliability of their testimony (Num. 35:30; Deut. 19:15; John 8:13–18). When the brief period of their immunity is over, they will be killed by the beast from the bottomless pit (Rev. 11:7; i.e., the beast of 13:1 and 17:8). The scene of their prophetic activity and the place where their unburied bodies lie is in “the great city,” certainly Jerusalem, prophetically called “Sodom” and “Egypt,” where Christ was crucified, yet actually representative of the world that has rejected the gospel and slain its messengers. Suffering and martyrdom were closely associated with the prophetic role in early Judaism (Neh. 9:26; 1 Thess. 2:15; Matt. 23:34–36 = Luke 11:49–51; Acts 7:52).

11:15–16:16

The Seventh Trumpet and the Six Bowls

Intercalated between the blowing of the seventh trumpet (11:15–18) and the narrative of the six bowls (15:1–16:16) are three separate visionary “digressions” that together form a continuous eschatological narrative (12:1–14:20).

11:15–18, The Seventh Trumpet. The seventh trumpet appears to inaugurate the eschaton, for an unidentified heavenly voice announces: “the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ” (v. 15). Yet, as in the case of the sixth seal (6:12–17), this is another preliminary anticipation.

11:19–12:17, Fourth Digression: Satan and the Messiah. In 11:19, the heavenly temple is opened to the accompaniment of atmospheric and seismic phenomena associated with an epiphany (cf. 8:5, which introduces the series of seven trumpets). John has used both Hellenistic and Jewish traditions in composing this chapter. The myth of the eschatological battle between Michael and the dragon (12:7–9) is inserted into the myth of the woman who bears a child and is attacked by a great red dragon (12:1–6, 13–17). The myth of the woman, the child, and the dragon (12:1–6, 13–17) can be read in several ways. In a Christian context, it is natural to understand the woman of vv. 1–6 as Mary and the child as Jesus. Yet in vv. 13–17, where “the rest of her offspring” (v. 17) are mentioned, she seems to personify Zion or the church, while her persecuted offspring represent Christians. The child is clearly the Messiah, described as “one who is to rule all the nations with a rod of iron” (v. 5, alluding to Ps. 2:9). The fact that the child was “caught up” to God and to his throne (Rev. 12:5) suggests the ascension of the resurrected Jesus. This ascension motif and the yet unrealized messianic rule of the child presuppose the Christian view of two comings of Christ, whereas Judaism expected just one coming of the Messiah. John has rewritten a Hellenistic version of the combat myth found throughout the ancient world. The particular myth John used is the Greek Leto-Apollo-Python myth. The goddess Leto, pregnant with Apollo, was pursued by the dragon Python. Leto fled to a distant island and eventually gave birth to Apollo who, when just four days old, killed Python. To his adaptation of the myth of Leto-Apollo-Python, John has prefixed a description of the two myth-images that served as a catalyst for his juxtaposition of two mythic traditions. A woman appears in heaven (v. 1) followed by the appearance of a great red dragon, her antagonist (v. 3). The woman is presented in astral imagery (clothed with the sun, the moon under her feet, and wearing the crown of the Zodiac) as the queen of the cosmos (v. 1). Artemis, Hekate, and Isis were similarly described. The dragon (alias the devil, the ancient serpent, and Satan, v. 12), the primary antagonist of God, first appears at this point in John's eschatological drama (v. 3). The ascension of the child in v. 5 is described using the rapture motif commonly found in Greek myths involving deification through ascension to heaven.

The myth of the heavenly battle in which Michael defeats and expels Satan and his angels (vv. 7-9; a variant version is reflected in Rev. 9:1; cf. 1 Enoch 90:21) is always a primordial rather than an eschatological event in Jewish thought (2 Enoch 29:4-5; Adam and Eve 12-16; cf. Isa. 14:12-15). Yet Satan's eschatological fall to earth is closely paralleled in the only vision of Jesus preserved in Gospel tradition: "And he said to them [seventy disciples], 'I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven'" (Luke 10:18, RSV). The fact that Michael is the one who defeats Satan, not the Messiah as in Christian tradition, underscores the Jewish character of Rev. 12:7-9. John's elaborate identification of the dragon in v. 9 further suggests his modification of a Jewish source.

13:1-18, Fifth Digression: The Two Beasts. Here John introduces the dragon's two earthly allies, the beast from the sea and the beast from the land who, with the dragon, constitute an unholy eschatological trinity. Many versions of a primal myth of combat between the great gods and a sea dragon or similar monsters circulated in the ancient world. The Greeks told stories about the conflict between Zeus and Typhon, Apollo and Python, the Babylonians about Marduk and Tiamat, and the Israelites about Yahweh and Rahab (Isa. 51:9-10; Ps. 89:10) or Leviathan (Ps. 74:13-14). According to Jewish primeval mythology, God created two sea monsters on the fifth day of creation, Leviathan and Behemoth (Gen. 1:21; cf. 2 Esd. 6:49-52). The female monster Leviathan was confined to the sea (Apoc. Abr. 21:4) while her male counterpart, Behemoth, was confined to the desert (1 Enoch 60:7-9). In Rev. 13, John exhibits his familiarity with the expectation that after the Messiah is revealed, Behemoth will appear from his place and Leviathan will ascend from the sea (2 Apoc. Bar. 29:3). John sees the first beast (the female Leviathan) rise from the "sea" (representing the abyss or bottomless pit [cf. Rev. 11:7] and symbolizing evil and chaos). Blasphemous names are written on its seven heads, and dia-dem adorn each of its ten horns (Rev. 13:1). The appearance of the beast (v. 2) combines several features of the four separate beasts from the sea described in Dan. 7:2-7. The great harlot sits on this beast (Rev. 17:3), whose seven heads stand both for Rome's seven hills and for its seven kings (17:9-10). Horns symbolize power, and the ten diadems suggest universal sovereignty that parodies the rule of Christ (19:12). This beast personifies human opposition to God as represented by the Roman Empire. In Judaism, the sea monster came to represent oppressive foreign nations (Dan. 7:1-8), and occasionally the chaos monsters Rahab or Leviathan represented Egypt (Ps. 74:14; 87:4; Isa. 30:7; Ezek. 29:3). Since this beast has the throne and power of the dragon (Rev. 13:2b), it functions as Satan's earthly representative and as a parody of Christ. The worship that is given to this beast (v. 4) was that connected with the imperial cult. The "blasphemous names" referred to in v. 1 may refer to the honorific titles (such as "lord" and "god") applied to living emperors. One of the beast's seven heads, though fatally wounded, is miraculously healed (v. 3), parodying the death and resurrection of Christ and a possible reference to the legend of Nero's return (Sib. Or. 3.63-74; 4.119-24; 5.33-34). Nero committed suicide on June 9, 68, but few saw his corpse or witnessed his burial. Though hated in Italy, he was popular in the eastern provinces. From A.D. 68 to 88, at least three Nero impersonators appeared. The fact that this beast warred against the saints and conquered them (Rev. 13:7) refers to those such as Antipas who had been executed for refusing to sacrifice in connection with the imperial cult (2:13; cf. 6:9-11; 20:4).

The second beast from the earth (the male Behemoth) had two horns like a lamb, and it spoke like a dragon, obviously a wolf in sheep's clothing (13:11). Later referred to as the "false prophet" (16:13; 19:20; 20:10), it acts as the agent and promoter of the first beast, orchestrating and enforcing its universal worship (13:12). The second beast performs deceptive miracles, persuading people to fashion a cult statue of the beast that has the power of speech (vv. 13-15). Christian eschatology anticipated eschatological "false Christs" and "false prophets" who would perform miracles (cf. Mark 13:22; Matt. 24:24; 2 Thess. 2:9). Religious fraud was common in the ancient world, though it is unknown in connection with the imperial cult. The second beast represents a local authority concerned with the worship of the first beast, probably the priesthood of the imperial cult, the most important cult in the province of Asia. The foundation of the provincial cult of Domitian at Ephesus late in the first century (involving the obligatory participation of the entire province of Asia) provided a climate in which enormous pressures were placed on Christians to be loyal citizens and participate in the imperial cult. Sacrifices and prayers were not ordinarily directed to the emperor but to the gods on his behalf, yet Christians generally refused to make any kind of sacrifices. Emperors were not officially regarded as gods until they were posthumously pronounced divus (Lat., "divine") by the Roman senate, though Gaius (A.D. 37-41) and Domitian (A.D. 81-96) are exceptions. In the eastern provinces, however, they were often accorded cults while living. The second beast compels everyone to be marked on the right hand and forehead with the name of the beast; unbelievers and lapsed Christians thus form an identifiable group in contrast to faithful Christians marked with God's seal (Rev. 7:2-8). The coded name of the first beast is 666, a number that is the total of the numerical value of the letters spelling "Nero Caesar" in Aramaic, John's native language.

14:1-20, Sixth Digression: Three Visions of Victory. John now reports a more comforting series of victory visions. First (vv. 1-5), he sees on Mount Zion the Lamb with the throng of 144,000 faithful martyrs who have the names of Christ and God written on their foreheads (cf. 7:4-8). This group of celibate males (v. 4) is the "first fruits" of the people of God who will share Christ's millennial reign (19:4-6). Their sexual purity represents separation from all forms of sin and idolatry; they are males because they are depicted as victorious soldiers. OT prerequisites for participation in holy wars included the preservation of ritual purity through sexual abstinence (Deut. 23:9-10). This holy war theology was understood eschatologically by the Essenes, who kept themselves in a state of continual ritual purity in readiness for the imminent eschatological conflict.

The second vision (Rev. 14:6-12) consists of three angelic announcements, the proclamation of the gospel to all humanity intended to elicit repentance (vv. 6-7), the announcement of "Babylon's" fall (v. 8, anticipating chap. 18), and a warning of the terrible consequences for those who worship the beast and its image and who bear the name of the beast (vv. 9-11).

The third vision (vv. 13-20), begins with two complementary prophetic sayings articulating the theme of vv. 14-20: Christians who die in the Lord are blessed (v. 13). John envisions the final judgment (vv. 14-20; later described in 19:11-16), based on Joel 3:13, as a twofold harvest, one of grain (Rev. 14:14-16), the other of grapes (vv. 17-20). Harvest was a frequent Jewish metaphor for the last judgment (Isa. 27:12; Joel 3:13; 2 Esd. 4:26-32). Christ, described as the "son of man" of Dan. 7:13-14 (cf. Rev. 1:13), reaps the earth with his sickle. Though the Parousia is not described with traditional Christian imagery (e.g., 1 Thess. 4:15-17), the grain harvest represents the gathering of Christians (Matt. 24:31), while the vintage harvest (Rev. 14:17-20) refers to the judgment of the ungodly (Isa. 63:1-6; cf. Rev. 19:15b).

15:1-16:16, The First Six Bowls. John introduces this third heptad by reporting another sign in heaven (cf. 12:1, 3): seven angels with the seven last plagues. The introductory throne room scene depicts those who had conquered the beast standing beside the sea of glass with harps and singing the song of Moses and the Lamb (vv. 2-3). The Pentateuch records two songs of Moses, a victory song following the Exodus (Exod. 15:1-18) and his swan song (Deut. 32:1-43). Though Rev. 15:3b-4 alludes to both, the theme of a new and final Exodus predominates. Seven angels emerge from the heavenly tabernacle (the heavenly model for the portable sanctuary used by Israel before the building of Solomon's Temple; cf. Exod. 25-27; Heb. 8:2-5) and receive seven bowls or cups filled with the wrath of God (Rev. 15:7), an OT judgment metaphor (Isa. 51:17-23). The plagues enumerated in Revelation 16 include (1) the plague of sores or boils (v. 2; the sixth plague in Exod. 9:9); (2) the sea turns to blood, killing all sea animals (Rev. 16:3); (3) the rivers and wells become blood (v. 4; both resemble the first plague in Exod. 7:20-21); (4) the sun scorches people (Rev. 16:8-9; partially resembling the heavenly fire of the seventh plague in Exod. 9:22-24); (5) the throne and kingdom of the beast are blanketed with darkness (Rev. 16:10; the ninth plague of Exod. 10:21); (6) the Euphrates dries up (Rev. 16:12; no counterpart in Exodus); (7) great earthquakes, the great cities collapse, the islands and mountains disappear, huge hailstones fall (vv. 18-21; similar to the hail of the seventh plague in Exod. 9:22).

16:17-19:10

The Seventh Bowl and the Punishment of Babylon

Babylon was a great and ancient Mesopotamian city of interest to Judaism chiefly because the short-lived Neo-Babylonian Empire (605-539 B.C.) captured Jerusalem and destroyed Solomon's Temple (586 B.C.). In the OT it became a symbol for the current superpower. In Revelation and other Jewish and Christian literature written after A.D. 70, "Babylon" became a cryptic name for Rome (Sib. Or. 5:143, 159; 1 Pet. 5:13; cf. Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 4.23.11). Like Babylon before, Rome had captured Jerusalem and destroyed the Herodian Temple in A.D. 70.

16:17-21, The Seventh Bowl. The pouring out of the seventh bowl represents the climax of the seals, trumpets, and bowls, the final plagues sent by God to afflict humanity (15:1). God himself proclaims “It is done!” (16:17). As part of this last plague “God remembered great Babylon” (v. 19), an editorial link by John to indicate that the seventh bowl includes the judgment of Babylon (17:1–19:10).

17:1–18, The Great Harlot. This visionary episode is unique in Revelation for, unlike the other vision sequences, it describes a static scene, or tableau. This vision of “Babylon” belongs to a Hellenistic literary genre called ekphrasis, i.e., a “detailed description” of a work of art. Though the works of art on which the description is based have perished (probably marble bas-reliefs), copies have survived on ancient coins. These coins, some minted during the reign of Vespasian, depict dea Roma (Lat., “the goddess Rome”) seated on Rome’s seven hills with the river god Tiber reclining at the right and the she-wolf with Romulus and Remus at the lower left. Some coin types reduce the Tiber to wavy lines below the seven hills. The goddess Dea Roma was particularly popular in Anatolia from the mid-second century B.C. on. John used this popular depiction of the glory of Rome as a means for vilifying Rome and contrasting her with the new Jerusalem.

John ties the new vision to the previous section (15:1–16:21) by having a bowl angel show him the judgment of the great harlot seated on many waters (17:1–2). Carried away by the Spirit, John sees a woman sitting on a scarlet beast full of blasphemous names with seven heads and ten horns (v. 3), the beast from the sea (13:1). This woman, decked out like a successful prostitute (Athens is said to dress ostentatiously like a prostitute in Plutarch Pericles 12.2), holds a golden cup filled with impurities (Rev. 17:4). On her forehead is written “a name of mystery” (RSV), “Babylon the Great, Mother of Harlots and of Earth’s Abominations” (v. 5). What does this “mysterious” name mean? The tutelary deity of Rome had a secret name (Plutarch Roman Questions 61). Servius suggested that Rome’s name was concealed to prevent the deity from being invoked to leave the city. The secret name of Rome was popularly thought to be “Amor” (“love”), the Latin name for Rome, “Roma,” spelled backwards. Perhaps aware of this tradition, John depicts Rome as a prostitute, i.e., the antithesis of love. The angel explains that the beast “was, and is not, and is to come” (Rev. 17:8), suggesting both the Nero legend (13:3) and parodying the God who “is, was, and is to come” (1:4, 8; 4:8). The woman herself represents “the great city” dominating the world, i.e., Rome (17:18). Yet in v. 9, the angel interprets the seven heads as the seven mountains on which the woman sits, i.e., the traditional seven hills on which Rome was situated. The seven hills, however, are really seven kings; five have fallen, one is, and the other has not yet come (v. 10). There has been endless speculation about the identity of these kings. If the seventh king is Nero (who when he returns will be the eighth, v. 11), who are the previous six? Nero was the sixth emperor (counting Julius Caesar), and Domitian the twelfth; no matter how the names of the emperors are juggled around, they do not neatly fit John’s scheme of seven. That suggests that the number seven is simply a schematic representation for the complete number of Roman emperors. Actually, according to tradition, Rome did have seven kings during the Roman monarchy (753–509 B.C.). The symbolic significance of the number seven led to the widespread belief among both Romans and Etruscans that the period of kings had been destined to conclude with the seventh king of the seventh saeculum (Lat., “generation,” “reign”). The ten horns (v. 10) are ten client kings of Rome who are of “one mind” (RSV) or “one accord,” an ancient technical term for the kind of concord within a city and unanimity among nations brought about by the benevolence of the gods (in this case ordained by God, 17:17). These client kings, therefore, are not coerced into an alliance with Rome but are in full agreement with it. Their united forces will unsuccessfully war against the Lamb, who will conquer them (v. 14; cf. 19:19–20). The angel interprets the waters (the Tiber) under the harlot as representative of all humanity over which Rome has temporary control (v. 15). In vv. 16–17 a coalition of ten kings allied with the beast will attack and destroy the harlot. The Nero legends anticipated the return of Nero from the east with a great army to destroy his enemies in Rome (Sib. Or. 4.138–39; 5.93–110, 361–85). During the period of the late republic (133–41 B.C.), Rome experienced almost continual internal disorder brought on by a relatively independent army of professional soldiers under the control of strong leaders, some of whom captured the city. When Sulla captured Rome in 82 B.C., he had thousands of his opponents murdered. With the recent instability of the year of the three emperors (A.D. 68–69), the vengeance on Rome associated with Nero’s return had ample historical precedent.

18:1–19:8, Reactions to Babylon’s Fall.

Chap. 18 is a pastiche of five different types of poetic compositions all focusing on the fall of Babylon. The first section, vv. 1–3, though often referred to as a dirge or lament, is actually a prophetic taunt song. Taunt songs were used by OT prophets for deriding the enemies of Israel and announcing their downfall (Isa. 23–24, 47; Jer. 50–51; Ezek. 26–27). This taunt consists first of an angelic announcement anticipating the fall of Babylon (Rev. 18:1–3). The opening words, “Fallen, fallen is Babylon the Great” (cf. 14:8) are derived from Isa. 21:9. There, as here, the statement is a prophetic anticipation of a future event that will surely come to pass.

Rev. 18:4-8, attributed to a "heavenly voice," refers to the future fall of Babylon. It conforms to a particular prophetic form, the summons to flight, consisting of an initial summons to flee followed by a threat of judgment. The form is often found in the writing prophets, particularly Jeremiah and often in connection with fleeing from Babylon (e.g., Jer. 50:8-10; 51:6-10; Isa. 48:20-22; 52:11-12). The form is also found in Christian prophecies (Mark 13:14-20). The command "Come out of her!" (Rev. 18:4) is followed by an encouragement to repay Rome double for her deeds (v. 6). The reason for leaving is because of the imminent arrival of plagues associated with the seventh bowl (v. 8).

In vv. 9-20, John has incorporated three dirges attributed to those sympathetic to Babylon (those enriched by their dealings with the city), kings (vv. 9-10), merchants (vv. 11-17a; cf. Ezek. 27:12-24), and the merchant marine (Rev. 18:17b-19). Each brief threnody or dirge is introduced with "Alas! alas!" (vv. 10, 16, 19) and concludes with the slightly varied refrain that Babylon's destruction has been accomplished in "one hour" (vv. 10b, 17a, 19b). Modeled after Ezek. 26-28, these dirges conclude with a cry of joy in Rev. 18:20. Rome is presented in vv. 11-14 using the common image of the central world market first found in Isocrates (Panegyricus 42; cf. Strabo 17.1.13). The extensive Roman trade in rare commodities was proverbial.

An angel then throws a millstone into the sea symbolizing the downfall of "Babylon" (Rev. 18:21-24). This action contains features typical of the "reports of prophetic symbolic actions" found in OT prophets (e.g., 1 Kings 22:11; 2 Kings 13:14-19). Here in the setting of apocalyptic prophecy an angel rather than a prophet performs the action, which John has modeled after a similar action reported in Jer. 51:63-64 where Jeremiah tells a messenger to throw a stone into the Euphrates, symbolizing Babylon who will sink to rise no more.

The throne room scene in Rev. 19:1-8 is the fifth and last poetic section in this passage. The first antiphonal hymn celebrates the judgment of "Babylon" as an accomplished fact, the subject of the angelic disclosure according to 17:1. This section contains four hymns arranged in two antiphonal strophes: first, 19:1b-2 / 19:3; second, 19:5b / 19:6b-8. In turn, vv. 5b-8 constitute an antiphonal response to vv. 1b-4. The term "hallelujah" (a Hebrew liturgical formula meaning "praise Yahweh," found only here in the NT) is used three times to introduce three of the hymns (vv. 1, 3, 6) and as an antiphonal response in v. 4b. The song of great heavenly multitude (v. 1), probably angelic beings (cf. 5:11), like the angelic taunt of 18:1-3, focuses on the judgment of "Babylon" (and the vindication of the martyrs) as an accomplished fact (vv. 1b-4). The entire scene closely resembles the heavenly liturgy of 5:11-14 (cf. 14:1-3; 15:2-4). An unidentified voice from the throne provides the cue for all of God's servants to praise him (v. 5), introducing a second set of hymns celebrating the fact that God "reigns" (RSV), better translated "has established his reign." The eschatological perspective of this hymn is that the kingdom of God is fully present. The hymn also celebrates the imminent union of Christ with his people using the metaphor of marriage, with the Lamb as the bridegroom and the church as his bride (cf. Eph. 5:21-32; 2 Cor. 11:2).

19:9-10, Conclusion. This brief section, which forms a conclusion to 17:1-19:8, bears several verbal and thematic similarities with 22:6-9. In both, an angel commissions John to write, a beatitude is pronounced, and John is discouraged from worshiping the angelic revealer. The angelic claim that "these are the true words of God" (v. 9b) refers to the entire section 17:1-19:8.

19:11-21:8

The Judgment of God's Adversaries

John has emphasized the structural and thematic importance of 19:11-21:8 by framing it between a pair of angelic revelations (17:1-19:10 and 21:9-22:9) that begin and end with numerous verbal and thematic similarities. Both use female imagery; Babylon the harlot is the central concern of 17:1-19:10, while the Bride, the new Jerusalem, is the focus of 21:9-22:9.

19:11-20:3, The Victorious Parousia.

From the vantage point of earth, John sees the heavens opened (a theme associated with divine revelation and equivalent to the open door in heaven in 4:1; cf. Ezek. 1:1; Mark 1:10; Acts 7:56). Christ rides forth as a divine warrior leading the heavenly armies against the beast, the false prophet, and the dragon who are defeated and punished in the reverse order of their appearance in Revelation 12-13. Though this scene depicts the Parousia (fulfilling Rev. 1:7), the traditional Christian Parousia imagery is missing (cf. 1 Thess. 4:15-17; Mark 13:27; Matt. 24:31). The reason is twofold: first, the emphasis here is on the judicial function of the Parousia (as in 2 Thess. 1:5-10; 2 Pet. 3:8-13), and second, in Revelation the eternal messianic kingdom is placed on a renovated earth so that Christ comes to his people on earth rather than transferring them to heaven. In describing Christ as a victorious warrior, John piles up descriptive epithets and attributes in a manner similar to the Patmos vision in Rev. 1:9-20. Christ's many diadems (19:12) symbolize his sovereignty as "King of kings and Lord of lords" (v. 16). He alone knows his secret name, corresponding to Rome's secret name (17:5). The single allusion to his redeeming death is his robe, which has been dipped in blood (cf. 1:5; 5:9; 7:14; 12:11). His public name is "The Word of God" (19:13; cf. John 1:1-3; 1 John 1:1). An angel announces the imminent destruction of the earthly opponents of God (Rev. 19:17-18) followed by a brief narrative of the decisive defeat of the beast and the slaughter of his client kings and their armies by the armies of Christ. After the beast and the false prophet are captured, they are consigned to the eternal torment of the lake of fire (vv. 19-21). Since the beast and his allies have already destroyed "Babylon" in accordance with God's will (17:16-17), this victory must represent the conquest and destruction of the remaining opponents of God and the Lamb (but cf. 20:7-9). The "lake of fire," mentioned six times in Revelation 20-21, has no close parallels in Jewish eschatology, though fire itself is often connected with eschatological punishment. The next to last stage in the conquest of evil is the confinement of Satan (identified by his several aliases as in 12:9) by an angel to the bottomless pit (the abyss, whence he came) for a thousand years (20:1-3). In Jewish legend, the free rein that he and his angels have exercised on earth must end by God's eschatological intervention (1 Enoch 10; 54:6; 69:27-28; cf. Isa. 24:21-22).

20:4-6, The Millennial Kingdom. During the temporary restraint of Satan (20:1-3), the martyrs alone are raised in the first resurrection (20:5) and reign with Christ on earth for a thousand years (cf. 2:26-27; 7:15-17; 14:1-5). Satan is later released for a limited period (20:3; Jewish eschatology knows no such temporary release of Satan). The notion of a temporary messianic kingdom became a subject for speculation within Judaism after A.D. 70. 2 Esdras 7:26-29 anticipates an intermediate messianic kingdom lasting four hundred years (after which the Messiah dies), while an indefinite period is mentioned in 2 Apoc. Bar. 40:3 (cf. 2 Esd. 12:34; 1 Cor. 15:24-28). Various rabbinic sages reportedly proposed that the messianic kingdom would last from forty to seven thousand years. What is the function of such a temporary messianic kingdom? It reconciles the expectation of a messianic kingdom with the notion of the final realization of the eternal reign of God. Jewish messianic expectation was based on the hope of the restoration of the house of David (cf. Pss. Sol. 17). Yet Jewish eschatological expectation tended to focus not on the restoration of a dynasty, but on a single messianic king sent by God (hence a dispensable theocratic symbol) to restore the fortunes of Israel. A messianic interregnum, therefore, functions as an anticipation of the perfect and eternal theocratic state that will exist when primordial conditions are reinstated forever. Since the Messiah was not a supernatural being in Jewish thought, he must eventually die (as in 2 Esd. 7:29). Yet for Christians, the messianic kingdom could obviously not end that way. As early as Paul, the messianic kingdom of Christ, after an indefinite period, concludes when Christ transfers his sovereignty to God (1 Cor. 15:24-28). To accommodate such a provisional state, John has awkwardly duplicated the final eschatological events and inserted the temporary millennial kingdom in the middle. He narrates two final wars (Rev. 19:11-21; 20:7-10), two victories over Satan (20:1-3; 20:10); two resurrections (20:4-6; 20:12-13); two judgment scenes (20:4; 20:12-13); and two states of blessedness (20:4; 20:12).

20:7-15, The Release and Defeat of Satan. After Satan's release, he gathers armies from the nations of the earth for a last hopeless attempt to destroy the millennial kingdom on Mount Zion (20:7-9; cf. 14:1-5). Gog and Magog, derived from Ezekiel 38-39, are generic names for nations hostile to Israel who unsuccessfully attempt to annihilate the people of God. Yet they will be decisively defeated by judgments from heaven (Ezek. 38:22). Since the names Gog and Magog occur only rarely in Jewish apocalypses, John depends directly on Ezekiel. After Satan's defeat he, like the beast and false prophet before him, is perpetually confined to the lake of fire (Rev. 20:10).

The final judgment is depicted in vv. 11-15 in traditional eschatological imagery (1 Enoch 90:20-27). The second resurrection, implied but unmentioned, enables the rest of the dead (martyrs alone experience the first resurrection), both righteous and wicked, to stand before the throne of God awaiting his verdict. Into this traditional scene of the opening of two sets of books, John has inserted a reference to the book of life (Rev. 20:12; cf. 13:8; 17:8; 21:27). The metaphor of two sets of heavenly tablets or books on which righteous and wicked deeds are recorded for reference on the day of judgment was common in early Judaism.

21:1-8, The New Heavens and the New Earth. John then sees a new heaven and a new earth that have replaced their earlier counterparts that have "passed away" (21:1; cf. 20:11). It is strange that such a cosmic cataclysm is passed over with just two oblique references. The eventual destruction of heaven and earth is part of Christian tradition (Matt. 5:18 = Luke 16:17; 2 Pet. 3:10-13). The descent of the new Jerusalem is accompanied by the commentary that God now dwells with humankind and all death and suffering are now eliminated from human experience (Rev. 21:3–4) with the reinstatement of primordial conditions. In some strands of Jewish eschatology the heavenly Jerusalem replaces the earthly Jerusalem (2 Esd. 7:26; 10:41–44).

The climactic statement of God found in Rev. 21:5–8 summarizes the central message of Revelation. The reliability of the message is guaranteed by the speaker, God himself, the Alpha and the Omega (cf. 1:8) and the Beginning and the End (a widespread Hellenistic divine title emphasizing cosmic sovereignty and lordship). God's message is that those who conquer, i.e., hold fast to the word of God and the testimony of Jesus, will be children of God and enjoy eternal blessedness; those who do not renounce their sinful ways will be punished with eternal torment. God's role in Revelation is similar to popular conceptions of the emperor's primary function: to dispense justice by punishing the disobedient and rewarding the obedient.

21:9–22:9

The New Jerusalem

Here, as in 17:1, a bowl angel invites John to see a special sight, the Bride, the wife of the Lamb, i.e., the new Jerusalem (the people of God under the metaphor of a city), the antithesis of the great harlot of Babylon. The new Jerusalem that John sees descending from heaven is then described in numerous details indicating that it symbolizes the people of God (21:9–22:5). The twelve gates bear the names of the twelve Israelite tribes (cf. Ezek. 48:30–34). In Rev. 21:15–21, John's angelic guide measures the city, whose length, width, and height is twelve thousand stadia (at 187 meters per stadion, the city would be an enormous cube 1,367 miles on each side). The eschatological temple described in Ezek. 42:16–20 is square, in contrast to Solomon's rectangular Temple (1 Kings 6:2), though its innermost room was cubical (1 Kings 6:20). Poetic descriptions of the future Jerusalem describe it as constructed of precious stones (Isa. 54:11–12; Tob. 13:16–17). The precious stones adorning the new Jerusalem contrast with the jewels worn by the great harlot (Rev. 17:4). Each of the twelve foundations of the city bears the name of one of the twelve apostles (Rev. 21:14) and consists of a single enormous precious stone (vv. 19–20). The names of these stones correspond to those mounted on the breastplate of the Israelite high priest (Exod. 28:17–20; 39:10–13). The identity of the new Jerusalem with the church suggests that the twelve stones symbolize the priestly status of the people of God (Rev. 1:6; 5:10; 20:6).

In 22:1–6, John sees aspects of the city based on traditional Jewish conceptions of the three central features of Eden: the throne of God, the river, and the fruitful tree of life (1 Enoch 25:1–7; 2 Enoch 8:1–8). The term “paradise” (meaning “garden” or “park”) was used for the earthly Eden and for heaven (Jub. 4:23; 2 Enoch 8:3, 5, 6 [long]; 8:1, 3, 8 [short]; Luke 23:43). In Jewish legends, Adam lived in paradise (the third heaven, 2 Cor. 12:3–4; 2 Enoch 8:1) and was expelled to earth for his disobedience. The eschatological restoration of primal Edenic conditions found in the OT prophets (Isa. 11:6–9; 65:17–25) became an important theme in apocalyptic thought. According to Rev. 2:7, the tree of life grows in paradise. The traditional river flowing out of Eden (Gen. 2:10) has become the river of life, and the trees of life grow on both banks of the river (inspired by Ezek. 47:1–12). The final goal of salvation is now realized (Rev. 22:3–5). The servants of God are finally able to see him (ordinarily unachievable; cf. Exod. 33:17–20; John 1:18), which means that they share his holiness and righteousness. His name is on their foreheads because they belong to him forever. In fulfillment of the promise made in Rev. 3:21, they will reign with him forever (22:5). Only the 144,000 martyrs shared the earlier millennial reign with Christ (20:4).

Epilogue

Rev. 22:6–9 is a transitional passage that both functions as a conclusion to the larger angelic revelation in 21:9–22:5 (which is parallel to the earlier angelic revelation in 17:1–19:9) and as a conclusion to the entire work. The numerous parallels to 1:1–8 indicate that 22:6–21 does indeed function as an epilogue. John follows the literary conventions concluding Jewish apocalypses by emphasizing the truth and importance of his revelatory message and by referring to how this prophetic book should be used. When he claims that “I John am he who heard and saw these things” (v. 8), he is using a common ancient witness formula emphasizing the reliability of the eyes and ears in gathering direct personal knowledge. Most Jewish apocalypses feign antiquity and so mention the problem of preserving their message for the last days (Dan. 8:26; 12:4, 9; 1 Enoch 1:2). John wrote for his own time so the work must not be sealed until the end but immediately published since the end is near (Rev. 22:10). The staccato quality of 22:12–17 corresponds to 1:1–8. Two complementary prophetic oracles with Jesus as the speaker are quoted in 22:12–13. The reference to his imminent coming (v. 12) is complemented by his claim to be the Alpha and Omega (v. 13; cf. 1:7–8). The seventh and last beatitude of 22:14 pronounces a salvific blessing on those who have washed their robes (cf. 7:14; 16:15), i.e., have been redeemed by the blood of the Lamb and so have access to the new Jerusalem, from which sinners are excluded (cf. 21:8, 27). Another saying of Jesus is cited in 22:16: "I Jesus have sent my angel to you [plural, i.e., the hearers]"; it functions to guarantee the authenticity and authority of the revelation granted to John for the churches. In v. 16b, Jesus identifies himself as the root and offspring of David (emphasizing his messianic status; cf. Isa. 11:1, 10) and as the bright morning star (symbolizing universal sovereignty). The invitation of the Spirit and Bride (i.e., the people of God) to "come" is not addressed to Jesus but invites readers to share in the redemption and the salvation that only the faithful will experience.

The final paragraph in vv. 18–20 contains the author's attempt to safeguard his revelation by pronouncing conditional curses on those daring to add or subtract anything from his book (cf. 1 Enoch 104:10–13). The integrity formula, "do not add, do not delete," was used widely throughout the ancient world in histories to guarantee the accurate use of sources, in treaties to protect their integrity, and in revelatory literature to claim completeness. The penalty for tampering with the text of Revelation is either to experience the plagues described in the book or to be barred from the holy city. Jesus, who testified to the truth of John's revelation, promises "Surely I am coming soon," to which John responds "Amen. Come Lord Jesus!" (v. 20). This concluding prayer probably translates the ancient Aramaic eucharistic formula marana tha ("our Lord, come!") found in 1 Cor. 16:22 and Did. 10:6. The promise of the imminent Parousia is reiterated several times throughout Revelation (cf. Rev. 3:11; 16:15; 22:7).

INDEX TO COLOR MAPS

This index lists geographical names found on the color maps at the back of this book. The number(s) of the map(s) on which the name appears is listed first, followed by the key, or grid reference (a letter-figure combination that refers to the letters and figures at the margins of the map). Places whose names changed over time are identified by a "see also" reference. For example, the entry for Azotus indicates it can be found on Map 11 in location B5, and on Map 13 in location A5, and readers are referred to Ashdod, its alternate name.
